The one who saved me from heaven-hell was Rem, who grabbed my arm and forcibly pried the woman away. Holding onto my right arm, Rem glared fiercely at the stunning intruder.

???: “What’s your deal? Don’t get in the way of me and Master’s tearful reunion!”

Rem: “You’re the one being completely out of line! Subaru-kun’s the one suffering here! Just who are you, anyway…?”

Shaula: “I’m Shaula! I’m Master’s long-distance childhood friend, who met him when we were little and made a promise to reunite someday! That’s my position!”

Rem: “—! Subaru-kun’s childhood friend position belongs to Rem!”

In a flash, Rem yanked on my right arm in protest. But the woman —Shaula—pulled back on my left arm to counter her.

Subaru: “Guaaahh!!”

The two beauties tugged at me with all their might, and my shoulders screamed in agony.

In that instant, one phrase flashed through my mind: the Judgment of Ōoka. You know, the tale of two women fighting over a baby, and the real mother is the one who lets go for the baby’s sake.

So, the one who thought of my wellbeing would surely be the one who truly cared—

Emilia: “B-Both of you, calm down! Subaru’s gonna get torn in half if you keep pulling!”

Subaru: “Gyaaaaaaaaahhh!!”

Unable to bear it, kind-hearted Emilia joined in to stop them—but ended up grabbing my right leg instead. Now I was being pulled in three directions. I was being torn apart.

And of course, in these kinds of situations, there’s always one more who joins in.

Echidna: “In that case, I suppose it falls to me to hold his left leg.”

Subaru: “Th-There’s no “correct” answer here! Echidna-san, help me!!”

Echidna: “Unfortunately, I’m far too weak to resist the others physically. But when it comes to how deeply I care for you… I dare say I won’t lose to them. …How embarrassing.”

Subaru: “NOW IS NOT THE TIME FOR THAT!!”

Echidna blushed faintly, but I didn’t have the luxury to process her tender feelings. At this rate, I was gonna be torn limb from limb.

Rem: “Subaru-kun’s childhood friend position belongs to Rem…!”

Shaula: “Master! It’s time to fulfill the promise we made when we parted ways!”

Echidna: “If nothing else, I will prove my feelings by never letting go…”

Subaru: “Nghhhhhghhhhh!!”

As all four of my limbs were pulled apart, I experienced excruciating pain while witnessing what should’ve been a dream scene—beautiful girls fighting over me.

It was like a warning for how chaotic the rest of my school life would be—

Frederica: “Now then, these two are our new friends: student teacher Echidna-san, and Shaula-san, our second transfer student in two days. Everyone, please help them feel welcome and fit in quickly.”

Everyone: “—Okay!!”

Frederica’s resigned voice was met with the cheerful replies of our classmates.

And as if it were all happening in some faraway world, my consciousness drifted further and further into the void.

Subaru: “Wh-What’s even gonna happen to me from now on…?”

Otto: “…I don’t know either, but it doesn’t seem like anything good.”

The last voice to slip into my fading consciousness was Otto’s, perfectly cast as the best friend in a dating sim, muttering under his breath.

—What the hell is gonna happen to my school life from now on?!

Fourth Period
(LQ AI Translation)

1

Beatrice: “—Rise and shine! Morning’s here, in fact!”

Subaru: “Fonjurass!”

With a thud, the impact marked the start of another morning for me.

Coughing up a storm as I opened my eyes, I was greeted—once again—by the ever-pretty face of my little sister, Beatrice, who somehow seemed more unstoppable in her prettiness every passing day.

Subrau: “No, ‘pretty face’ just doesn’t cut it when describing her… Cute, lovely, so cute… Let’s just call it a ‘super-pretty face.’”

Beatrice: “Hmph, that super-pretty face of Betty’s is here to announce the morning, I suppose. Come now, today’s going to be a very, very important day, in fact. So let’s hop up and go welcome the morning, I suppose.”

Beatrice, with a poetic flair that hinted at a promising future, announced the arrival of the day.

Our family’s Beatrice wasn’t just adorable in looks; she was a multitalented little prodigy, really. With so many paths ahead of her, it was enough to make her older brother feel a little woozy inside.

Subrau: “Ugh… Beako’s gonna end up so out of reach. But I still want her to always wake me up, stopping my late-morning sloth like she does…”

Beatrice: “Betty also wants to keep contributing to your comfy morning wake-ups, Subaru… but that’s not how things’ll always be, in fact. Because Betty is right in the middle of her growth period, I suppose.”

Subaru: “Uwooooh, please always stay my adorable Beako who fits in my schoolbag!”

Beatrice: “I’m way past the age to fit in a tote bag, you know!”

From the bed, as I kept up my aimless chatter, Beatrice walloped me with a pillow.

Fair enough. While I did want to exchange these daily morning affection rituals with my sister for a bit longer, today really was an important day—so I figured I’d better behave.

Because today was—

Subaru: “The long-awaited day of the annual Sakura Festival!”

Beatrice: “I suppose!”

After all, it was the day of an unmissable event for this overly excited sibling duo.

2

Meili: “Oh myyy, your bedhead’s really something, mister∼.”

Subaru: “Ah, it’s you, Meili-chan.”

After dashing about with an energetic Beako and finishing our ruckus in the room, I changed clothes and headed downstairs. The one who welcomed me was a girl munching toast at the table.

The girl with her deep-blue hair braided neatly was Meili-chan, a fellow student at Beako’s school, and one of her good friends.

Naturally, she knew me too, so I patted her elementary schooler head without restraint.

Subaru: “What’s this now, munching on our toast first thing in the morning. Don’t tell me… you’ve finally made up your mind to become my little sister?”

Meili: “Don’t say stupid things, reallyyy. I just ran out of bread at home this morning, so I didn’t get to eat. See, I’m a toast girl in the mornings, you know~?”

Subaru: “Didn’t know, but I’ll make a note of it. Toast in the morning… strawberry jam? Peanuts?”

Meili: “I like ham toast the most~”

Subaru: “A carnivore, huh. Then I’ll jot that down in the ol’ brain notebook.”

Since she’s one of Beako’s close friends, there’s a chance she’ll be back for breakfast again. Normally, Mom would take care of that, but it wouldn’t hurt for me to remember too.

By the way, Meili-chan’s languid way of speaking doesn’t quite feel like a kid’s, but learning that her attitude is largely influenced by her family makes it kind of charming.

And speaking of her family—turns out it’s a small world after all—

Meili: “Still though, saying you want me as your sister, how bold of youuu. That means you’ll marry Elsa, righttt?”

Subaru: “Oho, so you’re going there. True, Elsa-sensei is a beauty with a killer figure, but she’s got that kind of untouchable scary vibe too. I’m still trial-and-erroring whether to go that route, or find a non-legal workaround to make you my sister.”

Meili: “Hmm, do your best, just don’t make Beatrice-chan mad, okay~?”

Subaru: “Hey now, even if I get more sisters, it’s not like my love for each of them gets divided. In fact, my love gets multiplied by the number of sisters… That’s Sister Complex Dynamics Law No. 2. You’ll learn it in middle school.”

As I patted her head while she crunched her toast, Meili-chan let out a weary sigh.

Her reactions were quite different from Beako's, and I loved that. But if I got too carried away, Beako would bite my hand, so I decided to put my siscon pride aside for now.

Petra: "We don't learn anything like that. Subaru-oniisan, please stop saying weird stuff."

Subaru: "Ah, Petra-chan, you were here too?"

Petra: "Yes, Petra-chan is here. I was in Beatrice-chan's room."

Looking up at me while I was playing with Meili-chan was Petra-chan, the girl with the big, adorable ribbon in her hair.

Beako, Meili-chan, and Petra-chan were a trio often seen together, and even setting aside my bias as Beako's family, they were an unusually high face-value group.

And to think they're all in the same class… Their classmates must have it rough.

Subaru: "Just who's the most popular among them… I'd like to say our Beako's number one, but she's a bit shy and has a sharp tongue."

Meili: "Oh, that's sharp of you, mister~. Even at school, Beatrice-chan can be really blunt with the boys. That's why Petra-chan's the most popular~"

Petra: "M-Meili-chan, please don't say that…"

As I folded my arms and analyzed the situation, Meili-chan added commentary while biting into her second piece of toast. Petra-chan blushed at the explanation, but it was a valid take.

Subaru: "All three of you score equally high in the APP metric, but Petra-chan wins out in approachability and friendliness."

Petra: "Even if I'm popular with the boys, it doesn't mean much. My classmates are still so childish."

Subaru: "Oh, the classic "girls mature faster than boys" theory! This is my first time hearing it said aloud, kinda gets me hyped. Go, Petra-chan! Keep those boys wrapped around your finger!”

Petra: “Uuugh, that’s not the point I was trying to make…”

Subaru: “—?”

I’d meant to praise Petra-chan for her budding charm, but judging by her puffed-up cheeks, my response didn’t land well.

Meili: “Seriously~, you’re hopeless…”

Even Meili-chan was sighing behind me.

Hrm, little girls these days are a tough crowd to understand.

Subaru: “That’s where Beako comes in handy. She’s nice and straightforward, makes it easy for her big bro.”

Petra: “Subaru-oniisan, you really need to understand girls better. Why not read the shoujo manga in Beatrice-chan’s room?”

Subaru: “Oi, I’m always hungry for new stories, so obviously I’ve already read everything in Beako’s shelf. Classics like “Kimi Dake ni Todoke” and “Hanayome Danshi”—I’ve covered them all.”

Petra: “Then clearly, it hasn’t helped you one bit!”

Subaru: “That’s harsh?!”

Look, manga’s meant to be enjoyed, not studied. That’s my stance.

Though, if enjoyment leads to learning something, that’s just a nice bonus.

Subaru: “Anyway, that’s beside the point. Since things are turning against me, let’s switch topics. —Petra-chan, Meili-chan, what’re your plans for the Cherry Blossom Festival today?”

Meili: “I’m not really that interested~…”

Petra: “We’re going too. Beatrice-chan’s coming with us. Umm, if you’re free too, Subaru-oniisan…”

Subaru: “Oh? Was that an invite just now?”

Petra-chan shyly opened up the topic, and her kindness really touched me.

She was probably worried that I—the guy who doesn’t get elementary school girls—might be drifting aimlessly around the school.

Sure, from the outside it might look a little sad, a high schooler playing with little kids. But I truly appreciated her concern.

Subaru: “But no worries there. Maybe in another timeline there’s a lonely version of me, but in this heart-throbbing timeline, I’m not alone.”

Petra: “We know you have Rem-oneesan, so we never thought you were lonely. But… being with us might be even more fun… y-you’d have flowers on both arms and your back.”

Subaru: “Wait, that’s not the kind of sympathy I expected?!”

Meili: “And I’m apparently one of the flowers too. That’s scary, cut it out please~.”

Petra-chan’s invite made me super happy, but unfortunately, I had prior plans.

After all, I’d already made a date promise with a smokin’ hottie for today’s Cherry Blossom Festival.

Subaru: “So yeah, I can only hang with you girls for about the first hour of the festival. Sorry.”

Meili: “Still, you’re making time for us~…”

Subaru: “Of course. I wanna party at the festival with Beako, and I wanna see you and Meili-chan having fun too. That’s important to me, y’know?”

If this were a summer festival, I’d be snapping photos of them in yukata for sure—but not today.

Even just watching Beako enjoy herself with her close friends was something I wouldn’t miss.

Subaru: “So yeah, I’ll dash over right after school ends. Forgive me with that.”

Petra: “Mmm… okay. I’ll let it slide this time. But you better come, promise.”

Subaru: “Yeah, I swear. I’ll even pawn off Beako if I have to.”

Petra: “You’re not supposed to do that! You might not be able to buy her back, even with an outrageous price!”

Petra-chan held out her pinky, and I linked mine with hers for a pinky promise.

Just as we sealed the deal, Beako—fully ready for school—came to join us. Thus, with the girl who looked best in a randoseru in the world, and the two other girls tied for first in randoseru rankings, I sent them off—

—and so began the cherry-blossom-drenched day of Natsuki Subaru.

3

Rem: “Please don’t make me repeat myself. Subaru-kun’s mornings belong to Rem.”

Shaula: “You’re one to talk, makin’ me say the same thing over and over again, ‘kay? From now on, I’ll be the one enjoyin’ Master’s mornings. Thanks for your hard work up till now. Shoo, shoo.”

Rem: “I will not “shoo”!”

After sending off the trio of elementary schoolers that morning, I had just changed into my uniform and stepped out the front door when I was met with a ferocious catfight erupting before my eyes.

It was unusual for Rem not to ring the doorbell that morning, so I’d been a little worried something might’ve happened—

Father: “Didn’t think this is what it’d turn out to be. You’ve got some nerve, son.”

Subaru: “Ugh, Dad…?”

Mother: “Oh my, not just Rem-chan… that girl… could it be?”

Subaru: “Huh? Mom, you know her?”

My parents appeared behind me as I stood frozen in the doorway. I ignored Dad’s usual throwaway comment and latched onto what Mom had just said.

The two currently squabbling at the entrance were my childhood friend, Rem, and Shaula, the one who’d just transferred schools the other day.

Shaula had completely blown me away with her greeting during the morning HR on her first day, but ever since, she’d been acting all buddy-buddy with me at every opportunity, causing Rem’s voltage to hit MAX.

But there was something off about Shaula’s behavior. From the way she talked, it felt like she had memories with me that I didn’t know about—memories that hinted at something deeper.

Subaru: “So this is the moment the mystery finally gets solved? Mom, you know Shaula?”

Mother: “Let’s see… remember when you were little, and we went to visit my father? Back then, there was a girl you used to play with near your grandpa’s house… oh right, that scar on your forehead, you got it when you fell there.”

Subaru: “No one cares about my old scar. Also, it’s kinda confusing how you said “your father” and “grandpa” in the same breath… Anyway, this girl I played with, she was?”

If that’s true, then she’s the kind of girl you’d expect in a galge.

Could it be that I really did make some troublesome promise with her when we were kids? That possibility started bubbling up inside me.

Subaru: “Then, with Shaula, I…”

Father: “Wait, wait, hold on a sec. Isn’t that off? I’m pretty sure the one playin’ with Subaru back then at Grandpa’s house was Rem-chan, who’d snuck into the trunk to come along.”

Mother: “Huh? Was it?”

Subaru: “Wait, wait, wait! Now I’m even more confused! Which one is it, seriously?!”

Mother: “Sorry, looks like I was mistaken.”

She always liked to be dramatic, but this time Mom’s false lead left me completely deflated.

In the end, the mystery of Shaula remained unsolved… and it looked like we were moving into the second half of this story.

Subaru: “Second half? We haven’t even left the house yet. Today’s the day of the Cherry Blossom Festival!”

Father: “Exactly. You go do your thing, son. As for me and your mom, we’re gonna enjoy the Cherry Blossom Festival just the two of us, so don’t worry about us!”

Subaru: “Yeah, yeah! Glad your marriage is rock-solid!”

With both words and physical force pushing me forward, I made my way toward the two still locked in a war of words at the front door.

They immediately noticed me and shifted their expressions in an instant.

Rem: “Good morning, Subaru-kun. Let’s go to school together!”

Shaula: “Mooorning, Master! It’s a warm and sunny day, so forget school and come make some sweet ‘n spicy memories with me instead!”

Subaru: “Rem wins.”

Shaula: “Why’s thaaat?!”

Rem: “Yes!”

The tide had turned in Rem and Shaula’s ongoing rivalry.

It wasn’t that I disliked Shaula or anything like that, but still…

Subaru: “I’m the kind of student who actually likes school, which is pretty rare these days. So, sorry, but I can’t go along with the whole “ditch school and have fun” thing.”

Rem: “I understand, Subaru-kun. That’s precisely why there’s a gap between Shaula-san and me. It’s the difference in our childhood friend status.”

Subaru: “Is… that how it works?”

It felt slightly off, but considering Shaula had brought out her own twist on the childhood friend trope with that long-distance angle, maybe there was some rivalry here that only they understood.

Anyway—

Subaru: “Don’t let it get you down. Besides, that promise or whatever you’re talking about? I don’t even remember making it. I don’t even remember where we met before. Honestly, I think forgetting about someone like that would be better for you.”

Shaula: “Master…”

Shaula collapsed on the spot, dropping to her knees with misty eyes fixed on me.

I was weak to that look. But I had to stay firm here. Everything I’d said was how I really felt.

Shaula was beautiful, and she had all the makings of someone who could be happy.

She'd be better off forgetting all about some random pebble she stumbled over on the road.

Subaru: "So yeah, from now on, let's just be good friends—"

Shaula: "In other words, Master's tellin' me not to look at who he was, but who he is now, yeah?!"

Subaru: "That's what you got from that?!"

Wow, the image of me in Shaula's head just keeps gettin' cooler and cooler.

If I had said that on purpose, it'd be crazy cool, but it kinda felt like I was just trying to justify forgetting the promise, so maybe it actually made me look like trash?

Subaru: "Hey, Rem, can you talk some sense into her? Coming from you— Rem?"

Rem: "Th-That never even occurred to me… That was Rem's blind spot. Rem's just been relying on all the memories she has with Subaru-kun as a childhood friend…"

Subaru: "Rem-san? Yoohoo, Rem-san?"

Trembling, Rem stared down at her own hands in shock.

Looking back at what had just been said, I had no clue what could've hit her that hard—but somehow, she seemed to have had a revelation, clenching her fists with resolve.

Rem: "Rem mustn't only look at the Subaru-kun of the past. Rem must see the Subaru-kun of the present, and the future as well. Shaula-san, Rem is deeply moved by your way of thinking!"

Shaula: "Hmm… you might actually be a girl worth talkin' to! You wanna keep the Master's shine burned into your eyes for all eternity too?!"

Rem: "I do!"

The two grasped each other's hands with a snap.

I'd been completely left behind, but it seemed the two of them had reached some sort of understanding. Honestly, if it meant we wouldn't be having these clashes every morning, I was fine with that.

I was fine with it, but—

Subaru: "Uh, ladies? I was thinking we should probably head to school around now…"

Rem: "Ah, yes. Then, Shaula-san, Rem will take the right side today."

Shaula: "Guess that puts me on the left. Fine, long as we swap sides tomorrow, I can deal∼!"

Saying that, the two took up positions flanking me, a perfectly synchronized formation despite the fiery clash just moments ago.

Scratching my cheek, I had a bad feeling and turned to glance behind me.

There stood Dad and Mom in the doorway, giving me warm looks like they were watching something adorable. Flustered, I broke into a run.

4

Emilia: "W-Wow, Subaru, you're reaaally sweaty. Are you okay?"

Subaru: "Y-Yeah, I'm fine, I'm fine… I just got a little too hyped up this morning."

Emilia: "I see… Want to use my handkerchief? I made sure it's nice and clean."

Saying that, Emilia, who'd been waiting at the school gate, offered me a white handkerchief.

Just as she claimed, it was properly folded and even ironed. Using it to wipe my sweat felt like far too cruel a fate for it.

Subaru: “Nah, I’m good. I’ve got my own towel right here. Umm, let’s see…”

Rem: “Here you go, Subaru-kun. I made sure to wash it thoroughly.”

Subaru: “Oh, lifesaver. Thanks, Rem.”

Taking the towel from Rem, I wiped off my sweat without hesitation.

By the way, while I had run all the way from home to school without stopping, utterly drenched and dead tired, Rem and Shaula had not only kept up, they were both perfectly fine.

Emilia: “Rem-san and Shaula-san sure have amazing stamina. Subaru’s totally worn out.”

Rem: “Rem jogs with Nee-sama every morning. That way, if anything ever happens to Subaru-kun, I can run straight to the hospital.”

Subaru: “Please just take a taxi.”

Shaula: “Me too! I’ve got a li’l confidence in my reflexes, y’know! Don’t let looks fool ya, I was a pretty well-known sportswoman back where I used to live.”

Once I finally caught my breath, Shaula’s energetic comment stuck in my head.

I had heard she’d lived overseas before transferring here, but I still didn’t know what she’d actually been doing over there.

However—

Subaru: “Sportswoman, huh…? And you’re not even outta breath, so maybe you’re not bluffing.”

Shaula: “No bluffin’, no bluffin’ at all! My coach even told me I could shoot for the gold medal, I swear! But, well, that didn't really pan out."

Emilia: "Because you came back to Japan?"

Shaula: "Mm."

Something about Emilia's casual question gave me a bad feeling.

Not to sound full of myself, but I couldn't deny the possibility that I was part of the reason Shaula had returned to Japan. Which meant… could it be… she gave up her gold medal dreams because of…

Subaru: "It wasn't for me, right?"

Shaula: "Of course it was for ya, Master! I couldn't sleep at night thinkin' about ya, and honestly, all my grades plummeted 'cause I couldn't focus on anything my teachers or coaches said, so they just booted me out."

Subaru: "That's not "for me," that's "because of me," and it's not even my fault, is it?!"

The absurd self-inflicted tragedy made me regret worrying in the first place. I mean, I wasn't entirely wrong to suspect it, but this was clearly in the realm of personal responsibility, right?

Subaru: "Agh, seriously, I already used up a ton of stamina and willpower this morning… And I'd decided I was gonna go all out and have fun at the cherry blossom festival today. Don't drain my reserves with this slice-of-life skit."

Emilia: "Ah, the cherry blossom festival! That's right, we had that going on today. I almost forgot."

Saying that, Emilia poked her tongue out with a hint of guilt.

A gesture like that from a beyond-stunning girl packed enough firepower to knock someone out cold, but I was immune thanks to all the daily exposure to cute childhood friends, a promising little sister, and her adorable friend.

Subaru: “If you hadn’t brought that up, I’d be a husk by now. You gotta be careful, Emilia-tan. Your smile could either bring world peace or start an apocalypse—it’s a nuclear weapon.”

Emilia: “Sorry, I’ve got no idea what you’re talking about.”

Subaru: “Fair enough. …Wait, is that a phone?”

Her blunt response slashed me down, and bleeding inside, I glanced at the phone Emilia had pulled out. It was old. No, not outdated exactly, just incredibly plain in design.

It wasn’t a smartphone. It looked more like one of those easy-to-use flip phones.

Subaru: “Uhh? Did you find that somewhere?”

Emilia: “Hm? Nope, it’s my phone. Oh, that reminds me, I never got your contact info, Subaru. I was hoping to get it from you since we promised to go to the festival together. Figured it’d be a problem if I didn’t have it.”

Subaru: “Ah, right, right. Putting aside how that phone’s more unique than old-fashioned, yeah, we definitely should exchange info.”

Emilia: “Yes. I’ve already added your home number from the contact list.”

Subaru: “Please, I’m begging you, just don’t call that.”

Emilia: “Eh? O-Okay, got it.”

It was nice of Emilia to add me from the school directory, but if she ever called and my parents picked up, they’d grill her about our relationship and I’d take a critical hit. So I had to eliminate that option in advance.

Subaru: “Still, you should exchange numbers with Rem and Shaula too. You’re going to the festival with Rem, and… Shaula, what about you?”

Shaula: “Huh? Me~?”

Subaru: “Yeah. There’s a festival today. We’re heading there, so you’re coming too, right?”

Shaula: “I’ve been confessed to.”

Subaru: “I have not confessed, thank you very much?! I just said Emilia-tan and Rem are going too!”

Exasperated by Shaula’s wild leap in logic, I pulled out my phone and, fumbling a bit with Emilia’s unfamiliar one, managed to register my number.

Subaru: “Wait, sorry for doing it myself. You probably don’t like other people messing with your phone.”

Emilia: “It’s okay. I don’t really get how to use it anyway, so I usually just guess when I call my family.”

Subaru: “If that works, fine, but maybe try not skipping the tutorial next time. Like in games—don’t skip the first-time tutorial screen if you wanna learn the basics.”

These days, most games are built with intuitive tutorials early on to ease new players in.

Veterans might find it annoying, but you can’t choose a player’s experience level, so I get the developers’ pain.

Anyway, back to the topic at hand.

Subaru: “Alright, I already had Rem’s number memorized, so I added it. Shaula, yours?”

Shaula: “Master, I want you to enter it for me! It’s 080—”

Subaru: “Wait wait wait, you can’t just blurt it out! Protect your privacy! You’re hot, you’ll get stalkers!”

Shaula: “I’ve been confessed to again!”

Subaru: “I said I haven’t!”

After some commotion, we finally managed to register all three numbers in Emilia’s phone.

Shaula was being noisy about it, so I ended up memorizing her number too and added her to my own contacts. Looked like she was officially joining our festival group.

Subaru: “At this rate, adding more people won’t even matter… Rem, what’s Nee-sama’s schedule?”

Rem: “She said she was stopping by Roswaal-san’s place. Depending on how her work goes, she might join us for the cherry blossom festival…”

Subaru: “Hmm, I don’t wanna get in the way of her love life, but I’ll be lonely if Ram’s not at the festival.”

Rem: “Rem feels the same. I’ll ask her nicely.”

Clasping her hands in front of her chest, Rem’s declaration all but guaranteed Ram would show up.

Ram doted on her sister too much to refuse a request like that. At least, as far as I knew, she’d never done it even once.

Subaru: “So, never even once in her entire life.”

Emilia: “Wow, you’re so confident. I heard you and Rem-san are close, but is Ram-san too?”

Rem: “Yes. Subaru-kun and Nee-sama go way back—since they were swaddled together as infants.”

Subaru: “That wasn’t me, that was you, Rem.”

Rem: “My mistake. They were wrapped in the same swaddling cloth.”

Subaru: “That was still you.”

I felt like we'd just done this routine recently. Maybe a year ago?

That said, lingering at the school gate like this was starting to draw attention. I was already sticking out like a sore thumb, surrounded by three beautiful girls. Time to head in.

Subaru: "Right. While we're at it, maybe we should call some other people too. We can help fill up Emilia-tan's contact list."

Shaula: "That's discrimination against transfer students~! I'm a transfer student too, y'know~! Master, I want the same love and affection! Actually, I'd rather have something big and strong~!"

Subaru: "What kind of "big and strong" are you talking about? Like a giant teddy bear or something?"

Incidentally, as a symbol of large, strong affection, there were two huge teddy bears in Beako's room, gifts from both me and Dad that happened to overlap. Watching her sleep nestled between them always gave me that guardian-and-protected kind of vibe—and it was kinda heartwarming.

Subaru: "Huh? What's wrong, Emilia-tan? You're making such a serious face. …Don't tell me, you don't really want more people joining? You'd rather it was just the two of us?"

Emilia: "Nope, that's not it at all."

I was mostly joking, but the flat-out rejection still stung.

While I reeled, Emilia hesitantly opened up to me.

And then—

Emilia: "Um, Subaru. I'm really glad, but… I don't have a contact list. The only things I have are my diary and a vocabulary notebook…"

Subaru: "I meant the phone's one!"

Right on cue, I delivered the standard tsukkomi.

5

Felt: “Ohh, a festival? Sounds great—let’s go together!”

Next to me, Emilia was silently tapping away at her phone, seemingly absorbed in it. Meanwhile, Felt, who’d given her number to Emilia, gave a spirited grin as she spoke.

Just like we’d discussed at the school gate, we were aiming to recruit more members for the festival.

So, since Felt had actually come to the classroom early for once, I took the chance to corner her and bring up the festival and swapping numbers with Emilia.

Subaru: “You’re pretty into it. Honestly, I didn’t expect that.”

Felt: “Huh? Didn’t expect it? What, you think I’m some buzzkill who turns down invites?”

Subaru: “Not that. I’m talking about the lineup. I mean, I’m inviting Reinhard too, you know? You’d act like you hate that, right?”

Felt: “‘Act like’? The hell’s that supposed to mean?! I genuinely hate it!”

Felt tried to kick me with her indoor shoe, making the chair creak as she shifted. I easily dodged her attacks, but geez—she didn’t hesitate at all despite wearing a skirt.

Well, that was just the usual with Felt. She was the kind of girl who’d leap up onto the shoe rack without a second thought if it meant getting away from Reinhard.

Felt: “Lately, running away all the time’s been exhausting. No matter how far I go, that guy finds me anyway, and nobody in class takes my side…”

Subaru: “So now you’re just quietly hanging out in the classroom. Surrendered, huh?”

Felt: “Like hell I have! I’m standing strong, alright? I’ve got a will of steel, and I’m gonna keep dodging all the crap he throws at me. It’s all about me keeping my cool.”

Arms crossed, legs crossed—Felt had a bold, tough-as-nails stance.

And honestly, she had a point. Relationships only work when both sides are on the same page. Still, as someone who’d been watching the two of them inch closer, it was frustrating to see how clueless Felt was about her own changing feelings.

Emilia: “Does Reinhard like you, Felt-chan?”

Felt: “Whuh—”

Out of nowhere, Emilia lobbed that bomb of a question into the sensitive battlefield of love and relationships.

Even though she’d been concentrating hard on her phone, she’d clearly been listening in on us. Snapping it shut with a satisfied “All done,” she handed Felt’s phone back and continued—

Emilia: “The other day, weren’t you two walking your dog together by the riverbank? So I thought you must be reaaally close…”

Felt: “Ugh… I told you back then! I only went with him ‘cause of Romy. That mutt needed walking…”

Emilia: “But Romy’s important to you, right? It’d feel weird to leave him with someone you truly hated. I mean, I love Puck so much, I could never part with him.”

Saying that, Emilia looked out the window.

I followed her gaze, wondering what she was looking at—and was completely floored when I saw a gray cat perched on a utility pole outside. When she said “part with,” did she mean physically?

Puck: “—Come now, it’s just one of Lia’s adorable quirks. Let it slide. I’m only tagging along because I want to, after all.”

Subaru: “You’re sending telepathy directly into my brain now?!”

Felt: “Hey, Subaru. You’re mumbling with this totally freaky look on your face. Also, explain this to the new girl. I’ve tried, but I’m getting nowhere.”

Emilia’s pet cat, Puck, was a spirit beast that only I could hear—a feline monster-in-the-making.

It sounds insane even to say it, but it’s real, so I can’t exactly deny it. Still, talking to Puck like that always got me labeled as a weirdo. Gotta be careful.

Clearing my throat, I turned back to Felt and Emilia.

Subaru: “Emilia-tan, I don’t actually have much to add. Reinhard really does like Felt, and Felt really is trying to run away from him.”

Emilia: “Oh, I knew it! I thought so! Hehe, I’m pretty sharp, aren’t I?”

Subaru: “Yeah, about as sharp as an HB pencil.”

A confidence that fragile needed to be handled with care and a good bit of sharpening.

Well, Reinhard was pretty serious about it, and everyone in class figured it was only a matter of time before something happened between the two.

Of course, for Felt, it probably felt like she was being made into some kind of spectacle—and she wasn’t exactly thrilled about that.

Subaru: “But hey, Cinderella is a storybook character.”

Felt: “A spectacle and a storybook character are not the same thing! I’m not anyone’s showpiece!”

Emilia: “So, it’d be different if no one was watching?”

Felt: “Ghk…!”

Caught off guard, Felt fell silent with a pained expression.

She narrowed her crimson eyes at Emilia, who tilted her head in confusion. She clearly hadn't meant anything by it, making this Felt's loss, honestly.

Felt did have a bit of a feline streak, so maybe she really did have two sides to her. In public, she couldn't bring herself to be honest, but when alone…

Subaru: "She's all claws in front of others, but cuddles up like a kitten when it's just the two of them… Tigress~"

Felt: "Shut up!"

Just as I was about to uncover the truth, Felt's merciless front kick landed square in my gut.

I'd been running my mouth in full joke mode and didn't dodge in time, taking the hit right in the stomach and crumpling. Emilia rushed over in a panic, patting my back.

Emilia: "Subaru, Subaru! Geez, Felt-chan, that was waaay too much for just covering up your embarrassment."

Felt: "I wasn't embarrassed! Anyway! I'm going to the damn festival! And I'm not stopping you from inviting that jerk Reinhard either. He's gonna show up anyway. So I'll just beat him at his own game!"

Subaru: "Wh-What exactly do you think Reinhard is gonna do to you…?"

Felt stormed out of the classroom, flipping the bird as she went.

So in the end, though it was still about Reinhard, the reason she bailed was more roundabout than direct. She probably wouldn't be back until homeroom.

Subaru: "Ahh, crap. I messed that up. Teased her too much… I'll have to apologize later."

Emilia: "Wait, you were teasing her?"

Subaru: “I’m surprised you didn’t notice, Emilia-tan, but yeah—it tracks. …Anyway, I’m rooting for Reinhard in this love story.”

That wasn’t just because I bet on the two of them ending up together in the class pool, but also because Reinhard was my friend.

Tall, handsome, and a genius at everything, Reinhard still fumbled like a clueless newbie when it came to Felt—it was his first love, and it showed.

Subaru: “Still, there’s something sweet about it, like you just have to peek through your fingers even when it’s too cringey. Y’know what I mean?”

Emilia: “Kinda… kinda not… But I get what you’re saying, Subaru. When two people like each other, you want them to get along. I always want Father and Mother to stay reaaally close too.”

Subaru: “Hm? Mmm… Yeah, that makes sense.”

When you brought married couples into the mix, the discussion shifted a bit, but it wasn’t wrong in a broad sense. So Subaru didn’t argue it.

That said, Reinhard’s feelings didn’t mean Felt’s could just be brushed aside. That part deserved reflection.

Subaru: “Felt, as you saw, takes action when she doesn’t like something. I don’t think she truly hates him though.”

For all her talk, Felt never went harder than Reinhard could handle.

That hesitation said a lot—and I, for one, wanted my buddy’s first love to work out.

Subaru: “So, with that said, I’d like to officially invite Reinhard to the festival too.”

Emilia: “Sure, no complaints here. I’d love to get to know him better too.”

Subaru: “Aww, that big ol’ heart of yours is what makes you amazing, Emilia-tan. Yo, you hear that, Otto?”

Otto: “You were acting like I didn’t exist this whole time, and now this?!”

With a theatrical reaction, Otto joined the conversation from the edge of the scene.

Otto, by the way, was the ace of the soccer club despite how he looked. He usually took naps at his desk until morning homeroom after early practice.

But when needed, he always chimed in like this. Really convenient dude.

Subaru: “From how Felt acted, looks like she hasn’t invited Reinhard yet. That’s rare. You got any idea why?”

Otto: “Nope. Reinhard and I aren’t in the same club or anything.”

Subaru: “Useless. You know in dating sims, the protagonist’s best friend always has tons of info, right? You gotta be that guy.”

Otto: “It’s already presumptuous of you to call yourself the protagonist. And those best friend characters only prep info about girls anyway.”

Subaru: “Otto, you and your facts…”

Otto: “Am I not even allowed to speak logically anymore?!”

Still, Otto had a point.

Even in games, the best friend wouldn’t be expected to keep tabs on male classmates, after all.

Subaru: “Although… if we’re talking dating sim logic, maybe…”

Otto: “Why do you have such unshakeable faith in this ‘dating sim best friend’ nonsense?”

Emilia: “I don’t really get this ‘dating sim’ thing… but Otto-kun, you're coming to the festival today too, right? Wanna come with us?"

And just like that, Emilia brought the dating sim argument to a close with her invitation to Otto.

Hearing that, Otto's eyes widened, and I slapped a hand over my face.

Emilia: "Huh? Did I say something weird?"

Subaru: "Yeah, Emilia-tan. You gotta tease Otto a bit more first…"

Otto: "You literally just said you'd reflect on your behavior toward Felt, and now you're doing the exact same thing to me?!"

Subaru: "Alright, alright. Then let's promise to meet under the legendary cherry tree."

Otto: "You're still dragging this dating sim stuff out?!"

Always throwing out oddly specific references—Otto Suwen just couldn't escape the aura of a dating sim best friend.

Anyway, with Otto joining the Sakura Festival crew, our adventure was far from over.

Subaru: "Yeah, our festival's just getting started!"

Otto: "It's about to end right here though!"

Emilia: "Wow, you two are in sync!"

This was Otto Suwen.

6

Frederica: "As you all know, the Sakura Festival is being held today. I believe many of you will be going out to enjoy it, but please do not get carried away. As students, you must strive to conduct yourselves with dignity."

Subaru: "Even if you don't say it, Derica-sensei. We're in high school, you know?”

Frederica: “Yes, which is exactly why I am saying it to you, Natsuki-kun.”

Subaru: “Huh?!”

In the homeroom after school, with the Sakura Festival still to come, there was a restless air about the room—and in that, I got singled out by none other than our Frederica-sensei.

Dignified conduct as a student, huh? I had no idea what I’d done to deserve being called out like this.

Subaru: “Derica-sensei, why me?”

Frederica: “The rumors have reached even my ears. Apparently, a great coalition is being formed to attend the Sakura Festival. It is said the instigators are Natsuki-kun and Emilia-san.”

Subaru: “Coalition? Isn’t that a bit much?”

True, I was the one who proposed gathering a party to attend the Sakura Festival under the banner of “Let’s make more friends for Emilia.”

Then it became a second mission, standing against Shaula’s claims of transfer student discrimination, and I figured—might as well invite our classmates too. I told those classmates to “invite anyone,” but still—

Subaru: “That’s not such a weird thing to say, right?”

Ferris: “Ohh my, Subaru-kyun’s suuuper funny. He doesn’t even remember who he asked what~”

As I tilted my head, Ferris giggled into his hand, lips curved in that infuriatingly smug way.

I raised an eyebrow at Ferris’s overly cutesy behavior and shot back a “What now?”

Of course, Ferris was also one of the people I invited to the festival. He'd agreed without issue. I didn't think it was any problem.

Subaru: "So then why the cryptic act?"

Ferris: "Ohh, Ferri-chan's not tryin' to be cryptic~ But! Since you invited Ferri-chan, naturally, you also invited Crusch-sama, didn't you?"

Subaru: "That's… ahh, no way."

Finally catching on to what Ferris was saying, I peeked over Ferris's head to look at Crusch seated behind him.

Wearing her uniform with perfect composure, Crusch met my gaze and gave a solemn nod.

Crusch: "Do not worry. You said yourself, the more the merrier, did you not? Therefore, I extended invitations as broadly as possible. We should expect a reasonable turnout."

Subaru: "I wasn't trying to recruit a damn army!"

Crusch's response missed the point, but then again, she was the student council president of this school. On top of that, her family was a well-known house in the city, meaning she had connections far and wide.

Judging by how far she'd misunderstood the assignment, I had a bad feeling her invitations didn't stop at our school.

Ferris: "Sooo yeah~ Might end up a waaaay bigger group than lil' Subaru-kyun imagined~"

Subaru: "'Might'?! If you knew, why didn't you stop her?!"

Ferris: "Ehh~, but like, why would Ferri-chan stop it~? Crusch-sama was so earnestly workin' on it, and her serious face was sooo pretty…"

Subaru: "Ughh, I'm the idiot for ever counting on you."

Ferris: “Subaru-kyun’s a dummy∼”

Subaru: “Say that again?!”

And just like that, I got baited into snapping back at Ferris, the provocation too effective for its own good.

Ferris and I locked horns like a pair of overexcited hamsters until Frederica-sensei clapped her hands sharply at the front of the classroom.

Frederica: “That’s enough! Setting your little quarrel aside, Natsuki-kun, that is not all!”

Subaru: “Wait, there’s more?”

???: “Of course. Have you already forgotten that you extended the same invitation to me as well?”

Hearing that voice, all I could say was, “Ugh.”

Turning around, I found the smug, oh-so-smug expression of the young lady flaunting her customized school uniform—Priscilla.

Fanning herself with a closed sensu, she masked her mouth and continued:

Priscilla: “Events such as these petty festivals in town hold no appeal for me. However, to reject a direct request would reflect poorly upon my grace. Thus, I pulled a few strings as well.”

Subaru: “W-Wow, ‘pulled some strings.’ That’s… not really something high schoolers usually say, huh?”

Priscilla: “Fret not. While it irks me to allow that vixen a moment of satisfaction, if the stiff-necked student council president is to act, then mineself must, naturally, surpass her. It is merely a matter of course.”

Crusch: “Hm. That is quite noble of you. So, then… are you declaring a challenge to me?”

With an amused glint in her eye, Priscilla threw down the gauntlet, and Crusch—of course—accepted it without hesitation.

This was bad. Two of the class's Three Great Ladies were about to clash—and no one wanted that.

Subaru: "Wait wait wait! Both of you, don't fight for my sake—!"

Priscilla: "Fool. Who said we are fighting for your sake?"

Crusch: "We are simply acting in accordance with our names and responsibilities."

Subaru: "It's really not that serious! Also, if this drags on any longer…"

Neither Crusch nor Priscilla were listening. I started to sweat as I tried to explain the real issue. But someone else beat me to it.

And that someone was—

Anastasia: "—Hey, y'all. You do realize today's an important day for me too, right?"

Anastasia: "Yet here ya are, yakkin' on and on… I'm tryna wrap school up quick and head on over to the festival venue, y'know? Can I make that any clearer?"

Smiling sweetly as ever, Anastasia stood from her seat. The last of the Three Great Ladies had finally spoken.

Anastasia, known for freely coming and going from the city's Chamber of Commerce—some even said she ran the whole thing from behind the scenes—had, as I'd heard, been pouring herself into festival prep for days.

Well, actually, she told me that herself. So it was totally understandable she wanted to get to the venue as soon as possible.

Anastasia: "Y'all can play at bein' whimsical young ladies all ya like. But there's a time and a place, and if ya don't learn that now, ya'll be strugglin' plenty in the adult world. Y'all're high schoolers already. Should know better by now."

Priscilla: "You dare think yourself superior for no more than rubbing shoulders with the Chamber of Commerce? True influence is exercised in its rightful place. If you must dance in such petty halls, it speaks only of how lowly you value yourself."

Crusch: "Your tongue runs too far. Yet, I must admit, Priscilla's words do carry weight. Anastasia, I too appreciate your efforts, as a fellow member of the student council. However, neglecting our scholastic duties sounds a poor note."

Subaru: "GYAAAH!! Frederica-sensei! I'll be careful not to go overboard at the festival! And I'll take more responsibility for what I say and do! So please let's just end homeroom now!!"

Caught between the sparks flying from the three girls now standing at the center of the classroom, I begged Frederica-sensei to step in before things went full nuclear.

It was, quite frankly, like praying to God to stop a war—but unlike God, Frederica-sensei was actually present and could be guilt-tripped into action.

Frederica: "Very well! During the festival, see to it that you do not act as wildly as you are now! I do not wish for your memories of a joyful event to be sullied!"

Class: "…"

Frederica: "I said, do you all understand?!"

Class: "Yes!!"

And so, with my loud voice speaking for the whole class, homeroom came to a close.

At last, the Sakura Festival was set to begin.

And just like that, the day of the actual Sakura Festival had arrived.

The Sakura Festival was a spring event held at a well-known location, famous for its dense and extravagant row of cherry blossom trees. Countless stalls lined the walkways, and it was simple in design—a quintessential spring festival.

After school, everyone headed home to change into their casual clothes, then gathered at the festival's entrance.

Under a loose rule that even if one couldn't make it at the agreed time, they could simply join later, we decided to hang out together with an easygoing mood—but also being careful not to piss off Derica-sensei.

At the very least, if anything happened, odds were I'd be the one getting chewed out for it.

Subaru: "Seriously, how did it even come to this… huh?"

Grumbling, still not fully convinced by the situation, I made my way to the meeting spot. There, I spotted Emilia already waiting.

However, she wasn't alone.

Subaru: "No way… Don't tell me some sleazebag tried to hit on her—"

Echidna: "—Please, let go of me. I'm supposed to set an example for the other teachers."

Emilia: "Oh? No need to worry so much. I think it's fine if we just go around together. It's not like you're forbidden from having fun, right, Echidna-sensei?"

Subaru: "Wait, Emilia-tan's the one doing the hitting up?!"

Rolling up my sleeves, I had rushed in ready to save her, but all that fiery determination was for nothing.

I'd totally pictured some thuggish guy bothering the beautiful Emilia, but apparently I'd gotten the roles completely reversed.

The one being dragged around by Emilia was a white-haired beauty —

Subaru: “It’s Echidna-san. …No, Echidna-sensei.”

Echidna: “Natsuki-kun. …It feels oddly ticklish being called “sensei” by you.”

Subaru: “You’ll have to get used to it. You’re the one who decided to become a student teacher, not me. Still…”

Looking slightly troubled and blushing faintly, Echidna-san was currently undergoing her teacher training at our Lugunica Academy.

To me, she was one of the lovely ladies from the neighborhood, so I had some mixed feelings about how to interact with her at school—but I made sure not to show any of that.

Because, honestly, seeing her flustered like this was a blessing for the eyes.

Subaru: “So Emilia-tan’s the one holding Echidna-sensei back?”

Echidna: “Yes, exactly. Could you please talk to her too, Natsuki-kun? Officially, I’m here as a teacher. My purpose at this festival is to supervise students.”

Emilia: “You’ve said that a bunch already. But it’d still feel sad if you just left. Right, Subaru? Wouldn’t it be nice if we all went around together?”

Subaru: “Hmm.”

Scratching my cheek, I glanced back and forth between Emilia-tan and Echidna-san.

Well, both of them had a point. Echidna-san was technically working. As a trainee, she probably needed to draw a firm line between herself and her students.

But from Emilia’s perspective, it did seem weird for someone she knew to be nearby, watching from a distance, and yet not joining them.

Subaru: “Hmm… If I had the casting vote, I’d side with Emilia-tan. I wanna hang out with Echidna-sensei too.”

Emilia: “See! Subaru agrees with me!”

Echidna: “Even you, Natsuki-kun… Do you not care if I fail my teaching practicum and lose my chance of becoming a proper teacher?”

Subaru: ““Proper teacher” kinda sounds shady the way you say it, but I’m not hoping for that. I get where Emilia-tan’s coming from. And honestly, we’re probably the biggest group from school here at the festival.”

Echidna: “Mgh…”

In truth, with Crusch and Priscilla’s cooperation, plus Otto and Reinhard, not to mention Ram being roped in through Rem’s pleading… even I had lost track of the full headcount.

It might not have reached triple digits, but a high double-digit turnout was very likely.

Apparently, Echidna-san had also heard something similar from Frederica-sensei.

Thinking maybe my claim had some weight to it, she let out an unusually deep sigh and—

Echidna: “You really are good at convincing people. That’s Echidna’s genius for you.”

Emilia: “Wow, I want one too!”

Echidna: “Do you…? I was just about to say I wasn’t sure whether to be happy about that or not.”

Regardless of Echidna-san’s mood, Emilia seemed unusually attached to her.

Curious, I asked her about it. Emilia tapped her finger to her lips and said,

Emilia: “I’m not really sure why either, but I just felt like I wanted to be friends with Echidna-sensei. Or maybe, I felt like we could be friends.”

Subaru: “I see. By the way, I live near Echidna-sensei, so if you become friends with me, you’ll naturally run into her more often…”

Echidna: “Please don’t use me as a stepping stone for getting closer to her. That stings a little.”

Subaru: “Ugh, sorry. I got a bit too greedy trying to score a win.”

I genuinely reflected on my misstep.

Then, perhaps thanks to our combined persuasion, Echidna-san said she’d contact Frederica-sensei and stepped away, phone in hand.

I thought maybe it was an excuse to bail, but she made the call somewhere visible, so it seemed like she’d really come to terms with it.

Emilia: “Huh? Subaru, were you already at the festival earlier?”

Subaru: “Ah, yeah, kinda. It wasn’t sneaking around or anything—I had plans with my little sister and her friends. You know, elementary school finishes earlier.”

Emilia: “Ohh, so that’s why you dashed off like lightning after homeroom ended.”

Subaru: “Exactly.”

Since homeroom ran late, I’d had to rush like crazy to make it in time for my promise with Beako and the others. I used all the shortcuts and alleys I could, and nearly blew out my knees, so I ended up taking a taxi at the end. Dad covered the fare after seeing how desperate I was.

Subaru: “Anyway, I met up with my sister and her friends and had a bit of fun. Beako, obviously, but Meili-chan and Petra-chan were all smiles too. Petra-chan especially, she was extra stylish today… That's totally 'cause of a boy."

Emilia: "Huh? Subaru, your sister's in elementary school, right?"

Subaru: "Yup. But you know, kids these days are way ahead of the curve. Way different from when I was their age. Even game graphics are in a whole different league now."

With every new console generation, graphics that once seemed unbeatable just kept evolving. Really made you feel like human technology knew no limits.

While I was marveling over the future of children, Emilia softly murmured something.

Emilia: "I'd like to meet your sister too."

Subaru: "Oh…"

Emilia: "Hmm? Did I say something weird?"

Startled by her unexpected remark, I stared at her with wide eyes. Emilia tilted her head in confusion. I frantically waved my hands, head, and knees.

Subaru: "No no no, nothing weird! Not weird at all! Actually, yeah, I'd love for you to meet Beako too. I think you'd get along great."

Emilia: "Hehe, I'm looking forward to it. I'll bring Puck along too."

Subaru: "Yeah, sounds good. I've got a feeling Beako and Puck would really hit it off."

Well, Beako's cuteness was an all-devouring black hole, so there wasn't a soul in this world who wouldn't get along with her.

Emilia: "Thank you, Subaru. For everything."

Subaru: "Eh?"

Emilia: “I was really nervous about transferring, wondering if I’d fit in… But you, Rem-san, and everyone else have been so kind to me…”

Saying that, Emilia turned to look at me.

Right at that moment, a slightly strong gust of wind blew, sending a flurry of cherry blossoms fluttering around her. The petals danced, swaying around her smiling face, as if enchanted by her presence—

—I guess this is what they meant by being captivated.

Emilia: “Thank you, Subaru.”

Subaru: “…Don’t mention it. I’m just glad you’re having a good time, Emilia-tan.”

Barely managing to keep my composure, I gave her a reply.

For a brief second, I’d been so completely taken in by her, I didn’t want to ruin her natural charm with any weird reaction of mine.

Because that casual, unassuming moment felt so incredibly precious.

Rem: “—Subaru-kun! Sorry, did we keep you waiting?”

Shaula: “Master!!”

Right then, I heard Rem and Shaula calling out from behind.

And it wasn’t just them. More and more of our reliable crew had arrived, all ready to make the most out of the Sakura Festival.

Subaru: “Sure, the Sakura Festival’s fun and all…”

Emilia: “Hmm?”

Subaru: “But there’s still plenty more fun ahead. Get ready, Emilia-tan.”

As I watched everyone approach, I turned and winked at Emilia.

Flashing a dazzling smile, teeth gleaming, I struck my coolest pose and fired off my line at the girl I had my eye on.

Emilia blinked at me in surprise—and then smiled again.

And with that smile—

Emilia: “Yes, I’m reaaally looking forward to it!”

She smiled as brightly as the full bloom of cherry blossoms overhead.

—The festival was just beginning.

But it wasn’t only the Sakura Festival.

If every joyful day could be its own celebration, then the festival had already started long ago—and it would keep going.

—The festival goes on. The festival never ends.

Because the fun was only just getting started.

Blu-ray Specials

Bonds of Ice

Prologue:
Four Greats and an Outsider

—There exist beings known as spirits.

Mana fills the world. The Od Laguna is the source of this mana, and is considered to be the foundation of eternity. Spirit is the term used to refer to supernatural beings who are given life by the Od Laguna, manifest in this world through the power of mana, and meddle with it as they please.

They are born as lesser spirits, become quasi-spirits, and finally reach the status of spirit. Particularly powerful spirits are known as great spirits, but even among them there are four who possess exceptional power, the ones known as the Four Great Spirits, and these four spread dread, reverence, blessings, and menace across all the land.

Dread—the self-appointed 'Arbiter' Melakuera, who acts in order to preserve the balance of the world.

Menace—the most beautiful slayer, the 'Slasher' Zarestia who indulges in eternal peace in her bed.

Reverence—the 'Stone' Muspel, a sanctuary that merely exists, possessing neither will nor words nor ideology.

Blessings—The 'Sacred Beast' Odglass, who watches over humanity with affection and benevolence from atop the Sacred Mountain.

Four great spirits all of whom possess equal might, the Four Great Spirits.

Their existence and names are known far and wide, and the matter of how to deal with them is considered to be of grave importance in all the world's countries.

In truth, history even tells of an entire city that was burned down by their wrath. Setting aside Odglass, the Four Greats cannot be said to be friendly to mankind, and their actions for the most part are entirely self-serving.

This especially applies to the reason for the previously mentioned destruction of a city—It is said that it was caused by a clash between the Arbiter and a Great Spirit that possessed power rivaling the Four Greats.

Neither the name nor the appearance of this Great Spirit on par with the Four Greats are known.

But a name took on a life of its own, and the Great Spirit that escaped the Arbiter's judgement and lived on was called this by the people who feared it:

—A terrible beast as powerful as the Four Greats, 'The Beast of The End'.

Its actual circumstances and location remain unknown to anyone—

Chapter 1:
Called by You

1

When she woke up, the first thing she felt was the cold.

“…It’s reeeally cold.”

She whispered as she sat up in her crudely fashioned bed

—She was an extraordinary girl with exceptional features. Her silver hair was like moonlight itself, her skin as pure as virgin snow. She narrowed her amethyst eyes which resembled dazzling jewels, her beauty was truly miraculous.

However her countenance was marred by drowsiness, and it didn’t appear she would leave her bed any time soon.

“…”

In this manner, she whiled away her time wrapped up in her bedsheet. Fresh air blew in from outside her room. The atmosphere was the very picture of dawn, but the girl continued to waste time half asleep.

Even though it was only morning, one might worry about just how sleepy she was.

“Gotta get up…”

Nearly an hour had passed before she fully woke up.

She yawned, her long legs stretching out as she left the bed. Her thin nightclothes hung off her shoulder, salaciously exposing her smooth, slender body.

Her immodest appearance was more like a work of art than anything salacious, like some master painter’s finest work. It was far too careless even though there was no else there, it was as though she wasn't even considering how others looked at her.

"…"

She slowly opened the door and went outside as she tidied her long silver hair. She lived in a huge tree which had been hollowed out and even had doors and windows. She narrowed her eyes as she looked overhead at the sunlight streaming in through the trees, and then shut the door with her bottom.

She descended the winding roots barefoot, down to the frost-covered land, the chill eliciting a small moan. She then headed to a nearby stream as she relished the feeling of walking on ice.

The small stream next to her tree was indispensable to her lifestyle, a blessing from nature. She got on her knees and started washing her face with the freezing water.

"Mm! Mn-!"

The water's temperature was quite literally eye-opening, obliterating any last traces of drowsiness. She then smacked her cheeks as she stood up.

"Mm, alright!"

Having finally overcome her sleepiness, her voice was overflowing with vitality.

She shook her head to dry her bangs, and then left the stream.

"Okay, now to take care of everyone."

Near the stream was a clearing she used to dry her clothes, it simply consisted of a line going through the trees. She obtained a small towel from here and started sprinting with vigor.

She dashed into the forest, trampling grass and leaping over roots as her skirt fluttered freely.

Her surroundings were white, the wind was cold, but even so, it was a scenery she was familiar with. Grabbing a branch with one hand, she executed a pendulum-like swing.

She reached her destination having greatly shortened her path, as though making up for her drowsiness that morning.

“Hup, and there! Good morning, everyone!”

As she landed, she pitched forward to kill her excessive momentum. As if to cover up the awkwardness, she stuck out her tongue and greeted the figures before her with an embarrassed grin.

“…”

However she received no reply.

It was only natural, though they looked human, they were in fact ice sculptures. There were three exquisitely crafted sculptures, standing back to back in a corner.

She held her towel up to them with a smile, “Well then, I’m going to clean you up again, please bear with me.”

Her apologetic voice signaled the beginning of her daily routine. She used her towel to gently clean off the snow accumulating on the sculptures. Using minimal force, her technique was cautious and tender.

Before long she’d tidied them up sufficiently, and nodded with satisfaction as she stretched lightly.

“I overslept today, so I’ll have to speed things up a bit.”

She looked up at the sky and reflected on her tardiness. Her daily routine, the maintenance of those sculptures, was far from over.

Throughout the forest, there were many such sculptures scattered here and there and it was her duty to take care of all of them. The sun was higher than usual, she’d have to give it her all to make up for the time she’d lost, as she built up her motivation-

“—Oh dear, another day of hard work I see.”

Suddenly, a voice from the sky took the wind out of her sails.

"…That again, the way you talk is reeeally mean."

"I mean, it's strange. No one asked you to do this, so to me it seems like a total waste."

"It's not like I'm doing this to have someone praise me, don't say that sort of stuff."

The voice speaking to her was androgynous, and they couldn't be seen even if she looked overhead. The girl puffed her cheeks in displeasure as she steadily grew more frustrated.

"Not even a greeting, and you won't show your face? That's reeeally rude, you know?"

"Hm, I suppose you're right. One moment."

Freezing winds blew through the forest in response to the pouting girl's complaint.

That wind carried with it a hint of pale green, forming a whirlpool in front of the girl. A silhouette started to take shape, and in the blink of an eye the light manifested into a being with a fluffy gray coat of fur, small enough to fit in a palm.

Waving a tail as long its body, its round black eyes looked right at her. It truly did resemble a cat.

However, its true nature was entirely different, otherworldly in fact. An entity possessing supernatural abilities beyond the framework of the natural world.

"—Mr. Spirit."

Her form of address caused the spirit's face to change. A humanlike gesture, a smile.

"That is indeed what I am, but it feels wrong considering our relationship."

The kitten seemed displeased to be called a spirit, he groomed his face as he floated in front of her as though it was completely natural.

The girl sighed lightly at his attitude, and then-

"—Puck."

"Yep, very good. It makes me happy, Emilia."

This time the spirit called Puck smiled genuinely at the girl named Emilia. The girl thought him strange, for his smile was filled with tremendous affection.

In that enormous forest covered with freezing wind and snow, the odd pair conversed. In the entire frozen forest, there was only their small exchange.

2

—To Emilia who lived in the forest, Puck was akin to a strange neighbor. They weren't together enough to be called family, and they weren't familiar enough to be friends. But they weren't so distant as to be acquaintances.

Thus, they were neighbors—That's what Emilia thought at least.

"Really, what a layabout, always bothering me when I'm busy."

"Ehh, that's not quite right. Rather, you're the one at fault since you're always busy."

"There's a whole lot I have to do! I don't have time to play around with you."

"You have time to doze off in the morning, though?"

"D-Don't say such absurd things, I always get up early! Really, you know?"

Puck casually played with his whiskers as he watched Emilia turn red and make excuses at record speed. He simply floated behind her as she rapidly progressed through the forest.

As Emilia continued her routine, Puck started circling above her as he attempted to lure her.

“I won’t deny that I’ve got time to spare, but you’re working way too hard for no reason. Cut yourself some slack, I don’t think self-indulgence is such a bad thing.”

“Self-indulgence, I reeeally hate the sound of that.”

“Then how about Sloth? Ah, but that one gets on my nerves somehow.”

Emilia sighed deeply as Puck talked to himself.

“If you don’t like how busy I am, why don’t you help out?”

“Help as in-?”

“Like taking care of everyone, or investigating the forest! Isn’t it obvious?”

As Puck tilted his head, Emilia stopped and thrust her finger at him. She then used that finger to point around them.

“If you help me, I’ll have more time too…”

“Nah, no way. Because I believe not having to work is the best part of being a spirit. Furthermore, I think what you’re doing is pointless. Finally, I just don’t feel like it.”

“…Why are you always teasing me like this? Puck, you blockhead!”

His stern words seemed to hurt her. Calling her work pointless, it wasn’t like she was doing it for laughs.

“Consider it my revenge. You hardly ever listen to me, I’ll be nicer too if you stop being so obstinate.”

“There’s no need then! Please, take your leave! Hmph”

Emilia turned away from the winking cat and announced a breakdown in negotiations. Useless or pointless or whatever, she didn't plan to stop her routine.

Rather, Puck smiled bitterly and shrugged his shoulders as he continued to follow Emilia who was moving extremely fast. That was their usual exchange, one that had occurred several times now.

And then Puck would retreat, only showing his face later on when tensions had cooled, but—

"—Emilia."

"What is it?" Let me just say I'm still mad, so I don't have much time for you. But if you're apologizing…"

"Then save that time for later, we've got guests."

Emilia's expression instantly changed as Puck spoke in a slightly lowered voice. She extracted a scroll from her bosom, her worry clearly evident in her profile.

Meanwhile, Puck turned his head and started sniffing the chilly wind.

"Humans, quite a few it seems."

"Do you know where?"

"North of here, around the 'Sloppy Snow Path' on your map… Say, perhaps you should rethink your naming scheme."

"Why? They're easy to remember, I think they're good names."

"I'll agree with that much, but it might be embarrassing if others saw it… Ah, whatever."

When she tilted her head at his suggestion, he for some reason completely changed the subject. Emilia felt that something was off about him, but she set that feeling aside for later.

—The 'Sloppy Snow Path', contrary to what the name would suggest was extremely dangerous.

“People keep coming here despite all the warning signs you put up, huh.”

“Maybe they just miss them now and then.”

“They’re just facing the consequences then. It’s their own responsibility, so why not leave it be?”

“I think it’s a little nice how you don’t force me into anything.”

With a smile, Emilia nimbly tied her hair up using her towel, Puck then gave her a pure white robe he’d retrieved somehow.

She accepted it and put it on, covering her face with the hood to hide her identity.

“Even so, isn’t this too baggy?”

“It looks cute that way.”

“That’s not what I’m talking about.”

Rolling up her oversized sleeves, she glared at Puck for a moment before she took off in a sprint.

The ‘Garden’—the various places she’d been on her daily routine—was not where she was headed. She kicked up snow as she accelerated, taking the shortest path at the greatest speed.

She kept low as she slipped through the densely wooded area. The frozen foliage was sharp as a blade, but Emilia ran as if to weave her way through it.

“The smell’s stronger at this range. There’s… Only ten or so.”

Puck flew through the sky, his tail fluttering as he effortlessly matched Emilia’s pace. His announcement caused her draw in her chin and narrow her field of view as she dashed over the snow.

“They haven’t brought a ground dragon, even in a snow-covered forest like this. Well, I suppose it’s only natural.”

“If they had one, it probably wouldn’t enter a dangerous place like this, huh”

“Dragons are quite good at sensing danger, they wouldn’t go along with these fools’ suicide..”

Emilia nodded as she leaped over a large chasm. They were already quite far from the ‘Garden’, but this a path she’d already mapped out.

Emilia could clearly see even the subtlest details which would be imperceptible to the average person, she easily flew through even the harshest paths. Finally—

“—Here!”

Suddenly, the forest had opened up and the ‘Sloppy Snow Path’ lay before Emilia. It was a slight gap in the forest, a sloping path sandwiched by trees on both sides. It was about as wide as three men standing arm to arm, an unnaturally well-kept forest path.

She then spotted some figures laying tracks on the path and pushing their cart with great effort.

There were ten men, desperately trying to get their cart up the path.

Their determination could perhaps inspire compassion from any onlooker, however—

“If only they were merely lost, eh.”

“It’s not like it’s impossible that they just lost their way.”

“To come without a ground dragon, and sneak through a secret path? Perhaps you mean they’ve lost the path of decency?”

“…You’re a dunderhead.”

Having said that, Emilia looked down at the ‘Sloppy Snow Path’, carefully observing the group from atop a large tree.

They wore thick clothes and had wrapped chains around their cart’s wheels to prevent slipping. This might have been necessary in frozen regions, but this wasn't the right season, it was as warm as could be. This forest was the only place with any snow at all.

In other words, they had intended to enter the forest from the start —

"Feel like admitting I was right?

"Oh, be quiet."

"Nya—"

Emiila pushed Puck away with a finger and stood up on a branch, she then glared at Puck who was rubbing the spot she'd pushed.

"I'll take care of this, so you just watch, I don't want you meddling."

"Meddle, as in?"

"As in delaying me like this, perhaps."

"Nyanderstood."

Puck put on an expression of understanding, but Emilia jumped down from the tree without even looking at him. She adjusted her hood mid-fall, careful to hide her face.

She intentionally landed with a bang, surprising the men who immediately turned to look at her.

"—Huh?!"

"Wh-What the hell?! Something suddenly…?!"

The screaming men were all on high alert, wary of Emilia's sudden descent. They had thick fur clothes, with headwear to match.

As they trembled, Emilia pointed at them and uttered these words—

"—That's far enough."

A firm, dignified voice like a silver bell. A tone intended to calm the men, who stopped moving as if entranced.

They had been captivated by her voice, but unaware of this effect Emilia stiffened her cheeks as she stood in their way.

"It's dangerous ahead of here, if you don't want to get hurt you'd better leave quietly."

The men simply stood there dumbfounded, their eyes wide at her words. Emilia took that reaction to be a favorable sign, and believed things would go smoothly.

She figured Puck was most likely still watching from behind, with no hope she'd succeed.

—Let's show him just how wrong he was!

"There should have been several warning signs around the entrance and several paths here. If you missed all of them… Um, this is hard to say, but I don't think you're cut out for this, places like this are reeeally dangerous."

"…"

"Please go back and reflect on today's events. If you're lost, I can guide you out. How about it?"

Emilia tilted her head as she asked this, and the men simply looked at each other in silence. Watching this, Emilia internally praised herself for her seemingly convincing persuasion. Puck would be surprised too, and if the men learned from this it was wins all around!

"Excuse me, lady."

"What is it?"

Emilia was already imagining Puck's apology when a large, bearded man called out to her, perhaps the group's leader. Having reflected on her warning, he'd lower his head and—

“—You think we’ll listen to you just like that?”

He yelled as he aimed his crossbow at her. She had the feeling Puck just sighed in exasperation.

3

His crossbow already had an arrow notched, prepared to fire at any time. It was a mechanically operated hunting weapon, with a lock for the arrow and a reel for the string.

It was originally invented in the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko, even women and children could use it and furthermore, men could use it one handed. For these reasons, it was a much beloved weapon.

Of course its accuracy depended on the user, but the bearded man had plenty of practice.

“Now don’t go thinking anything strange, this thing could blow a limb off in one shot.”

“…Is that for self-defense?”

“It’s far too powerful for that. As you can see, this is to take care of nuisances like you, who meddle in others’ business—Hey!”

He jerked his chin at his companions as he spoke mockingly. A man who was previously pushing the cart then approached Emilia with a rope in hand.

“Sorry, but we can’t just let you go now that you’ve seen us. You never saw anything… Or preferably, there was never anyone here.”

“You don’t want to be seen, so you were planning to do something bad here?”

“If that weren’t the case, why would anyone even come here? That doesn’t just go for us, but you too, right?”

His vulgar hostility was on full display, his deranged grin showing his crooked teeth. However Emilia fell silent as she grimaced at his brazen accusation. Because she couldn’t confidently say he was wrong.

“—! Wait, don’t move!”

Shaking her head, Emilia rushed him. He waved his crossbow to keep her at bay, but Emilia didn’t care.

“I understand your reeeally selfish viewpoint, so I’ll do things my way too. No hard feelings.”

“You fool! Can’t you see my bow?!”

“It’s you who ought to see carefully, or you’ll never land a shot.”

“—Die!”

His veins popping at her provocation, the bearded man fired at her. The firing mechanism released the coiled up string, letting the arrow tear through the air.

Emilia was less than ten meters away, he’d aimed perfectly at her center of mass. A steady arm and no hesitation, his ability with the bow could bring down any man or beast.

—For exactly that reason, she easily predicted his shot.

“Wha?!”

“No hard feelings, I said.”

Emilia had already dodged, letting the arrow pierce the tree behind her. Emilia repeated her earlier words as the bearded man trembled, having missed a certain kill.

She saw through everything, his bloodlust, his aim, the instant of his attack. Once she’d read the shot, dodging was a simple matter. And having dodged, she began her counterattack.

“Sh—!”

With her robe’s hemline fluttering, Emilia leaped at the man closest to her. The men didn’t expect their leader to fail, and were completely unprepared for her assault. She dived into his chest, her shoulder bashing his chin with such force he was blown away, towards the cart.

The men nearby screamed in pain as his flying body mowed them down.

“Y-You damned morons, what are you staring at, do something!”

The bearded man had come to his senses and started hurling abuse at his companions who had lost their spirit. Startled by his words, the men drew their weapons.

Watching them draw their blades and hatchets, Emilia felt strangely relieved. She was worried they might have more ranged weapons.

Because then, she couldn’t keep them from hurting each other.

“Nothing to worry about now!”

Throwing caution to the wind, Emilia boldly rushed into the charging horde, battling her armed enemies with her bare hands.

The enemies attacked without hesitation, and there were so many of them, but Emilia didn’t want to hurt them. To say she was a disadvantage was putting it lightly.

But as if to completely erase her disadvantage, Emilia used the terrain. The snow was her home turf.

On the other hand, the men had completely lost their mobility, their attempts at movement resembling those of toddlers. It was completely clear who was superior.

Kicking the snow, she nimbly rushed the man in front of her and slammed her palm into his jaw. She followed it up with a low sweeping kick to another man and simultaneously brought down yet another enemy. She had wiped them out in one go.

Her skill was sublime, it was like she was dancing.

“Wh-What the… This girl…!”

However, the bearded man didn’t have the leeway to be entranced by her dance. He desperately attempted to notch another arrow with his numbed fingers, but he was too panicked to do it smoothly.

The crossbow prized for its usability and power had one big weakness: It couldn’t fire rapidly. By the time he was done, Emilia had already eliminated half his men.

“Damn it, damn damn damn…”

Emilia sensed him aiming at her from behind. Emilia immediately created some distance with a powerful kick.

She simply had to read it just like she did the first shot. It was an invitation to strike.

“U-, Aargh!”

She sent a fat man flying with a kick, but this left her open. In an instant, the bearded man—

“Gh- Aaaaahh!”

Instead of an arrow, she was assailed by his screams of agony. She turned around in shock to find him writhing in pain.

She immediately approached him, worried about his condition.

“I warned you!”

Sliding near him, Emilia grimaced at what she saw. The writhing man’s face had a deep vertical cut on its right side.

Beside him was his crossbow with its string snapped, it was probably what tore into his face. His right ear had been ripped off, spilling copious amounts of blood as he screamed.

“Hurtshurtshurtshurts!”

“Don’t move, be still!”

Holding him down, Emilia untied her hair. She then used her towel to bind his wound.

It was far from ideal, but there was no other option.

With the blood loss stopped and the man unconscious, Emilia turned to the men, her hands covered in blood.

“You still want to fight?”

In response, the men who’d lost their leader and half their numbers gulped, even they realized the position they were in. However, their pride wouldn’t let them back down just like that.

It was meaningless obstinacy.

Emilia pointed at the snow stained by the bearded man’s blood.

“Listen closely. This is actually a witchbeast infested area. With all this happening in their territory, they’re bound to show up in large numbers. —You know how scary this forest is, right?”

“…”

“Take your fallen and go home. I won’t do anything to you.”

Emilia once again emphasized that she didn’t intend to fight. The men briefly fell silent, but soon started carrying their downed companions.

Emilia was relieved, it was over. If they retreated, that would be that. However—

“I told you to hurry, didn’t I? You’ll have to leave that cart behind, think of it as a punishment.”

She stopped their attempt to retrieve their cart. Their battle had surely attracted attention, they would have to leave as fast as possible.

The men showed signs of resistance, but ultimately yielded to her glare and left the forest dejected.

“—Come here, Puck.”

Once she was sure they were gone, she whispered to Puck. Meanwhile, she picked the crossbow up and examined its string.

That little incident was no accident.

“I was watching, you know. You made quite the mess.”

Puck casually descended from his spot. Floating next to Emilia, he stared at the bloodstained snow in feigned shock, causing Emilia to sigh as she showed him the crossbow.

“This didn’t happen naturally, that was too much.”

“Too much? I don’t get it, I’m just a cat after all.”

“You’re no cat. —Look, it’s frozen here. That’s why the string snapped and injured him like that. That wouldn’t normally happen.”

“Emilia, to think you’d do such a…”

“No way it was me! Seriously, I told you not to do anything.”

Puck feigned innocence as Emilia scolded him, meanwhile she set the crossbow down and facepalmed.

To call it a little trick would be cute, but the result was dreadful. However she did understand why Puck did it.

“I understand you were helping me, I’m happy about that. But surely you had another…”

“Sorry, but as far as I’m concerned that was karmic justice, I’m not losing any sleep over it. Your safety is far, far more important, after all.”

He stroked his whiskers without a hint of guilt as he replied, causing Emilia to cast her eyes downward. She knew he wasn’t wrong, that was what he really believed. He truly cared about her.

It was because she understood that it was so painful. She had no idea what she'd done to deserve his affection, nor how to return it.

"…"

Ordinarily, humans and spirits would never coexist due to their radically different modes of life. There existed a method to deviate from this natural order—a contract between human and spirit.

Having exchanged their vows and pledges, the spirit would be in the human's service, lending them power. Those who obtained extraordinary power through such contracts were known as spirit users.

In this scenario, it would not be strange for the pair to have a loving relationship. Emilia and Puck appeared to share this kind of relationship.

However, that wasn't quite it, there was no contract between them. Emilia was just a girl who lived in the forest, and Puck was just a stray spirit—That was supposed to be the extent of their relationship. Emilia didn't have the courage to take the next step.

"More importantly, let's have a look at their stuff. Regardless of what it is, it'd be a waste to leave it around for the witchbeasts."

"…But that's basically thievery, isn't it?"

"It's making good use of waste. It'd be great if they had cute clothes, though there isn't much chance of that."

Emilia set aside her thoughts and smiled bitterly at Puck's attitude, he was just clearing the atmosphere.

Accepting his consideration, Emilia checked the contents of their cart, contained in wooden boxes.

"It's… Some kind of bottled liquid. It's all murky, some kind of medicine maybe?"

"That green tinge is weird, huh? Shall we get rid of it? Or maybe you'd like me to make a sled?"

“Yes, please.”

The boxes were large enough to fill one’s arms, and each one was full of bottles of some kind of green liquid. Having guessed that they were some kind of medicine, Emilia collected all five boxes.

As she laid the heavy boxes down, Puck activated his magic—A pale light warped the atmospheric moisture, producing a small ice sled.

Emilia placed the boxes on it and started pulling it toward the ‘Garden’.

“We had to leave the cart, huh.”

“Something that size couldn’t enter the forest… I suppose the Snow Blight will end up destroying it.”

“Perhaps he’ll be satisfied to have a new toy. Go, go!”

Puck said as he rode the sled, Emilia shrugged her shoulders in response and started pulling again.

She had to return to the ‘Garden’ and continue her routine.

“Heave ho!”

“What the heck is that?” Emilia continued to pull the sled, urged on by Puck’s various chants. Such hard labor didn’t seem to suit her slender arms, but her strength showed otherwise.

4

—She got rid of anyone who tried to enter the forest, no exceptions, no lenience. No one had asked her to do this, she’d spontaneously decided it on her own.

The impetus for this, and her expectations in doing so were complex in a number of ways, but to simplify things, one could say that most of it was that she simply didn’t want others messing up her home.

She understood how egotistical it was, but since for some reason almost everyone who came to the forest had evil intentions, her guilt decreased by the day.

Even though she understood that wasn't something she should use to justify her actions.

"Even so, today's guys really were the worst, huh?"

Puck crossed his short arms as he said this, his casual attitude not matching his words. This was shortly after they'd returned home with the boxes.

Emilia returned to her work and Puck followed after her in a bad mood.

"Yeah, I guess so…:"

"You're using that tone even though they just tried to kill you. To lash out at you after you'd warned them so kindly is unforgivable, don't you think?

"But maybe the way I spoke bothered them somehow."

"Naive! Way too sweet!"

Puck immediately shot her down and thrust his tail at her.

"Listen, it's important to be aware of your own faults, but you're going way too far. I've heard far too many "buts" and "howevers", let's ban them for now."

"Eh? But-"

"Take this!"

"Ow, that… Doesn't hurt."

Puck struck her arm with his tail for her transgression. He'd perfectly controlled the impact to maximize the sound while minimizing the pain.

"What was that just now?"

"A punishment for naughty children. If you don't teach them right while they're young, they'll turn out like those guys from before. I sure would like to see their parents' faces right now… Wonder if the parents are all beardy too?"

"Pff"

Emilia almost burst into laughter at Puck's sudden joke. However, she quickly cleared her throat and hid it.

"Setting aside the beardy's spankings… Things have felt a bit strange lately, like we're being watched, and there's the increased activity in the forest… Perhaps I'm imagining it?"

"—. Well, the feeling of being watched might be my fault."

Puck gave a lighthearted answer as he washed his face. She felt that there was a momentary delay to his answer, but he started speaking before she could ask.

"As for the increased activity, to begin with, do you understand why those people keep coming here? Or did you face them without knowing?"

"N-No way. Their goal was… Something reeeally bad, right?"

"Yep yep, I guess so. Super cute."

"Why are you doing that? Did I say something wrong?"

Emilia knit her brows as Puck patted her head. In response, Puck straightened his tail and started speaking in a formal tone.

"Even I'm not very well versed in the happenings of the outside world. However, I do understand why those people came here."

"Puck, you said a banned word!"

"I can say it, it's only banned for you."

"That's tyranny…"

"Tyranny's fine. Anyway, let's continue. They wanted to secretly pass through this forest, so people wouldn't see them moving their goods."

"…Couldn't they move it normally?"

Not understanding his explanation, Emilia tilted her head.

"Probably not. Outside the forest, there's a number of rules and laws. Depending on the place, you even have to pay just to use a road."

Puck's explanation seemed plausible, but Emilia didn't seem pleased, because Puck would occasionally mix in lies in his stories.

"You're trying to trick me again, that's definitely a lie."

"You seem confident, but what am I supposed to be lying about?"

"That you have to pay just to use a road. That'd be a huge pain for everyone."

"That's right, it is. That's why they wanted to use the forest."

Puck would usually admit to lying right away, but he didn't do that this time. Emilia's eyes widened when she realized he was telling the truth.

"Outside the forest, even roads are considered property. People crossing, and even moving goods, all sorts of things have various fees associated with them. It's only natural they'd want to go through here, right?"

"…Then I'm doing something really terrible, aren't I?"

Puck's composed explanation stopped Emilia in her tracks. As she worried with a difficult expression, Puck stopped with her while grooming his tail.

"Why do you think that?"

"I mean, if that's how it is outside the forest, I totally understand them wanting to use that path. For me to stop them is way too selfish…”

“Hm, it is true that it might be bad if that were your own selfish desire.”

Puck nodded at her worried murmurs as he continued grooming his tail.

“However, that’s not quite right. All you want is to protect the ‘Garden’.”

“…Yeah.”

“That’s your own problem, but it’s also true that it’s extremely dangerous here. I’m sure they too thought it was preferable to be assailed by you rather than a witchbeast.”

Puck spoke gentle words to console Emilia. These words surprised her, a reaction that seemed to hurt Puck.

“Why so surprised?”

“I never imagined you’d say something so nice.”

“How terrible. Even though I’m always so nice, cute and fluffy.”

“Although I only ever thought of you as fluffy.”

“Harsh!”

Puck toppled dramatically in response to her words, causing Emilia to laugh for real this time. For a while, no words were spoken.

Emilia eventually tired of laughing and caught her breath as she nodded to Puck.

“Alright, I’ll try having a little more confidence in my actions.”

“Yeah, do that. Also, not all the people who come here are evil. There were those who were genuinely lost, and you guided them out, didn’t you?

“Maybe they wanted to avoid road fees too…”

“If little kids had such intentions, it’d be the end of the world.”

The two ended their reminiscing as they reached a frost-covered sculpture. Their unplanned adventure had ended and it was time for her to get back to work.

“Alright then, I have to take care of everyone, so.”

“Yeah, I’m really sleepy since I manifested for longer than usual. But if you can’t bear to be without me, I’m prepared to stay until I disappear.”

“Right, right. Good night, you lazybones.”

Emilia indifferently sent him off as she took off her hood. Her cold attitude caused Puck’s eyes to moisten as he disappeared from the feet up.

“Disappearing like he’s dying, he only learns the weirdest things.”

She said of the spirit who was far more worldly than her. Emilia then approached the sculptures with a new towel and started cleaning them gently.

“Good morning… It’s a bit late for that, sorry.”

She wiped down their faces, receiving no reply as usual. Her careful technique slowly shaved off snow and frost, returning them to their original form.

—The sculptures were exquisitely crafted, far beyond what a human could accomplish. Their physiques, expressions, clothes, were all perfect reproductions, as though real people had been frozen solid —Well, that was actually true.

She worked hard, taking her time as she carefully maintained the sculptures. In total, there were forty nine of them, all of which she handled every morning. They were all real people who had been frozen at some point, and to Emilia they were the shadows of her irreplaceable brethren.

Counting her, there were fifty elves in that white forest—

—Regardless of how it looked to others, that was what she thought.

5

—A giant forest covered in white, a world ending all the same in every direction.

"…"

Having separated from Emilia, the ethereal spirit headed toward a certain part of the forest. There was a very slight change occurring at his destination. It was an extremely subtle shift, but if left alone, it'd become something he couldn't overlook.

—It was akin to fire. The slightest spark could become a blazing inferno, turning everything to ash.

The forest, the people, and even the girl—

"—Disappear"

The spark which had only just ignited, the glow that threatened to consume the forest, was crushed. Making sure of that, the spirit manifested into a vague embodiment of power.

"She still needs time. If possible, an eternity."

Within that murmur was a heartfelt plea. It was intimate, loving, affectionate—

"…"

Leaving that lonely echo behind, the spirit disappeared.

Chapter 2:
I Am Here

1

Northeast in the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica, the Elior Forest was known as “The Frozen Forest”. Within Lugunica, it was considered to be an extremely unusual environment. These peculiarities had been recorded for around a century. Lugunica was typically temperate, warm in the fire season and cold in the ice season, it was only in a certain area far north that one could see snowfall year round.

If one were to then compare Elior Forest to other areas, it would be clear that its weather patterns were completely abnormal. The source of this abnormality was commonly considered to be a spirit.

To give an example, take the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko, a land covered in permafrost, where spirits were seen on a regular basis. There even existed a nationwide religion worshipping spirits, the Holy Church of Gusteko. Extreme regions were considered to be trials put forth by spirits, and the majority of the population believed in these teachings.

Even beyond Gusteko’s scriptures, it was common knowledge that these spirits’ power had repercussions on the entire world. It was also very common to respect spirits, the only exception being the Vollachian empire.

But even so, it was a fact that spirits were beings of incredible power, and it was well known that to provoke one was to invite disaster.

—This has gotten a bit long, so let us conclude with this: The source of the extreme weather in Lugunica’s Elior Forest was a spirit who lived there, and angering such a powerful spirit would bring catastrophe.

That was Lugunican Kingdom’s viewpoint, due to which the forest continued to rest undisturbed to this day.

—Of course, the girl who lived there had no way of knowing this.

2

"—Puck, look! There's so many of those shiny stones! We did it!" Emilia proclaimed joyously as she lay on the ground, waving to Puck.

Deep in the forest, there was a place she called the 'Doddering Thicket', a place that only had very old trees, all frozen. Their dense foliage blocked out the sun, leaving the area dark at all times.

It was so dark that even one's footing was uncertain, and Emilia laid there with her eyes sparkling.

"That's really great, but be sure not to take too many. They'll lose value."

Puck laid down next to her, waving his tail as he warned her. Her grand discovery was reflected in his eyes too. Before them were old roots protruding out of the ground, meandering and coiling around each other.

Within a gap in the roots was a well hidden opening in the ground. Even in the darkness, that frozen opening had a glow to it.

—It was vein of the shiny stones, as Emilia called them.

"What do you mean lose value? They're all pretty, aren't they?"

"It'd be great if everyone thought that way, but if there's a lot of a certain item, people tend to think of it as less special."

Emilia cocked her head in confusion as she crawled to the opening. She then used a knife to carefully cut the stones out of the ground.

"Aah, this feels reeeally good, like cleaning someone's ears."

"That sort of reaction to stones this pretty, I can't say I dislike it."

“Is that a compliment?”

“Of course, you’re quite good at expressing your joy. It’s splendid.”

Emilia continued to scrape the wall with her rusted and chipped knife as Puck silently applauded and encouraged her..

Honestly, it was distracting. Anyway, Puck’s advice was given in good faith. It was easy for her to lose herself as she did this, but it would be troublesome if she took too many.

Because this was the only source of income she had.

“Besides, they won’t form new ones if I take them all, right?”

“That’s right. They’re basically mana in crystalized form. If they accumulate particularly large amounts of mana they become magic stones, and other such stones start forming around them. This place is very conducive to their formation, so the trick is to leave a few behind.”

“Hmm, you really are smart.”

“You could even call me a mana expert. In fact, you could even call me an Emilia expert.”

Puck stroked his whiskers as he smiled at a wide-eyed Emilia.

“It’s true, you know. If you collect too many of these, you’ll want to keep them and then use them to decorate your room. Yes, I can see that future clearly.”

“You’re not seeing the future, that’s something I did a long time ago…”

“History is a circle, people repeat their mistakes… Ah, that was pretty deep, huh?”

If he was seeking agreement, he would find none from Emilia.

However, there was some truth to his words. She had once tried to hoard the stones in secret, not wanting to give them away.

“I’d gathered so many, but they suddenly lost their luster and became ordinary rocks.”

“Because they’re piles of mana. If there were an even larger source of mana nearby, they would steadily be absorbed by it and become empty.”

“An even bigger source?”

“Ah, that’s me.”

Emilia was left dumbfounded by this nonchalant declaration. She remained silent as Puck nodded at her without a hint of guilt.

“Basically, as long as I’m with you, they’ll be no different from ordinary rocks. I guess you could say it’s a real waste. Now, hurry up and trade them for dinner before you get attached.”

“Understood, understood completely! Turning on me like that, you’re horrible…”

Emilia obeyed his instructions, clearly displeased. She put the stones in her pouch and confirmed their weight before leaving.

She tidied her snow-stained robe as she carved a sign into a nearby tree to mark the location, a portrait of Puck, quite a good one if she said so herself.

“A crushed witchbeast?”

Emilia ignored Puck’s teasing and returned to the ‘Garden’. She soon reached familiar territory and sighed in relief as the tension left her face.

“Looks like the forest still has a lot of places we don’t know about.”

“The forest reconnaissance team has a grand total of two members, after all. And I don’t really cooperate, so in truth you’re doing it alone. Even so, you’re steadily completing that rather avant-garde map.

“Avant-garde? You’re trying to trick me with tough words.”

“That wasn’t trickery, merely an honest impression.”

Contrary to his catlike appearance, it wasn’t uncommon for Puck to use words she didn’t understand.

This was usually when he wanted to hide his true feelings from her. It made her feel a little lonely, but she also thought herself selfish for feeling that way.

“It feels like you’re being all habuncho* again, though.”

[T/N: Regional slang for ostracizing someone]

“I don’t really understand what you’re saying either, I guess the feeling is mutual.”

Having heard her mutter, Puck shrugged his shoulders in a human-like manner. They arrived at her home as they continued their conversation.

They left the sled at the roots of the tree she’d remodeled into her home, she intended to sell its contents along with the stones she’d collected.

“By the way, it’s really convenient how this sled doesn’t melt away.”

“It’s because I made it, you know? Wanna ride down some slopes later?”

“That sounds reeeally fun, but I don’t have time for that. Maybe some other time.”

Having rejected his invitation, Emilia smiled bitterly as she pulled the sled. The boxes were quite heavy, but thanks to Puck’s sled she could move them fairly easily,

However, it was lacking in that it couldn’t cross uneven terrain. Though Emilia would normally bound through rough terrain, she currently had to use gentler paths.

“Looks like there’s more snow falling around these ‘Zig-zagging

Woods' than before, it's getting harder to walk."

"Straight to the point, huh. Zig-zagging, zig-zagging…

"No complaining. It's my map, so I'll name them as I place."

Emilia pouted at Puck who was complaining from the sled, he had a habit of criticizing her naming scheme.

It was at the point where Emilia, being stubborn herself, would no longer even consider his suggestions. Easy to understand names that you wouldn't forget, really good names she thought.

"Zig-zagging… Ah, we're approaching the exit. It's about time I left, you'd better put your hood on too, don't forget."

"Hmph, that's hard to swallow… But fine, I get it."

Emilia reluctantly nodded to Puck's advice as he took his leave when they reached the end of the 'Zig-zagging Woods'.

Donning her hood, she hid her silver hair. Puck seemed satisfied by this and smiled, he then started disappearing with no warning.

"…Suddenly disappearing like that is a real bad habit of his. It was quite the shock back then."

She was used to the sight now, but it was terribly surprising when she first saw it. Spirits could freely control the formation and disintegration of their bodies from atmospheric mana.

Not knowing this, Emilia was driven to tears when Puck suddenly disappeared with no explanation. She still remembered how angry she was when Puck just showed up like nothing happened the very next day.

"Whoops, can't get distracted now."

Realizing she was getting caught up in her reminiscing, Emilia consciously put a stop to it and braced herself.

She had almost reached her destination, it wasn't the time to fool around. The closer she got, the more her face stiffened. Even as her heart raced, she knew things were going quiet.

What awaited her demanded that sort of resolution.

"…"

She was now alone, having separated from Puck. Her surroundings steadily changed, the difference in atmosphere was strikingly clear. The drumming in her chest grew ever more violent.

The snow-covered landscape around her changed into brilliant greenery as she proceeded.

The deeper one went into Elior Forest, the more extreme the cold became.

However, the opposite was also true, the effect weakened as one left the forest, and the outskirts were no different from any ordinary forest. Of course that did not mean the cold disappeared entirely, but it was no longer lethal to humans.

At the chilly outskirts of the forest, there existed a human settlement.

"—I'm here."

Emilia stopped and narrowed her eyes at the scene before her. Through the gaps in the trees, she could make out some small houses

Houses made of brick, villagers wearing faded clothes. There were perhaps forty or fifty people here, and they weren't particularly well off according to Puck. That was second hand information, but Emilia did know how lonely the place felt.

Even they wanted nothing to do with Emilia, who only had Puck and her sculptures for companions.

"…"

Discarding her hesitation, Emilia walked toward the village. Pulling her sled through a gap in the fence, she entered the place, feeling the ground through the soles of her shoes.

It was well past noon, approaching evening. It was a season with long days, the sun still shone brightly in the sky. There was still some time before sundown.

For that reason, there were still small children playing in a clearing in the middle of the village. Their joyous voices were somewhat comforting to Emilia.

It was a poor village with few inhabitants, but the childrens' joy was priceless. She felt that the site of these happy children could make anyone smile.

At the very least, Emilia felt that way. However, she herself was the reason this couldn't continue.

"Ah…"

A feeble voice, from one of the children. A child had spotted her when he turned around, his smile immediately disappeared, tension evident on his face.

That striking response spread like a chain reaction. They looked at Emilia as they quietly whispered to each other and then left the area.

"…"

Their rapid evacuation didn't even leave Emilia the chance to say anything. Emilia wanted to sigh, even though she knew all along she would be rejected completely, with no opportunity to explain herself.

"…I didn't even do anything."

Emilia grumbled as she felt an air of fear spread through the village.

Children to adults, adults to neighbors, news of the 'Forest Person''s arrival spread. The village was on high alert, and the so called 'Forest Person', Emilia, picked up her pace as she continued pulling her sled to her destination.

Within clearing lay the village's only marketplace—one in name only—It was essentially a place to exchange goods. The villagers could bring their plant or animal products and quickly trade them.

However its meager lineup was more than enough for Emilia. Leaving her sled at the entrance, Emilia took a deep breath and entered.

"—You, huh."

A 'room' that only had a roof, with an aging man sitting before some goods lined up on a long table. The man wore a headband, and had his forehead was deeply wrinkled. He scowled at Emilia as he spoke to her in a low voice.

His tone and eyes made it clear he wasn't welcoming her. However, he wasn't ignoring or distancing her, which was a relief.

"The usual, please."

"…Alright."

They exchanged few words, the man then stood up in response to her laconic request. He picked up a nearby box and haphazardly tossed some crops and spices in.

Meanwhile, Emilia took her pouch out as she prepared to pay with the stones she'd collected.

"Your shoes."

"Eh?"

"…Your shoes. How about them?"

Emilia was momentarily dumbfounded by his hoarse whisper. But she immediately looked down and noticed the condition of her shoes, so ragged she was practically barefoot.

"Ah! Please do. As you can see, they've gotten all holey as of late…"

"…"

"And…"

Giving no response, the man slinked into the back of the building. Emilia simply smiled bitterly at her situation.

However, she was really happy he noticed her shoes before she said anything.

"…Here."

"Thank you so much. Hm, they fit just right."

He held out some crude shoes, cobbled together from cloth and hide. Emilia would normally very quickly ruin her shoes running around in the forest so she figured she was better off barefoot, but that wouldn't do in front of others.

This was also something she'd learned from experience. Having confirmed the shoes' size and feel, she paid him with her stones, he then passed her the box he'd filled.

Having obtained these, her shopping trip was complete.

Perhaps she could segue into small talk if they were closer, but unfortunately his gaze didn't allow it. As usual, she'd have to leave things at that and head back to the 'Garden'.

However, her chores that day didn't end at shopping.

"Um, actually, I brought some stuff that was left behind in the forest."

Her proposal caused the man, who thought they were done, to raise his brow. Emilia went outside and pointed to the sled and boxes she'd left there.

This was how she intended to dispose of the intruders' cargo. This was what she always did, taking the items left behind to the village.

Since she couldn't return them to the original owners, she at least wanted someone to make use of them.

“…Understood, I’ll take them.”

“Please do.”

The man examined the contents of the boxes, drawing in his chin as he looked at the bottled substance. Leaving their handling to the village, Emilia bowed and left for real this time. She didn’t pass a single villager on her way back.

She wondered if there was a rule dictating no one go outside until she left. If they were openly rejecting her to this extent, the shopkeeper’s blunt attitude was wonderful by comparison.

She had once gone to the shop while a woman was watching over it, sending her into a convulsing fit. Shopping aside, Emilia couldn’t even explain herself before she left.

It seemed they had a man in charge ever since, which she felt apologetic for.

“Am I really so scary, I wonder…”

Emilia touched her face all over, confirming what it felt like. However, she couldn’t really grasp what she looked like from feel alone.

—Emilia was deathly afraid to know exactly what she looked like.

“…”

Once she was done, she suppressed a sigh as she returned to the path into the forest. As she was about to enter, she suddenly turned around.

—She felt a presence watching her.

“…How strange.”

It was different from the gazes of the villagers. They tried to avoid her as much as possible, and that included even looking at her.

As long as she wasn't there, she basically didn't exist as far as they were concerned. That was precisely why the presence staring at her made her so uncomfortable.

"…"

Even so, she didn't wish to confirm who exactly it was.

Staying in the village much longer would be unpleasant, both for her and for the villagers. If it was something she could endure herself, she'd do it to keep the peace.

"Time to go."

She said to herself as she ignored the persistent gaze. Emilia dashed into the green forest, her new shoes impacting the soft ground.

As she ran, her breaths gradually turned white, and color left her surroundings, giving way to a snowscape. Finally, the sensation under her shoes changed to the familiar feeling of cracking ice.

"—Oh, you're back. Welcome home."

Emilia came to a sudden stop when she heard those words, her shoes scraping the ground. Catching her breath, she looked up to find Puck who narrowed his eyes at her condition.

"Seems you've had another unpleasant experience?"

"…No way! That's not the case. I got to talk a lot more than usual today."

"Yeah? Then hiding your face like that is a bit rude, isn't it?"

Puck chuckled as he pointed this out, causing Emilia to realize she still had her hood on. She hastily took it off, her cheeks a bit red.

"How cute, like an apple."

"…You're so nasty, Puck."

"I just called you cute, though. Anyway, setting aside your shopping, how about those boxes?’

Dissatisfied at this change in topic, Emilia shook her head.

“Mm, I don’t know. I couldn’t read the shopkeeper’s expression. And later, in the village…”

“In the village?”

The conversation naturally led to the gaze following her, but Emilia seemed hesitant to talk about it.

The reasons being rebelliousness, and that she didn’t want Puck to worry. Rebelliousness as in she didn’t want to tell Puck and then get treated like a kid like usual.

These factors sealed her lips.

“Uh, you see, the shoes. The truth is, he pointed them out before I even said anything. You know how the old ones were all holey?”

“That’s because you always wear them down right away, isn’t it? I think he was definitely shocked.”

“Even if that were the reason, it’s a really big deal for him to remember a detail like that. At this rate, we might even be able to talk about the weather…”

The fact that he looked at her with such pity even though she tried so hard to avoid that really annoyed her.

To Emilia, being able to talk about the weather would be a sign of greatly improved relations. The weather was a great topic, since it was always changing. She was having a hard time thinking of any other topics, though.

“To begin with, what weather are you planning to talk about? It’s always cloudy or snowy around here.”

“That’s fine! What’s important is being able to do it.”

“Really—?”

“Why would I lie about something like this? Really, really, it’s the truth!”

Emilia didn’t feel particularly bad as she responded to Puck’s doubting gaze. At the very least, she had someone actually talking to her.

—It was quite the luxury to her, since she’d normally talk to those mute sculptures.

3

The room was dim and gloomy. The windows and curtains were shut, blocking out any light from entering. A sinister atmosphere permeated the dark and still room.

The room was not silent. There was a very slight sound, which continued incessantly.

—Hoarse breaths, and the distorted sound of nails scratching at something wet.

“…”

The room had a wooden floor, a simple bed, and a crystal light that had gone out. Sitting on the bed was a silent man, picking at the bandaged wound on his face.

The wound covered most of the right side of his face, even his ear which was now gone. It was painful just to look at, but the man’s expression wasn’t one of pain, his bloodshot eyes were filled with hatred.

The reason was a small gap in the curtains through which he could see the outside world. —Several hours ago, he’d seen a girl in a white robe through that gap. Not only had she ruined their transaction, she even insulted their way of life.

Furthermore, considering her words and her movement in the village—

“Excuse me, boss. Uh…”

A young man with a deep voice knocked on the door, and then entered without waiting for a response. The darkness caused him to flinch, but he fixed his posture when he spotted the man on the bed.

The man wordlessly urged his visitor to speak. Having deduced that from his silence, the young man started speaking to the bandaged man—their bearded leader.

“Looks like you guessed right, boss.”

“…You’re sure?”

“They didn’t want to talk, but we squeezed it out of them. What now?”

Having received this report, the bearded man stopped his scratching. He sniffed his finger which was covered in blood and pus, the foul smell warping his face into an evil smile.

“—Bring me the cage.”

“The cage, sir?”

“They’ll know what you’re talking about. And then the troops, we’ll set out when they’re assembled, get them ready.”

The subordinate nodded as he gulped at the insane look in the bearded man’s eyes. Having made sure of that, the bearded man started staring at a wall, picturing the forest beyond it.

“Alright, let’s get you in that cage. You’ll be our plaything till you die, girl.”

4

—It had been several days since her trip to the village, and even more since her battle. As far as Emilia was concerned, nothing had changed in that time.

She would look after the sculptures in the morning, Puck would start his meddling midway, and once she was done she would have her breakfast, after which she would start working on her map.

In the evening, Puck would show up again and hang out for a bit, accompanying her on her way home since she would stop her mapmaking before sundown. She would then have her dinner and take a bath, after which she'd go to sleep and end her day. These peaceful days continued without incident.

That was probably why Emilia ended up forgetting about the strange gaze she'd felt in the village. Since she didn't think it was a threat, it steadily left her thoughts, and today was no different.

"You might get a little lonely, but I'll have to step out for a bit today."

That was the first thing Puck said to Emilia, who had just barely woken up and was washing her face in the stream.

"Umyu…"

"Yeah, that's right, a little outing. Don't cry because I'm not around, okay?"

"I won't cry or anything…"

Puck acted rather self-important as he passed a towel to Emilia, who was the furthest thing from a morning person. Emilia finally realized what they were talking about as she sluggishly dried her face.

"You're free to do whatever you want wherever you want, though… Guess there's days like this now and then, huh."

"I think just telling you in advance like this is already quite good for a vagabond."

"That's… Yeah, that's right."

Nodding at his assertion, Emilia cast her eyes downward, still holding her towel to her face. She blinked several times before she looked up at Puck.

"Then, can I ask you where you're going?"

“It’s a secret. But it isn’t anything dangerous, suspicious or wrong.”

“That sounds real dodgy…”

“If I say I won’t do something, I won’t do it. That’s why I never help with your mapmaking, you know?”

“That’s not something to be proud of…”

No matter what she said, Puck could always talk his way out of it.

“You really can’t say?”

“Yeah, sorry. But look, secrets just make a girl more desirable.”

“Eh? You’re a girl?”

“Nah, just wanted to try saying it, I really am a guy. Furthermore, it’d be real bad if I were a girl, I wouldn’t be able to fulfill a really important promise, you see.”

“Right, right.”

Puck placed his hands on his back and puffed his chest out, causing Emilia to sigh and nod. It didn’t seem like he intended to respond sincerely, and she didn’t really have the right to ask for more details. He didn’t have to tell her any more than he had, their relationship didn’t warrant it.

“Can I ask about your plans for today?”

“You already know, the same as usual.”

“I see… Sorry for asking.”

“You’re such a bully! Just forget it!”

Puck laughed cheerfully as Emilia pouted at his teasing. Emilia then turned her back on him, intending to go clean the sculptures. However, at that moment—

“—Emilia. I won’t be with you, so don’t do anything dangerous.”

"I should be saying that to you. Don't run off with some stranger or…"

Emilia turned around as she replied, but her sentence stopped midway. Puck's gaze was warm and gentle. Those round, black eyes seemed to contain some strong emotion.

"If something were to happen, your first priority should be to run away. And if it seems dangerous, run away immediately. Understood?"

"…"

"Don't let the 'Ice Flowers' bloom, even by mistake."

"…Yeah."

Emilia looked away as she nodded. Her attitude wasn't quite one of assent, but Puck seemed satisfied and started to fade away. As she watched his physical form disappear, Emilia started to pout.

"He really is unfair."

He was always playing dumb, but he'd occasionally get so serious all of a sudden. When he spoke to her that way, she couldn't possibly brush it off.

Even if she didn't like it, she had to stay aware of that which lay inside her, it wouldn't do to disobey Puck's instructions. Both Emilia and Puck knew this. Perhaps Puck even more so than her.

He wouldn't speak of it in detail, perhaps that too was part of the secret he'd mentioned.

"—I'd better get moving."

If she got wrapped up in her thoughts there wouldn't be an end to it. Disregarding the labyrinth that was her thoughts, she got back to her work.

By keeping her daily routine this way, she was also protecting her heart. Subconsciously aware of this, Emilia ran toward the 'Garden' with a towel in hand.

5

Mapping the whole of Elior Forest was something Emilia had decided to do on her own. Investigation and creation, all of it was done by Emilia alone. Puck wasn't particularly cooperative in this endeavor, though he would often meddle.

Even so, they shared the information on the map and she was grateful that he used it.

She'd started working on the map about half a year prior, but progress was slow-going, and she had a long way to go to complete the entire forest.

Especially as of late, the northern areas she was presently investigating proved to be quite treacherous due to the rough terrain and deep snowfall.

In addition—

"—Another one."

She marked an X on her map as she sighed at the scene before her. It was a densely wooded region, with thick trees that were completely frozen.

It was certainly a pain to have her path blocked by these dense woods, but she sighed for a different reason—The fact that a tree had been brought down by force, and the traces of something crossing over it. There were even signs of tracks in the area which caused Emilia to knit her brows.

"That's not supposed to be around here… And it's recent."

Snow started accumulating in the grooves. Seeing this, Emilia conjectured that this 'Clattering Grove' had just recently ended up in this state.

"…"

Spreading out her map, she examined its contents and her memory. She then took off, donning her hood as she slipped through the cramped grove.

Not to hide her identity, but to keep her hair from getting caught in the foliage. She often thought her long hair was troublesome in such situations, or when she was bathing.

She thought she'd be free of many of her troubles if she just cut it short, the reason she didn't do so was because Puck asked her to keep it long since he preferred it that way.

—She also felt that someone had once complimented her long hair, though she didn't remember it.

"—Here."

Having left the woods while in thought, Emilia looked down at the ground in front of her. It was a sight she'd seen several days prior, disconcerting as usual.

Just like before, the 'Sloppy Snow Path' had tracks going up the hill. What was different from before was the absence of the lawless intruders and the cart that they'd left behind.

"…"

She descended the path and examined the deeply engraved tracks. There was even more snow falling here than in the grove she'd just left, but none had accumulated on the tracks.

There were no footprints around the tracks, as though the scars from the other day's battle had been covered up completely. It was only natural that this would happen. It was natural, but it was a bit overdone—

"—You're here, aren't you? How about you show yourselves?"

As she stood over the tracks, Emilia raised her voice. For a moment there was no reply, the path was silent. However, that silence was soon broken.

The forest's silence was replaced by the sound of many footsteps, and the noise of a carriage being pulled. A group wearing thick clothing appeared before her with a familiar face leading them. Well, not that familiar, it had changed quite a bit since she last saw it.

"Yo, it's been a week, huh. Nice to meet you, girl."

"…I can't say the feeling's mutual."

They lined up down the slope, the leader who spoke to her being the large, bandaged man. His voice, gaze and wound made it clear to Emilia exactly who he was.

But the insanity in his eyes sent a chill up her spine. Emilia knew her judgement wasn't very good, but it was obvious to her what they were aiming to do.

She realized for the first time that she could be unhappy about someone wanting to meet her.

"Even so, how did you know we were here? We were careful not to leave any footprints."

"It's not like I came thinking you were here. I just noticed the tracks while I was doing something else. There was no snow on them because you used them to hide your footprints, right?"

"Tch, good eye. An expert on forests, are you."

Hearing her response, he clicked his tongue and started scratching at his wound. Emilia grimaced as blood seeped through the bandage.

"Can I ask you something?"

"What."

"That wound, it'll leave a bad scar if you don't treat it properly. Do you have any medicine for it?"

"—! Oi, oioioi, this little… Medicine? Medicine, you say?!"

Her question seemed to touch a nerve, causing him to fly into a rage. His expression and shouts surprised Emilia, leaving her bewildered, this reaction only further enraged him.

“You trying to make a fool of me? Or are you really that much of an airhead? Either way, you’re even more of a fool than I thought, ‘Forest Person’!”

“…That name…”

“I don’t think I need to tell you where I heard it, girl.”

The bearded man smiled vulgarly as Emilia’s expression changed. He moved his hand in a grandiose fashion, and in that direction—east of the forest—was the village.

“Damn you, you robbed us and sold the goods to that tiny village. We asked around and it turns you do this quite frequently, a serial offender, huh?”

“…What are you talking about? I never…”

“You can do whatever you want and their guilty conscience keeps them from complaining, you’re quite a nasty woman, you know?”

“Don’t make stuff up, I never once intended to do anything of the sort!”

“Quit playing dumb! Those village bastards spilled the beans, we know all about your little deal! Giving them a cut to keep their mouths shut, they’re practically accomplices!”

“…Eh?”

His malice overwhelmed any response she might have had to his false accusation. He interpreted her silence as an admission he was right.

However, the truth was much more cruel. Emilia was completely shocked by his words, their contents far beyond her expectations. To think that those villagers told them such things about her.

"You're barking up the wrong tree if you bear a grudge against them for this. Aiding a demi-human in a country like Lugunica is a task far too serious for those poor bastards, it was only natural they'd fail."

"Aiding a demi-human…?"

"Think you can get away by feigning ignorance? How about you drop the act and get on with it, 'Forest Person'—No, elf girl."

Following his string of false accusations, he dropped one final bomb. Emilia had no immediate response to his assertion that she was an elf.

His eyes sparkled with the satisfaction of being right as he stared at Emilia's frozen figure.

"They cooperated with a demi-human… Moreover an elf bandit. Those village guys are unbelievable, that's a serious crime in Lugunica."

"I-I'm not a bandit… Even so! Why even the villagers?!"

"You really are behind the times, huh? You don't even know about the Demi-human War? You bastards lost the civil war, you have no rights. Merely breathing near your human masters is a crime. Furthermore, even among demi-humans, elves are considered particularly bad. It's obvious isn't it?"

"Why…"

"Do I look like your dad? I'm not going to sit here and teach you."

He laughed at her shaky voice, and his twenty or so men started laughing with him. Surrounded by their malice, Emilia clenched her fists tightly.

Thrusting her nails into her palms, she suppressed her quickening pulse and breath as she glared at the man.

"What is it you want to do?"

"…Straight to the point, I like it. It's simple."

He stopped laughing and jerked his chin. Once he did this, they pushed their cart behind him. In the cart was a large rectangular structure made of metal. He was showing off an iron cage.

"You robbed us of our goods and ruined our business. The villagers are guilty too, but we're nice guys, we'll give you a chance to atone."

"Atonement or whatever…Does that have something to do with that cage over there?"

"You really are dull! Or can you not see reality? You! Will enter! This cage! We have to recover our loss, that much is obvious. We'll have the villagers compensate us, that's obvious too. And you, the mastermind, will pay with your body inside this cage!"

He screamed vulgarly as he smacked the iron bars, leaving her confused. She didn't get what he was talking about and thus couldn't consider it. To begin with, this negotiation itself was completely unexpected.

"I get that there's been a misunderstanding, but I have no reason to do as you say. It's true that I took your cargo to the village. As for what the villagers said about me… It's a bit sad, but let's set that aside for now. But to begin with, you were the ones who started it with your crime, weren't you?"

"Crime, crime, huh? But what about the villagers' crime of aiding a demi-human?"

"That's completely nonsensical! Besides, that's between me and them! You guys have nothing to do with it!"

"However, we're the ones who have the right to speak. In this country, your actions are unforgivable."

Emilia had no response to his extreme arguments. She didn't know whether or not he was lying, but he was clearly being completely unreasonable. However, if what he said was true, if the villagers would be blamed too—

“Then make a choice.

“…”

“It’s simple. If you don’t want to do it, you’d better forget about the villagers. If you don’t want anything to happen to them, get in.”

“That’s…”

“They sold you out, so I don’t think you have any obligation to them, though.”

The man offered Emilia a terribly cruel choice, and his wide grin suggested that he was quite pleased by her hesitation. She had to choose between herself and the villagers—

“…What will you do with me once I’m in there?”

“This world is filled with people who have certain preferences, perverts who’d love to violate a beautiful caged elf. I certainly understand the feeling.”

“…”

“I don’t mind either choice. Even if you don’t, we have other candidates too.’

“Candidates?”

“In the village, and of course the forest. They’re here, aren’t they? Longears besides you.”

The vulgar man directed his gaze toward the ‘Garden’, causing Emilia’s eyes to widen. That was malice directed at her frozen companions, she understood what she had to do.

“—Understood.”

Emilia shut her eyes as she announced this to him. It wasn’t that she couldn’t decide. She was merely confused and that manifested as hesitation. She knew from the very start what she was going to do, though she may have been mistaken.

However, the same went for them. She understood their desire to retaliate against her, but she wouldn't forgive an attack on the villagers or the sculptures.

—She wouldn't allow it. If someone had to be punished, it had to be her alone.

"You want me in that cage?"

"…Yes, that's right. Well, that depends on how much people want you. What's most important is your looks."

"I see. —If that's the case, I don't think I'll meet your expectations."

Emilia responded sarcastically as she grabbed her hood. It was unusual for her to feel this way while facing other people. —No, this was the first time. The first time she wanted to see their reactions.

"…"

Her silver hair flowed down her back when she took her hood off. She raised her face, staring directly at them with her amethyst eyes, causing them to gasp.

Emilia's expression was resolute in the face of their shocked gazes. Their faces could only be described as ones of stupefaction and astonishment.

That was just what she'd hoped for, but it still made her heart ache.

"Do you still want me in that cage?"

Her question made them all flinch in fear. Emilia As Emilia looked at their tension-filled faces one by one, someone muttered the following,

"Silver hair, amethyst eyes… Silver elf…!"

They were all features that comprised the being known as Emilia. They were also the traits of the world's most detested entity. The primal fear they induced could crush hearts and paralyze people with terror.

A village girl shrieked and fainted when she first saw Emilia, she learned what these features meant from that fearful scream. That is —

"—Witch. The same as the Witch of Envy."

"…"

It was one of the men who mouthed those words. The world's most feared, most hated, most terrible existence, a 'Witch'.

'Witch of Envy'—Throughout the whole world, even now that name was synonymous with fear. It was said that this calamitous being was a woman with silver hair and amethyst eyes.

Emilia matched these conditions perfectly, which was why she was shunned by all. The villagers were no exception.

However, that was merely a small portion of her sin.

"…"

Having laid eyes on her, the men started panicking. The shocked men were terrified to even meet her gaze.

However, there was one whose reaction was clearly different. The bearded man scratched his wound as he laughed loudly. A laugh filled with joy and insanity.

"Ha, haha, hahahaha! Oioioi, are you serious? Unbelievable! Who could have possibly predicted this?! Ah, you're more than I could have imagined!"

"…What's so funny?"

"You! You, obviously! I don't wanna hand you over to anyone else. Ah, I'd use you in that cage my whole life if I could."

He was practically licking her all over with his slimy gaze, a reaction that surprised her. She remembered that she'd felt this before, the unpleasant feeling at the village.

Several days ago, there was a gaze that stuck to her when she went to the village. —She now realized just what it was. She also realized that he had no intention of retreating even having seen her true face, and that further conversation was useless.

“Understood. I get it now. —Talking to you is pointless.”

“We just can’t get through to each other like this. It’s a shame we couldn’t come to an agreement.”

“Yeah. I agree.”

They mutually decided that their negotiations, which could hardly be called negotiations, had broken down.

Emilia spread her arms, at the same time the men behind the bearded man started to scatter. They were all equipped with crossbows, both their numbers and weaponry made this encounter far more dangerous than the previous one.

Even so, she had to defeat them. She would bring all twenty of them down and make them swear not to harm the forest or the village. If she couldn’t do that, the forest she’d tried so hard to protect would be violated.

“…”

There was no cue to start the battle. Emilia charged without warning, keeping low as she did so. The sounds of firing crossbows overlapped as a rain of arrows tore through the air.

However, Emilia avoided them with a mere twist of her body. The arrows were too fast to track by eye, so she would dodge by reading the shooters’ intent. It was that simple, but there was the question of how many people could do such a ‘simple’ thing.

Surrounded by the sound of arrows piercing the snow, Emilia slammed her palm into a man’s torso. The hardness she felt beneath his fur clothes was not that of trained muscle. He had something like a steel plate stuffed under his clothes which absorbed the impact of her blow.

“I reflected on our previous encounter, just like you said. I knew you’d fight barehanded, so isn’t obvious we’d be prepared?”

“—Kh.”

She grit her teeth at his boasting as she drove the back of her fist into a man’s jaw after which she knocked him down with a sweeping kick. She’d shifted into a more direct fighting style aiming to knock them out quickly.

“This damned girl!”

Shortly after, the men she approached tried to keep her at bay with knives, but she weaved through the silver flashes and performed a split kick mid-air, blowing two men away with hard kicks to the face.

She then turned mid-air, with not a moment to rest as she continued to dodge arrows. She immediately rushed into some other men, striking them with tremendous force. They were sent tumbling over the snow.

“Oohh, not bad. I knew you were strong, but even this many armed men aren’t enough? I could cry.”

The bearded man seemed calm even as he watched his comrades get beaten down. He whistled at Emilia when doubt began to show on her face.

“Ah, how delightful. —It seems unease and doubt are toying with your heart quite nicely.”

“I have no idea what you’re talking about.”

“Is that right? Do you know why I’m so calm, then?”

Emilia tilted her head and as if to show off to her, the bearded man struck the cage. He then moved his hand to his mouth—

“—Don’t you think this cage is a bit big for you?”

"…"

Before she could grasp the meaning of his words, he started to whistle through his fingers. The high pitched sound reverberated through the forest and summoned a massive beast laying near the path—One which had been kept in the cage.

"It can't be…"

Sensing a ferocious presence nearby, Emilia looked toward the sky. Above her was a colossal shadow leaping overhead, making no attempt to hide itself.

The giant beast's huge jump caused an explosion of snow. Lowering its head, the jet black beast bared its fangs and glared at Emilia as it roared.

"—Grr!"

Sending drool flying, and equipped with slimy teeth the size of human heads, were two heads. The beast—No, not a beast. Its doglike heads both had broken horns on their foreheads.

"Here's your answer. —The witchbeast Orthrus, what do you think?"

Emilia trembled as the bearded man, accompanied by the witchbeast, announced this full of excitement.

6

The source of his confidence, the massive monster bearing two heads, Orthrus. Covered in jet black fur, its colossal body measured over four meters in size and its eyes were devoid of sanity as it glared at Emilia.

Its colossal maws could swallow her slender body in one gulp and rip her to shreds, and its claw-like paws could tear humans apart with the slightest touch. These traits, specialized for murder, showed that Orthrus was a true witchbeast.

"A witchbeast… Why would you do something so reckless!"

"I suppose your charm plunges men into madness. It really is sinful."

The bearded man, confident he would win, ridiculed Emilia as her expression tensed up. The nonsense he spoke was very reminiscent of Puck's teasing, but the emotion it instilled was entirely different.

Emilia's breath halted for a moment when she remembered the absent cat.

"—Emilia. I won't be with you, so don't do anything dangerous."

That was what he'd told her when they parted that morning, the normally jovial spirit had gotten so serious. And perhaps this situation counted as the danger he'd warned about. If something happens, run away, he said. He was right, she understood that.

"But if I run… "

However, her legs didn't move. Not because she didn't want to run, she just couldn't back down with the village and the 'Garden' at stake.

"Hey now, what happened to all that vigor from before?

He clapped at Emilia, who'd stopped in her tracks and gone silent. She looked up in response, and the bearded men pointed to Orthrus who was snarling ferociously.

"If you've lost your nerve, I wouldn't mind having him withdraw."

"Really?"

"Is this the time to stare blankly? Ah, it's true. It'd be best if our product was unharmed. A limbless elf's value would be…"

"Then put him back in the cage and leave this place. Don't harm the village or the villagers either. If you do this, we can reconcile our differences."

Taking advantage of his offer, she offered an amicable resolution, a genuine solution with no ulterior motive.

However, the bearded man was dumbfounded by this and flew into a rage.

“Can you not comprehend your situation?! Why the hell should we listen to you?! Don’t get it wrong, we’ll give the orders, and you’ll obey!

“But I—”

“Do it, Orthrus!”

Her explanation was immediately cut short by his rage and Orthrus’ roar. Roaring with anticipation, Orthrus leaped at Emilia and swiped at her.

Its enormous blow carved up the snowy ground, sending hardened snow and soil flying. An attack of this magnitude would easily rip a human to bits if it landed.

With her hair fluttering, Emilia narrowly cartwheeled out of the blow’s path.

But the beast’s assault didn’t stop there, its colossal jaws continually snapped at her. Emilia desperately escaped as she was followed by the sound of its jaws, its foul smell, and its flying drool.

“This isn’t the time to be doing this!”

“—Grr!”

She continually dodged the two heads’ endless attacks by a hair. The way it chained attacks, and the interval between them, was radically different from any man or witchbeast she’d faced before. She couldn’t even attempt a counterattack since its thick fur and hide would simply absorb her blows. Furthermore, it wasn’t only the beast she had to be wary of—

“Don’t kill her! And avoid the face, she’ll lose value!”

The bearded man yelled to his subordinates, who had their crossbows trained on Emilia. Obeying this order, they fired at her legs in an attempt to kill her mobility.

Emilia had no room for error between the simultaneous threats of fangs and arrows. She could rely on her taijutsu for now, but she would eventually reach her limit. If one attack grazed her, another would land directly, and the third would be certain death. Before that could happen—

She slipped through the rain of arrows by force, assailing two men who had just fired and were reloading. She immediately followed it up by kneeing another man's torso, having forgotten about their steel plates.

"Damn—"

No matter what she did, she couldn't fully avoid Orthrus' teeth. She managed to avoid a direct hit, but her robe got snagged, causing her to lose her footing. She was immediately assailed by arrowfire. 'This is bad', she thought, but a shadow suddenly covered her.

"—!"

The next instant there was a howl of pain, but it wasn't from Emilia. The two headed beast had several arrows lodged in its back.

The arrows intended for Emilia ended up hitting the witchbeast as it continued to pursue her. The witchbeast turned around in a rage, and swiped at the men who shot it.

"—?!"

The ferocious blow split the ground open, creating an explosion of blood and snow. Fortunately for the men, their thick armor prevented their deaths.

However, their injuries were too grave for them to continue fighting. Witnessing this friendly fire caused the bearded man to explode in anger.

"Don't screw around, you moron! Do you not remember who broke your horn and became your master?!"

"—Grr!"

Showed in abuse, Orthrus roared rebelliously. However, the bearded man's command overpowered the beast's instincts. The reason was the witchbeast's horn.

Witchbeasts were originally considered to be completely impossible to tame, however there did exist one method to control them. That is to say, to break the horn that all witchbeasts are born with.

In this scenario, the witchbeast would be forced to obey the commands of the one who broke its horn. There existed no other method to tame them.

However, this only applied to the one who broke the horn. That was why Orthrus turned its fangs on the other men, there were essentially prey.

"That's quite a rowdy look you've got there! Hurry up and do what you're supposed to! Crush her legs and bring her to me!"

"—Grr!"

"Right now!"

Furthermore, even breaking a witchbeast's horn would not create an amicable relationship. It only granted the right to give orders by force. Consequently, Orthrus' hatred was directed at both Emilia and the bearded man in equal measure.

"…"

Despite this, Orthrus obeyed him and turned to Emilia. It wanted to destroy everything, but it directed all that bloodlust at Emilia. However—

"Hey, let's stop this!"

Before Orthrus could attack, Emilia once again appealed to the bearded man. It was her last chance, she couldn't fail here. She spoke desperately.

"Half your men are down, they need treatment! I understand how you feel, so let's stop here, continuing would cause irreparable damage!”

“Don’t make me repeat myself! You’ve already done irreparable damage! Capturing you would finally make up for it, that’s why I’m here!”

“Isn’t your life worth anything?! You have to get out of here right now!”

“Aah…?!”

They screamed at each other, but her desperate pleas eventually gave him pause. The emotion behind her appeal wasn’t quite fear, there was something different. Sensing that she’d gotten through to him, Emilia continued.

“I told you before, right? This forest is really dangerous! Especially for you, since you’ve spilled a lot of blood here, they’ll definitely remember the scent. And you even brought a witchbeast… What do you think they’ll do when they see their territory in this state?!”

“Territory? Whose territory? What the hell are you talking about!”

“That’s—”

Perhaps realizing he shouldn’t ignore her words, he raised his voice. Emilia opened her mouth to answer, but it was already too late. Before she could respond, the answer appeared before them.

“—Ah.”

A dumbfounded voice leaked out, causing Emilia to turn and look up. A colossal snowball filled the sky, thrown at them from atop the hill.

“Run—!!”

Emilia immediately leapt to the side as she shouted, barely escaping its blast radius. A colossal impact shook the ground, followed by many dying wails.

To call it a snowball was putting it lightly, considering the scale of the destruction it caused. The gigantic mass of snow rolled down the hill, adding to its size as it became a force of absolute destruction and crushed those who were late to flee the base of the hill.

Emilia had managed to escape the point of impact and Orthrus had dodged instinctively, but they were the only ones who managed to evade it., the survival of the rest was left to fate. You were lucky if it didn't roll into you, and unlucky if it did. It was that simple.

"…"

Shards of ice, beautiful though they may be, were little more than murder weapons once they were absorbed into the mass of snow. The men who were left behind dyed the snow red as they were swallowed up.

Screams of agony overlapped as they had their entire bodies crushed, their internal organs being forced out. In an instant, the snow path had turned into the scene of a disaster, a snowscape of death. The snowball which had swallowed so many men finally crashed into their cart, the magnificent impact destroyed the cage as the snowball fell apart.

Mixed in the scattered snow were human remains and the cart's wreckage. The tool they'd left behind had just been used to kill them.

—That was surely the embodiment of the rage of the lord of this territory, the white silhouette that stood atop the hill.

"Snow Blight…"

Emilia looked away from the tragedy, up at the being at the top of the hill as she mouthed its name. It wasn't as if it heard her, but the white figure turned to the sky and roared as if in response.

The horn on its forehead pierced the heavens as it beat its bulky chest, ostentatiously emphasizing its presence. It was definitely the Snow Blight—The 'Lord' of the forest's northern area, a terrible and cunning witchbeast.

It had the form of an ape, with short, frizzled white fur like snow, a red face intoxicated by bloodlust rather than alcohol, and erratic yellow eyes that glimmered with killing intent.

Its short legs were strong enough to split the ground and its tree-like arms were more than strong enough to toss a snowball weighing several hundreds of kilograms. It was certainly smaller than Orthrus, but it was just as menacing. It was this Snow Blight's arrival that Emilia warned of, the worst possible situation.

However, she wasn't the only who was upset at the boisterous intruder.

"—Grr!!"

Orthrus' fur stood on end as it howled with determination in the face of the Snow Blight's intimidation. The two witchbeasts had simultaneously deemed each other enemies, and they'd also deemed the each other the greatest threats.

Consequently, what followed was inevitable, unstoppable.

"…"

Their bloodlust collided, covering the several dozens of meters between them in an instant. Orthrus dashed up the hill, intending to massacre the Snow Blight with its sharp teeth and powerful jaws.

Facing the demonic dog's charge, the Snow Blight also prepared to fight in close quarters.

However, the Snow Blight's offense and defense were of an entirely different level.

"…"

Dashing forward, the Snow Blight stabbed its hands into the ground and started gathering snow in its massive palms.

—Before long, the gathered snow took on a spherical form and became a colossal snowball as it started rolling down the hill. This was surely the source of the Snow Blight's name, the way it rampaged through the snow.

"–Grr!!"

The speed and force with which the snowball took shape and grew was extraordinary. With the white murder weapon bearing down on it, Orthrus hastened its charge even further. Its two heads opened their jaws as wide as they could so as to tear into the snowball, and then into the Snow Blight's throat.

The distance between the two steadily shrunk until it disappeared entirely Orthrus' fangs pierced the snowball, its jaws clamped down, the force—

"Uuoohhh—!!"

The lord of the forest forcibly held the snowball together with its gigantic arms, causing Orthrus' teeth to shatter at the roots and its heads to snap to the side with their necks broken. This was without a doubt an instant kill—Orthrus' giant body was crushed by the snowball, its two heads spilling blood and brains.

The demonic dog's body was swallowed up completely, rolling with the snowball as its bones were crushed to bits, ultimately ending up as a pile of flesh.

Like this, the snowball left the path and rolled into the forest, mowing trees down until it disappeared into the distance. Having witnessed this overwhelming power, those besides the witchbeast had varying reactions.

"…"

Emilia put her guard up, the bearded man sat down in despair and his subordinates were too shocked to move. Only Emilia still had the will to fight. The others had their spirits broken by Orthrus' horrific murder at the lord of the forest's hands.

"I warned you so many times, and yet…!"

Emilia grumbled in frustration, but never in human history had idle complaints solved a crisis. Having crushed the demonic dog, the Snow Blight started scanning for its next victim. The lord of the forest preferred those with fighting spirit—In other words, just Emilia.

"…"

The Snow Blight glared down at Emilia. There were track-like marks near its feet. The witchbeast would move as if sliding, with its feet hardly leaving the ground, leaving these tracks in its territory.

The X's she'd marked on her map were all the Snow Blight's hunting grounds. This was no exception. The Snow Blight set its sights on Emilia and started howling.

"—!"

Leaping over the path, it swung its massive arms at her.

Its hands were too large even for its gigantic body and were strong enough to flatten Emilia.

Left, right, backward, regardless of where she went she could not escape its range.

Then the only answer left was forwards, the bold choice to advance and dive under its legs.

"…"

At the moment of impact, the explosion-like winds behind her were strong enough to push her forward.

Creating a cloud of snow where it landed, the Snow Blight casually launched another attack at Emilia who had managed to get behind it. Slipping past and stepping closer, Emilia slammed both her arms into its chest.

She'd put everything she had into that blow.

She even twisted her arms at the moment of impact to add penetrating force. The impact sent the snow around her flying and sound it created was such that any human would surely have their organs destroyed.

—However, her opponent was no human, it was a witchbeast. And even among witchbeasts it stood at the top.

“Hurts…”

Having been blocked by its armor-like muscle, Emilia retracted her fists in pain. Most of the power had been stopped, with Emilia suffering the recoil damage. And most importantly, Emilia had stopped moving in order to land that attack.

“—Grr!”

Unconcerned about the impact on its chest, the Snow Blight’s face showed no signs of pain as it swung at her.

Even twisting her body as fast as possible, her suboptimal position made it impossible to dodge. The powerful blow landed, blowing her away.

“Kh…?!”

Emilia couldn’t put up any sort of defense against the organ churning force and was slammed into a mountain. She had been embedded in the snow up to her knees as she coughed up blood.

“Ow…”

Having rendered her unable to move, the Snow Blight’s next move was exceedingly rational.

Leaving the powerless for later, it chose to prioritize the greatest threat.

“…”

“Uh, aah?”

The Snow Blight's line of sight landed on the bearded man, who had fallen to his knees. Having lost himself after witnessing Orthrus' death, he had wasted the time Emilia desperately bought them. As a result, since he still had his crossbow in hand, he was chosen as its next target.

"Hi, hic"

His throat trembled as he attempted to loosen his stiff fingers and drop the crossbow. He intended to show he was no threat by doing this, but it was too late.

"Ah"

His dumbfounded reaction seemed far too subdued considering the tragedy that had befallen his hands.

The demonic ape's palms crushed both his arms along with his weapons. The man forgot to even scream as he stared at his arm getting crushed with the crossbow.

The beast roared as it raised its arms. If it were to bring them down, the bearded man would die like splattered fruit. Neither he nor his comrades could stop this.

So it was someone else who stopped it.

"…"

The sound of an arrow being fired, and the sensation of a small impact in its back caused the Snow Blight to turn around. Its gaze landed on Emilia, who was on one knee as she held a fallen man's crossbow.

Wiping the blood from her mouth, Emilia discarded the crossbow. With an arrow in its back, the Snow Blight turned to face the interloper head on.

Being attacked by prey on the verge of death seemed to wound its pride.

Postponing the bearded man's execution, the Snow Blight chose to attack Emilia instead. Emilia knew this would be the consequence of interrupting.

If she didn't, he would die. She couldn't let that happen.

She didn't like him in the slightest, and he was the source of several unpleasant memories. But even so, she couldn't let him die.

"Don't do such terrible things in this forest…"

She whispered. She wasn't looking at the approaching Snow Blight, her gaze was aimed at the blood and corpses littering the path.

"Don't stain this forest with blood."

So many people had died already, if this continued the count would only grow. She couldn't let that happen. If even more people died here—

"Nobody needs to suffer here—"

Her vision blurred as tears filled her eyes. She had stopped speaking midway, because her words unintentionally touched the door of some memory.

Those words unconsciously led to the gate to memories that had long been sealed away.

However, they weren't enough to bring forth those memories. And she didn't really have time to seek them out either.

"…"

The witchbeast did not possess the reason, intellect or mercy to hear her plea.

So all she could do now was make a choice.

"Don't let the 'Ice Flowers' bloom, even by mistake."

Puck's parting words repeated in the back of her mind. She saw his face when she closed her eyes in guilt. And then, she spoke.

"—I'm sorry."

Words of apology, not directed at the beast before her, nor the bearded man and his men, and certainly not at herself.

It was an apology to Puck and to her companions in the forest who had been frozen.

"…"

Guilt and an unbearable power swelled up in her heart. The power desired a target, and she would release it to the outside world. —She was repeating her sin.

Hazy memories and vivid guilt, the sins of the past, the forest freezing over—

A glow surrounded her as colossal magical power started surging forth. Probably the same glow as back then.

"—?"

The Snow Blight stopped and frowned at the eye-burning light. However, it looked around and realized it was a false alarm, and then continued—Not.

It fell over, as though a massive weight had forced it off its feet.

Unable to bear it, the witchbeast howled in pain and confusion. It desperately tried to turn and look at its back, but that was impossible. The ape's large neck was encased in thick ice, and more than half its upper body had been frozen.

The weight it felt on its back, was something that grew from the wound there.

—Blooming on its back was a crimson flower of ice which grew by draining the beast's blood.

The ice flower absorbed blood from the small wound as it grew. Its mass was soon greater than that of the witchbeast that had become a flower bed as. The witchbeast had been robbed of its life force.

Warping the atmosphere, the beautiful and deadly ice flowers spread their petals and bloomed.

The witchbeast's body gradually withered away, its fur starting falling out as it lost moisture. Its shrunken limbs were like dead branches. There were no longer any traces of its former strength as the light left its eyes.

"…"

A hoarse breath signified the end of the ruler of this territory.

The witchbeast died a cruel death, its vitality consumed by flowers, understanding nothing as the snow buried it.

"Wh-Wha… What…?"

The bearded man panicked as he saw this. The death of the beast, and the crimson flowers of ice that bloomed from its body. However, even he understood the source of this phenomenon.

"Y-You… Elf?"

"U, Ku… Ah…"

Cowering in the snow, Emilia groaned in pain. She had been the one who did this.

Furthermore, her strained gasps and red face showed that his suffering wasn't over just yet.

Beads of sweat formed on her forehead as tears trickled down her cheeks. They weren't tears mourning the witchbeast's death, she didn't have the leeway to even care about that right now, so great was her suffering.

She desperately tried to suppress her surging power—But she couldn't.

"N-No way…?!"

The bearded man screamed as he stared at his crushed arms in shock. His wounds filled with crossbow shards had started to change, and the blood flowing out of them froze as a tiny flower bud manifested.

—The same ice flower that had killed the witchbeast. The sight of their growth overwhelmed him.

“H-Hii, hiii…!”

Still on the ground, he shook his head in rejection. However, his condition steadily worsened as he lost blood and vitality, and his consciousness was slowly fading.

At this rate he would end up sharing the witchbeast’s fate, losing his life to the ice flowers.

“W-Wait, please wait…! I’ll apologize! I beg you…!”

Driving his face into the snow, he begged as snot dripped down his face. However, Emilia couldn’t stop this.

A flower had even started budding in the wound on his face.

It turned out that the ice flowers were manifesting in any and all wounds in the area.

Budding in wounds, they would glitter a brilliant crimson, taking life and providing a beautiful death.

“No… Please, stop, understand…”

The men’s shrieks filled the path as they sensed their slowly approaching deaths. This snow path would turn all living things into flower beds, and become a field of crimson flowers.

Imagining this, Emilia desperately tried to keep it from happening. However, her power was beyond her control. Realizing that everyone would die, Emilia broke into tears

“Please… Somebody…”

“—That you didn’t call my name immediately is one of your bad points.”

An aloof voice responded to her tearful plea for help.

The voice was far too familiar, causing Emilia to momentarily forget her suffering.

“Good grief, I step out for a bit and this happens. Those obstinate fools are bothersome too, but I’ll have to lecture you properly later.”

Saying this, the owner of the voice floated down to Emilia’s side with a smile. There was no mistaking it.

Covered in fur, a cute face, an indifferent voice and a casual attitude, it had to be him.

“…Puck?”

“Yep, it’s me. Your wonderful, cute, fluffy cat.”

He winked at her as she suffered, and then moved to face her directly and joined his hands, as if praying, as he gently spoke to her.

“Emilia, take a deep breath. For now, you don’t need to think of anything besides me.”

“—Yeah.”

Right now, she had absolutely no reason to doubt or refuse his instructions.

She closed her eyes and started breathing deeply, just as he’d instructed. Even now the surging power within her showed no signs of stopping as it begged to be released.

However—

“…”

Her consciousness slowly faded as Puck whispered to her, and her pain and suffering steadily diminished as well.

The tension gradually left her face, and her breathing calmed.

"…"

Finally, the surging magical power had dispersed, leaving a sleeping Emilia. Her expression was rather peaceful. Puck nodded with satisfaction as he affectionately gazed at her, and then turned around—

"Now then, how should I deal with you?"

"…Ah"

Puck spoke as he clapped, destroying the blooming flowers in their wounds.

They were dumbfounded at the flowers' disappearance, having been mere moments from death.

An unavoidable death, and a miraculous savior—These consecutive shocks were too much for them.

But whether they lived or died still depended on how the spirit before them was feeling.

"Well then, I only saved you because this girl had tried so desperately to prevent your deaths. I merely respected her wishes, that's all."

"…"

"If it weren't for her, you would be dead. If she weren't so kind, I'd massacre you. If she weren't sleeping peacefully, I'd throw myself away."

His words, calm and gentle though they were, were very clearly threatening.

Puck circled above the men with a smile as they were frozen by his words. They had made Emilia suffer while he was away, as if to show his anger at this—

“If you’ve learned anything from this, never even think of harming this girl or this forest. It’d be wise to never approach this forest again. Emilia’s very kind so she’s even soft on you guys, she might even forgive you. But I don’t intend to be nearly as nice as I look. —Got it?”

“Hii—”

His final words were accompanied by freezing winds. The ice-like wind surrounding them was but a small fraction of his power—The men trembled, unable to even speak when they realized this.

“Well, hurry home then. —Because I’ll never forgive you.”

Puck seemed content as he said that to the cowering men.

This cold declaration had them running out of the forest with no hesitation this time. After he watched them scrambled away, Puck looked around and tilted his head.

“Now, to make sure she doesn’t catch a cold.”

His voice was full of love, the polar opposite of the threatening tone he was just using. He gently lifted the sleeping girl with magic and slowly took her home.

Gently, so that she could at least sleep peacefully for now.

8

When she woke up, the first thing she felt was despondency, a sense of guilt she couldn’t put into words.

“Ah—”

She muttered, still in bed, with no real meaning to it.

She had slept so deeply she didn’t even dream, and yet she woke up with much greater ease than she usually did. That was most likely because what her body sought was not rest, but escape.

—To escape from the sin she'd committed. Once she was suitably distant, she woke up.

—That was probably all it was.

“Puck, are you there…?

She sat up in her bed and called to him. However, she received no reply, he was nowhere to be seen. Shaking her slightly hurting head, she turned to the window.

Judging by the color and angle of the light pouring in, it was probably before noon. She believed she'd fallen asleep in the evening, so she'd definitely slept for almost a whole day. Perhaps even several days—

“How did things turn out in the end…?”

Stepping down from her bed, Emilia reexamined her memories.

The men who planned to ambush her at the ‘Sloppy Snow Path’, Orthrus and the Snow Blight, and finally her disobedience when she unleashed her uncontrollable power and nearly lost herself—

“—Puck had to stop it again.”

Having disobeyed him, she couldn't even count how many debts she owed him by now.

Without the opportunity to repay even a single one, she continued accumulating debts, that was the extent of their relationship.

This time, if Puck didn't stop it the whole forest—

“That's right, the village! I have to find out what happened.”

Puck had stopped her overflowing magic, so the bearded man and his men were probably safe. However, it wasn't only Emilia they were targeting, the fate of the village was unclear.

“—!”

Running out of patience, she rushed out of the house, grabbing her hood and donning it along the way.

Hiding her face, she ran toward the village.

Along the way, several unpleasant thoughts crossed the back of her mind. The possibility that the bearded man attacked the village, and the worry that he'd used a witchbeast. If Orthrus ran wild, a small village like that would be torn apart.

If something like that had occurred, it would be an unforgivable mistake on her part.

"Please, please…"

Emilia exited the white forest and arrived at the village as she prayed for their safety

From a distance it didn't look like any of the buildings were destroyed. Even after she leaped over the fence, she could find no traces of an attack in the village.

This relieved her, but she immediately realized—

"…There's no one here?"

It was midday, the villagers were usually out and about around this time.

But right now she couldn't find a single person, she found the stillness rather disconcerting.

The village wasn't damaged. But she didn't know about the villagers. Perhaps the bearded man caged them like he tried to do to her and—

"—!"

The moment she thought that, she sensed someone and turned toward them. Her reaction was fast, and she caught sight of a figure. A familiar man was peeking out from the village's meeting place—The man she traded with whenever she visited the village.

"U…"

Having been found, his aged face wrinkled even further. Emilia was happy that he was safe, but this reaction puzzled her.

The headband-wearing man was the only one in the village who didn't fear or reject her. But right now, it was though he wanted to avoid her at all costs.

That guess wasn't wrong.

"Um…"

"—W-We had no choice! Forgive us, please forgive us!"

"Eh?"

She drew closer to ask about the situation, but the man suddenly fell to his knees and lowered his head as he apologized in a shaky voice.

She was taken aback by this. She never imagined this sort of thing coming from the normall calm man.

"If we didn't say that, the village would have… Things were going well, but please let this be the end! Don't involve us in your business anymore!"

"Involve? I…"

"We won't tell anyone about you! I swear it! But I won't accept anymore goods, nor will I trade with you! Please leave us alone!"

"…"

The sudden fear and rejection left her lost for words.

"—Ah"

It's not like she didn't expect this to happen eventually.

But even so, she had hope. That maybe they could get closer, that kind of hope. That was why the shock was greater than she'd ever anticipated, but she also understood.

There was nothing more to say. —There was no longer any connection between them.

"…"

She'd heard what they said about her. It seemed what the bearded man said was true, that they'd sold her out.

And thus they feared that she would come to exact her revenge. Even if she declared she would do nothing of the sort, the fear carved into them would not fade.

And so, this would be the end.

"Just one more thing."

"One more…?"

"Those people didn't do anything? Nobody got hurt?"

She looked down at him, wanting to be sure of that at least. If she could just confirm that much, she could end this.

"Y-Yes… Nothing happened, nobody was hurt. They won't come here again."

"…I see, that's good then."

She was relieved from the bottom of her heart.

Nobody was hurt. That incident hadn't harmed anyone else.

That was probably the only part of this ordeal she could consider fortunate.

Having confirmed this, she could accept their decision and sever their ties.

But first—

"—Raise your head."

"Ah, aah, we're so sorry… ah"

He obeyed her and raised his head, his voice frozen. His wrinkled face turned pale, gripped by extreme terror.

Reflected in his green eyes, was the dreadful image of a witch, bearing silver hair and amethyst eyes.

—She would accept their decision. However, she would also have them accept hers.

Taking off her hood, she revealed her face, her eyes narrowed at the gasping man.

The cold, heartless, unfeeling expression of a witch—

"Never forget this face and what you're feeling in this moment."

"…"

"Never again mention to anyone that I was here."

Her warning was calm and absolute.

So they would never forget, so they would never think of incurring this fear again.

—So they would never again have anything to do with her.

"…"

The terrified man simply stared at her wide-eyed, unable to even answer. But the lack of a response wasn't a problem. That reaction in itself was the answer.

—Not just his, but that of the entire village.

"—Never again set foot in the frozen forest. That place is my forest, my garden."

Raising her voice, she warned the whole village.

She and the man were the only two people there. However, she sensed innumerable gazes on them from the moment he started apologizing, originating from the houses around them.

Therefore her words would reach them all. This fear would envelop all of them..

No would dare approach her, nor speak of her ever again.

"—Goodbye."

She turned around, intending to leave without saying anything. But in the end, she mouthed just one word.

She herself did not understand why.

Nevertheless, she did not look back at his face, she thought that was the right thing to do.

"…"

She slowly walked out of the village, her silver hair flowing in the wind.

Out of the clearing, past the fence, until the village was no longer visible, she continued walking resolutely as they all watched her, playing the role of the silver witch to the very end.

As proof, the man behind her murmured this:

"Witch of the White Forest. —The Witch of Frost"

That name would follow her for a long, long time.

9

—The kingdom's largest mining town, Ganacks, was to the northeast of Elior Forest.

Situated at the base of the Gina mountain range which was said to have once been a dragon's dwelling, it was one of Lugunica's six great cities and was known for its booming magic ore industry.

Though it boasted unrivaled magic stone production, it was also home to other industries—Such as its famous pleasure district.

Be it the miners working in the mountains, or the mercenaries dealing with illegal miners, the pleasure district was an oasis to all sorts of people, a grand success in the mostly dull area.

At night, Ganacks' main street would be lit by gorgeous crystal lights, and brawny men would come to be soothed by scantily dressed women—

However, right beside those showy streets was an entirely different world.

A gloomy world that the virtuous ignored, beyond the reach of those beautiful lights. An aura of blood and violence enveloped it, a place for those who made such things their business.

And then an old building by the main street—Even it was no exception.

It would be difficult to ascertain at a glance just what occurred in there, there wasn't even a sign of any sort. However, those more attuned to such matters would immediately sense the evil atmosphere surrounding it.

A den where the sanctity of life was sullied, where all problems were dealt with through violence.

"It's true! It's just like I've been telling you!"

In a room deep in the second floor of the somewhat filthy wooden building, a man shouted in a hoarse voice.

Contrary to the building's outer facade, the room was immaculate. And in the middle was an exquisite ebony table upon which the hoarse man, bandaged all over, placed his arms.

His right ear was missing, and both his arms were pitifully wrapped in bandages.

He was the bearded man who had just barely escaped Elior Forest with his life.

His eyes were bloodshot as he pled as though he'd completely forgotten about the pain.

"There's elves in that forest! I saw it myself! That elf girl was completely genuine, we need to capture her right away!"

"Just how many men will you send to their deaths before you're satisfied?"

The voice that responded to his barbaric proposal was cool and callous as it shot him down.

Sat in the chair facing him was a man in the prime of his life. A well dressed man with a clean shaven mustache, quite unlike the filthy man across him, the difference in their status was obvious at a glance.

"Fifteen men just died under your leadership. They don't come free, you know."

"They might as well! You could find any number of replacements roaming the back alleys!"

"Perhaps men are cheap, but that's not the case for witchbeasts. Merely keeping and feeding Orthrus was quite the expense in itself. I gave it to you as a favor, but…"

"Th-The elf can make up for that too! If we catch her, we can make half-elves! I'm sure the rich would swarm in to torture a half-devil!"

The bearded man continued to persist, his words causing the other man to lower his eyes in thought.

"…Certainly, half-elves aren't a common sight on the slave market."

"—! Then!"

Deeming his superior's reaction favorable, the bearded man chuckled thinking it was now possible to make a comeback. In his mind, methods to exact revenge on that elf—that silver-haired girl—had already started churning.

Even man and witchbeast combined proved insufficient. She even had that damned spirit with her. Even so, he had to do it. To recover his trust and honor, he had no choice—

“Definitely, I’ll definitely make up for this. I’ll teach that elf girl…”

“Make up, is it?—There’s other ways to do that.”

“Other ways?”

His excitement was suddenly interrupted by his superior. The bearded man waited for him to continue, but it the reply came from somewhere else entirely.

“—Not reversing a failure, but compensating for it.”

“—?!”

In that moment, a wholly different voice filled the room. They’d already made sure to clear the room, and the building itself was owned by their organization, they even had guards blocking the room. It’d be impossible to slip by and enter the room.

Therefore the intruder hadn’t entered by door or window, but rather manifested by traversing space itself.

Particles of light manifested near the ceiling, wavering as they gathered into a single entity. The bearded man was speechless as the light took the form of a kitten before his very eyes.

“It’s kind of embarrassing to be stared at like this, you know?”

“W-W-W…”

“Well now, that’s a reaction beyond my expectations. I quite like it.”

Floating before the bearded man, the cat nodded in satisfaction at his lack of comprehension. —The kitten, so small as to fit in one’s palm, was speaking human language as though it were a matter of course.

This reality, this existence, were both familiar to the bearded man. Staring in shock, he shouted.

“You’re… That damned elf’s spirit!”

“Hm, it’s only been two days. But that form of address isn’t quite fitting, she’s not a ‘damned elf’, and I’m quite different from the spirits you lot are familiar with.”

“What are…”

“After all, I’m far fluffier and cuter than any other spirit.”

The cat smiled and winked, very clearly mocking the bearded man. Understanding this, the bearded man was about to scream in rage, but then he realized.

“Wait a minute. Why weren’t you surprised, boss?”

Despite his shock, his superior sat before him as cool as ever. He showed no reaction whatsoever to the spirit’s sudden entrance, remaining in his chair unperturbed.

Almost as if he had no reason to surprised—

“—Don’t tell me, you sold me out?!”

“Don’t speak such slander. As for the means of compensation, the great spirit simply put in a word before you. Along with a gift, you see.”

As he spoke, the boss pushed the wooden boxes under his desk out with his foot. The merchandise the bearded man and his men had lost, stolen by the elf girl and villagers some ten odd days ago.

The spirit had returned them and influenced his boss, a fact that enraged him.

“You believe this damned cat over your subordinate?!”

“A spirit more than capable of freezing us along with the entire building, something your endless blunders and dimwitted yelling could lead to.”

The bearded man raised his voice, but his superior bluntly shut him down, and then started twirling his mustache.

“Moreover, I hail from Gusteko. I follow the holy teachings. To cross a spirit is absurd.”

In accordance with the holy doctrine, he turned his hands to Puck, signaling that he could do as he pleased.

That gesture and attitude showed the bearded man all he needed to know. His boss and the spirit had already settled things, and he was deemed useless to the organization, something to discard.

“Unlike the beardy over there, this one is quite wise. I’m thankful.”

As the bearded man was struck with the reality that he was being thrown away, the spirit wrapped his long tail around himself and said,

“Well then, it’d be great if that facial hair made you wiser too. Though I’d be satisfied if you just understood how hard that girl tried to settle things peacefully.”

His tone was casual, as though he was merely making small talk, his sleepy-sounding voice completely lacked in vigor. His words were soft like those of an adult scolding a child—But even so, his words held tremendous power.

The bearded man’s instincts screamed to nod, apologize and beg for forgiveness. But—

“—Don’t get carried away, you damned cat.”

“Hmm?”

Even if the spirit forgave him, it was still over. The organization definitely wouldn’t just let him off. Moreover, there was the fact that his boss betrayed him. He was doomed, so he might as well show some stubbornness.

“As if some talking cat has the right to nag its human masters! Listen up, in this country demi-humans, especially elves, have absolutely no right to disobey! They’re our livestock! No different from the rocks being mined and sold around here!”

His face red with rage and agitation, he glared at the cat as he bared his bloody teeth.

“I ought to be the one warning you and that girl. —No matter how far you go, no matter how much you hide, people won’t leave you alone! That threat will follow you no matter where you run, never forget that!”

Unsightly and warped, his words momentarily left the spirit speechless. The cat soon let his ears droop and took a deep breath.

“If you’re going to go that far, there’s no helping it. —It’s about time I punished you.”

“Gonna kill me? Must feel nice to let off some steam, huh!”

“No, I’m not that short tempered. Rather, I’m going to have you help us out.”

“What?”

The bearded man raised his eyebrow at the spirit’s statement, and in an instant he felt something slip into his chest. Cold, as though ice itself were being pressed into him, the sensation caused him to groan and grab his chest. However, there was nothing there, his chest seemed no different from usual.

“What the hell did you just do? You damned… Gah?!”

His rebuke was cut short by the severe pain exploding within him. He fell to his knees on the spot, the pain almost causing his eyes to pop out. It was unbearable, like a blade tearing him up from the inside.

“You saw the ice flowers in the forest, right? I just planted one inside you.”

"…"

"Your anger and hatred toward that girl and myself will cause it to grow. Even merely thinking or wishing evil upon us will feed it. —And in the end, it might even pierce right through you."

The cat groomed his face as he cruelly looked down on the bearded man with his round, black eyes.

"How fitting for you to be punished by your own heart. If you ever leave all of this behind, the flower shall wither away. But if you never let go…"

"Die, you-Gyaah!"

The bearded man's insults were cut short by his scream of pain, he then went limp and collapsed to the ground with a thud.

As he lost consciousness, he heard the spirit speak.

"—My name is Puck. Remember that name in the afterlife."

His anger at this introduction caused another jolt of pain, knocking him out completely.

"Alright then."

The spirit—Puck watched the bearded man faint and then turned to his boss, who was silent. The man's eyebrows furrowed as he watched his former subordinate, but he looked up at Puck without any change in countenance.

"What will you do now? Will I be punished too, for my negligence as Chap's superior?"

"Ah, his name was Chap. Doesn't really fit him, honestly."

"…"

"Well, there's no need to worry. As someone from the Holy Kingdom you should be familiar with a spirit's disposition, yes? My dispute was with him. —If you deal with him as promised, everything will be just fine."

Puck replied to his question and then started ascending before the continued, "But even so,"

"If you lot break your promise and attack the forest yet again, you'll all be turned to ice just as you expect."

"A spirit making an example of someone, how very human. Perhaps the times have changed."

"The concept is a little different. This is—"

Tilting his head at the man's sarcasm, Puck thought for moment.

"—A demonstration, shall we call it?"

Puck's words made the man fall silent and sigh deeply. He then shook his head in response.

"…I'm not joking around. We'll stay away from the forest and the elves. I have no desire to repeat this."

"I see. Then we no longer have anything to do with each other, and I'm not so cruel a spirit as to harm a human I have no business with."

Puck grinned as though he were telling a joke, but the man didn't smile back. Thinking this reaction unfortunate, Puck bid him adieu.

"Release ol' Chap and let him live a long life. Don't have the organization finish him off no matter what, that's what he's hoping for."

"I understand… But can I ask one final question?"

"Hm?"

His restrained voice caused Puck to turn back to him. He then spoke in a subdued tone.

"Shall we think of that forest as your… "The Beast of the End"'s territory?”

“…”

Puck initially showed no reaction to this question. It was a question he didn’t expect, and also a question that showed how keen the man’s judgement was.

The lack of response caused tension and unease to float across the man’s gaze. Puck did nothing to ease his nervousness, nor did he choose particularly gentle words as he cocked his head.

“What exactly are you planning to do with the answer?”

“…Nothing, really. As I said, I follow the teachings of Gusteko. I simply asked out of personal interest, considering you’re a spirit on par with the four greats.”

“I see. Idle curiosity, is it? There’s no helping it then.”

Puck nodded as though he’d accepted that answer, and straightened his tilted head. And then—

“Never again speak of that name or what happened here, how about ‘yes’?”

“…Supposing I were to tell someone?”

“You’d best leave it at that. Chap isn’t the only one with an ice flower inside him.”

“—?!”

“Kidding!”

Puck winked at the astonished man, his tone not suggesting a joke in the slightest. With that, Puck vanished from the room. Similar to when he appeared, mana scattered through the atmosphere as his form dispersed, leaving neither sound nor presence behind.

“—Hah.”

Having seen his visitor off, he leaned into his chair and took a deep breath—He was covered in sweat.

The cold sweat running down his forehead and back once again reminded him of the reality that he'd just confronted a supreme being.

"—What a terrible day."

He whispered as he ordered Chap's removal, his former subordinate still lying on the ground. It had already been an hour since the ordeal.

He felt a twinge of pity as he watched his subordinates toss the bearded man out.

"—Well, he's just reaping what he sowed."

However even that was little more than a momentary sentiment.

10

Emilia dashed out of the village and into the forest, but her pace soon slowed.

She slowly trudged her way through the familiar path. The greenery around her steadily lost color and she could feel ice being crushed under the soles of her shoes.

She'd walked this path countless times. It wasn't something she looked forward to by any standard, but it wasn't wholly terrible either. She had some happy memories here, however few they might be.

She'd probably never take his path again.

"I'll have to mark it off on the map…"

She murmured feebly, deeming the area forbidden territory in her mind. But in exchange, the Snow Blight's territory was now free. She would be able to increase the scope of her investigation.

She could finally investigate the area she'd been postponing, wary of witchbeasts. If she thought about it that way, it wasn't all bad. It was a wave of change, both good and bad.

"—You look like you're trying hard to convince yourself of something."

"Puck?"

As she walked with her eyes cast downward, the sudden appearance of the voice above her stopped her. Descending upside down before her was Puck, who'd been absent the whole day.

Puck righted himself once he'd reached eye level and looked at her with a sorrowful face.

"I get the gist of what's happened. As far as I know, your power even extended as far as the village. There were probably even children shocked to find ice flowers growing out of their scraped knees."

"…I see. I guess their fear was inevitable, then."

She'd only learned this after the fact, but their reaction was completely understandable. Much like those scoundrels, the villagers too had tasted the fear of the ice flowers, and they knew Emilia was the cause.

It was probably impossible for things to go back to normal after that.

"Do you think they're being selfish?"

"…Not at all. It was my fault, after all."

"Your fault? How?"

"Regardless of the reason, I put them through something dreadful. If you didn't handle the situation, things would have gotten even worse and the village would have…"

She couldn't continue, it was terrifying to even mouth the words.

If she said, she'd see it clearly. The horrifying scene she herself was going to create.

—She couldn't forget the alienation and dismay she felt at the village.

It certainly couldn't be said that they were close, they kept her at a distance, and she knew she wasn't welcome. Even so, they were able to compromise over time.

At the very least, Emilia had such hopes for the clumsy interactions they'd had for almost a year now.

A faint, selfish, thoughtless hope she'd never even realized.

"—Hey, Emilia. It's a good opportunity, so why don't we try leaving the forest?"

"…Puck."

"Now that you can no longer do business with them, it'll be hard to secure food. Furthermore, there were even those people who came here aiming for you. The time is right, isn't it?"

Puck's words caused her to lower her eyes slightly, deep in thought. His view was correct. Having cut things off with the villagers, the problem of food was a major one.

Like the bearded man, there were surely more people who would come after Emilia—and the elves.

The things she'd done to protect the forest, they might have all been self-satisfaction on her part, this was something she was certainly worried about.

But even so—

"I can't just leave everyone behind and run off somewhere."

Even if it was only self-satisfaction, she wasn't going to stop.

In addition, she was once again forced to face her uncontrollable power and she started to realize.

—Who exactly turned the forest white and froze her companions.

The reason for her guilt was surely within that unopenable door into her memories, and only her sleeping brethren held the key.

“You really are so stubborn, Emilia.”

“I’m sorry Puck. I really do understand how much you worry about me.”

“That you understand and still reply like that anyway is just the cherry on top. It really makes me pout, nya~n.”

Curling up mid-air, Puck meowed as if to tease Emilia. Despite her despondence, her cheeks relaxed a bit and the tension left her shoulders.

—This wasn’t the first time Puck had suggested leaving the forest.

He was never very cooperative when it came to her usual activities such as maintaining the sculptures or investigating the forest, but that was ultimately because he did not want her to stay in this forest.

And as for the reason he felt this way, he’d never once told her.

“Why do you want to take me out of the forest so badly?”

“I can’t stand to watch you punish yourself like this. To a free-spirited guy like me, it’s absurd to stay in a place that only makes you feel bad.”

“It’s not all bad… And even if it makes me feel bad, there’s a lot here that’s important to me.”

Her objection made Puck scrunch his face up. He looked as though he’d just tasted something sour, causing Emilia to burst into laughter. And then—

“…Thank you, Puck.”

"I don't recall doing anything worth your thanks, but it certainly feels good to be thanked."

Puck stroked his whiskers as he reclined, puffing his chest out at Emilia's words. Watching this, Emilia put on a brave face and thrust her fist forward.

"Alright, I can't just mope around forever. As you said, I'll have to find a source of food while I've still got some in reserve. Also, I've got to go take care of everyone as well."

"It's already been two days, might as well leave them be."

"Why are you always so mean?"

"Tough love, you could say I'm giving you advice on what exactly you should be prioritizing."

Emilia pouted at his bragging, but she nodded. It was certainly important to ascertain her priorities. In that case, her answer was obvious.

"Once I finish cleaning them up, I'll go explore the Snow Blight's territory."

"…Haah. The northern areas are completely unfamiliar, so it could be dangerous."

"Even if something were to happen, you'll save me, right?"

"Saying that sort of thing only when it's convenient, what a naughty girl."

Emilia herself thought her words were rather selfish, and Puck puffed his cheeks in response. But he didn't deny it, which made Emilia smile.

As Puck watched her smile, he seemed to have come to a decision.

"Hey, how about this… I could teach you how to contract with lesser spirits."

"As we just saw, I can't always be there when you're in a tough spot. This should keep you safe and lighten the burden a bit… How about it?"

"Is it alright?"

Emilia asked, her eyes wide at his proposal, and Puck seemed displeased as he responded.

"Well, I can't say I like it. But it is a fact that your trauma could have been avoided, these lesser spirits will be able to help you next time."

Lesser spirits were beings who hadn't yet become spirits, essentially balls of mana.

Their power certainly couldn't compare to that of a great spirit like Puck, but they'd be a great help if she contracted with them since she couldn't use magic on her own.

"But if I do that, you…"

"Hm?"

Blinking in surprise, Puck stared at Emilia who had stopped midway.

His suggestion made her rather uneasy when she thought about it. For him to suggest that she should contract with lesser spirits, it was almost as if—

"—No, it's nothing. Then, can I take you up on that when I have time?'

"Just leave it to me, I'll pick nice ones with brilliant futures ahead of them."

Puck struck his chest and declared this full of confidence, causing Emilia to smile bitterly. Hiding her unease behind that smile, Emilia turned toward her destination.

If by forming a contract with some lesser spirits, she could live independently…

'—Puck won't go away, right?'

Keeping away and drawing closer, not wanting to be alone, not wanting to be hurt. Considering their relationship, those words seemed terribly selfish to her.

"—Alright then, let's do our best today as well, Puck."

With those words, she ran off, leaving footprints in the snow.

As if she expected to find something at the end of her path, and would run any distance to reach it.

"Oh dear, that's some speed. I guess she's at that age, huh."

Puck swam through the air, smiling wryly as he watched Emilia take off like the wind.

But he soon stopped moving and turned to the grove to his right, sighing as he did so.

—Through the gaps in the trees, he could see a wavering red ball of light.

"I'm afraid I can't allow that. I'll keep my promise. You keep yours too"

'—'

The ball of light showed no reaction to his words.

Upon seeing that its color was deepening as its heat slowly rose, Puck pointed the tip of his tail at it and blasted it.

Being on the receiving end of this large burst of magic, the red light soundlessly disappeared.

Confirming its disappearance, Puck slowly lowered his tail,

"Nobody has the right to hurt her."

He said in a tone that was unlike him, and then shook his head several times. Then, once his eyes and expression had returned to normal, he turned to the direction Emilia ran off in.

Her slender, white back was already far off in the distance—

“Heey, wait up, Emilia. You’ll fall and get hurt if you’re not careful.”

His tone was tranquil as he said this, he then swam through the air as he pursued her.

—Two days later, she found another village to the west of the forest.

Chapter 3:
If It's for You

1

—The moment she woke up, even now she dreamed of it every single day.

It was cold, she was imprisoned in something hard for a very long time, and she could not make the slightest movement.

But suddenly there was a cracking sound as it broke, and she fell out of it.

"…"

She coughed several times, trying to expel something revolting, and suffered as she was unable to do so. She was then tortured by a pain that made her whole body creak as well as the wails of her empty stomach.

Within this never-ending pain and suffering that would not diminish, her mind was filled with fear.

—She didn't understand anything, not a single thing. She couldn't remember. Her head was in complete disarray.

Was this because of the pain? She did not even understand the source of her suffering, she only feared that it would continue, completely helpless.

"Scary… I'm scared…"

She didn't know what was happening, she sobbed as the unfamiliar pain and fear continued to make her cower.

She started to wonder if this unceasing fear would make her cry until she died, and the terror sent her into the depths of depression.

Suddenly, she realized that there was someone right beside her, and that something was touching her forehead.

“…”

She trembled and her body instinctively stiffened. But she immediately understood that that wasn’t necessary.

Right now, nothing could be worse than the agony she was experiencing.

Right now, nothing could be more frightening than the terror she was feeling.

And most importantly, right now, it didn’t feel like whoever or whatever was touching her had anything to do with the pain or the fear.

“…”

As she wept, a different voice mixed in with her own. It gradually became clearer, and she soon realized it was coming from whoever was touching her.

This person was crying too.

Are they in pain? Are they suffering? A vague unease rose within her.

But it was neither.

“—Sorry. I’m sorry.”

The voice kept apologizing.

Tormented by unbearable guilt and intolerable grief, the voice continued to apologize.

Because the voice sounded like it knew her pain, her suffering, and her fear,

Because it made her feel like she wasn’t alone,

“Why are you apologizing…?”

“…”

“Why are you crying…?”

Raising her head, she voiced her doubts. They seemed to fall silent. But she couldn’t give up on the answer. Because she had to know.

“—Because I left you alone.”

“You left me alone?”

“—Because I could never find you.”

“But you’re right here?”

She told them that they had no reason to feel guilty or regretful.

In exchange, she wanted them to tell her something.

“Your name is?”

“My name is…”

At this point, the world slowly started losing its form as a white light engulfed it—

“I’m…”

—Without ever learning the answer, Emilia would wake from her dream.

2

“The same dream again…”

Sitting up in her bed, Emilia wiped off the tears running down her cheeks with the back of her hand.

Emilia knew she wasn’t very good at waking up, but it was especially hard when she had bad dreams. And for the most part, this was a very frequent occurrence.

Thus, waking up only ever got harder.

"Mm…"

As she moaned in displeasure, her head drowsily swayed back and forth.

Despite her low blood pressure, Emilia wasn't the sort to go back to sleep once she'd woken up. It just took her some time to build up her energy. Therefore, she was still able to sense the presence of lesser spirits even in her half awake state.

"There… Good morning, everyone."

The mute spirits asserted their presence by perching in her silver hair or on her slender shoulders.

Fundamentally speaking, lesser spirits were unable to communicate with words. At best they could transmit and receive feelings via mana, but the lesser spirits were still very fond of this crude form of communication.

It was to the extent that as part of the contract they sealed, she was required to converse and connect with them twice a day in exchange for borrowing their power. But even if there weren't such a condition, she still enjoyed interacting with them.

There was also another condition, Emilia had to distribute her mana to the forest's lesser spirits. This meant that the lesser spirits would have joint ownership of their contractor's mana, this was supposed to be something that deepened their connection, but she didn't really get it.

Anyway, Emilia's life had changed quite a bit thanks to her contract with the lesser spirits. It wasn't merely that she now had more conversation partners (Although they couldn't reply), they were also an indispensable addition to her daily life in the forest.

However, there were also certain parts of this very welcome change that she didn't like.

"…Everyone?"

The lesser spirits' faint wavering glow disappeared from her sight, causing her to look around with her blurry vision. She found that the lesser spirits that had been dancing around the room had all hidden themselves.

Emilia could only think of reason for this.

"—Puck, are you there?"

"Ah, good morning, Emilia."

The moment Emilia called out in an exasperated tone, a powerful accumulation of mana—Puck appeared within the room as if driving the lesser spirits away. The cat smiled at Emilia without a hint of malice on his face as she looked at him.

"Your eyes just wouldn't open this morning either, huh. You're like a kitten."

"As if it was that cute…"

"It doesn't seem like you believe me, but I really do think you're cute."

Puck made a sulky face, but Emilia shook her head at his concern. Words like cute or beautiful did not fit her. So she immediately changed the topic of conversation.

"And Puck, stop teasing them every morning. Isn't it cruel?"

"It's not teasing or anything. I'm just giving those homewreckers what they deserve."

[T/N: Homewrecker = Thieving Cat in Japanese]

"You're the cat here, and you were the one who told me to form a contract with them."

"That's the dilemma. How pitiful it is that they end up incurring in my wrath whenever they try to show off their relationship with you."

Good grief, Puck spoke as if it was someone else's problem. Sighing at him, Emilia extended her legs off the bed and unsteadily prepared to get up.

“The fact that you’re so sleepy means you must have had a bad dream, right? What kind of dream was it?”

“…A dream of when I woke up?”

“Well, it’s not like I can answer that for you. At any rate, that’s a strange way to refer to it. It’s the dream you often see, right?”

“Yeah, that one… Even though I don’t remember anything from before then.”

The memory of the dream caused her to grimace as she took her sleepwear off, baring her body. Even though Puck was right next to her, she never once paid him any mind as she changed, nor would she.

To begin with, it was doubtful whether or not she would care even if it was someone other than Puck.

“Emilia. I keep telling you this, but don’t change in front of other people.”

“But you’re not a person, Puck…”

“Not even in front of a cute cat. Starting from these little everyday things, all of a woman’s faults end up getting exposed. I’d like you to behave as if you were always being watched.”

“…Noisy.”

“Ehh—”

As Puck lectured her yet again while flying around above her head, she pushed him aside with her hand. She didn’t really get what he was talking about, but it was definitely something troublesome. She put her head through the clothes that were drying in her room, and once she got her hair out her change of clothes was complete.

Puck would scold her telling her that combing her hair with her fingers would ruin it, but this too was wisdom that allowed her to finish things quickly.

“It’s wisdom.”

“You’re a good girl at heart, but you really let yourself go when it comes to this sort of thing, huh. Makes me worry that you might eventually neglect to take care of yourself at all and start getting fat.”

Crossing his short arms, Puck objected to Emilia’s carelessness. Emilia ignored him and stretched her whole body. After this she would wash her face in the stream, and then start her usual routine.

“My forest investigation has gotten a whole lot easier thanks to the lesser spirits.”

“Boo—boo—.”

“Don’t make weird noises. It’s the truth, so pouting won’t change anything.”

Emilia stopped his jeering with a poke to his snout.

Thanks to her contract with the lesser spirits, her ability to explore had increased dramatically. To cut a long story short, it was because she was now able to rely on the spirit arts whereas she only had her own physical strength before.

Depending on how she did things, she could now easily approach difficult areas that were inaccessible before.

“The Snow Blight is gone too, so it seems I’ll even be able to advance north in my investigation.”

“Hmm. But I get the feeling your taste in music won’t align with the witchbeasts over there. You won’t stop?”

“Sorry, I have no clue what you’re talking about. Furthermore, I wouldn’t even be able to live in this forest if I were always worried about witchbeasts… If you’re that concerned, why don’t you come with me today?”

Puck was never very positive about her investigation, but he had become even more resistant as of late. Therefore, she tried to invite him along instead. However, Puck meowed ‘Nyannyan’ in response,

“Sorry, but I can’t do that today. It’s one of those days on which I secretly go off somewhere. It’s a secret.”

“You’re talking about this secret reeeally openly…”

“It’s manly, is it not?”

“Is it really? Is this what it means to be manly? Then I suppose it is manly…”

Puck beamed happily at her half-convinced praise, but Emilia felt uneasy. Puck had already set out on some business he kept secret from her many times now.

But this past month, the frequency of his outings had clearly increased. Although he still made sure to inform her every time he was leaving, and always came back.

However, the increased frequency of his trips and the fact that he asked her to form a contract with lesser spirits were a thorn in her side.

—It was like he was slowly preparing to leave Emiila’s side.

“You won’t tell me where you’re going even if I ask, huh?”

“It’s confidential. I do want to tell you, but… Sorry, that was a lie just now. I’m not telling you because I don’t want to. But what I’m doing isn’t anything wrong nor is it anything indecent.”

“Yeah…”

He had clearly declared that he had no intention of revealing his secret, all she could do was nod in response.

Having ended their exchange that didn’t ease her anxiety in the slightest, they each set out on their respective tasks. Outside the giant tree trunk that had been remodeled into her home, the forest air was as cold as ever. Emilia took a deep breath.

Filling her lungs with the freezing air, she started her day.

"I'll try heading to the northwest today. You be careful too, Puck."

"Yeah, you too. If push comes to shove, use the lesser spirits as a shield."

Joking around as usual, Puck's form dissolved into the wind like always. Once she watched him fade into the atmosphere, Emilia shook her head and started walking.

"I'll wash my face, take care of everyone… And then."

And then start working on her map against Puck's wishes—

"Could that be the reason…"

She did not know why it felt like Puck was distancing himself from her. But supposing that was the reason, would she prioritize Puck or her goal? And Puck, between his secret and Emilia, which would he —

"…"

She just couldn't find the answer, and went about her daily routine unable to concentrate.

The area surrounding her home, known as the 'Garden', had forty nine ice sculptures scattered across it, there were all elves who had been frozen, and to Emilia they were all irreplaceable companions —No, that was what she believed.

"Everyone, I…"

Her whispered words stopped midway. It wasn't that she didn't want to continue. It was that she couldn't.

When she went about her daily routine, when she faced these ice sculptures, her heart always filled with an unshakeable sense of guilt toward her expressionless companions cruelly sealed away in ice.

Emilia was aware she had committed some irredeemable sin against them. However, Emilia herself did not know what exactly it was. It wasn't in her memories. It was a sin she could not recall.

All she knew that before she woke up, she was in the same position as the rest of them. She had slumbered for a long time as an ice sculpture.

And then Emilia alone had melted the ice that would not melt, and she alone had awakened from the slumber they could not wake from.

This fact and her everlasting guilt, in addition to the extreme magical power within her that spiraled out of control if she wasn't careful—Even Emilia who had lost her memories could come up with an answer that fit these conditions.

"The snow in this forest and the fact that everyone was frozen, I definitely…"

She did not know what she thought, felt, and brought about before she went to sleep within the ice

But even though her memories had faded, her awareness of her sin had not. That was why she remained in the forest.

Waiting for the day her frozen companions would awaken, and give her an answer to her guilt—

"Huff, here goes."

The day they woke up, would be the day she would receive judgement for her sin.

Waiting for that day, Emilia continued to polish their sculptures. For she who had nothing, that was all the meaning her life had, the reason she could live without running from her guilt.

—A mighty red mass of pure power manifested within the forest.

The appearance of this ‘Power’ brought about terribly obvious consequences on Elior Forest.

The white forest covered in eternal frost produced the sound of cracking glass it rapidly crumbled away. The frozen trees, the frozen ground, and the frozen animals were all destroyed by the overwhelming heat.

This phenomenon was caused by the light at the core of the destruction.

“…”

The red death was round, and would occasionally waver violently. It was the most primal force of destruction in this world, and consequently the most powerful—Fire, that was the name of this phenomenon.

The ball of fire about the size of a human head floated through the air as it dominated its surroundings. It dominated its surroundings. Of course, the flame had neither eyes nor a nose. However, that was domination, an act of a sentient being.

Searching for something, the flame grew into a roaring blaze. Its will was such that it seemed that if it was for the sake of its goal, it would even be willing to burn away the entire forest.

Practically speaking, that was the quickest method for it to accomplish its goal.

If it reduced every last thing hiding in this forest to ash, if it turned the entire landscape into scorched earth, it would complete its objective.

—Of course, he wouldn’t just overlook such a violent act.

“—Not just eyes, you’re even sending parts of yourself now, huh.”

As the flame expanded its range, a sudden voice halted its movement.

The floating flame was assailed by wind, and at the source of that wind there was light gathering together. Immediately after, the light formed a small silhouette in the air, and the power took on a physical form in this world—The spirit keeping the flame's heat waves in check with wind, Puck had appeared.

Having appeared, Puck took a look around, and narrowed his eyes at the sight of the mercilessly burned forest.

"That's quite the greeting, wouldn't you say? I made sure to mark this area as my own, so what exactly are you doing in my territory?"

"…"

"Ah, I don't mean I went around peeing on stuff when I say marking. Despite my looks, it's not as if I'm a cat to the core. I've got intellect and grace, you know?"

"…"

"I haven't been trained, though… Huh, weird. I thought that joke would get some laughs for sure."

"Conversation, Unnecessary—"

The fiercely undulating flame said this to Puck who had been taking advantage of their silence to say whatever he wanted.

A low voice that sounded like a flame burning the world away. The fluctuating voice emanated from within the flame as it roasted the atmosphere while changing its form.

"That's a very nice manifestation, but did you really need to add the hooves too?"

"Thou, Why, I, Here, Observation, Inference Possible—"

"You're asking questions even though you haven't bothered to answer mine. Great personality you've got there… I don't think your search is as secretive as you think. Just showing up here causes this to happen, after all."

The horse of flame whose entire body was blazing asked this of Puck, and Puck responded by indicating the ruined forest with his jaw. And then he continued, “On top of which,”

“You’ve sent your eyes so many times, so I’ve taken some countermeasures. I’ve placed a barrier around the forest that detects your Od. But if you’re sending parts of yourself with this much power, I don’t really need a barrier or anything to sense you.”

“I, Observe. Balance Collapse, Danger, Power—”

“Not even a thank you even though I answered your question, huh? Be it an eye or part of yourself, you’re as rude as ever.”

Puck went to the trouble of giving an explanation and received no reaction whatsoever, causing him to drop his shoulders in dissatisfaction.

The flaming horse definitely had the intelligence and self-awareness necessary for conversation, but it did not possess the amiable disposition required to do so. Just a powerful ball of power, that was all it was.

It was that very disposition that would prove most troublesome right now.

“This Forest, Frozen Land, Magical Power. Countless, Destiny, Ice Flowers Blooming—”

“Don’t make such a big deal of it. I got a little angry when my territory was disturbed, so I punished them. I won’t do it again.”

“All, Thou, Deed. This, Speak Falsehood—”

“I’m not lying or whatever, it really was me. To begin with, who besides me could do something so extreme?—Who besides me, a spirit on par with the Four Greats?”

The flaming horse’s face was a wavering blaze. It was not possible to glean its expression. On the other hand, Puck who was aware he was normally rather rich in expression was now intentionally expressionless as he confronted the flame.

Expanding cold and piercing heat, these two extremes of temperature swirled between the two spirits.

"If you're that suspicious, why not try asking around? You could try the forest's lesser spirits, and there might be some kids who know me in the village near that huge mountain to the northeast of the forest."

"Unnecessary, Fully Understood—"

"…You know everything?"

The after-effects of last month's disturbance, he tried to offer this information, but the flaming horse rejected his proposal. Puck narrowed his eyes at their attitude. However, the flaming horse suddenly increased the heat of its burning mane in the meantime.

His field of view was dyed red in an instant, and as Puck put his guard up, the flaming horse spoke in a more powerful tone.

"I, Arbiter, Melakuera—"

"…"

"Balance Collapse, Anticipate, Evil Being. Escape Forbidden, Eradication Inevitable."

Giving their name, the flaming horse—The Great Spirit Melakuera kicked the ground with his burning hoof, covering the evaporating ground with white smoke. The aftershock of this overwhelming power was such that even the mana comprising Puck's body trembled.

Showing no sign of his inner turmoil, Puck waved his tail left and right as he glared at his opponent.

"Thank you for announcing your incomprehensible convictions. The world in crisis or helping an evil person or whatever, the stuff you're saying doesn't really ring any bells, but… If it's a fight you want, you'll get one."

"Fight, Denial. Holy Crusade, Acceptance—"

"This is my first time meeting someone who actually uses terms like holy crusade. Isn't it embarrassing?"

"…"

Despite Puck's provocation, Melakuera continued to maintain his silence. This was not a silence intended to hide a disadvantage, he was silent because he had no intention of talking to Puck.

He had declared conversation unnecessary, and indeed he did not seek to converse. He had an unshakeable goal, and was not interested in anything other than fulfilling it.

It could be said that it was very much like a spirit to be so extremely self-centered.

The natural beings known as spirits did not need any reason besides their own will for their actions and their results. The only exception being a contract with a spirit arts user, in which case they may prioritize the will of their contractor.

In any other situation, a spirit would place its own convenience above all else.

If fellow spirits came into conflict due to their differing goals, it would only result in battle.

When this happened, the only solution was for one to wipe out the other, and thus it could probably be said that spirits were savage beings much more simplistic than humans.

"Recent, Calamity, Magical Power. Truth, Thou, Power, Truth Or Falsehood—"

Asking this, Melakuera steadily raised his firepower as his burning mane grew. The flaming horse's surroundings were gradually scorched by the intense heat, and the frozen forest started losing its shape as it was forcibly thawed. Depending on Puck's answer, that firepower would probably be directed at him instead of the forest.

But that was what Puck was hoping for, the next best thing.

"How many times do I have to tell you, that was my doing, I even apologized for it. Or—"

Consequently, Puck halted his words midway and brought forth a colossal amount of magical power. The cat spirit had produced innumerable icicles around his small body, and their sharp tips were all pointed at Melakuera.

And then—

"Would you perhaps like to confirm for yourself whether or not my power is a threat to the world?"

"…"

Puck showed his intention to oppose Melakuera with his provocative words and attitude.

If Melakuera went along with this, the forest would inevitably become the stage on which the two great spirits would clash. However, Puck was confident this wouldn't happen.

In truth, Melakuera lowered his head, rapidly dropped his fire power, and reduced the heat.

"Understood. I, Forest, Departure—"

"Yeah. I'm glad you understand. I'm really sorry too, for causing this misunderstanding. The next time someone enters my territory, I'll scare them off just like I did to you."

When Melakuera displayed the intent to leave, Puck provoked him even further under the guise of an apology.

The massive power the flaming horse had sensed—In order to convince him that the source was Puck himself and that he was the only powerful being residing in this forest, that was why he did it, to keep the Great Spirit's attention on him alone.

So that the flaming horse before him would not take interest in the girl living in the forest.

"Forest, Thou, Dwelling, Understood. I, Thou, Warn—"

In response to Puck's smiling distraction, Melakuera's form which was wavering like a shimmering heat wave dispersed. Having lost the shape of a blazing horse, with its hooves and mane and the like gone, all that was left was a round, red ball of fire.

"Balance Collapse, Omen. I, Arbiter Melakuera. Carry Out Judgement, Execute Arbitration—"

"Your vague standards and views are pretty hard to comprehend. Simply put?"

"Witch—"

In response to Puck who had one eye closed, Melakuera uttered this word in a voice that one couldn't discern the slightest bit of emotion from. Puck did kind of expect this, so he tried hard to suppress a sigh.

At the very least, he couldn't show such a reaction in front of this flaming horse.

"I understand your concern. I'll send you a letter if I see anyone like that, so it'd be a great help if you could tell me your address… Ah, too bad."

Before he could finish his flippant response, Melakuera had vanished from the forest. Like a candle's flame being blown out by the wind, the way he gracefully disappeared in an instant caused Puck to fold his ears.

He then took a deep breath and scratched his head.

"That Melakuera, the one he sent was strong even for a part of himself. He was probably annoyed because I kept destroying all of his eyes, but… To retreat like this, he's not very perceptive, huh."

The Great Spirit Melakuera—He called himself the Arbiter, and was one of the extremely powerful ruling spirits known as the Four Greats.

The Melakuera that Puck had just faced was some power split off from the original, and was nothing more than an inferior copy of the real thing. But even so, it possessed enough power to match Puck since he was currently in an incomplete state.

He was able to drive him away with words alone this time, but there was no guarantee that that would work next time. Anyway, even among spirits who generally had fairly liberal principles, Melakuera was a spirit who followed extremely rigid rules.

The flaming horse's goal was as he stated, to protect the balance of the world, and to deliver arbitration upon any unnatural distortions.

However, the basis for this was a scale known only to Melakuera himself, and was unfathomable to anyone else.

If you caught his eye, you were out of luck, such was the general sentiment around him. If this were someone else's problem, Puck too would probably just laugh irresponsibly and tell them to do their best, but just this one time he couldn't do that.

"If I and the lesser spirits act as a cover, he shouldn't notice Emilia, but… If he comes at us for real, we're finished. How long can I drag this out I wonder…"

He had already crushed Melakuera's eyes which held suspicion toward the forest many times now. His secret operations behind the scenes were effective, Melakuera was most likely uncertain as to Emilia's existence.

However, that magical power she released last time served to rouse him, and made him seriously suspicious of the forest.

—Emilia needed time. Time to confront the power lying within her, and to learn about the situation she was placed in. If she just had that, she could definitely overcome this.

"But it's not like that stubborn fellow will just give her that time."

So she needed someone to stall until then, and Puck decided he would be responsible for this.

“I sure am noble, huh. If there were some worldwide prize for nobility, I would surely receive it.”

Cracking a joke as if he’d forgotten how serious the situation was, Puck surveyed the burnt forest. It’d be a big problem if Emilia was drawn here by the burning smell and ended up seeing all these trees that were turned into carbon.

“Cover up, cover up…”

Uncrossing his arms, Puck started freezing the burnt forest so it would look like it did before it was defrosted.

Emilia seldom came to the southern part of the forest. Seldom, but not never. So that she wouldn’t feel uneasy when the time came, Puck painted the forest white.

The spirit continued to freeze the forest in secret, so Emilia’s heart could remain at ease.

There was the concern that he was clearly being overprotective, but there was no around to point that out.

4

—At the same time, in the northwest region of Elior Forest, in a coniferous area.

Emilia nimbly dashed through the gathering of sharp foliage, having finished taking care of the ice sculptures.

No, it wasn’t quite right to say she was dashing through it. Exhaling white breaths, Emilia wove her way through the trees on a board made of ice as she skated through the forest at high speed.

“Hu, hup!”

Emilia rode over the uneven snow beneath her with a superhuman sense of balance. Her board took to the sky with her yell, and she looked down at the frozen forest beneath her as her body was bathed in wind.

On the surface of the snowscape she was looking down upon, she could see a number of unnatural pits and felled trees scattered about. These must have been the result of a witchbeast's actions, or perhaps they were victims to the mana storms that occasionally appeared in the forest.

Mana storms were a natural phenomenon that occasionally occurred in areas filled with dense mana.

Mana, required for the use of magic and for a spirit's activities, was ordinarily nothing more than a harmless, colorless power.

However, the conditions would occasionally line up in areas filled with mana, and mana close to activation would spontaneously discharge. As a result, a power with neither aim nor outlet would end up destroying nature.

This was the phenomenon known as a mana storm, and was the reason she had to alter her map on a regular basis.

"But it's especially bad around here…"

With her tied up silver hair flowing in the wind, Emilia muttered this as she observed the ground from midair.

Mapping things out in her head, Emilia compared the scene before her against the blank spots on her map, she could easily guess the dangerous areas—

She landed on the snow on the rapidly approaching ground, turning her board sideways to kill her momentum.

Producing a large spray of snow, Emilia stopped on the spot as if piercing into the ground. However,

"Ah, it broke. Looks like I can't match Puck after all…"

Unable to withstand the rigorous use, her broken ice board turned back into mana particles. This caused Emilia to drop her shoulders lamenting her inadequacy, due to which lesser spirits gathered around to comfort her.

She had borrowed the lesser spirits' power to form the ice board she was skating on. She was lacking in experience and her connection with the lesser spirits wasn't very deep, due to which the strength and durability were both inferior to the things Puck made.

"But every little bit counts… Even if it's slow going, I'll keep advancing step by step, no point rushing."

Smiling at the lesser spirits gathered around her, Emilia admonished herself for making comparisons to Puck.

It was absurd to compare their bond of hardly three weeks to a great spirit that had lived such a long life. If she was going to lament her inadequacy, it should be after they'd spent that much time together.

"But I'll be a granny by then… Ah, focus, focus."

Rather than setting very patient goals, she had to prioritize copying what she'd just seen onto her map. Pulling the rolled up map out of her bosom, she untied it and unfurled it over the snow.

On that faded paper was the map Emilia had been drawing up on her own for more than half a year now. She would have to redo it whenever she realized the forest was larger than expected, so even its current incomplete state was actually the eight incarnation thus far.

"There's pits here and here… Let's call this the Thorny Thicket'."

Thinking back to what she'd seen from the sky, she filled in the blank spaces on the map with a rough draft. She would name the place whenever the inspiration struck, but making a fair copy would have to wait until she got home.

"Alright. It looks like it's nearing completion now. It was a real pain back when I first started, though…"

Reviewing the unfurled map, Emilia praised herself, it really did look like a map now.

Naturally, it was most accurate in the eastern region where she lived, but thanks to the cooperation of the lesser spirits, her investigation of the northern and western regions was going especially well this past month.

“At this rate, I might end up finishing it waaaaay sooner than expected.”

As she admired the map, the anticipation of completing it lifted her spirits a little.

Mapping the forest was something she spontaneously decided to do while tending to the ice sculptures.

When she was first released from the ice, Emilia didn’t know anything about the garden or what she was supposed to do. As she aimlessly wandered through the treacherous forest, she encountered the ice sculptures of her companions and understood. —There was a connection between her ceaseless guilt and the ice sculptures.

From that point onward, Emilia decided that she would live in the forest and watch over them until they woke up, this would be her atonement.

In order to do this, she noted down the positions of the ice sculptures scattered around the forest on a handmade map, and then started working on the map when she decided to learn more about the garden. This was a habit that persisted even now.

“Doesn’t look like Puck’s too happy about it, though.”

Overlapping with the map before her was the face of the spirit who had always been by her side ever since she woke up.

To Emilia who had been left alone in the forest, Puck was always a source of emotional support.

However, for some reason he would always become apathetic whenever the topic was the forest or the ice sculptures.

It was as if he was telling her to forget all about the guilt in her heart.

"Even though I can't do that… Puck, you dimwit."

Emilia gently whispered this in her heart, rebellious words she could never say to his face.

That she was so intent on completing her map was also partly an act of resistance to Puck's proposal—She wanted to show that there were still things she had to do in the forest, so she could not leave.

But what if she covered the entire forest, and finished her map—?

When that happened, she would probably look for another excuse and continue to wait in the forest for her companions to wake up. And Puck would probably continue to stay by her side as she did this.

—The answer was forever beyond her.

"Ah, no, what's wrong? Are you mad I'm ignoring you?"

While she was absorbed in thought, the lesser spirits gently touched her hair. The sensation surprised her, but she immediately sensed the reason for their appeal.

"…"

They were warning her. Holding her breath, Emilia promptly lay flat on the ground. As she put her map back in her bosom, she felt a stinging sensation against her skin. The source of this ferocious pressure was down the slope right next to her, in the cluster of trees on slanted ground.

"—Witchbeast."

She saw a squirming shadow through the gaps in the trees, causing her to mouth the general term referring to the forest's greatest threat.

The northern region of this forest was originally the territory of that Snow Blight. Now that he was dead, many witchbeasts were competing for control over this territory. There were even witchbeasts on par with Orthrus and the Snow Blight participating in this struggle for territory, so even Emilia would be in danger if she accidentally encountered them.

The witchbeast she found today was also a formidable opponent, it would be wise to avoid a direct confrontation.

“That is, I believe… Guiltylaw?”

Searching her vague memories, Emilia muttered the name of the giant black beast prowling around downhill.

The witchbeast trampling on the piled up snow as its large, awful frame swayed—Guiltylaw, also known as the Shadow Lion, a powerful being that dwelled in dark forests.

With the head of a lion, a torso resembling that of a horse, and a tail equipped with a snake’s fangs and venom, its ferocious and brutal nature caused Puck to warn Emilia of its danger, a truly terrible beast.

“The Jet Black King of the Forest…”

Swallowing her breath, Emilia concluded that it would be unwise to fight and that she should withdraw. If she did fight, it wouldn’t end very well for her. Erasing her presence, she retreated, gaining distance—However, the witchbeast moved first.

“—Rrr!”

As she lay atop the snow while on high alert, Guiltylaw roared beneath her.

This roar filled with hostility caused Emilia to shudder thinking she had been discovered. However, that wasn’t what happened. The witchbeast’s giant body nimbly spun around in the air, and furiously charged the ‘enemy’ behind it.

“—What, is that?”

The appearance of this ‘enemy’ was completely unexpected even to Emilia.

Its approach and presence were so quiet that she may not have even noticed it if Guiltylaw hadn't sensed it.

But even so, its bizarre appearance was such that one look would sear it into your mind permanently.

—To Emilia, it looked like a mass of black water.

But its body seemed too elastic to be a mass of water, so it might have been more accurate to describe it as slimy instead. Its size dwarfed even the four-meter long Guiltylaw, it probably measured around five meters. Obviously, the round mass of water possessed neither eyes nor ears nor fangs.

Guiltylaw's attack hit the mass of black liquid so easily one would hesitate to even call it defenseless. Torn apart by the talon-like claws, its viscous body burst open with no resistance.

It was definitely dead. Emilia and Guiltylaw itself probably thought this.

However—

"—Rrr!!"

The next instant, it was Guiltylaw who screamed in agony.

The strange phenomenon began from its right paw that had dealt the deadly blow. Its leg which had touched the viscous liquid produced a festering sound as it rotted away, and the Shadow Lion writhed in unfathomable pain. This reaction wasn't merely from losing one limb. In truth, the erosion had only just begun.

"—?! That water…"

As Emilia looked on in surprise, the viscous liquid which had been torn apart squirmed as it started to move again.

Even those claws that would have dealt a fatal wound to any other organism could not physically kill this entity that she was unsure was even a living thing. The viscous fluid closed up its cut, and then its colossal body sprang up. It then landed on the writhing

Guiltylaw, completely absorbing the witchbeast's entire body.

With even its head swallowed up, Guiltylaw's shrieks spouted bubbles as it convulsed. However, the viscous liquid would not let its captured prey go. The witchbeast's body slowly rotted away, and then dissolved.

In just a few dozen seconds, the Shadow Lion had been completely dissolved to the bone and had now become part of the viscous liquid.

"…"

This act of predation that had occurred right in front of her left Emilia speechless. This went for how easily Guiltylaw was killed as well, but she did not understand what just happened.

But there was one thing she understood immediately. —That viscous liquid wasn't done just yet.

"—?!"

Having consumed the witchbeast, the viscous liquid's mass had gone up a size—Right as she thought the black liquid's slimy surface seemed to be bubbling, she sensed something flying at her and leaped out of the way.

Right in front of her, there was a violent explosion where she had just been lying, the result of the black liquid firing part of itself at her, an attack that could perhaps be called a slime bullet. The viscous liquid pierced the snow and the ground, leaving her in shock. That black liquid was definitely intelligent. It also had the cruel hunting instincts necessary to bring down prey.

—No way?!"

Having analyzed that far as she landed, Emilia's eyes widened at the black liquid's next action.

The viscous liquid that was downhill crawled up the snow toward Emilia with unbelievable speed. Its movements as if spreading out over the ground were such that it easily overcame the poor terrain and the obstacles in its path.

She couldn’t outrun it. Making this judgement in an instant, Emilia summoned her lesser spirits and was surrounded by light—

“I can’t touch it. So I’ll be counting on you guys!”

Considering how Guiltylaw met its end, coming into contact with the black liquid would be no different from suicide. Physical attacks could not repel it, she had no choice but to use magic in order to face it.

Perhaps sensing her will to fight, the black liquid’s surface started bubbling again as it crawled. Emilia prepared herself for another slime bullet, and the viscous liquid changed shape before her very eyes and pressed the attack.

But it did not attack by firing a slime bullet—

“Black tentacles—”

Parts of the viscous liquid stretched out thin and long, the black liquid waved them like whips to attack. There were six in total, a fierce offense.

“But if that’s all you’ve got… This is going to be easy!”

This attack that snapped fallen trees, disrupted the snow, and mowed through the cold air boldly flew toward Emilia.

Emilia slipped past the approaching attack, and the viscous liquid was unable to keep up with her as she dodged. The strangeness of its attack definitely surprised her at first, but as long as she was careful not to make contact it was possible to fight at close range. Guiltylaw was unlucky.

Though it had offensive instincts, it seemed to lack survival instincts. The black liquid kept trying to attack Emilia as she approached, and made no attempt to retreat. Consequently—

“—Please!”

Once she was close enough to be certain she wouldn't miss, Emilia invoked the spirit arts with an order to the spirits. She thrust her palm forward, and the white light released from it pierced the atmosphere and scored a direct hit on the middle of the defenseless black liquid. Although it hadn't taken any damage from the claws of a witchbeast, its movements rapidly dulled and then to a stop before long.

The viscous liquid had been frozen from the core, and that freezing damage spread to the rest of its body. It rapidly lost its amorphous nature that had been its specialty, and was reduced to a lump of ice sticking to the slope.

"It really… Can't move now, right?"

She cautiously approached the frozen black liquid, and tried poking it with a rod of ice she had manifested. No reaction. At the very least, she seemed to have forced it into an immobile state.

"There was no horn either, so it shouldn't be a witchbeast, but… Was it even alive?"

It was unclear. There was also some doubt as to whether she could say it was dead now that it was frozen.

But this viscous liquid had dissolved and consumed Guiltylaw, and then directed its hostility toward Emilia. It was unreasonable to say it wasn't a living thing considering these facts. She couldn't come to a conclusion either way.

She probably wouldn't find an answer to this no matter how much she thought. She probably wouldn't, but—

"…"

She knit her brows, unable to take her eyes off the frozen black liquid. It wasn't the cautious gaze of someone looking at an incomprehensible life form. She was feeling an entirely different, strange emotion.

"Somehow, this doesn't quite feel right…"

Now that she'd frozen it, the battle was over. Despite this, Emilia's body was still stiff with tension and caution, and she couldn't help but keep her focus on the black liquid..

It was if instead of her memories, her body itself knew the true nature of this black liquid—

"But I can't remember anything."

As usual, Emilia couldn't find the memories she desired no matter how much she looked around in her mind. No matter how much she worried, no matter how much she thought, she never made any progress and remained as lost as ever.

But if she just stood around fretting like this, she would only be wasting her time. She understood that much. It was almost evening already, it was about time she wrapped up her investigation.

Even if she waited here, the answers she wanted would not manifest. She agonized for a while, unable to come to a conclusion, and then made a decision.

That was—

5

"So you brought it back to the garden so you could show it to me."

"I thought you might know something because you're so knowledgeable… Was I wrong?"

Back at home base in the garden, at the spot where she dried her laundry, Emilia looked up at Puck who had come back having finished his business and tilted her head apologetically.

By her feet was the frozen black liquid they were talking about. As one would expect, she couldn't bring back the entirety of its five-meter body, so what she returned with was a fragment that she had broken off.

"It was a weeeeird liquid. I mean, that witchbeast you told me about before… Guiltylaw, you said not to approach it because it was dangerous, even it ended up getting dissolved easily.”

“You’re confusing it with another witchbeast. Guiltylaw’s definitely strong, but it’s lacking in a number of ways so you can deal with it fairly easily, I said something along those lines.”

“Eh, was that how it was…?”

She was under the impression that it was a formidable foe, but thinking about it clearly she felt like he did say that after all.

Regardless, it was a fact that the black liquid had dissolved Guiltylaw. The mere sight of it was horrendous, a death that could make one end up feeling pity for it.

“But I mustn’t pity it or anything of the sort, huh.”

“It’s a witchbeast, after all. No matter how they die, they’re just reaping what they sowed. Rather, what I’m worried about is the wound to your heart from witnessing that… Anyway, about this pile of ice.”

Immediately tossing aside any concern for the pitiful Guiltylaw, Puck observed the pile of ice on the ground.

Carefully looking it over, Puck blinked his big, round eyes several times. In the meantime, Emilia’s eyes were on Puck’s tail which was swaying from side to side as she obediently waited for his conclusion.

“By the way, did your business go okay?”

“Yeah—Hey, I’m busy investing this right now.”

“That’s true, but… Anyway, what were you up to?”

“I went to play with some fire for a bit—Hey, quit interrupting. You said you wanted to confirm what this thing was, yet you keep getting in my way. What a naughty girl.”

With his investigation constantly being interrupted, Puck said this in a huff as he turned around. In response, Emilia lowered her eyes slightly and apologized, “I’m sorry.”

“Are you perhaps depressed? Was Guiltylaw that pitiful?”

“No, that’s not it. He was certainly pitiful, but I’m not thinking about Guiltylaw… I can’t properly explain it, though.”

She herself could not grasp the true nature of the discomfort lurking in her heart. It was for the purpose of understanding it that she asked Puck to analyze the black liquid. Yet she kept bothering him despite this, she was basically only hurting herself. She did not understand why, though.

Emilia fell silent, and Puck sighed in response. And then—

“Emilia, you said this was part of the black liquid you defeated, right?”

“…Yeah, that’s right. The real thing was much bigger, but I couldn’t bring it all back. This is, right… Just the tip of the iceberg.”

It was a lump of ice only around thirty centimeters in size, but it was still quite the pain to bring it back here. Rather than the weight, it was her feelings that were the problem. Her answer caused Puck to take on a troubled expression,

“Emilia, it’s hard to say this, but you haven’t finished it. It’s still alive.”

“Eh—”

Emilia’s eyes widened in surprise at Puck’s words.

Immediately after, a crack appeared on the lump of ice on the ground. Black slime poured out of the crack as if overflowing and expanded in the blink of an eye, after which it immediately threw itself at Emilia who was standing nearby.

“—Well, I can’t let you do that, though.”

But that was the end of its comeback.

Before the leaping slime could attack, Puck clapped the paws of his hands. In an instant, particles of light flowed in and surrounded the black liquid, causing the atmosphere to creak as the slime was frozen and compressed.

Its formerly thirty-centimeter diameter was now reduced to just two by Puck's power. The sphere then cracked from its core and was smashed into pieces, scattering like grains of sand.

"Seems rather resilient, so you have to go this far at least to finish it off. The ideal would be to freeze it to the core and smash it apart. This, in other words."

Puck spoke as though it was the simplest thing in the world, but this was a technique that employed a high degree of magical power. At the very least, Emilia as she was now could not easily do it even by borrowing the lesser spirits' power.

But rather than her surprise at this technique, something entirely different had a much greater impact.

"Wait, if the black liquid just now wasn't dead…"

"The big part you left behind is probably running around right now."

"…"

With her fears confirmed, Emilia reflexively turned to the north of the forest.

The part she'd frozen and left behind was well over ten times the size of what she'd brought back. If that part was also released into the forest, there would be a lot more damage like what happened to Guiltylaw.

"You won't make it in time even if you go."

"Maybe so. That might be the case, but I can't just leave it be!"

When Puck coldly called out to her, Emilia responded with a face that looked like she was ready to dash off at any moment.

There was no guarantee that only witchbeasts would fall victim to the black liquid. It had even turned on Emilia. Meaning that to the black liquid, even the animals in the forest and her frozen companions in the garden were prey.

And that might not just apply to this forest. Even the village nearby —

“Setting aside the village you can trade with now, didn’t you already cut things off with those other guys? I don’t think you have any obligation to worry about them.”

“—Still, that’s no good. I still can’t let that happen.”

Puck read her feelings from her expression as he muttered this, and she shook her head in response.

She had sworn to never approach that village again. There was an unbridgeable gap between her and the villagers. But that didn’t mean she wanted anything bad to happen to them.

If it was possible for her to stop it, she wanted to do so.

“You’re going so far for people you’d be better off ignoring. Your kindness is a serious illness, huh. Someday, it’s going to backfire on… Oh, it already did. But you’re still not reflecting on it in the slightest. What a troublesome girl.”

“Say whatever you want. I’ll go have another look at the ‘Thorny Thicket’. Puck…”

“—Alright. I’ll go in your place, so you wait here.”

Emilia was expecting to have to persuade him somehow, so this caused her eyes to widen.

“You won’t stop me…?”

“I am stopping you. And in exchange, I’m offering to go in your place. If you just tell me the place, I’ll get there much faster than you, and I won’t fall behind that filthy liquid either. Am I wrong?”

"You're not wrong. You're not wrong, but are you okay with this?"

"Yeah, sure. I don't particularly care about this forest or the people in that village, but… I'd much rather do this than let you face that filthy liquid again."

Speaking in his usual unlikeable manner, Puck winked. Blinking at this human-like gesture, Emilia spread her map of the forest in a hurry.

"It's still a rough draft, but the Snow Blight's territory went from here to here. I met that black liquid around here… Over here, because the frozen trees are all thorny."

"So that's the 'Thorny Thicket'. Easy to understand, huh. Alright, I'll have a look."

Having received her explanation, Puck nodded as his form dissolved into the freezing air.

Releasing their manifestation and then manifesting anew at their destination, a form of teleportation characteristic of spirits.

The accuracy seemed to depend on the spirit's ability, but since it was Puck he would definitely make it.

"Please…"

Before she knew it Emilia had closed her eyes and joined her hands as if praying.

The bud of unease growing within her heart had not disappeared even now. Rather, now that she knew just how dangerous the black liquid was, her wariness toward its contamination was strengthened even further.

"…"

She opened her eyes slightly, the scattered remnants of the black liquid were within view. The appearance of the black liquid was clearly the cause of this sense of tension that made her heart race.

And she had also experienced that sensation accompanying pain. Many times, in fact.

So many times, every morning, the feeling brought about when she would wake from her bad dreams—

"—Emilia."

But before she could find an answer in her memories, the light of mana took the form of a cat.

"…Puck."

Calling to the spirit who had returned, Emilia was relieved that nothing strange had happened to that small body of his.

To begin with, Emilia trusted that he wouldn't lose no matter who he was facing. But still, an opponent was an opponent. Now that her anxiety which was like grains of sand was negated, Emilia sighed.

However, considering Puck's downcast expression now that he'd returned, she got the feeling she was about to get some bad news.

"I'll start with my report. At that 'Thorny Thicket' place you spoke of, the frozen… Black liquid, was it? It was gone after all. So I looked around for a bit."

"—. So, did you find it?"

"Relax. I found it. I took care of it properly, so you can go ahead and praise me."

Ehe, Puck puffed his chest with pride, but contrary to his attitude his ears and tail were still drooping. Noticing her gaze, the cat immediately continued, "However,"

"With my report finished, I'm going to move on, but… Emilia, don't go to the north of the forest for now. If possible, try to avoid going deep into the forest at all."

"What's that supposed to mean? For you to say something like that.”

He spoke in a joking tone, but Puck’s black eyes wordlessly conveyed his seriousness. In response to his attitude, Emilia asked for an explanation and Puck fell silent momentarily,

“—I took a look around the area to find the black liquid that ran away, but I didn’t find just one. I finished off the three that I found, but it seems to me there might be a lot more.”

He forced these words out with a sigh, and confirmed Emilia’s unpleasant premonition.

6

Puck’s eyewitness testimony and Emilia’s unpleasant premonition were soon proven true.

The reason was simple. Ever since their first contact, the black liquid had infested the entire forest, the entire area had become their territory.

In response to this large scale outbreak, Emilia followed Puck’s advice and temporarily suspended her mapmaking.

However, it couldn’t be said that this guaranteed her safety.

Rather, the level of danger to her was much greater than before. The reason being—

“—Found you!”

Yelling this loudly, Emilia skated across the snow to engage the black liquid that she just found in close combat.

The enemy was around one meter in size, rather small for the black liquid. The undulating black slime produced protuberances across its entire body in order to intercept Emilia who was rapidly approaching.

“Too slow!”

But before it could ready its attack, Emilia's drove her palm into its core.

Her palm glowed blue as mana surrounded it, and the venomous viscous liquid was unable to harm her. On the other hand, the ice magic Emilia fired froze the black liquid from its core, causing it to shatter to pieces in an instant.

Looking back at the scattering ice fragments, Emilia used the edge of the ice board she was skating on to come to a sudden stop, her lovely profile was filled with caution, and she sharpened her senses of sight and smell as she searched for her next opponent.

—In accordance with Puck's warning, Emilia had suspended work on her map.

But rather than reducing her trips into the forest, she greatly increased them as she proactively continued to battle the black liquid in order to exterminate them.

Over these past two weeks, she had already battled almost a hundred, and her link with her lesser spirits had also improved greatly.

As you just saw, if her opponent was simply a black liquid, she could safely deal with it.

Of course, the risk was never zero when it came to battles, but—

"Even so, if I can reduce the damage by even a little…"

Fighting wasn't pointless. That was what Emilia thought.

'Unless you strike at the source, there will most likely be an almost limitless number showing up. No matter how many branches or leaves you bring down, the tree won't fall. In much the same way, it will be necessary to cut this off at the source.'

That was what Puck said to her as she ran around dealing with the constantly appearing black liquid. That was probably his frank advice to her now that she'd gone as far as to directly disobey his warning in order to run around the forest. No matter how hard she worked bringing the black liquid down, it was all futile unless she exterminated the source. She figured that that was what he was trying to say.

However, despite telling her this it only had the opposite effect.

“Even if my method is missing the point, even if I’m doing this in a roundabout manner, there’s still meaning in fighting like this. So the fact that I want to do it won’t change.”

She understood that he was concerned for her. Out of both sincerity and stubbornness, the cat spirit would keep talking her head off trying to keep her out of danger.

She understood that she was the worst for ignoring all of his consideration and selfishly continuing her pursuit.

‘I don’t really get what it is that drives you to try so hard.’

Since Emilia would not listen to his warnings, Puck powerlessly dropped his shoulders and said this.

—What was it that was spurring her on? Emilia herself did not know the answer to Puck’s doubt. Perhaps it was because she didn’t know that she was trying so desperately, so she could find out.

“—Feels kind of itchy in my chest.”

Whenever she came into contact with the black liquid, she felt something ache at the bottom of the memories she could not access. That’s why she thought there was no way she could stop—

“—There’s the next one!”

When the cold odor brushed against her nostrils, Emilia discarded her thoughts and began the chase.

The ice board accelerated rapidly as it received the force of her kicks, her skill with it had increased dramatically. Only in actual combat can your skills truly be polished, it was an example of that sort of saying.

She went up the slope, bursting into a cluster of trees, going up the hill as frozen foliage grazed her skin. Pursuing the slight odor reaching her nostrils, Emilia found it down the cliff in front of her.

"…"

She saw the undulating black liquid flowing down a slope so steep it was as if the hill had been cut down. Since it was sliding down bare rock, it would not be possible to pursue it unless she was prepared to fall to her death.

—However

"—Eiyah!"

Though the mere sight of this precipitous cliff would paralyze most people's legs, Emilia dived down with no hesitation. With her ice board against the almost completely vertical rock surface, she chased after the black liquid with her world tilted ninety degrees.

In response to her feat that was both skillful and daring, the black liquid further down the cliff started firing slime bullets to intercept her.

As the attacks flew toward her one after another, Emilia swung her body from side to side to dodge them.

As she slid down the cliff, she adroitly handled acceleration, deceleration and turning simultaneously. She then evaded slime bullets blocking her path by leaping over them—And fired magic while gliding through the air, freezing the surface of the fleeing black liquid. However, the black liquid took a tumble, ripping the frozen portion off, ensuring the safety of the rest of its body. The chase would continue.

"You don't even have a head, why are you so crafty…!"

It was now somewhat smaller, but Emilia bit her lip as it continued to slide down.

In the meantime, the black liquid had not let up on its counterattack. Emilia easily dodged, and then increased her speed.

She would close the distance in one go, and then pierce it at full speed—

“If magic won’t work, how about… This?”

Her declaration accompanied their collision, she raised the underside of her board, crushing the black liquid into the cliff from above. The direct contact caused the underside of the board to turn black as the venom corrupted it, but at the same time the surface of the black liquid turned white as it froze. The black liquid tried to escape the freezing the same way it did just earlier, but this time her freezing did not let up.

It continued to lose mass as it ripped off parts of itself, and finally exhausted itself before it could fully corrupt the ice board. Its slimy body scattered into fragments of ice which made it impossible for it to do anything further, it was completely finished.

“…”

But she was still sliding extremely fast. The ground beneath the cliff approached rapidly, at this speed she would definitely die from the impact. Emilia overcame this problem through a rather forceful method.

“Please.”

In response to her brief call, her lesser spirits put out all the power they could.

As the wind whined, they formed an ice ramp at the base of the cliff. The hastily built ramp could only withstand a single use. But that was all she needed.

She took the ramp at high speed, and her body flew high into the sky. In the air so chilly it was practically cutting, Emilia carefully examined the ground as her silver hair fluttered.

360 degrees, her field of view covered everything, and within it she discovered several of the black liquid she could after right now.

She aimed at them and fired off some ice bullets, the aerial attack destroying them one after another.

“Two, three, four… That’s five!”

When she confirmed that she had wiped out all five enemies in her inverted field of view, Emilia performed a somersault. The sky and the ground were back in place as she slipped down the snow, gently reducing the impact as she slowed down. Slower, slower, the snowy mountain before her approached—

“—Ow!”

Unable to stop, she ended up crashing into the snow facefirst.

“Ah… My nose, hurts…”

Pulling her buried upper body out of the snow, Emilia stroked her nose as her cheeks reddened. Even though it was a pile of snow that she crashed into, an impact was an impact. She felt somewhat dizzy even now.

“But I was able to take them all out in one go, huh?”

Still pressing down on her nose, Emilia sat on the snow and looked back at what she’d just accomplished with one eye closed.

Black liquid extermination had become her new daily routine, taking the place of mapmaking, but today’s results were quite a bit higher than anything else in the past two weeks.

It was just past soon, and she had already disposed of ten of them. Up until now, her daily average was around five, so this number was unusual.

“Looks like most of the black liquid is around the northern area after all.”

The rate at which they appeared backed up her hypothesis, and she was now sure it was correct.

Right now, the black liquid was appearing all over the forest, but she definitely encountered it more frequently in the north. Even her first meeting with it had occurred in the north, so it was probably safe to assume this was true.

“I’ll have to tell Puck…”

About this too, she thought, but her words stopped midway.

The image of Puck being displeased at her leaping into danger appeared in the back of her mind. If she revealed this to him, he would happily work toward a solution. Leaving Emilia behind.

She would once again be making him clean up her mess.

She thought of it as far too cowardly an act.

“I can’t just have Puck do everything for me. He isn’t some doll who exists to follow my orders—”

Even though she ignored Puck’s warning, she was going to rely on him when it mattered. That was cowardice. She was taking him for granted. And also—

“I don’t want to give up just yet.”

If Puck was the one dealing with this, he would definitely distance her from the matter. If that happened, she wouldn’t be able to find the answer to the unease that she had been hunting to this day.

Her most important memories that were supposed to serve as her starting point were sealed away from her even now.

She was already suffering not knowing them, she couldn’t bear the idea of having even more things she didn’t understand

“…”

As if building her resolve, Emilia clenched her back teeth and looked up into the sky. It was hidden by thick clouds, but the sun was still high. She still had plenty of time.

“Please, lend me your power once more.”

If they couldn’t rely on that kind and overprotective spirit, they’d just have to do it on their own.

Answering her call, the faintly glowing lesser spirits emerged around her. Surrounded by the bluish white light, Emilia proceeded further north into the forest.

Filling in this unexplored region that wasn’t on her map felt very much like filling in her missing memories.

Right now, Emilia was unsure as to whether or not she should tell Puck about what she was doing, and ultimately decided not to. But even supposing she chose the other option, she probably wouldn’t have been able to do it.

The reason being that while this was going on, Puck was also facing an enemy unknown to Emilia.

7

—This was around the same time Emilia resolved to head north.

“Well now, I’ll hear you out if you’ve got an excuse?”

“…”

Two spirits positioned some ten-odd meters apart—A gray cat and a crimson horse of flame confronted each other.

Each was a great spirit bearing its own name, these being Puck and Melakuera. They each beheld the other head on, continuing their standoff with an atmosphere that definitely couldn’t be called reasonable.

That was a natural confrontation. This was a chance meeting that shouldn’t have occurred.

They both understood that they were in conflict. This forest was Puck’s territory, and Melakuera was an uninvited guest—That was the conclusion they had reached in a previous conversation.

Despite this, they had once again encountered each other in Elior

Forest.

Furthermore—

“The black liquid… No, the Black Serpent’s poison, isn’t it. I found you while searching for the source. Come to think of it, its first appearance was right after I met that part of you—What do you have to say about that?!”

Puck knew the true nature of the strange viscous liquid that kept appearing. It was the after-effect left behind by a certain witchbeast, an evil poison that would never disappear, possessing the will to harm the living—

He knew what it was. The problem then was the source, and the flaming horse was definitely related somehow.

“I’d like to hear your opinion. Whether you have something to do with it or not.”

“Thou, Dialogue. Answer Denied—”

“You’re not saying you don’t know, you’re outright refusing to answer, huh. Guess you’re honest to a fault as usual. But you’d best keep your resemblance to a horse to your appearance alone. When you immediately forget what you’re told, we call that being birdbrained.”

[T/N: The resemblance to a horse bit is because the ‘honest to a fault’ part contains the character for horse.]

Melakuera refused to answer in a low voice, and Puck continued onward mixing hostility and ridicule.

“Where are you finding the poison? And you shouldn’t be able to release it into this forest. If you were to try to enter this forest, you’d immediately be discovered like you were just now. What sort of cheap trick are you using?”

“Answer, Denial. I, Reason, Visit. Thou, Falsehood, Excess.”

“You’re accusing me of lying? On what basis?”

“Mining Town, Recent, Criminal. Thou, Ice Flower Seed, Destiny—”

The flaming horse’s blazing reply caused Puck to narrow his eyes, “Fmm”

Melakuera was referring to last month, when he intimated those scoundrels in the mining town Ganacks. Puck had given the man who hurt Emilia and his boss a fitting punishment.

It was all to set an example, a trap to draw Melakuera’s attention toward himself, but,

“If you made someone talk, I suppose it must have been by intimidating the sensible one. What a pity. He was a believer of Gusteko’s sacred teachings which hold spirits in reverence.”

“Petty, Trifling, Insignificant—”

“How cruel. Well, I suppose unlike Odglass you don’t have that kind of sensibility. I’m of the same opinion, but even I feel like offering a little sympathy.”

Since his deed could bring harm to Emilia, he was probably an ice sculpture by now.

Threatened by a flame spirit, and ultimately frozen solid—Truly pitiful.

The Great Spirit who called himself the arbiter was sure of Emilia’s existence—Strictly speaking, it was not Emilia herself but her ‘Power’ that he regarded as dangerous.

“Her rampage that day ended up drawing his caution, after all…”

That was as bad as it could get. In order to deceive him, Puck used various tricks to pretend that that day’s events were the work of his magic, but he was unable to fool Melakuera’s prejudice.

If the Great Spirit of Judgement learned of Emilia’s existence, he would definitely deliver a prejudiced judgement.

So if he was unable to deceive said prejudice, Puck’s stance was obvious.

“No matter how much you doubt it, my answer won’t change. Leave this forest, Melakuera—Forget about this place and go arbitrate for a married couple in a rut or something.”

“Contempt, Scorn, Firm Refusal. Arbiter Melakuera. Derision, Grave Sin.”

“Ah, you’re mad? How troublesome. Sorry, sorry. Let me rephrase then.”

Puck directed an embarrassed grin at Melakuera who was in a rage, scraping the ground with his burning hooves.

Still smiling, the cat tilted his head and continued,

“—Turn around and trot away like a good little horse.”

“Declaration Of War, I, Accept—”

Taking Puck’s provocation exactly as stated, Melakuera prepared for battle.

Leaning forward, Melakuera’s flaming body billowed as it produced wings so hot they warped the atmosphere behind him—Wings of flame. Melakura dashed forward as he produced waves of heat.

His sprint burned the ground below him, and his heat waves so hot as to sear any eyes looking at him razed the terrain. The frozen forest was unable to withstand the high temperature and was vaporized despite the frost as it was blown apart.

“All Creation, Ash, Carry Out—”

His fluttering wings produced wind that was both hot and extremely destructive. The scorching wind would burn throats that breathed it, eyes that looked upon it, skin that felt it, and ultimately even burn away souls themselves.

The purest form of destruction of all swept through the forest, and instantly burned away everything in a radius many times larger than the wings, reducing it all to scorched earth.

This space of death that had been formed in the blink of an eye would not allow the existence of even a single living thing.

—Unless that thing possessed power matching that of the flaming horse.

“Good grief… If you go that far, it’ll be a real pain to hide it from Emilia later on.”

In the middle of this space of absolute death that burned everything, an unharmed cat muttered this completely unfazed.

Within swirling red heat waves, a few dozen centimeters surrounding Puck were unaffected, completely isolated from the effects of Melakuera’s inferno. It was simply the result of magic colliding with magic and canceling it out, but of course, in order to actually do it was necessary to have fine control over an amount mana rivaling that of a Great Spirit.

This too was an ability only held by transcendent beings.

“But since you’ve got a fancy title like arbiter, surely that’s not the extent of your power?”

“Affirmative—”

“Thank goodness. If that was the best you could do, as a fellow spirit I wouldn’t be able to show my face in public.”

“Shame Unnecessary. Thou, Here, Annihilation—”

In response to Puck who always had a comeback, Melakuera fired flame bullets from his mouth. The balls of fire collided with Puck’s magic barrier with tremendous force and shattered it.

“Mm…”

“Persist, Continue, Sustain—”

Having been expelled from his shattered barrier, Puck was now assailed by relentless attacks from the wings of flame.

Puck waved his tail to intercept this, producing a white wave of cold. Tyrannical heat collided with absolute zero and the clash produced an explosion of steam which covered the burnt terrain in the blink of an eye.

“Nya—!”

Aiming for Puck who was engulfed by the white curtain, Melakuera fired a barrage of small flame bullets. The flame bullets scattered the steam, vaporized the trees that ended up in their path, and turned the southern region of the forest into a wasteland in mere tens of seconds from when the battle began.

The clash of just two spirits caused this.

“Not bad. —Now it’s my turn.”

Puck countered the flame bullets that were destroying the forest with bluish white ice bullets.

The flame bullets and ice bullets collided head on, and their perfectly equal powers immediately canceled each other out. The countless blasts of fire were countered by ice bullets of equal quantity, producing a chain of vaporization, extinguishment, and mutual cancelation.

It sounded like pouring water, but the attacks canceling each other out possessed truly dreadful power. Everything the fire touched was vaporized, and all that was covered by the light was doomed to remain frozen at absolute zero for all eternity.

They exchanged countless fatal attacks, the shockwaves of which were steadily shortening the forest’s lifespan. It didn’t seem like there would ever be an end to this exchange. It was only natural that both would conclude this.

“Judgement Of Evil! Judgement Of Criminals! Carry Out Arbitration —”

As he fired flame bullets, the flaming horse roared for the first time as he closed the distance between them in one go.

Mowing through the atmosphere with his wings of flame, Melakuera ferociously charged Puck who was still mid-air. The cat placed one paw atop the other and caught the blow by forming an ice shield right in front of him. The resulting shockwave contained waves of both heat and cold, causing the terrain to crack as it was scorched and frozen, ruining it even further.

“This is… Even more of a problem than I thought.”

Tossed about by the shockwave, Puck grimaced with his ears and tail shaking.

The forest around them was now completely unrecognizable, but Puck who was at the epicenter didn’t appear to be wounded at all.

To begin with, the concept of injury itself was meaningless to spirits. To spirits, damage was something that only occurred when something tore through the defenses of their materialization and harmed the Od that was the core of their being.

Unless they lost their Od, spirits would not die no matter what happened to them. Or to put it another way, in a battle between spirits, the goal was to rip through the opponent’s mana and crush their Od.

In that sense, it could be said that Puck and Melakuera were both in good health.

“Doesn’t look like I have much leeway.”

Even though spirits used atmospheric mana to perform magic, there was a limit to how much they could control. Although Puck possessed extraordinary power compared to the average spirit, he too was no exception. To say nothing of the fact that his opponent was a fellow great spirit, meaning his mana expenditure in battle was much higher than usual.

“Furthermore, I’ve got to finish this before Emilia shows up…”

It wasn’t as if his forehead could produce sweat, but Puck wiped his forehead in a human-like manner.

They had fought this much and caused this much destruction. Emilia had disobeyed his instructions today as well and had gone into the forest, working hard to exterminate the black liquid. He just wanted to avoid having her show up here.

She was a gallant and noble girl. If she understood Puck was caught up in this, she would probably join the battle with no hesitation. And that would be just as Melakuera planned.

“Brethren. Thou, Conclusion, Hasty, Desire—”

“It’s not just me. I don’t think either of us wants to look at the other’s mug for too long.”

“Falsehood Unnecessary. Thou, Impatience Unnecessary. Reason, Already Discovered—”

“…”

The wings of flame spread out over the ashen ground as Melakuera took a low stance, and Puck’s eyes narrowed in response to his words.

The flaming horse wasn’t the sort who would resort to provocation. His statement did not have any ulterior motives. He had spoken his thoughts directly, conveying a fact. He was announcing that Puck had no need to rush.

“Thou, Falsehood. Thou, Secret. Thou, Protect. All Unnecessary—”

“Hoho. And why would that be?”

“Thou, Conceal, Half-Devil—”

“…”

“Half-Devil, Silver, Witch. I, Already In Hand—”

Puck’s narrowed eyes widened at Melakuera’s declaration, witch and half-devil.

At the same time, Puck realized. Between the rampaging waves of mana formed by the clash between fellow great spirits, he could feel waves of a familiar mana flowing in from afar.

It was coming from the northernmost region of the forest—This sensation caused Puck's fur to stand on end.

"—Melakuera, what did you do to her?"

"Conversation Unnecessary—"

"…That's true, isn't it. There isn't room to talk. Nor is there room for mercy or holding back."

The tone of Puck's voice dropped, and the mana enveloping the area transformed with a violent noise, forming countless icicles that seemed to cover the sky. Their sharp tips were all aimed at the flaming horse on the ground.

"I'll kill you, and then bring her back. There's probably no point hiding it anymore, right?"

In response to the icicles covering the sky, the ground beneath Melakuera started emitting flames all at once. The roaring blaze and absolute zero dominated the skies and the earth as they faced each other.

"Die, fool."

"Concurrence—"

Clash, at the same time, it all happened in an instant.

However, the destruction brought about by this colossal power completely annihilated the southern region of the forest.

The white forest had vanished completely with not a trace left. And what was left was—

8

—The northern region had turned into a hell infested with black liquid, there was even more than Emilia was prepared for.

“Ha, hah…!”

Drawing ragged breaths, Emilia fell to her knees on the snow as she gasped. She had been running around the mountain non-stop, and the lack of oxygen caused her ears to ring incessantly.

The reason for all of this was the fierce attacks from the black liquid that just wouldn’t end.

“Finally, calmed down a bit…”

Wiping off the sweat running down her eyelids, Emilia sat down while making sure to keep her guard up.

It had been about an hour since Emilia challenged the north seeking to find the source of the black liquid. Emilia spent all that time fighting, they kept coming at her so fast she did not even have time to breathe.

“I lost count at twenty…”

Small and large, the black liquid came in a diverse range of sizes. It couldn’t be said that any one of them was particularly hard to deal with on its own, but having to fight battle after battle drained her willpower and stamina more than expected.

Perhaps Emilia was being conceited when she thought she could go further.

“If it weren’t for you guys, I would have been completely finished. Thank you.”

As she spoke her thanks, faintly glowing lesser spirits appeared on her shoulder. They couldn’t encourage her with words, but they supported her through their sensory connection. This made Emilia smile.

She had presently battled more than twenty, almost thirty of the black liquid. Counting the ones from before she reached the north, it was almost fifty in total.

She had to run around in the snow as she battled, and the fatigue was definitely building up. However, using the spirit arts didn't particularly tire her. This too was probably thanks to the lesser spirits.

"But I can still go on… Hah, didn't Puck once say this was dangerous?"

Opening and closing her fist, Emilia remembered Puck's lesson as she confirmed her level of exhaustion.

It would be ridiculous to follow his teachings even though she ignored his warning not to enter the forest. Furthermore, Emilia still felt a certain sense of antipathy toward the option of retreating.

The entire northern region of the forest had fallen under the black liquid's control, over this past hour Emilia hadn't seen a single other living thing, be it animal or witchbeast. The black liquid had probably already eliminated all of them. And when a hunter runs out of prey, it changes its hunting grounds—

"Even if I withdraw from here, they'll probably approach the garden sooner or later."

Even if she resolved to fight back when that time came, it was doubtful whether she would be able to reach the main part in the north. Perhaps this could be her one and only opportunity to reach the source.

"Mm—"

Crossing her arms, Emilia pondered with a troubled expression. She still had some willpower and stamina left. One more step, if something just gave her a little push—It was at that moment.

"…What?"

Her lesser spirits' sudden reaction caused Emilia to narrow her amethyst eyes and adopt a half-standing position. Since her lesser spirits sensed something approaching, Emilia started weaving mana in preparation for the arrival of some black liquid.

However, that preparation was pointless. The reason being that what appeared in front of Emilia was not some black slime, but—

"—Red, lesser spirit…?"

—Emilia whispered this as she looked at the crimson ball of light that appeared before her.

Particles of light gathered in the air and fused together, Emilia initially assumed the being that hence manifested was a lesser spirit like she was familiar with, but she immediately retracted that thought.

From her connection to the lesser spirits, Emilia felt the emotion of reverence flow into her. As the sensation surprised her, her lesser spirits all jumped and flickered as if they were afraid of the red spirit.

—She knew this reaction. It was a scene she saw every morning in her room.

"The way the children are reacting, it's the same as when Puck shows up, meaning… You're a spirit, right?"

Emilia carefully called to it, but the red spirit remained silent, giving no response.

Unlike Puck, the red spirit did not possess a true form, much like a lesser spirit. If it did not have any way to convey words or feelings, then perhaps it just couldn't be helped.

"But it's not like you showed up just to float there without saying anything, right?"

The spirit must have had some reason for showing itself like this.

Emilia held that sort of expectation towards the spirit. In a certain sense, it was natural for Emilia to have this trust. To her, spirits were all like Puck or her lesser spirits.

As far as she was concerned, spirits were all forces for good.

Consequently, Emilia had hope for this red spirit as well. —Emilia who could not place her faith in other people, her companions, and most of all herself, only believed in spirits unconditionally.

That was the sort of relationship she had cultivated with the spirits around her as she lived in the forest.

“—! Where are you going? Do you want to tell me something?”

It did not have a voice with which to answer her question, so instead it started moving as if to answer with its movements.

The red light swayed over the snow as if dancing, and started swimming through the air as if guiding Emilia. Emilia widened her eyes at the suddenness of this, but she immediately ran after the spirit.

“Wait, hey, wait! Where are you going?”

Surmounting snow paths, slipping through the frozen roots of giant trees, Emilia chased after the spirit in front of her. The spirit matched Emilia’s speed, maintaining a reasonable distance between them as it continued to lead the way.

There was something conclusive wherever the spirit was leading her. This belief drove her legs. She continued to run through the snowy forest, and the instant she came out of a cluster of trees—

“Ah—?!”

Perhaps her impatience had chipped away at her concentration, Emilia raised her voice as her footing unexpectedly crumbled.

A natural trap that would occasionally appear on snowy paths, overhanging snow. Her foot went right through the snow when she stepped on it, and she lost her balance as she slipped down the white slope.

“— This is bad!”

She let out a small scream, but fortunately the inclination of the white slope wasn’t very steep. She immediately used her limbs to correct her posture and stand up, and then slid all the way down to the very bottom.

“Wh-What a surprise. That was reeeeally startling…”

Looking up at the crumbling overhang of snow, the unexpectedly long distance she slid caused her to break into a cold sweat. She then remembered her objective, chasing after the red spirit, and restlessly looked around her surroundings as she searched for it. Then—

“—This is, a lake? So there was a place like this in the forest.”

Emilia’s eyes reflexively widened at this scene she was only just now discovering.

Before her was an immense lake under violently undulating snow. Of course, this was a place even Emilia did not know about. It was also the case that she’d left the northern region mostly untouched during her investigation, but considering the obstacles such as dense thickets and ravines, she probably couldn’t have made it far enough to confirm this.

However, this was Elior Forest, an eternally frozen land. Even this lake that appeared to be several dozens of meters in radius was completely frozen, and was like a huge ice making spot.

The red spirit that led Emilia here was floating at the center of the lake.

“A place like that… Umm.”

Having found the spirit, Emilia tried to run over to it, but stopped at the edge of the lake.

The surface was frozen, but she was a little unsure as to whether or not it would break if she stepped on it. There was also her experience with crumbling overhanging snow just now, so she cautiously placed her foot on the ice to test if it would break.

Fortunately, the frozen lake could easily support her weight. The frozen lake’s water was stained pitch-black so she was anxious about falling in, but it seemed there was no need to worry.

“So, I followed you, but… Is this the place you wanted to show me?”

Rapidly sliding over the lake’s surface to reach the middle, she called out to the floating spirit. The red spirit was silent as usual, but now it did not even move and simply continued to float there.

“As I thought, there’s something here… That’s how it is, huh.”

Interpreting the red spirit’s behavior this way, Emilia carefully examined her surroundings. It was an open space, under her was a lake, and in front of her was the spirit who vexingly could not speak, she had to find the answer.

She was currently in the northern region which had endless black liquid crawling all over the place, if she stayed here too long, the slime would approach—

“…How strange.”

Thinking that far, Emilia realized how odd the situation was.

There was no sign of the black liquid anywhere around her. That also went for the path she took to get here. Within an hour of entering the north, she was attacked by more than thirty of them. Compared to that frequency, her journey here was miraculously peaceful, too peaceful.

—No. There was one possibility that did not require a miracle.

—It wasn’t that she hadn’t encountered the black liquid. It was already here.

“…It can’t be.”

She suddenly felt her hair stand on end and was frozen in place as her eyes widened. She then slowly lowered her gaze, down to the lake she was standing on.

The lake that should have been frozen white seemed to contain something that dyed it black. —As if a familiar black contaminant was hidden there in such a large quantity as to fill the bottom of the lake.

"—What?!"

The instant she sensed the colossal danger in the frozen lake she was standing on, something strange happened. Turning toward the intense waves of mana, she found that it was her contracted lesser spirits that were calling her. The blue lights flew around at high speed, fervently trying to tell her something. What she felt flowing into her from their connection was fear, panic, anxiety—And anger.

Knitting her brows at this sensation, Emilia immediately noticed that the red spirit had disappeared. Right now, only Emilia and her lesser spirits were left on the lake.

The moment she realized this—

"…No way."

As if to affirm Emilia's dumbfounded mutter, a thunderous sound burst out from beneath her. Cracks formed on the lake's surface, and evil poison poured out of the ice like a volcanic eruption.

And then the contaminant gushing forth turned toward Emilia, and mercilessly rained down on her.

Chapter 4:
I Can Become Anything

1

Smashing through the lake's surface, the source of the black liquid—The great black liquid's entire body vibrated violently. The undulating black slime rained down slime bullets on its surroundings, instantly contaminating the lake's shore with evil poison.

The great black slime possessed a colossal body about a hundred meters in size, and it used that immense mass to wash away the frozen forest like a tsunami. In the blink of an eye, the area had turned into the scene of a disaster, filled with fallen trees and landslides.

Naturally, a girl standing in the midst of this downpour would be completely helpless. However—

"—Thank goodness, I just barely made it."

Surrounded by the terrible spectacle that looked as though the entirety of the lake had overflowed, Emilia said this as she sighed.

As the filthy water furiously swirled around her, not a single drop was able to touch her. This was no surprise, because her body was completely cut off from the black liquid. The method was simple, a box of ice.

The box ice Emilia had formed using the spirit arts floated atop the great black liquid's raging waves. The coffin-shaped box was very thick and buoyant, which allowed it to fully protect her from the contamination.

"But it won't hold for long, so… Ya! Ta! Ei!"

Her relief only lasted a moment. Emilia slipped out of the coffin and started forming new footholds over the liquid. The poison's erosion was dreadful, neither the coffin nor her footholds would last very long. Heading for land, Emilia leaped across the ice footholds she had formed using the spirit arts one by one, and escaped danger by jumping to an area the poison could not reach.

She then turned around, and the disaster at the shore once again made her eyes widen.

“That’s far too horrible…”

The lake was ruined by the great black liquid’s tyranny, and was already completely unrecognizable.

Having been released from the bottom of the lake, the great black liquid shook its whole body as if overcome by joy. —No, that wasn’t joy. It was moving like this to heat up the parts of itself that were still frozen and break them.

The great black liquid still had one portion frozen. However, it would soon be freed from even this incomplete state, and would use that giant body to hunt for prey. The forest wouldn’t even last three days if that giant body invaded it.

“I can’t let that happen! I have to stop it…!”

If it approached the forest, the tsunami would completely destroy the ice sculptures of her companions.

If that happened, there would no longer be anyone who could connect Emilia to her past. She would be alone. The idea was more terrifying than death itself.

Therefore, Emilia would fight. —Even if she could not remember the reason.

“I’ll stop it, I’ll definitely stop it! Please, lend me your power!!”

She would fight, and once again seal that great black liquid away.

Emilia built up her resolve and called out, and in response all of the lesser spirits she was connected to emerged. Each and every one of them shone brightly as they lent her power, and Emilia thrust her her hands forward.

The lesser spirits took hold of her white fingers and arms, and built up every last bit of mana they possibly could.

"…"

Perhaps having noticed this massive whirlpool of mana, the great black liquid turned its attention toward Emilia. The viscous liquid did not have eyes. It barely even appeared to be sentient. Despite this, Emilia knew it was looking at her.

The great black liquid vibrated violently, and immediately after, terrifyingly huge tentacles emerged from it. It roared as it swung down an attack like several large trees bundled together at Emilia.

Something like a pouring waterfall couldn't even begin to compare to this. It was as if the sky itself was falling. The heavens were dyed black as they fell—And right before they could crush her, light emanated from her.

"…"

Black and white, the clash between these primordial colors looked like the creation of heaven and earth.

The pure white light painted over the jet-black sky. The sky was frozen in an instant, cracked the next instant, and scattered into pieces the final instant. As shards of ice poured down like rain, the light ceaselessly continued even further, ultimately landing a direct hit on the top of the main body—

However, neither had managed to land a decisive blow.

"—Cunning."

Having been hit by the light, its response as it started to freeze caused Emilia to raise her voice.

Before the freezing from the light could reach the rest of its body, the great black liquid twisted the frozen part off, minimizing the damage. On top which, it sent this part flying, and the fragments aimed at Emilia rained down like buckshot.

“Kh, uuu—!!”

Every single shot in the barrage flying toward her was like a huge cannonball. The black lumps of ice bored into the ground, causing it to explode and scatter snow and ice, and even surrounded by this Emilia advanced.

Just as Puck taught her, the only way to exterminate the black liquid was to freeze it to the core and smash it apart. Of course, the larger the opponent, the harder it would be to freeze them, and this particular opponent was the worst.

But even so—

“I shaved off 1% with that attack just now! So I just have to repeat that a hundred times—!”

There were no shortcuts. If her only option was to chip away at it bit by bit, she would choose to do so with no hesitation.

As Emilia rushed toward it, the great black liquid fired a large amount of slime bullets to mow her down. As Emilia leaped over frozen trees, the ground beneath her burst open, scattering huge amounts of snow and soil.

Having kneaded a colossal amount of mana for that last attack, her lesser spirits were now exhausted. It would be a while before she could use such a powerful attack again. Emilia would have to buy them that time.

“Bring it on!”

If she thought too much, it would only make her despair. As if to clear that darkness, Emilia yelled as she faced it.

The great black liquid was a mighty existence, none of the opponents she had fought thus far could compare to it. The black liquid would win the battle if it simply touched her, whereas Emilia’s attacks were sporadic and lacking in power. A tiny little girl like Emilia barely even counted as an opponent.

—It was unclear whether the great black liquid even had a mind with which to think, but supposing it did, it would probably think this.

And all the advantages the black liquid had would become openings for Emilia to exploit.

“Uyaa—!”

She evaded the slime bullets and leaped over the corruption washing over the ground. She skated over the snow, surfed up the slime on her ice board, and repeatedly attacked the giant that was toying with her, dealing damage bit by bit.

She kept fighting hard with no breaks, pushing herself to the limit to overcome her disadvantage.

If there were someone watching from afar, or if the great black liquid had intelligence, perhaps they would have been left speechless, unable to believe what they were seeing as they watched her give it her all.

What was unfolding here was not a battle between a lone girl and a colossal enemy.

Naturally, Emilia had a few things to say about that.

First, if one were to say she was fighting alone, she would deny it by pointing out the lesser spirits that were with her. If one were to say she was at a disadvantage, she would retort that her opponent was being careless. If one were to ask if she seriously thought she could win, she would probably reply that she was fighting hard so she wouldn’t lose.

Right now, there was no doubt that the brave battle she was putting on was mostly driven by willpower. As long as her willpower held out, she could fight on no matter what—It was her foundation.

“Eii, ya—!!”

Abandoning her contaminated ice board, she formed a large foothold on the lake and leaped over to it. Emilia dug in her heels to stop her movement, and then flashed a light as she turned around, this light froze the slime diagonally.

The blade of light seemed to cut right through the great black liquid, dyeing the cut white. However, the great black liquid's counterattack was also extreme. It launched a huge slime bullet some ten-odd meters large at Emilia who had stopped moving. She formed a barrier of ice, but she couldn't stop it.

The slime bullet struck her ice foothold, and launched the block of ice high into the sky.

"…"

Clinging to the block of ice that had been sent flying, Emilia endured the violent wind that assailed her as she spun.

Below her was the great black liquid. The sky offered her no refuge as the viscous liquid extended its giant body, seeming to open wide so as to gulp down Emilia and the ice in go.

"Nnnnn—!!"

Above the waiting great black liquid, Emilia groaned as she used magic any number of times. Repeatedly hitting the rising block of ice, she finally stopped its rotation—Instead, the block of ice was launched downward much faster than gravity could pull it and struck the great black liquid.

Accelerating its fall were the innumerable icicles Emilia had fired into it from above. The countless icicles added speed and rotation, allowing the block of ice to break through the great black liquid's defenses.

"…"

The gaping great black liquid was easily split in four by the block of ice. The viscous liquid scattered with a black splash, and Emilia pushed her spirit arts to the limit.

The radially expanding light froze three of the four pieces. The atmosphere creaked as the black contaminants were dyed white, the sight of which brought Emilia satisfaction.

With this, how many of the hundred attacks she was supposed to deal had she dealt? She decided to think about the exact number later as she immediately withdrew in preparation for her next attack.

She jumped off the block of ice that had pierced the great black liquid and was now sinking to the bottom. She followed the several footholds she had created mid-air to escape the great black liquid's grasp—

"—?!"

At that moment, a sharp pain suddenly stabbed her heart, causing her breath to catch as she lost focus.

It was similar to the pain she felt whenever her confrontations with the black liquid stimulated her lost memories. However, the sensation just now was on an entirely different level from anything before. It was far too strong.

—She missed a foothold, and was left defenseless against the viscous liquid's counterattack.

"—Ah"

For an instant, her world turned upside down when her foot stepped on air. The frozen black liquid was in her field of view, when she saw the contaminant wriggling directly beneath her falling silver hair, she let out a strained breath.

In an instant, Emilia used her survival instincts to the fullest, searching for any possibility of escape in order to execute it—However, her hands wouldn't move. She was unable to find a solution.

"…"

She would be swallowed, dissolved, and consumed. That was the unavoidable future just a few seconds ahead of her.

This realization left Emilia dumbfounded, more than anger, more than sadness, what filled her was pure shock.

Was death something that happened so easily?

The last moments of the witchbeast Guiltylaw as it was swallowed and dissolved passed by her mind. Just like that witchbeast, Emilia too would probably have her hair, skin, and flesh dissolved, and be absorbed to the bone.

That was really scary, but,

"…"

For some reason, some part of her felt apathy.

Death was frightening. The end was terrifying. Despite this, she felt slightly relieved that it was over.

With this, she would no longer be tormented by the unease and guilt she had no answer to.

Thinking of it that way, the idea of dying like this—

'—Are you sure?'

As she accepted the end, she heard someone's voice.

This question caused Emilia to gasp and reopen her closed eyes.

Her field of view was filled by the black-stained death approaching right in front of her.

'—Can this really be the end? Even though you haven't apologized to anyone for even a single thing?'

Apologize. For what? Just who should she be apologizing to, and for what reason?

Those words seemed like nothing but a false accusation, but they soaked deep into her heart.

'—No way. You're faaaar from finished.'

She finally realized. It was the voice she heard every day, every morning, her own voice.

—Immediately after, a light emanated from her in the blink of an eye, and the surging frost shattered the great black liquid from its core.

2

The great black liquid that had filled the lakeside and caused damage rivaling a calamity was now shattering into tiny pieces.

The dancing shards of ice turned into white light, and produced a wondrous atmosphere that didn't quite fit the disastrous scene. However, Emilia who was crouching within the boisterously dancing light did not have the leeway to pay it any attention.

What had she done, and what happened as a result?

She understood the answer far too well, and it continued to assert itself even now.

"—Ah, kh"

Groaning in pain, Emilia fell to her knees on the ice as she held her chest. The inside of her chest was heating up, and the source of the heat felt like it could burst out of her body and reach the outside at any moment.

She had used her power.

The power she wasn't supposed to use, she had to use it again.

—No, not had to. Emilia herself had chosen to use it.

There was also the option of not using it. In that case, she would definitely be dead. But there were things in this world that were taboo even at the cost of one's life.

Right now, her power was spiraling out of control, freezing the great black liquid was not enough to satisfy it and it was now running wild trying to freeze the entire world.

If that happened, just how much would be sacrificed in exchange for Emilia's life?

"Noo… That, absolutely…"

With her eyes tightly, Emilia grit her teeth as she attempted to suppress her power.

The instant before the great black liquid could swallow her, her voice that wasn't hers spoke with her, and Emilia decided to use the power. But she did not do it to sacrifice her surroundings so she could save herself.

So that wouldn't happen, she would settle it without sacrificing anything, even if it meant breaking the taboo.

"U, aaa—!"

Her heart rate increased rapidly, and her temperature shot up dramatically. Her bare skin started putting out white steam, and her power that had escaped the confines of her chest and expanded to her head seemed like it could explode at any moment.

How could she, what could she—Through the chaos, a sudden warmth came fluttering in.

It was not the heat rampaging within her, nor was it the power dangerously swirling around her. It was the call of the gentle beings who were connected to her most precious spot.

"…You all."

Emilia understood what was happening in her blurry vision.

As she gasped on the ground, her lesser spirits cuddled up to her shoulders. To these small accumulations of mana, the power overflowing from Emilia was an existential threat. Merely approaching her would be dangerous. Despite this, they did not try to leave her.

And then, the lesser spirits' faint glow started to twinkle brightly as they fired white light toward the other side of the lake. They did not hit anything, they just randomly frozen the ruined ground.

That white light was the magic produced by the spirits on Emilia's shoulders. Starting with this, more than ten of the lesser spirits started indiscriminately firing magic toward the shore.

This was all in order to squander the power that Emilia could not control.

"…Everyone."

Understanding their intention, Emilia felt choked up. The spirits continued to use up the mana even now. Emilia's suffering did not cease either.

However—

"N, Fu…U"

As she exhaled warm breaths, Emilia felt her body's temperature lessen bit by bit. The aimless blasts of freezing power covered more and more of the ruined shore with ice. Emilia's power continued to decrease as more ice covered the scenery. Finally—

"Ha, a… Fu, a…"

Drawing deep, gasping breaths, Emilia pressed her forehead covered in cold sweat against the snow.

Her high body temperature cooled down right away, and her thoughts that were rendered delirious by the heat were now back to normal. The sensation of something foreign raging in her body was not completely gone. However, there was no longer any danger of it exploding and running wild.

"Withstood… It… Without relying on Puck, for the first time…"

That was a state in which she could not do anything without relying on him, but she had managed to overcome it without him this time.

This was all thanks to the lesser spirits who worked hard to protect her with no concern for their own safety.

"Thank you, everyone… Thanks to all of you, I"

Emilia said this in a tearful voice, still sitting on the snow, and the lesser spirits did not say anything in response. The lights simply wavered gently in silence, and Emilia felt something well up in her chest.

She had faced death, used her power in order to avoid it, had her own life and those of others threatened by this power, and was saved from it thanks to the lesser spirits' help.

She felt guilty for relying on the taboo. She was of course reflecting on it. But just for now, her sense of accomplishment at having survived won out.

Furthermore, there was even more good news. She was able to deal with the source of the threat to the forest, the great black liquid. —This time, she was able to protect the forest, the garden, and everyone.

"This time…?"

Feeling something out of place about her emotions, Emilia knit her brows slightly.

However, once opened she could no longer put the lid back on her memories. Now that she was no longer desperately trying to control her power, Emilia discovered the source of the aching pain that arose within her when she met the great black liquid.

—A green forest, her companions before they were frozen, a silver-haired woman, a black robe, and then.

"Ah, kh—?!"

The moment she reached for the lid and snuck a peek at part of her missing memories, she was repelled by a pain that felt like she had touched hot metal. But at the very end.

She got the feeling that someone told her to forget.

"…"

Unspeakable fear, indescribable loathing, hate that did not need a reason.

Emotions Emilia was not even aware of exploded within her, Emilia was taken aback by this outburst and raised her voice—

“—e”

The next instant, rays of heat rained down, covering Emilia along with the shore.

“…”

The heat rays piercing the ground from the sky produced a blazing inferno with their heat.

The shore that had just been frozen was bathed in hellfire and even ice was immediately vaporized.

The steam gushing forth covered the area with white clouds and destroyed the forest which was unable to withstand the heat. Within the dancing ash, all that was left in the area was a girl who fell to her knees in astonishment.

It was Emilia. Her silver hair was frayed and her clothes were stained by soot and dust, but she hadn’t sustained any real injuries. Considering the scale of the inferno surrounding her, this was a miracle.

If it wasn’t a miracle, it had to be a result obtained through great sacrifice.

“…”

Within the smoke so hot it was difficult to even breathe, Emilia stared in shock, unable to move.

She did not understand what had happened. But unfortunately, she immediately realized she had lost something. The contract between spirit and spirit arts user was a connection between souls.

If one of the connected parties were to be lost, Emilia would immediately feel it.

That was why she understood that her lesser spirits had faced the pouring rays of heat to protect her, and consequently had their mana ripped away after which their Ods burned.

She knew right away that she had lost an irreplaceable connection.

"…"

Emilia's heart was filled with the feeling of loss and despondency, these emotions took her to the limit of what her brain could process.

The overflowing magical power, the ache of opening the lid to her memories, and now the feeling of loss and despondency upon losing her bond. Every single one of these was far too much for her slender body to bear.

"—Extreme, Delight. Aah, that's a nice expression. I wanted to see that look on your face."

A voice suddenly struck Emilia's eardrums in the midst of her depression. She slowly turned in the voice's direction, and found a red light past the smoke.

A round, red light—It was the light that led her to the lake. It was the spirit that called her here. The spirit that had disappeared somewhere when the great black liquid showed up had now reappeared.

"That voice… Your voice? You can talk…"

"Thickheaded, Slow-witted. You're too damned slow. The spirits who died for you won't be able to rest in peace."

"…"

The spirit's voice was full of malice, its declaration made Emilia blink. She did not know the reason for the hatred in its voice. The spirit was unable to bear this attitude of hers.

“—Naive. It’s me. I suppose I might have just been some insignificant prey to you, though.”

The light swayed as it spoke, and scorched the atmosphere as it changed its form. The flame steadily took on a humanoid appearance, and Emilia was left speechless when she saw the face it reproduced.

The humanoid flame grinning boldly—Those red features felt familiar.

“The people who came to the forest back then, you’re their…”

“Understanding Affirmative. I’m the man who went through hell because of you and your spirit.”

Saying this as if spitting the words, the flame—Formerly the bearded man she faced on the snowy path, sneered cruelly.

Emilia had fallen unconscious after she unleashed her power toward the end of the battle with the Snow Blight. Because of this, she did not know what happened to the men led by the bearded man after that, but it seemed something had happened to him.

Something that changed him into this mass of flame.

“Sympathy Unnecessary. Don’t pity me. Despite how I look, it doesn’t feel bad at all. I was as good as dead when I got tossed out of the organization, and then the power to exact my revenge fell into my hands.”

“Revenge… On me?”

“Inquiry Affirmative! Obviously! When I was on the verge of death, a spirit that looked like a ball of flame appeared before me. I wanted to get my revenge, and he wanted to enter this forest… Our interests aligned. So I lent him my body, thanks to which the flower seed in my belly melted away and now I feel great.”

The man who had lost his human form to become a flame spread his arms and laughed like he was out of his mind. Emilia had no response to the intensity of his tenacity and unjust resentment resulting from a misunderstanding. But at the same time, she understood this.

It was the flaming man before her who burned away her contracted lesser spirits, causing this sense of loss that seemed to bore into her heart.

“…I understand what you’re trying to say. I understand completely.”

Putting strength into her shaky knees, Emilia stood up and faced the flame.

Drying the tears in her amethyst eyes and wiping the soot off her cheeks, she glared at the flame blazing with malice.

“I understand that you want revenge on me for what happened that day. I did something terrible back then. So I understand why you would retaliate. But…”

“But?”

“Why did you kill my lesser spirits… Those children…?”

Her feeling of loss was revived when she spoke the words, and rage surged within her to fill the hole in her heart.

In response to her question, the humanoid flame fell silent momentarily. But his features soon warped in an unsightly manner as he laughed, baring his horribly vulgar emotions.

“Simple, Clear. I figured I’d be able to see you cry if I did it.”

“…”

Emilia’s vision turned crimson with rage in response to this malice that was beyond her imagination. Immediately after, she once again released the power she had just suppressed, a chill spread underfoot and turned the burned ground white as it froze.

“Delight, Pleasure. Wonderful, get angrier and angrier. I’ll burn your limbs off and then roast the other elves when you can’t move.

You'll be the only one left!"

"If I'm the one you're aiming for…!"

As if to oppose Emilia's rage, pillars of flame erupted from under him. The waves of heat set the man who had fused with a spirit's surroundings ablaze, and the lake's remaining water and snow boiled and evaporated away.

A sign of the fire season that hadn't visited Elior Forest in a hundred years clashed head on with a sign of the ice that froze Elior Forest for a hundred years, and the shore was turned into a hell of absolute hot and absolute cold.

"You are evil! You are a witch! You are a criminal! I, Criminal, Execute Judgement—!!"

"Leave the others out of it—!!"

The man yelled vigorously, and Emilia too raised her voice as if screaming at him.

The two shouts collided, and in an instant bullets of flame and bullets of ice blew away the shore's atmosphere. The exploding red and white lights produced shockwaves, and innumerable explosions burned the forest white and froze it red.

—The fated battle between Emilia and the man had begun.

3

Emilia who unleashed the power hiding in her chest, and the man who fused with a spirit possessing immense power.

The clash between these two mighty powers was already trending in a certain direction even though the battle had just begun.

"…"

Endless flame bullets were fired incessantly, and jostled by the impact and hot wind, Emilia did not even scream in pain as she was knocked about.

Emilia was also using magic to counterattack, but she could not even graze him. This was an obvious outcome.

The opponent had fused with a spirit, and moreover a supremely powerful spirit possessing power on par with a Great Spirit. By contrast, Emilia could not even control her power, let alone use it properly.

As a result, Emilia was one-sidedly tormented by her opponent's attacks, and was repeatedly blown away.

"Gutless, Weak! What's wrong, is that it? You'll die if you don't do a little better, you know?!"

The man enjoyed the feeling of harassing her as he continued to release flame in this one-sided assault. But every single one of his attacks was extraordinarily powerful, and all Emilia could do was devote herself to dodging them.

His ability was with no exaggeration on Puck's level—Who as far as Emilia knew, was the strongest.

"But, even so…"

Her lesser spirits gave their lives so she could keep hers, there was no way she could waste it by burning to death here.

Striking the ground to raise her body, Emilia escaped the explosive flames by flipping backwards. Continuing to flip, flip and flip, she twisted midway, overturning her body and breaking into a run.

"Unsightly, Disgraceful! Running is useless!"

"Even if you say it's useless, I can't let this be the end…"

Without the lesser spirits' assistance, Emilia could not handle magic skillfully enough to produce footholds or ice boards. All Emilia could do was run on her own two legs, and desperately hold on with her own two arms.

"Thou, Insane! If all you can do is run around, just burn away quietly!"

The man was enraged by Emilia's actions that seemed to be pointless struggling. The bright red attacks continued even now, and Emilia who was running across the shore desperately evaded the flames.

Even though she was running through extremely hot steam, Emilia had barely sustained any burns. This was thanks to the robe Puck gave her. The robe was probably woven with some special power that was reducing the damage. Even if this wasn't the case, it was what she believed.

It was fine if it was just an assumption. The power of an assumption was nothing to look down on. Thanks to this robe, she was able to keep her legs going. —And thus, she was able to create an opening to attack.

"Scheme Seen Through! Crafty woman!"

The moment she succeeded in her goal, the man's relentless attack loosened for the first time.

Turning around, Emilia saw it. The man clicked his tongue as he looked upward, at the great black liquid that had thawed out and was now about to fall on him.

The black liquid Emilia had frozen with her magic had now been freed by the man's flames. It was for this reason that Emilia had been running around the shore, she intended to revive the black liquid with his consecutive attacks.

It was a matter of luck who it would choose to attack when it was released, but—

"Now it's your turn to get chased around!"

The black liquid's persistence was guaranteed. The once smashed great black liquid had now been reduced to a size of about twenty meters upon its release, but compared to the man, it was large enough.

If it could create just the slightest opening, she could turn the situation around with one attack—

“Imprudent, Shallow, is that it?”

He held up his billowing arms of flame and turned the world a deep crimson.

It roasted the surface of the black liquid that was about to crush him, and in an instant the viscous liquid’s entire body started bubbling as it boiled, after which it exploded, spreading a foul smell as it was vaporized.

With the sound of water pouring on hot metal, the black liquid was mercilessly scorched by the ultimate flame. It bubbled up and burned away, completely vaporized.

This was complete destruction, on an entirely different level from being sealed in ice.

“—ah”

Emilia’s strength immediately left her when she saw this.

Emilia had to work so hard to beat it. She had gone so far as to rely on her power that was sealed away as taboo in order to bring it down.

The man had finished it off in a matter of seconds. It wasn’t a problem of compatibility. It was the overwhelming difference in power.

“Utmost Delight! This is it, this power! I was right to give the spirit my body! I, Absolute Agreement! Delight! Hiha, hihahahaha!”

Tramping on the remains of the black liquid that had been thoroughly burned, the flame scratched its head and turned back to Emilia. His gaze made her shoulders jump, after which realized that she had collapsed to the ground.

Her knees had no strength left, and her teeth chattered as she clenched them.

Begging for her life would be pointless. Stalling for time would be meaningless. Then at least—

“If it’s my life you want…”

“Affirmative. Yeah, that’s right. That’s exactly right. What about it?”

“The forest, my companions, I’m begging you… Please spare them…”

Emilia pleaded with the approaching flame as its heat warmed her bangs and dried her eyes.

If his goal was to exact revenge on her, it was inevitable that she would lose her life here. Even so, she at least wanted to be sure no harm would come to her companions. She had to make sure nothing would happen to them.

However, the flaming man’s expression was one of joy as he looked down at Emilia.

“Laughter Inevitable. Don’t make me laugh, you stupid girl. Why exactly should I listen to your request? If it brings you pain, I’d much rather…”

The man’s sadistic words thoroughly mangled Emilia’s heart one by one. His ill will caused Emilia’s cheeks to stiffen with grief. And seeing this, the man became even happier as—

“That’s right. I’ll line up all your companions near this lake, and burn them all away. And in the end, I’ll burn you… Unnecessary, Deed. I, Objective, Thou, Annihilation—”

“—?!”

Suddenly, the man stopped smiling and spoke in a completely emotionless voice.

The sound and its contents caused Emilia to stare in wonder, and immediately after even the man himself blinked. The man then grabbed his own throat, and started yelling at something she couldn’t see.

“Hey, quit talking like you own the place! This is my body… Appeal Refused. I, Objective, Half-Devil Annihilation. Thou, Objective, Half-Devil Annihilation. Objective Priority. Thou, Inefficient—"

The flame trembled before Emilia's eyes, and two voices emerged from the man's mouth. One was the man's voice filled with rage, and the other was a low, emotionless voice. They were currently quarreling.

"Don't screw… She put me through hell… No, destroy the half-devil swiftly. This existence shall bring harm to the world. Descendant of the Witch… Half-Devil, kill, right now…"

Grabbing his head, the man and the flame's voices mixed together. Emilia understood that that was the voice of the spirit he fused with. Right now, the man's will was being consumed by the flame spirit.

But at the same time, she had heard something she couldn't overlook. The man's—No, the spirit's objective.

"It's not just him… You want to kill me too…"

"Inquiry Affirmative. Thou, Criminal. You are sinful. A criminal deserving of death. A half-devil…"

"…Half-devil? What's that?"

"Half-devil, descendant of the Witch…! Your hair, eyes, appearance, everything about you is the same as the Witch! Not just your appearance, even your bloodline is the same as the Witch's! The same as the half-devil!"

Emilia could not comprehend the man and the spirit's chaotic, overlapping words.

Words that she couldn't overlook just kept piling up. Witch, to Emilia and to anyone else in the world, that was an ominous word—

"Why are you suddenly talking about the Witch… Half-devil, do I have some sort of connection to…?"

"Don't play dumb, half-devil! No, half-elf! You who bear the same appearance as the Witch! Born from the same cursed blood as the Witch, descendant of the Witch! Reincarnation of the Witch! Danger to the world!"

"Half, elf…"

The word the flame spoke was completely unfamiliar to her.

It was supposed to be, but the sound of it melted into her heart awfully easily. With her breath taken away, her chest produced pitiful heartbeats, and her understanding deepened in tempo with this sound.

"I'm a, half-elf…"

"Affirmative. Thou, half-elf. You alone are different. In this forest, you alone are an outsider!"

"I, alone. I'm different from everyone else in the forest… That's why I alone woke up?"

Emilia was most likely in the same state as the rest of her frozen companions before she woke up. Despite this, she alone was released from her slumber, and continued to live her life.

There must be some reason, she thought as she battled the guilt that kept asserting itself within her.

There must have been a reason that she alone woke up, unlike her frozen companions in the forest.

—This was probably it.

"Then, do you know? What I did."

"…"

"You… You came to kill me, so you must know, right? What it was that I did, and why the forest was frozen!"

Facing the silent flame, Emilia forgot all about her unfavorable position and raised her voice.

Over and over, whenever night came, she would see the same scene in her dreams, her nightmares.

At the end of her battle with the black liquid, when the door to her memories opened ever so slightly, the scene she saw towards the end—

If that was the answer, if that was the unforgivable sin she had committed—

“Tell me what I did! What did I do to everyone in the forest?! Why am I… Hated by everyone? Why am I alone?! Why…?!”

Emilia shouted desperately as her voice quavered, as if she was crying, as if she was shrieking in despair.

That was the doubt she had always carried within her.

The guilt that kept smoldering in her heart, the people that detested and feared her existence, how she lived alone, unable to come into contact with anyone—

She always told herself that it couldn’t be helped. But even that had a limit.

It didn’t matter if it couldn’t be helped. She didn’t care if there was nothing she could do.

But if it really couldn’t be helped, then she at least wanted to be able to accept that. She was aware that she had committed a sin. Then using that as the reason, she wanted to put an end to this guilt.

And she believed that the flame before her would give her that chance.

“If you’re going to kill me, tell me why you’re doing it. If you just tell me that much, I… If I don’t know why, I won’t just do as you say…!”

The strength that had once left her once again filled her limbs as she mustered up her willpower.

This was rage, rage had given her this strength. Even though she was plunging into the depths of despair, even though the sense of loss was breaking her, her rage lit up her power. That was what was happening here.

“I, Protect the world’s balance. You are a threat to this world’s peace…”

“I don’t know anything about that! I haven’t done or even thought anything like that! That’s not the sort of thing I want you to tell me! I’m talking about the sin I committed!”

“Thou, Your, Past, Committed, Crime, Sin—”

In response to his argument that seemed like nothing more than a false accusation, Emilia expressed her irritation directly. Her objection caused the man and the spirit’s voices to mix together as they fixed their flaming eyes on Emilia. Looking at her, they continued.

“I, I, Unknown, as if I’d know.”

“—. —. —Ha”

The flame’s words burned brightly, and their contents momentarily rendered Emilia speechless.

Seeing her reaction, the flame repeated itself.

“I, Thou, sin or whatever, I have no clue—”

“—! That can’t be…?! Then why…?!”

In response to his unbelievable statement, Emilia gasped frantically as her voice caught.

The flame had answered her. It wasn’t concerned about Emilia’s past or the sin she had committed.

Then—

“Then why are you, for what reason?!”

“You are, criminal. I am, criminal judgement. That is, I, Mission—”

“But you’re saying you don’t know anything about my sin, aren’t you?!”

Emilia’s past, the source of her guilt. Though it did not know about them, the flame had declared her guilty.

Emilia’s voice grew tight at the absurdity of the situation, and to her the flame said,

“Thou, Existence, that is your sin—”

“…”

“Your very existence in this world is a sin. That is unforgivable. A great sin—”

“—u”

She let out a ragged breath.

And before she knew it, she had once again sunk down to the ground. Even the strength that her chaotic emotions brought forth had now disappeared, and she could no longer move properly. That was how badly those words just now had wounded her heart.

“Thou, Half-Devil. You are the descendant of the Witch. Thou, World Balance, bring about destruction. That Is Sin—”

Tormented by the violent words striking her, Emilia could no longer even raise her face.

Half-Devil, Witch, Danger to the World, she had nothing to do with any of that. She had no clue. Even so, she was declared a sinner.

She had spent countless sleepless nights assailed by her guilt. And when she would wake from her nightmares, the question of what she did in the past would wring her heart.

Hated by everyone, ostracized by everyone, distanced by everyone, these always brought her heartache.

Something had happened, there was some reason, the reason lay within her sealed memories, that was what she believed.

Her awareness of her sin in itself became a form of support for Emilia.

A form of support that allowed her to accept the situation she was placed in, and that she had to live all alone.

Despite this, the crimson flame casting accusations upon her burned away all of that, declaring this:

—You cannot be allowed to exist, your life itself is a sin.

"…Why is it always like this?"

As Emilia powerlessly hung her head, a hoarse, tearful voice left her lips.

"The reason you all hate me… Why is it always something I can't do anything about…?"

If the sin she committed was the cause, she wanted to be judged for it. If atonement was possible, she would do anything.

But if she was hated because she was not an elf, but a half-elf, there was nothing she could do about that.

But if she was hated because her silver hair and amethyst eyes resembled those of the Witch, there was nothing she could do about that.

But if she was hated because she was a half-devil, a witch, a threat to the world's balance, there was nothing she could do about that.

"If you loathe me, if you hate me… Make me the reason you do so…"

“Denial. I, Sentiment Unrelated. You are a half-devil, you are a witch, that is your sin—”

“This is about me, so why are you talking about someone else…?! I’m Emilia, just Emilia… Not a half-devil, not the Witch. Look at me, talk about me and not someone else…”

Emilia raised her head, voicing this desperate plea as tears streamed down her cheeks.

With her hand on her chest, she faced the flame that burned away criminals as she declared that the girl standing before it was her own person.

Amethyst eyes filled with tears and silver hair fluttering in the hot wind—In response to this girl who possessed the characters of the Witch who brought disaster, the crimson flame—The Arbiter spoke loudly.

“I, I, Arbiter Melakuera. Trial, Arbitration, Execute Judgement—”

The unfeeling arbiter did not offer the slightest bit of sympathy to her plea that seemed to reach one’s very soul.

The flame’s form then changed, its humanoid shape swelled up, taking on a half-human and half-horse appearance. The flame’s hooves seared the ground, with fire hot enough to scorch eyeballs.

The absurd heat it was gathering would completely and utterly burn away Emilia’s existence, mercilessly ending her with no remorse, sorrow, or anything.

“…”

The tears flowing down her cheeks evaporated. Emilia simply stared at this countdown to her death.

If it released those flames, she would disappear into nothingness. That was the man’s—No, Melakuera’s role as the arbiter, to mercilessly erase from this world with not a trace left.

She would vanish, become nothing. The days she had spent living here were something no one desired.

—It wasn’t even about how she lived.

Her existence was, to the forest, to her companions, to anyone and everyone, completely meaningless. It didn’t even matter who she was, that Emilia was Emilia.

Nobody, not one single person, would ever even call her name—

“—Puck.”

On the verge of erasure, Emilia regretfully mouthed that name.

Her life that no one desired. Within it, there was just one being who would call her by name.

Imagining the familiar cat with her eyes closed, with this one and only warm memory—

“Arbitration, Execute—”

Light rushed towards her.

The swelling red light reached her in the blink of an eye, and then—

“—That’s enough.”

A gray cat appeared before her and brushed away the red hot light.

4

“—You properly called my name this time. That’s great, Emilia.”

The cat smiled back at Emilia as he waved his tail.

The cat’s attitude, conduct, and smile were all familiar, and Emilia’s throat tightened.

Puck shook his head at Emilia as she repeatedly faltered, unable to even say his name because of how sudden this was.

"Relax, there's no rush. We'll have plenty of time to talk. —After I drive this guy away."

"Brethren. You, I, Clash with Part—"

"How noisy. This is between me and this girl, don't interfere."

Puck's mood turned sour as he frowned, and the next instant bullets of light were fired at Melakuera.

The centaur raised its forehooves to intercept this sudden attack, and trampled the approaching light bullets with its blazing hooves. However, its hooves that touched the light were frozen in an instant, after which they fell off with a low sound.

Of course, Melakuera was able to reform his lost hooves with flames right away, but in response to Puck's attack that declared further conversation would be useless, he made his entire body billow as he cautiously raised his firepower.

"Hey, did you know? It seems that those who get in others' way end up getting kicked to death by a horse. But if it's a horse getting in your way, that doesn't seem to make much sense, huh. Well, that's a saying about romance, though."

[T/N: Refers to a Japanese saying, people who interfere in others' love lives should get kicked to death by a horse.]

"Brethren, Appeal Stand By. That Half-Devil, True Nature Exposed. Witch Descendant, Annihilation Necessity—"

"I don't really care about any of that nonsense. That body is… The bad beardy, huh. You deceived him and borrowed his body to trick my barrier, I see. You're as sneaky as ever."

The two spirits exchanged words, but the rift between them could not be filled, and Puck in particular made his hostility clear.

The cat used his tail to point to Emilia as his eyes filled with rage.

"Poor girl, she's about to cry. You hurt her with your heartless words. With your worthless suspicion and nonsensical delusions.

With this, we've become enemies for life."

"That Girl, Half-Devil! She's the reincarnation of the Witch! That girl is a menace who shall bring ruin to the world's balance!"

"The world, the world, like that's the only thing you know… It's tedious. You think that anyone and everyone would be out to do something to the world if they just had a little power? Let me tell you, there's no one so obsessed with the world as you. And also, the world doesn't need you or your power nearly as much as you think."

"Contempt, Firm Refusal! My mission, objective, denied, as if I'll let you get away with—"

"Looks like we're finally on the same page. I can't forgive you either."

As Puck's anger got colder and colder, Melakuera's blazing rage responded to it. The two spirits who held extreme power were already beyond the point of reconciliation.

A clash between them was now inevitable. However—

"Puck, no… You can't win, you'll die…"

Shaking her head, Emilia pleaded with Puck from behind as he prepared for battle.

She was happy that he came for her. She was truly happy. But—

"If you die too, then… No…"

"—It's going to be a bit of a problem if you underestimate me, Emilia. Sure, he might look a little stronger, but I have an overwhelming advantage when it comes to cuteness and fluffiness."

As Emilia tried to stop him, Puck deliberately put on a carefree expression and raised his hands to encourage her.

However, Emilia who was a spirit arts user understood. All over Puck's behavior, and in the corners of his smiling face, there were signs of exhaustion that he couldn't conceal.

It seemed that something had happened before he got here, he had already used up a considerable amount of his power. That definitely couldn't be ignored considering his opponent was Melakuera, an opponent at the same level as him.

"Bluff Futile. Your resistance is pointless. Your, Reserve, Enormous Expenditure—"

And this fact was clear to Melakuera as well.

Despite this, Puck continued to face the centaur as he proudly threw his chest out.

"Saying that sort of thing, considering how I just took out a part of you that you put quite a bit of effort into, it seems to me that you're actually scared on the inside, isn't that right?"

"Cowardice Nonexistent. Imprudent, Shallow, I'm disappointed, you damned cat!"

"Be disappointed all you want. —You can go ahead and turn into shaved ice while you look down on me!"

Ending their conversation, the one who acted first was Puck who overlapped his paws. An all-freezing light emerged from his linked paws, gushing out straight towards Melakuera.

Melakuera countered the instantly approaching light with a flame bullet. The white light and crimson flame collided, and the space between absolute hot and absolute cold was ripped apart.

"—!"

The resulting explosion of wind ran amok like a typhoon, and Emilia desperately clung to ground on the verge of being blown away. As this happened, the cat and the flaming horse flew through the wind and clashed mid-air.

"How about you become an ice sculpture too, and get polished by that girl every morning?"

“Firm, there’s absolutely no way—”

His joking provocation was taken seriously and angrily rejected.

Forming white light in the shape of a sword, Puck used it to attack the flaming horse. The light grazed Melakuera and slashed the world diagonally, and in an instant the sky, the ground, the forest, everything in the light’s path froze.

Puck then spun his body, swinging the sword of light all over the place as he spun like a top. His body was well suited to this high speed rotation, and the tornado of light turned into an onslaught of countless attacks relentlessly pursuing Melakuera.

However, Melakuera wasn’t just going to sit there and take it. As the centaur dodged this extraordinary sword dance, it underwent a bizarre transformation, changing into a mass of flame.

“Rushing to finish it, Reserve Nonexistent! Proof! You’re going to lose and die!”

Having changed into swirling hellfire, Melakuera’s power and the hostility of the man it fused with roared.

The swelling crimson flame struggled against Puck’s sword of light, ultimately burning away the freezing sword with its extreme firepower, and the freezing waves were at once overwhelmed by the scorching heat.

“Puck—!”

Emilia screamed in despair at this scene that proved the man’s, Melakuera’s declaration of victory.

At this rate, the cat’s small body would be swallowed up by the flaming horse’s raging fire—

“A cornered rat bites the cat—I’m a cat, though.”

“What, What—!”

Puck was engulfed by the flames, and immediately after Emilia screamed, Melakuera who was supposed to have the advantage suddenly had his torso swell from the inside. His torso formed from flames swelled to the point of bursting, and finally flowers of ice bloomed from it as if ripping through the flame.

Puck had slipped into the flaming horse's body, and created a beautiful explosion of powerful magic from within.

"And this is what you call roasting the flesh and crushing the Od."

"Imposs, ible… That Phrase, I, Unknown—"

"I just thought of it as I said it, you see."

As the astonished flame ruptured, Puck who was still in good health inside it was holding a red light.

A light that could be held by Puck who was small enough to fit in a palm—That was the core of a spirit, the Od. To a spirit it was the source of their life, and when exposed it was also a fatal weak point.

If their defenseless Od were to be crushed, any spirit would die. Even Melakuera.

"Any last words?"

Puck who quite literally had victory in his hands asked this as if offering his final sympathies. With its Od stolen by Puck, the mass of flame that was losing its form started blazing especially bright—

"This, can't… I, with the spirit's power, get my revenge on that girl…"

"You were just used as a Yorishiro, but I don't really pity you in the slightest."

"Don't sc…! I, Arbiter Melakuera. Mission, Carry Out. World, Protect Balance, Deterrence—"

"I see. Those were both lackluster farewells, but I'll be sure to engrave them on your tombstones."

Intense hatred and unshakeable tenacity, Puck carelessly tilted his head at these two extremes. He then used his magic to mercilessly freeze Melakuera's Od, crushing it completely.

Like a fruit being crushed, Melakuera's Od scattered into red particles disappointingly easily. At the same time the flames drifting through the air also turned pale, and were blown away unable to even resist the wind.

There was nothing left. Not of the mighty Great Spirit, nor of the pathetic man it used.

"…"

Puck slowly descended to Emilia who was unable to believe what had just happened. With his tail swaying in the wind, the cat looked at her battered state with sad eyes.

The emotions filling his round eyes caused dread to well up in Emilia, making her grab her shoulders. Reminded of Melakuera's outrageous accusations, she tightly embraced her slender body.

Melakuera had declared this: The reason Emilia was ostracized by everyone, was because she was a half-devil, a witch.

There were many people who had called her a witch thus far. The people in that village nearby, the scoundrels who came to commit evil in the forest, the bearden man who was obsessed with her, and finally the Great Spirit Melakuera—

Every single one of them, they were not looking at Emilia, they looked past her at the Witch as they said those words.

And that was probably—

"Emilia, let's rest a bit first. You probably can't think straight right now no matter how hard you try."

"…"

Puck's gentle, considerate voice made her afraid. She couldn't look him in the eye. She didn't want to find out what emotions were reflected in his eyes.

She wanted to believe. Emilia wanted to believe in Puck. However, if even Puck was looking past her at someone else, what would she do?

"…Emilia."

As Emilia shook her head in refusal, Puck called her name in a lonesome voice.

She couldn't raise her head. The threat of Melakuera had passed, the great black liquid was gone too, the forest was supposed to be free of danger now, but she now felt far more isolated than ever before.

"Puck, did you know…?"

With her head still lowered, without showing her face, Emilia asked this of the spirit who was always by her side.

Emilia's bloodline that she herself was unaware of. Puck knew more than her about the world, the forest, and maybe even Emilia herself, perhaps he knew about it.

"That I'm a half-devil… That I'm different from everyone else."

"Emilia, there's no such thing as a half-devil. Don't say that sort of thing."

"…"

"It's true that you're different from the forest's elves. You're a half-elf. That's the truth."

"…"

Her breath caught, and she clutched her chest despite her heart's pounding.

He knew. Puck knew about her origin after all. He knew, and kept it secret until now, never telling her it was something bad.

“Why didn’t you tell me?! That I have evil, evil… Blood? Was it blood? If I knew I was descended from that sort of blood, this…!”

“—That’s wrong! That shouldn’t be something that hurts you!”

“No…!”

As Emilia dug her nails into her shoulders, Puck’s voice turned desperate for the first time as he yelled this.

Puck’s grim voice was so close she could touch him, causing her to step back instinctively.

Raising her head, she looked at him. He looked terribly hurt by her reaction. Seeing this, Emilia realized that she had committed a sin that she shouldn’t have—

“—a”

—Heat rays closed in from every direction, shooting the floating cat down.

5

Even when burned by heat rays beyond imagination, a spirit’s body would turn black or anything of the sort.

Unless the attack penetrated the defenses of the mana composing their body and harmed their Od, the spirit would appear to be in perfect condition.

However, if their Od were to sustain fatal damage, the spirit’s existence would crumble away like sand.

Just like Melakuera, whose Od was crushed by Puck just moments before.

—And just like Puck, who was currently dissipating into particles of light in Emilia’s palms.

“Brethren, Foolish. Result, Natural—”

“Real Body, Equivalent Part, One Body, Not—”

“Total Seven, Two Forfeit—”

“Arbitration, No Obstacle!—”

“I, Arbiter Melakuera”

Descending from above her were five voices and five flames.

The flames surrounded Emilia, and circled around her as they changed shape. The crimson lights produced four limbs, a torso, and a head sporting a mane, five flaming horses had manifested into the world.

All five of these flaming horses were beings equal to the Great Spirit that had just been defeated—No, not equal beings. One could believe they were the exact same being.

This was nothing special, the principle was simple.

The Great Spirit Melakuera had divided his existence into seven parts, and was controlling each of them individually.

Possessing seven bodies each of which was on par with Puck, he used this overwhelming power to monitor threats to the world, secretly acting as a force to deter any potential causes of calamity.

His unrivaled conviction was backed up by this power, he truly lived up to the title of Great Spirit.

—But this fact currently held no meaning at all to Emilia.

“Puck… Puck…”

She paid no attention at all to the five great spirits surrounding her or the fact that her death was rapidly approaching.

Right now, she was completely focused on the spirit that was fading away in her palm.

“…”

Completely powerless, Puck's fallen body did not stir an inch. The contours of his body were steadily blurring, and it seemed like he could disappear in the blink of an eye. So Emilia couldn't allow herself to blink.

But it was clear that this would have absolutely no effect on Puck's disappearance, she could not delay it in the slightest.

"…Puck…"

Puck gave no response to her call. He did not even react.

Normally, he would spring right up at any moment and say 'Just kidding—'. However, even Emilia understood that that wasn't going to happen now.

Puck was beyond saving. Just like the lesser spirits, he too would die protecting her.

"Brethren. His Death, Meaningless. Brethren, His Death, Regrettable —"

"Why… Did you…"

Puck's feeble warmth, feeling it to the fullest with her fingers, Emilia turned toward Melakuera who was saying something or other. The tears on her cheeks were drying. Her eyes were fully open.

The gaze of those amethyst eyes caused all five flaming horses to intensify their flames.

"It's fine if you hate me."

"Denial. I, Thou, Hatred Nonexistent—"

"It's fine if you loathe me."

"Denial. I, Thou, Loathing Nonexistent—"

"If you were only hurting me, I could take it. But despite that, the lesser spirits, and Puck, like this…!"

“Denial. I, Deed, Hindrance Elimination. Brethren Sacrifice, Thou, Sin—”

“If! My life! Was such a terrible thing!”

Why did she alone awaken from the ice?

Why did she live by herself in the forest?

Why did no one tell her?

Why, if her being alive was such a sin—

“Was I born to bring someone misfortune…?”

Filling others with dread, hurting someone, losing her lesser spirits, and now losing Puck too.

And after giving rise to all this sorrow, Emilia herself would lose her life.

“Affirmative—”

As Emilia trembled, Melakuera powerfully stomped on the ground as he affirmed her despair.

The spirit announced this to the girl stricken by the grief and sorrow brought about by her existence:

“Thou, Involve, Another Misfortune—”

“Thou, Acquaintance, Calamity—”

“Thou, World, Balance Collapse, Threat—”

“Therefore, Thou, Annihilation Necessity—”

“Thou, Existence, Grave Sin—”

The five spirits spoke in turn, calling out the surrounded girl’s crimes.

And finally, the five voices spoke in unison.

"World Consensus, Thou, Death, Crave—!"

Representing the world's desire, the five Melakueras simultaneously delivered their verdict. The voices from all five directions desired her death, this crushed Emilia's heart.

She lowered her eyes, and though her tears had dried, just one drop flowed downward.

And landed on Puck's forehead as lay in her palm, on the verge of disappearing.

"—I'm sorry, Puck."

An apology, not for getting him wrapped up in this, nor for disobeying his instructions, nor for anything that happened in the days until now. This apology was for just one thing.

For being born, for being alive, and for bringing him misfortune, that was what she was apologizing for.

In those words were disappointment in herself, and an empty hopelessness—

"—Don't screw around."

Emilia gasped when she felt the vanishing spirit in her palm move.

In her field of view that was blurred by that single tear, she could see the spirit tremble as it got up. The cat spirit's body was fading away, but its black eyes were filled with intense emotion,

"Don't screw around, Melakuera…!"

With his voice trembling with rage, Puck glared at the Melakuera's surrounding them.

"How many times are you going to make her cry? How many times are you going to hurt her? How much will you make her suffer? How much light will you steal from her…?!"

"Brethren. Thou, Annihilation, Unavoidable—"

“The reason this girl was born! Is not something you get to decide!”

“Puck…”

Her cheeks stiffened, and the tears that should have stopped started flowing again. Emilia desperately tried to keep her trembling out of her palm. She thought that even the slightest interference could make Puck vanish.

“This girl was… Emilia was born with blessings and hope…!”

On her palm, the spirit yelled even on the verge of disappearing.

His mana came loose with each roar, steadily shaving away his body. However, Puck persisted in spite of this, and thrust his tail at Melakuera who maintained his burning coldheartedness.

“This girl will become happy. Happily, happily, happily… Someone’s misfortune or being shunned by someone, there’s absolutely no need for such things to hurt her. This girl was born to be happy. Emilia was born to be happy!”

“Firm Denial. Anybody, That Birth, Desire—”

“I do—!!”

“Ridiculous! Firm Denial, Continuation—!”

Puck struck his chest as he said this, and all five voices responded in unison.

The five overlapping voices spoke the same words denying Emilia’s existence and Puck’s screams.

“That Power, Witch Reincarnation! That Appearance, Witch Reincarnation! That Existence, Witch Reincarnation! Therefore, World, That Existence, Threat! That, History, Spiral! Error, Endless Repetition! Error, Endless Transmigration! I, Endless, World Downfall, Crisis, Experience—!”

“You’re not talking about me! Nor are you talking about this girl, quit spouting off about whoever! No one’s talking about that! Now, look at the girl in front of you and answer me, Melakuera!"

Their turbulent emotions collided, and in response to Melakuera's roars Puck pointed to Emilia.

To the girl who had fallen to her knees sobbing, afraid of Puck's impending doom, wounded by the insistence that no one wanted her alive, plunging into the depths of despair even now.

"She's just a girl in tears. Where the hell is this threat to the world?!"

"That Power, Threat! That Mind, Immature, Threat! Crisis, Oneself, Approach. Uncontrollable, Magic, Easily Released. That State, Threat! Threat! Threat—!!"

"—hiu"

Emilia, weak-hearted as she was, thoughtlessly used the taboo power multiple times.

Because of this, Melakuera had decided that he could not overlook her existence. In order to protect herself, she would use her uncontrollable power, he regarded this mentality as dangerous.

That was an undeniable fact. Emilia could offer no rebuttal. However—

"The Black Serpent's poison at the bottom of the lake, weren't you the one who released it into the forest?! Tricking a weak-hearted person into cooperating with your plan… You trapped Emilia."

Melakuera's accusation enraged Puck even further. The cat examined their surroundings, and correctly deduced what had occurred at the ruined shore.

"You intentionally put her in a dangerous situation, and just waited to see if she would use her power!"

"…"

"And in the end, you brought out the source of the poison and had it fight her, isn't that right. It's true that she used her power when she was in a bind. But the whole thing was just a farce of your creation, wasn't it…!"

"Details, Argument Meaningless! Truth, That Girl, Uncontrollable, Magic, Use—"

"Both of us would have done the same thing! If we were in danger, we would try to do something with our power. Despite that, are you trying to say this girl is the only one not allowed to do that?!"

"Affirmative! That, That Is, Fate—"

"—Fate."

There was absolutely no room for argument, Melakuera firmly declared this, and Puck repeated the last word he spoke.

Fate, to the self-appointed Arbiter Melakuera, this word truly was the be all and end all.

It would not allow anyone to object. Because fate was decided by the world itself.

This magnificence of this word that denied all resistance took Emilia's breath away—

"—We won't lose to something as trivial as fate."

Puck said this with a smile, and Emilia forgot all about having her breath taken away.

"…"

Both Emilia and Melakuera fell silent at Puck's slight smile. Under their gazes, Puck calmly turned around and faced Emilia directly.

The cat on her palm was already disintegrating, and yet he groomed his face like nothing was wrong.

'—Emilia, let's form a contract."

"…"

"Nonsense—!"

His sudden proposal rendered Emilia speechless, and Melakuera loudly expressed his rage in her place.

But Puck waved his tail at the raging flame spirit,

"Be quiet, Melakuera. This is the sacred dialogue between spirit and contractor. Someone as obsessed with the rules as you shouldn't be able to interfere."

"…"

Perhaps his statement was right on the mark, Melakuera chose to remain silent in response. There was no longer anyone getting between Puck and Emilia. There wasn't anyone, but—

"Puck, why…"

"The situation isn't very romantic, sorry about that. But look, I could disappear at any moment, so I'd definitely say there's a certain mood to the situation."

"No, that's not it…"

She shook her head. Puck's current attitude was completely different from what it was when he was facing Melakuera. His voice was gentle and his gaze was warm, and it made her chest hurt.

She understood he was on the verge of vanishing and didn't have much time, but she still hesitated.

"…If that's not it, what are you worried about?"

"I mean, you… Until now, you never once mentioned a contract. So, I…"

It was Puck himself who discovered Emilia's aptitude as a spirit arts user.

And he was also the one who taught her how to form a contract with lesser spirits, and helped her do it. She was thankful for this. However, at the same time it also made her anxious.

He was a whimsical stay spirit who wasn’t contracted with anyone, but even though he was always following Emilia around, he had never once offered to form a contract with her.

“I thought someday, you’d go away somewhere… That’s what I thought, so…”

“—That’s, I guess I didn’t give off the right impression.”

She was afraid that broaching the topic of a contract would mean acknowledging that they might eventually part.

She thought that perhaps Puck was silently expressing his intent by avoiding the topic of a contract.

Because of this, Emilia never once suggested to Puck that they should form a contract, she couldn’t.

“Seriously, you’re so distrustful, like an unfriendly kitten.”

As she revealed her thoughts, Puck scratched his cheek with a somewhat troubled smile. He then floated up to Emilia’s face with a lazy expression.

Separating from her palm, he met her eyes from directly in front her, so close that they could feel each other’s breaths.

“Alright then, I’ll properly convey it in a way you can understand.”

“…Yeah.”

“You’re important to me, so I want to protect you forever.”

The spirit with round black eyes said this and then touched his forehead against that of the girl who possessed big, amethyst eyes.

“—You were born to be happy. So I want to help you achieve that.”

Not vanishing, not embarrassed, and not deceiving, this was pure compassion.

Those words pierced Emilia's heart, erasing the ache from her memories and her guilt.

All she felt now was the warmth of the spirit touching her.

"You won't go anywhere?"

"I won't. I'll always be with you."

"You won't hate me?"

"I don't think you'll find anyone who loves you more than I do."

And as the spirit smiled bashfully, the girl faintly smiled as well—

"Then, please. —Let me believe in you."

"Sure thing."

In response to the girl's smile, the spirit casually struck his chest—

"—Called by you, I am here. If it's for you, I can become anything."

And with that, the contract was sealed—

6

In the very beginning, it all started when a spark emerged from a small campfire.

Back then, it did not yet possess either intelligence or anything that could be called self-awareness. It just remembered that this was its beginning.

On a cold night out in the wilderness, surrounding the campfire it was born from, was a family seeking warmth.

There was nothing about them really worth mentioning, they were a completely average family.

A stern father, a gentle mother, a disciplined elder sister, and a mischievous younger brother. A kind of family you could find anywhere, a scene you could see anywhere.

—They traveled from land to land, living their lives all over the world.

Over the course of their travels, fire was indispensable to them whenever they set up camp. Cold, bandits, unforeseen circumstances, fire would prove useful no matter the situation, it possessed universally useful power.

“Once we’ve chosen where to camp, light the fire. From now on, that is your duty.”

The father passed down the important role of managing the fire to the youngest son.

The young boy would enthusiastically gather withered wood and light a fire whenever they set up camp. And when the campfire was lit, ‘it’ would appear from the flames.

“—A flame, a spark, a friend.”

From the moment the flames gave it life, it forever accompanied this family on their travels. It had no reason. It did not possess the intelligence to think of one. If it had to say, it was simply natural.

Going with the flow, it continued to accompany the family on their long, hard travels.

Extremely cold snowscapes, deserts full of hot sand, huge, rushing rivers, enormous, dense forests, there were far too many to count.

However, no matter what hardships befell them, when he settled down at their campsites and lit their fires, the boy was at peace. The flickering, wavering flame provided the family relief and tranquility.

And ‘it’ was always with them. With the flame, with the family, always.

"—A flame, a spark, a friend."

And then a long, long time passed, years, even decades.

This time that didn't feel particularly long to 'it' was plenty long to humans who had finite lifespans.

He who was a boy when he first gathered around the flame had become a young man, and then the young man became a father, after which the father became a grandfather, and now, he lay at the end of his life.

"—A flame, a spark, a friend."

His once youthful and lively voice had now become hoarse, and his hair had lost its color.

The old man lying on a crude bed repeated these words any number of times as if delirious.

He had already lost sight of reality. That was what his family thought as they each in their own way bid farewell to their grandfather, their father, their husband.

There was only being in the room who understood that his words were not nonsense.

'It' which had accompanied the boy for so long, which had watched over the young man, which had spent its time with the father, and which was now bidding the grandfather farewell from the quietly burning fireplace in the corner of the room.

"—A flame, a spark, a friend."

Those words were a prayer from the boy as he lit a spark on the withering wood and blew on it to make it burn. Even as a young man, a father, a grandfather, he would always say this prayer whenever he lit a fire. This prayer whispered so quietly that no one could hear it was a secret known only to the old man who had once been a boy and 'it' which had accompanied him.

So that it wouldn't lose to the freezing wind, so that it would drive away the savage bandits, so that it would protect them from suffering and misfortune, so that the family could live in happiness —

The old man who had once been a boy was always with the flame, always with ‘it’. So even as he was losing his life, he prayed for his family’s safety.

“—A flame, a spark, a friend.”

To the very end, the old man that had been a boy continued to whisper this prayer.

His family buried his corpse that had lost its soul under the freezing ground. ‘It’ wanted to burn his remains to ashes.

It did not know the reason. At this moment, for the first time, it gained self-awareness.

“—A flame, a spark, a friend.”

A friend, that was what he had called it.

It recalled the prayer of the man who was now buried under the freezing ground, never to move again.

“Friend—”

Until the very end of his life, he continued to pray to it for his family’s safety and wellbeing.

The man who had spent his entire life with the flame—The man who was its one and only friend had entrusted everything to the flame.

It had to protect them. It had to fulfill its friend’s final prayer.

“I, Sole, Friend. That Name, Melakuera. Therefore, My Name, Melakuera—”

“It’ took the name engraved onto his tombstone as its own.

He had accompanied it his entire life, until he finally burned out. Therefore, his name would live on with ‘it’ until ‘it’ burned out.

“I, Melakuera—”

It was still but a lesser spirit far from the status of spirit, however its purpose had already been decided.

It would fulfill its friend’s prayer. It would fulfill Melakuera’s hope, he who had entrusted it with maintaining peace and tranquility.

It would protect the world from all dangers. It would save others from all suffering.

—Its friend’s life was proof that fire was a power that could protect everything.

7

He did not understand why he suddenly remembered his past at this moment.

That was his origin, which Melakuera himself had started to forget. Regardless of the reason, regardless of the details, who Melakuera was right now would not change.

But having uncovered this memory tucked away at the bottom of his mind, Melakuera understood.

He had sworn a vow before the grave of his one and only friend who had prayed to him until the very end.

The man had accompanied him until his life burned out. So in exchange, his name would live on with the Great Spirit Melakuera until he burned out. This was his vow.

Therefore, it was inevitable that he would now remember that day.

The deterrent that protected the world, one of the Four Great Spirits, the Arbiter Melakuera—His end was near.

“This is a complete reversal from before, huh.”

“…”

“To be honest, I’m a little disappointed. Even though you’re missing parts of yourself, I never imagined that I’d be this much stronger than you.”

As Melakuera reminisced about his origin, a voice much more fierce than its tone would suggest pierced him. When the flaming horse lowered itself, it met a towering beast’s eyes right before it.

—Calmly standing there was a feline beast more than twenty meters long.

With gray fur and a mane like a lion. The tips of all four limbs were as sharp as talons, and its formerly round, black eyes now glowed gold. Even its countenance that would have been considered cute by human standards had now changed into that of a carnivore craving flesh and blood.

There wasn’t even a trace of its former appearance. The form of a fellow spirit that had released his his true power—

“Four Greats, Outsider. Beast Of The End—”

“I can’t say I’m very fond of that old-fashioned name. Furthermore…”

The great beast grimaced at Melakuera’s murmur, and then swung its paw sideways. In an instant, one of the flaming horses charging from the right took a direct hit, and its flaming body was easily ripped away. In other words, its Od had been exposed—

“For one of the Four Greats, you’re not putting up much of a fight.”

Ensnaring it with its claws, his fellow spirit ripped the Od apart with no hesitation. That was all it took for the part of himself that had been ripped open to lose its core and for the flames to then disappear with a noise.

Every single one of his parts fell before the Beast of The End, and what was left was—

"You're the only one left."

"Affirmative, I, Melakuera. Last, Individual—"

"Perhaps you're just saying that when in truth you've got reserves hiding elsewhere? You're pretty cunning, so I can't really believe you just like that."

"Investigation, Caution, Thy Liberty—"

"'Go ahead and doubt me all you want', huh. Well, I'll believe you. —No matter what tricks you get up to, you wouldn't lie."

His fellow spirit that had transformed its appearance only resembled its small self in terms of gestures as it closed one eye.

Saying nothing in response to his fellow spirit's carefree attitude, the final Melakuera raised his head. He was looking up at the slender girl clinging to the gray fur on the giant beast's back.

"…"

The girl tightly holding on to his fellow spirit did not avert her eyes from him. There were no tears in her eyes, there was only calm determination as her cheeks stiffened.

Silver hair, amethyst eyes, and devilish beauty that captured the hearts of those who looked upon her—Regardless of what she herself thought, they would probably continue to cast a shadow on her fate.

Melakuera did not regret telling her that her existence itself was a sin.

However, he did regret that he could not stop this sin from continuing to torment her.

"Brethren. Thou, Cruel. That Girl, Alienation, Hatred, Fear, Inevitable—"

"That might be the case. Certainly, just as you say this world does have too many troublesome rules and restrictions that would make it just a little hard for her to proudly be out and about."

"Agreement. Doubt Recurrence. Why, Thou, That Girl, Cruelty Inevitable, World, Push To—"

"That's because I believe."

A gentle and tender tone, this statement didn't really fit his current beastly appearance, but Melakuera waited for his fellow spirit to continue.

Belief. Like Melakuera had believed in the power of flame in order to fulfill his friend's prayer.

Why did his fellow spirit that was worthy of the title 'The Beast of The End' believe in the half-devil girl on his back? What did he see in her?

"I believe that this girl can strive for happiness no matter what kind of world she's facing."

"…"

"I believe she's that kind of girl, so I want to help her achieve that. It is for this reason, Melakuera, that your line of thinking was inaccurate. Although I've been telling you this from the start."

He had no basis, he believed just because he wanted to believe, as he spoke these extremely spirit-like words, Melakuera's fellow spirit brought his head down to Melakuera who had fallen silent and wrinkled his face as he smiled.

"This girl will not become the Witch. —Your worries are nothing more than pointless anxiety."

With this clear declaration, it seemed his fellow spirit had no intention of saying anything further. The flaming horse remained silent for a while in response to his fellow spirit's attitude, and then once again directed his burning yellow eyes toward the girl.

His impression of the girl stiffening at his gaze had not changed one bit.

"Thou, Half-Devil. Thou, Witch, Descendant. Thou, World, Balance Collapse, Threat—"

"…"

"Thou, That Doubt, Denial Possible—?"

That she was a half-devil, that she was similar to the Witch, that she possessed a power that could destroy the world, not one of these things would change.

He just wondered how the girl and his fellow spirit would overcome these.

"Just as you said, it seems I'm a half-elf."

"…"

"Different from everyone else in the forest, with hair and eyes resembling those of the Witch, and furthermore with a reeeally huge power sleeping in my body, I understand that you think that make me dangerous."

"…"

"I'm a weakling and a coward, so if I were alone something like this would definitely happen again. That's reeeally scary… However, Puck will be with me."

The girl strung her words together with difficulty, expressing her opinion in such a way that it would be easily understood.

She possessed silver hair and amethyst eyes, the same characteristics as the Witch, but she continued with this,

"I won't become a witch like you're worried about. I'm Emilia. A half-elf born and living in this forest."

She who possessed silver hair and amethyst eyes, the same characteristics as the Witch, declared that she was not the same as the Witch.

Consequently—

“Understood Completely—”

Accepting her gaze and resolve, Melakuera gave his answer after which his burning hooves bored into the ground.

Waves of heat spread with the tremors, and his fellow spirit and the girl both widened their eyes when they saw him once again create a sea of flames. With a sidelong glance at their reactions, Melakuera’s flames became even more powerful, and expanded.

His body became a roaring blaze, and the crimson horse of flame reached a size rivaling that of the Beast of The End. The Great Spirit of Fire and the Great Spirit of Ice confronted each other head-on.

“Thou, Appeal, Contents Understood. Thou, Survival, Resolve Understood. However, I, Arbiter Melakuera—”

His fellow spirit’s appeal and the girl’s resolve had both reached him. However, Melakuera’s several centuries weren’t so shallow as to be swayed by this. Melakuera too had his resolve as the protector of the world.

“I, Execute Arbitration! I, Carry Out Judgement! Thou, I, Everything, Show—!”

“…”

“Brethren, Nay. Thou, Puck. Half-Devil, Nay. Thou, Emilia—”

He called their respective names for the first time, and his fellow spirit and the girl—Puck and Emilia prepared themselves.

Lowering his body, Puck gripped the ground with his four limbs and Emilia tightly held on to him.

“Emilia.”

“What is it?”

“Once this battle is over, can I call you Lia?”

“…You dummy.”

With this exchange, countless bluish white lights started dancing around the fierce beast. His overflowing mana turned into waves of absolute zero and clashed with the waves of heat formed by Melakuera’s mana.

Fire and Ice, Crimson and White, Melakuera and Puck, the battle of two extremes would finally reach its conclusion.

“I, Arbiter Melakuera—”

“My name is Puck. Remember that name in the afterlife.”

The two great spirits exchanged introductions, and in the end his attention turned towards Emilia who did the same.

“I’m Emilia, just Emilia. —I was born with that name, and will live with it until I die. I’ll be sure to remember you too.”

She declared resolutely, and in an instant the flaming horse and massive beast unleashed their power—

—In the end, the lake in the northern region of Elior Forest was utterly annihilated with not a trace left.

8

The evening sun descended on Elior Forest’s sky, and the snow-white forest was dyed orange.

The forest was always covered by thick clouds and snowfall persisted throughout the year. The very fact that they were able to look up at the sky’s evening glow could be said to be a catastrophe on par with a cataclysm.

But that sort of emotionless analysis wasn’t necessary right now. Just a few words, this would be nice.

“—What a beautiful sky.”

Falling to her knees on the snow, gazing at the sky and forest illuminated by the evening glow—The scene of the entire surface being dyed orange, Emilia seemed enraptured as she murmured this.

“It is quite the view, isn’t it. Guess Melakuera did something decent in the end.”

Saying this with a smile was Puck, who was by Emilia’s side gazing at the same scenery.

The spirit curled up his body that was more than twenty meters in size, and his fierce features somehow seemed to retain his usual charm. Even though his appearance had changed, his behavior was still the same as that of that cavalier little cat.

Finding it just a little bit funny, Emilia ended up smiling.

“Ah, you’re finally smiling, Emilia. Yep, even that idiot managed to do something good in the end.”

[T/N: Idiot contains the character for horse]

“Puck, you’re going waaaaay too far.”

Emilia cautioned Puck who said this when he saw her smile.

Needless to say, Emilia herself did not hold a very favorable impression of the flame spirit, but—

“Melakuera, wasn’t he an old friend of yours?”

“Just an old acquaintance. I don’t really have very many friends, you see. Because cats are solitary creatures. Nyaon.”

“Puck, you dummy…”

Her strength suddenly left her when Puck mimicked a cat’s meow with that huge body of his. With a powerless posture, Emilia directed her gaze forward—Toward the peak of a hill from which one could see the entire forest.

There, dyed vermillion by the evening sun’s light, was a grave that was little more than a pile of rocks. The name of the flame spirit was engraved on it, but there was nothing buried there. It was a grave in name only.

Making such a thing might not have been any consolation to the Great Spirit. But for some reason, Emilia felt that she had to do it.

“I wanted to make him a more proper grave, but…”

“It’s a fine parting gift. You can think of this evening sky as a thank you.”

As Emilia stared at the grave, Puck responded while grooming his tail. His words caused Emilia to look up at the evening sun once more and let out a sigh of admiration.

The beautiful evening sky, a miraculous scenery that Melakuera had unintentionally created.

Puck seemed dissatisfied that it was because of Melakuera, but the details didn’t matter when it came to the deep emotions it produced. Come to think of it, this was Emilia’s first time seeing such a clear sky.

“This sunset too is something you couldn’t have seen if you died. The world still has a whole lot more that can make you happy.”

“…Yeah. I suppose so.”

“—Emilia?”

Emilia shook her head, “That’s not it.” In response to Puck’s puzzled voice.

She found it difficult to properly express these feelings in words. Emilia just needed some time to choose her words, and Puck affectionately looked over her without rushing her.

Right now, she was somewhat embarrassed to be gazed upon by those golden eyes full of consideration.

“…”

Her relationship with Puck had changed dramatically since they were now contracted to one another.

Until now, his whimsical, frivolous, flippant, aloof attitude had made her anxious countless times.

Unable to grasp his true feelings, not knowing if maybe he'd go away someday.

That was—

"Hmhmhmhmhmm"

When she cast a fleeting glance his way, she found him humming in a good mood. Not even knowing how she felt, like he was enjoying her confusion.

—Having formed a contract with him, they were now deeply connected, and through this connection she felt these emotions flow into her.

Within this colossal wave of emotions flowing into her, she felt a deep affection that made it hard to pull oneself away, and it made her so emotional she almost felt dizzy.

To think that he felt this way about her all along, she was so upset she wanted to kick herself for not realizing sooner.

Her ears and cheeks felt like they were burning. Her face was definitely red. She thought she could hide it from Puck by pretending it was from the evening light, but.

"Eh, Emilia, your face is turning red. Are you okay? Maybe it's a fever from the exhaustion?"

"Th-That's not the case. You're probably just seeing things. Because you became so big."

She completely failed to hide it, and spoke rapidly as she tried to evade his question. Puck grumbled, "Ehh, is that it I wonder—", but she immediately cleared her throat and changed the subject.

Hiding her shame and embarrassment, she asked something she needed to ask.

“Hey, Puck. Why did you form a contract with me?”

“Maybe I shouldn’t have?”

“That’s not it! That’s not it at all. It’s just, until now, even though you were jealous of those lesser spirits, you still…”

Puck had adamantly avoided the topic of forming a contract with her. What changed to make him choose to form one despite that?

“…You’re only sharp at times like this, and you just won’t give up until you get an answer, huh.”

In response to her sincere gaze, Puck muttered this with the nuance of a wry smile. He then directed a distant look at the evening sky,

“The reason I never spoke of forming a contract with you was because I made a vow. I can’t tell you who to, but the vow basically restricted me from entering a relationship of spirit and spirit user with you.”

“Vow…? That you wouldn’t form a contract with me? But, Puck…”

“It was a really important vow, you know? But compared to losing you… The choice was obvious.”

Puck spoke as if it was of no concern, but the weight of this made Emilia fall silent. To a spirit, a vow was of utmost importance. They had to keep their vows even at the cost of their life. When she formed her contract with the lesser spirits, it was Puck himself who taught her that.

“Doing something like that, are you okay…?”

“Hmm, to be honest I don’t really know what’s supposed to happen. I imagine there’ll probably be a lot of fallout. Ah, I’m not talking about my fur.”

“Don’t joke around at a time like this! You don’t even know what’s going to happen, and yet…”

“But it’s fine. You don’t need to worry, Emilia.”

In contrast to Emilia who was panicking at the seriousness of the matter, Puck’s laid-back attitude showed no signs of crumbling. His attitude made her anxious, but Puck continued.

“Even if something happens, we’re already connected. No matter what happens from now on, we’ll be together. So you have nothing to worry about.”

“…”

Puck’s manner of speaking was so cheerful it was as if he truly felt no unease or worry.

Because of this, Emilia restlessly looked around any number of times, and finally gave in to exhaustion.

“It’ll be okay because we’ll be together, you don’t even have any basis for saying that… You’re really not worried?”

“Not really? I mean, I’m satisfied as long as I get to be with you. So I don’t really care about any of the other stuff.”

“M— The way you talk is so unfair…”

He’d talked away her unease and anger. After all, he had something so joyful. That he wanted to be with her, surely Puck had said something like that before—

“—a”

She let out a frail, strained breath.

Puck’s affection was slowly opening the lid to her memories, and the contents were pouring out.

Her dim, blurry memories connected, and were revived in that moment.

"…"

"Whoops, that was dangerous."

Puck supported Emilia's body with his paw when her sudden dizziness made her stumble. But the paw he had extended was the paw of a terrible beast. It was somewhat risky even though he skillfully caught her with his pads without letting his claws touch her.

"Aah, that was close. I got careless because I haven't used this form in a long time. Sorry about that."

"—Sorry."

"Yeah, sorry. I'm sorry."

"…Puck, you were apologizing to me back then too."

Still leaning on his paw, Emilia looked into the giant cat's eyes that were right beside her as she said this.

Her words caused Puck's eyes to widen, after which his pupils contracted as if he realized something. And then the spirit that had turned from a small cat into a big one awkwardly averted his eyes.

"…You didn't really have to remember that."

"That's wrong… That's not how it was."

Every night, she would see that dream. Every morning, she would wake from that dream. The answer to that dream made Emilia bite her lip. She grabbed the spirit who was still holding her, clinging to his fur as if to keep him from running away.

"Puck, back then… I, I…"

"Emilia, back then, you'd just woken up so you were in a serious panic. So no matter what you said it wouldn't be weird, and I wouldn't have minded no matter what you said to me. Also…"

As Emilia's voice turned tearful, Puck gently, calmly spoke to her as if handling something terribly delicate. He then paused for a moment, and continued.

“I was happy. That you needed me.”

“…”

“I can say this now, but although you were in that state back then, I was in quite the state myself. After all, in my hundreds of years of life… That was my first big moment. Makes me nervous.”

“Nervous…? You feel that too, Puck…?”

“What do you think I am? Maybe I look like some superhuman with a body and heart of steel, but the truth is that at heart I’m just a little cat as sensitive as my paws, you know?”

Puck bounced Emilia with his paw as he said this. But now Emilia understood that even such pranks were just to hide his embarrassment.

“Searching for you, I finally found you, and you woke up… You probably experienced many things for the first time back then, but that was my first time too.”

“Your first time, for what?”

“The first time I felt happy, the first time I was glad to be alive.”

Puck said this with a smile, causing Emilia’s eyes to widen. And then the spirit reflected in those wide, amethyst eyes donned an unusually serious expression.

“Thank you, Emilia. For making me happy. By waking up and by spending all this time with me in the forest, you made me so happy.”

“Puck…”

“Those feelings were really hard to express in words… So I wanted to show them every day through my actions, but it seems I was too vague.”

When Puck hung his head as if regretful, Emilia shook her head vigorously.

He would always come to see her every morning, exchange some trivial chitchat, and always act like he was having fun, because of which she couldn't understand what he was really feeling, but it was no big deal after all.

Every single day, it wasn't as if he was acting like he was having fun. He truly was enjoying himself.

"—Me too, there's something I could never tell you, Puck."

"Hm?"

Puck had honestly, truly honestly told her what he really felt, so Emilia felt like she had to reveal her true feelings as well. Her embarrassing true feelings.

She always wondered if he would laugh at her if she told him, so she could never say it.

"I love you, Puck… You're like a father."

"Pf"

"Wh-Why are you laughing?! I gathered all of my courage and endured the embarrassment to say that."

He really did laugh at her when she came out and said it, her face turned red as she separated from his paw. When she did so, Puck apologized while still laughing uncontrollably,

"Th-That's not it, Emilia. I'm not laughing at you or anything."

"M— then, why are you laughing?"

"…You said you could never say it, but you already told me that at the very beginning."

"Eh…"

Puck’s face was still wrinkled with laughter as he said this, astonishing Emilia. Though her memories seemed to have returned, she had no recollection of any such conversation.

“Don’t tell me you’re just making stuff up because I can’t remember.”

“You’re saying something absurd again, my daughter.”

“…You’re already treating me like a daughter.”

“You remembered… Isn’t what happened, but it looks like you felt the same way. I was actually holding back my affection too.”

When Puck winked at her, Emilia averted her eyes in embarrassment.

The same conversation back then, ahead of the memory in her dream—Her consciousness suddenly flickered, and the events of that day were revived in her mind.

Back then, in the scene her young self saw, there was a cat spirit hanging his head—

“Why are you apologizing…?”

“…”

“Why are you crying…?”

“—Because I left you alone.”

“You left me alone?”

“—Because I could never find you.”

“But you’re right here?”

She held out her hand and shook her head, telling him he didn’t do anything wrong.

“Your name is?”

“My name is…”

Her dream would always end at this point. But today, today was different.

What happened next, what they talked about, what they promised, she remembered all of it.

“—I’m Puck. Until now, and from now onwards, a spirit just for you.”

“Spirit…?”

“When you’re afraid, when you’re sad, I’ll protect you. When you’re having fun, when you’re happy, I’ll celebrate with you. —That is, if you’ll allow it.”

He would always be with her, he would always be kind to her, and he would allow her to rely on him. Even Emilia who knew nothing knew what kind of person that was.

She didn’t remember, she didn’t know, but she always wanted to meet him.

“—Father.”

“Eh?”

“That’s a father, right?”

“…”

Pondering for a moment, the cat spirit nodded as if confirming it.

“I’ll stay by your side and protect you. Your family, I suppose that’s right.”

“…”

“Then, from this day onward I’ll be your father. You can depend on me, Emilia.”

She remembered how she always depended on the spirit who said this to her.

“…”

“Emilia?”

Emilia blinked several times when her consciousness returned to reality, causing Puck to call out to her.

The synergy between the voice and her memories made her face turn completely red. It was to the point that she couldn’t even blame the evening light, not just her face but even her neck had turned crimson.

“E-Emilia? Are you alright?”

“…Not Emilia.”

With her face red and her cheeks warm, Emilia pouted as she said this. When she saw Puck’s eyes widen, she stared at him while turned to the side as she repeated herself.

“Puck, you said you’d call me something else.”

“…Yeah, I did say that. Is that alright?”

‘That’s, you know, it’s obvious. I mean, you formed a contract with me, so we have to be more, you know, affectionate. Also, I just remembered our first meeting, and you… So, um.”

“Calm down, you don’t need to be so flustered. —Lia.”

His voice was kind and his gaze was gentle, just like the memory she just remembered.

So Emilia donned a gentle smile.

“—Yeah. Understood, Puck.”

And with the evening glow behind her, she nodded. The girl and the spirit then affectionately cuddled up to one another and happily watched the sun go down.

—As they felt closer to each other than ever before, the two once again became family.

Epilogue: The Meaning of Happiness

1

The signs of dawn breaking made Emilia wake up, after which she sat up in her bed.

“Cold…”

Murmuring this with a drowsy look, she pulled her sheets toward herself. She drew her knees closer and placed her chin on the sheets she’d pulled, whiling away her time while in a half-conscious state.

She wasn’t falling asleep again. She was already awake. Her mind and body just hadn’t caught up yet.

So it was still okay, time slowly continued to pass by while she idly —

“—Lia. Get a hold of yourself, or you won’t have time for your daily routine.”

As she nodded off, a voice suddenly slipped into her ears. But this didn’t surprise Emilia in the slightest. She just grimaced,

“…Just a little longer.”

“That little longer is no good, I’m afraid. Come on, get up already.”

“Noisy…”

“Ehh—”

When Emilia buried her face deeper in her bedding, Puck made an elongated sound in a dissatisfied tone. But the gray coated cat soon regained his composure and landed on her shoulder. And then, while she kept her face lowered, he pulled hard on her ear.

“Hey, wake up, wake up. Wake up, wash your face, and brush your teeth. Once you’re done with that, move on to your hair… A braid would look nice today. Pretty please.”

“Braid… You do it.”

“Alright—”

Emilia left her hair to Puck who was hurrying her, and rubbed her eyes as she left the bed. Fixing her sleepwear that was sliding down her shoulder, she seemed somewhat annoyed as she stepped into the chilly morning air.

The scenery of the garden, which she could look over from the huge tree she was living in, hadn’t changed a bit over these past several years.

At the spot where she dried her laundry, she had constructed a simple storeroom that had her daily essentials crammed into it. The stream in which she washed her face and bathed was close by, and at its shore was a memorial she had built from obsidian.

“Good morning, everyone… Looks like we’ve got good weather today as well.”

Emilia made sure to greet this memorial with no inscription on it every single morning. This memorial was an offering to the lesser spirits she had once bonded with, who she suddenly lost. Her contract with them was severed one-sidedly. But still, she had to keep her promise. This was her sincerity towards the nameless memorial.

“Woah, cold…”

Splashing it with water from the stream, she cleaned the memorial. She then washed her face, getting rid of any remaining traces of drowsiness. She rinsed her mouth as well, and with this she had done everything she was instructed to.

“Alright, braiding complete. Hmm, you’re super cute today too.”

“Right, right.”

Puck had been working hard on her shoulder while she was busy cleaning the memorial and washing her face, he puffed his chest out with pride. When she cast a sidelong glance at Puck who wiped his forehead with an expression that looked like he had done something incredible, her braided silver hair entered her field of view.

“Wanna have a look in a mirror?”

“No, that’s fine. There’s nothing to worry about since you did it for me.”

Shaking her head at his proposal, Emilia who had been toying with her braided hair let go of it.

It wasn’t just limited to her hair, Puck knew more about Emilia than Emilia herself did. She didn’t think anything weird would happen if she just left it to him. To begin with, Emilia didn’t really know much about fashion.

Furthermore, Emilia still lacked the courage to step in front of a mirror.

“It’s so adorable too, how unfortunate.”

Puck crossed his short arms and sulked, causing Emilia to force a faint smile as she separated from the stream and headed back home.

Puck would fuss over her and compliment her appearance like this, but Emilia knew her appearance was one that inspired dread in others. She took Puck’s flattery with a grain of salt.

Having returned home from the stream, she approached her change of clothes placed on the bed. Picking out her clothes was also Puck’s job.

Emilia cheerfully shed her sleepwear, baring her body with no hesitation.

“How immodest.”

“You’re the only one around here, and you’ve got your back turned to me.”

“I keep telling you that that’s not the problem, I guess you just won’t learn no matter how many years pass.”

“I think you’re reeeeally stubborn, to keep repeating something I haven’t listened to for so many years.”

Her clothing today was worn like a coat, so there was no risk of it ruining her braided hair. She had a reliable family member called Puck who wouldn’t overlook such things.

Puck prepared her towel while she changed, and Emilia took her shoes out of a shelf.

“Those shoes, do they feel alright?”

“Yeah, they’re fine. I’m already completely used to making them, like a craftswoman or something.”

“I find it somewhat sad that you’ve ended up making your own shoes instead of finding some place to buy them, but since it seems you want to be praised I’ll go ahead and praise you all you want. That’s really great, Lia.”

“Ufufu, you just can’t be straightforward.”

Emilia had made her shoes by hand using tanned leather and plant tendrils. She tapped the tips against the ground to fit them against her feet, and then took the towel Puck offered her as she once again set out into the garden.

Her daily routine of running around to clean up her sleeping companions who had become ice sculptures had not changed. But she started a little later than she did before. This was because of how bad she was at waking up properly—Not really, the reason was much simpler.

It was because there was no longer anything she had to do after she finished cleaning them.

“But even so, you’ve gotten pretty lazy now that you’ve finished that map of yours."

"Hey, I reeeeally resent that. Right now. I'm just taking a break after a job well done."

"Sure is a long break, though."

Puck rode on her shoulder with an exasperated expression. Just as he said, Emilia's daily grind to finish her map of Elior Forest was now complete, and she was now out of a job.

The final rewrite of the map was the twenty first edition, and it was presently put up on her room's wall. Unfortunately, her original goal of using the map so she could talk to more people had not been fulfilled.

"But what's important is that I did it. This sense of accomplishment is a treasure in itself… Isn't that right, Puck?"

"Yeah, let's just go ahead and leave it at that, Lia."

Emilia too felt relieved when he agreed with her. It was a strangely roundabout way to say it, but Emilia ignored that.

The trick to getting along with Puck was to avoid fussing over the little stuff.

"Ah, right. Isn't the anniversary of Melakuera's death coming up soon?"

She was making her rounds around the garden, clearing the frost off her forty nine companions. Midway, Emilia muttered this as if she suddenly remembered it. The moment she did, Puck grimaced in dissatisfaction.

"There was no need for you to remember that… It's today. But it'd better if you just forgot about it."

"You're being mean again… There may have been a big quarrel at the end, but he was a friend, wasn't he? I'll have to clean his grave properly."

"I have some doubts as to whether you could really call that a quarrel, and to begin with I was never friends with Melakuera. He was just an acquaintance. We met… Well, I don't really remember."

Climbing up Emilia's silver hair, Puck started grooming his face on top of her head. Emilia sighed at this behavior resembling that of a family cat. His secretiveness hadn't changed.

But she got the feeling that he used his forgetfulness as an excuse a lot more frequently than he did before. Maybe that was related to him breaking his vow to form a contract with Emilia—

"Lia? You'll end up walking into a tree if you space out like that, are you okay?"

"Ah, yeah, I'm fine. I was just thinking for a bit… Right, back then, you became reeeeeally big. I thought for sure that you couldn't return to normal…"

"Aah, I was seriously perplexed when you sincerely started building a huge cat house. You didn't even have any plans, and you were pretty clumsy so you never did get very far, though."

"I know I'm clumsy, so you really should have told me sooner."

"I was really happy that you wanted to do something for me, so it ended up slipping my mind. And your red face when you got all embarrassed and angry was super cute, so it slipped my mind then as well."

"If there were that many slips, you were just playing a prank on me!"

When Emilia's face turned completely red as she got angry, Puck nodded several times in satisfaction.

During their battle with Melakuera, Puck had formed a contract with Emilia, this restored his Od and allowed him to use her excess mana to return to his true form—Since then, she hadn't once seen that giant, monstrous form bearing golden eyes.

"Because it's not very pretty, you see."

That was what Puck said, but she didn't really understand what that meant. However, Emilia also thought that this small form was more Puck-like than the big one, so she didn't complain. It was cute.

"Gosh, just come here already, Puck. I'm mad, so let me touch your ears and tummy."

"You don't really have to come up with that sort of excuse, you can go ahead and touch me whenever you want."

"It's not like I want to touch you, this is your punishment. I'm punishing you for being bad."

She pouted as she hurried him, and Puck descended before her saying, "Right, right" With a blank expression even though he was being punished. He spread his arms out as if telling her to do whatever she wanted, and Emilia reached out to his defenseless body to enjoy his fluffy fur.

His stomach, his ears, and even the base of his neck. A connoisseur like Emilia wouldn't overlook the tip of his tail either.

"Here, take this."

"Nyannyan, so ticklish!"

"Hehe, how was it? You're done? You give up, right?"

"I lost, I lost, I surrender, I surrender. I just can't win against you, huh."

After she toyed with him to her heart's content, she looked upon his wilting, exhausted appearance with satisfaction after which she put him back on her shoulder.

"Good. Now, stay quiet just like that until we get home. And start making preparations once we get back, we'll be visiting Melakuera's grave for the first time in a long while. It might take a while, should we bring lunch?"

"Sure, I do quite like your manly rice balls."

“—? Manly, didn’t that mean something like openly talking about secrets?”

“You remember something from that long ago, huh. To be honest, I’d forgotten.”

She didn’t really understand the connection between secrets and rice balls, but it didn’t seem like Puck had any intention of explaining it so she’d have to think about it on her own. Although she already had many such doubts she never could find the answer to.

Anyway, she had decided what she was going to do once she had finished her daily routine. Once she cleaned off the final one, she went back home while playing with Puck.

Leaping over the stream, ascending the tree’s roots, opening the door to her room—

“—That’s quiiiite the splendid map you have here. I couldn’t help but admire it.”

The instant she entered her room completely devoid of caution, an unfamiliar voice greeted her, causing her to stop.

The voice came from the tall figure standing in the middle of her room with their back to her. The figure with long indigo hair flowing down their back was looking at the map of the forest affixed to her wall.

“It must have taken a great deal of time and effort to create this. Considering the scale of Elior forest and the witchbeasts that dwell within it, it is easy to imagine how haaaaard it must have been.”

“Eh, ah, eh?”

“You possess adequate literacy. The drawings and names are perhaps what one might call creative, but that’s down to individual taste. Now, all that’s left is to look upon the creator… Yes, I see.”

Paying no mind to Emilia’s bewilderment, this person nodded as if confirming something, and finally turned around to face Emilia eye to eye. The sight of their face made Emilia gulp.

Their face was not normal. No, that wasn't quite right. The features themselves were nothing unusual, it was just that their face, well, it was unusual.

"…Makeup?"

"Correct, this is makeup. Howeeeeever, your features haven't been altered in the slightest it would seem."

The man who had painted his face white and his lips purple nodded in response to her question. Taking a good look at him, it wasn't just his makeup, the clothes adorning his body were truly striking as well. That eyesore of a color scheme went well with the makeup on his face, a rather disconcerting combination.

And betraying Emilia's impression of him, the man added this,

"It is truly an honor to be able to meet you. She who dwells in Elior Forest, The Great Witch of Frost."

"—!"

That name was the alias used to refer to her by those who knew she lived in this forest, it had become commonplace in rumors before she knew it.

To be honest, she didn't like it very much. Even now the title of witch was something she struggled with. Therefore—

"I thought I'd be quiet and hear you out, but I see your lack of manners extends well beyond sneaking into my daughter's room."

"Oh deeeear. What have we here, it seems you have a strange pet accompanying you."

Emilia felt uncomfortable, and Puck spoke in her place with a voice and expression full of hostility.

The spirit floated in the air with his arms crossed, keeping the man in check as his eyes widened. In response to Puck's intimidation, the man narrowed his heterochromatic eyes,

“What exactly does your watchdog… No, watchcat, do to visitors lacking in manners?”

“It’s obvious, isn’t it. —This is what I’m going to do!”

Puck joined his paws as he spoke, and in an instant a massive whirlpool of mana surrounded the spirit. He turned it into a shockwave, and the man before him was easily—

“Eh?!”

“If thaaaat’s all you’ve got, I’m more than capable of doing the same.”

While looking at the whirlpool of mana, the man casually snapped his fingers. In an instant, he had produced a whirlpool of mana spinning in the opposite direction of the one Puck had formed, and the two collided—

And then—

“…”

—With a violent explosion of light, Emilia’s home of many years was blown to smithereens.

2

“—I have no intention of antagonizing you. I doooo wish you would believe this.”

“…Could you not say that before you spent half a day fighting?”

“Right, exactly, it’s just as Lia says. You’ll really have to reflect on this.”

“You too, Puck! I kept asking you to stop but you just wouldn’t!”

Covered in soot, Emilia was indignant as she yelled at Puck and the man, neither of whom showed any signs of remorse.

They had strayed quite some distance from her home, and were now in the vicinity of the ‘Zig-zagging Woods’ in the eastern region of Elior Forest. But the area had already changed so drastically that it would be hard to call it that anymore, perhaps she even ought to hurry up and change the name on her map to the ‘Bristly Wasteland’

“But eeeeeven so, this is the first time in a long while that anyone has managed to push me to my limit in a battle of magic. Against my better judgement, I forgot all about stopping and went so far as to use my trump card.”

“That goes for both of us. The last one to make go as far as to use my Star Beast form was one of the Four Greats, Melakuera. It would be no idle boast to say you possess power on par with the Four Greats.”

To make matters worse, the two in question completely ignored Emilia’s anger and were starting to get along. Even though they should have used up all of their willpower and stamina, they showed no signs of this whatsoever.

But in response to Puck’s praise, the man laughed meaningfully, “Hohooo”

“Your clash with one of the Four Greats, perhaps you’re refeeeerrring to ‘The Day The Heavens and The Earth Turned Red’ from seven years ago? Two beings possessing extraordinary mana clashed in this forest, producing a colossal calamity that dyed the forest and the sky red, or so the rumor goes.”

“Seven years! It’s already been that long, huh. Time sure goes by quickly.”

“The events of that day ended up becoming that kind of rumor?”

Emilia and Puck exchanged glances, the rumor the man spoke of was familiar to them.

It was definitely about the day they clashed with Melakuera. On that day, Melakuera’s power scorched the land and cleared the skies, spreading an evening glow. It truly was the day the heavens and the earth turned red.

“The ‘Arbiter’ Melakuera has been absent ever since. It is said that his now empty position among the Four Greats is filled by the being known as the ‘Beast of The End’. Perhaaaaaps this new member rings a bell?”

“Ohh, how scary. I can’t say I know of any spirit that goes by such a terrifying name—”

“Puck, didn’t you just show him your Star Beast transformation…”

With his shoddy attempt to play dumb completely failing to fool anyone, Emilia sighed and the man’s smile deepened as he looked at her. Judging by his attitude, it seemed fairly obvious that he already knew this for a fact from the start.

Then perhaps his objective had something to do with Puck, who was now one of the Four Greats.

“If that’s the case, I’ll be joining the fight too. I can see that you’re a reeeally skilled mage, but even you would be at a disadvantage two on one, isn’t that right?”

“I ceeeertainly cannot deny that. So allow me to speak of something else.”

“Speak of something else…?”

As Emilia grew warier, the man flipped his frayed coat and bowed deeply where he stood.

His gesture was so refined that even Emilia who knew little of etiquette could tell how polished it was.

The suddenness of this caused Emilia’s eyes to widen. The man continued with his head lowered before her,

“I humbly apologize for my sudden visit, and moreover, for being so rude as to test you. I am Roswaal. —Margrave Roswaal L Mathers. I am the current head of the Mathers family which has governed the land containing this forest for generations.”

Still in a state of shock, Emilia pondered the man-Roswaal’s words, and soon became even more shocked. Governing the forest, those words reminded her of something Puck had told her a long time ago.

“Are you perhaps… Here to collect money from us?”

“—Hah?”

“I mean, that’s what Puck said before. That outside the forest, even the roads and the land are people’s possessions, and even things like passing through them or living on them mean you would have to pay money. This is your forest, isn’t it?”

Never mind that she didn’t know, she had done something outrageous.

Emilia lost all hope and felt like she could collapse on the spot.

She only wished to quietly, peacefully wait in this forest until her companions woke up, but to think that she was being a bother just by staying here.

“Could this be the reason for my guilt…”

“That would be terrible. Let’s hope you’re wrong about that.”

Puck didn’t seem to agree with her fears, but Emilia too hoped that she was wrong about this. But even if that wasn’t the case, the fact remained that she had been living on someone else’s land for free.

She took a peek at Roswaal and found that he was watching their exchange with an amused expression.

“Ah, please don’t worry about me. Should it seem that this conversation could run long, let’s seeeee, I would be eeeeever so grateful to receive to a cup of tea.”

“R-Right, of course. A cup of tea… Ah, my home…”

About half a day ago, her home had been annihilated when the battle between Puck and Roswaal began. The scale of the magical battle following this made her forget about it, but considering how long she had spent there it was only natural that it would sadden her even now. Furthermore, she had even left her map in that room.

“You worked so hard to make it too, and now it’s completely gone…”

“Hm, so no tea then. And it would appear that the two of you cannot pay the rent you owe for the time you spent living here, is that correct?”

“u… Yes, um, that appears to be the case.”

Money, the problem was money. Just like before, she was purchasing her daily necessities by taking the shiny stones she dug up to the nearby village and using them to trade, so she didn’t have any money on hand.

“That’s right! How about instead of money, I dig up these pretty rocks…”

“Lia, calm down and think about it. The forest belongs to this… Roswaal, so naturally, everything you could find in the forest would also belong to him. That goes for those pretty rocks too.”

“Then I’m a thief?!”

“And me, I guess I was the real homewrecker.”

She had just lost her home, and now it turned out she was a thief all along, the devastating truths just kept coming to light one after another because of which Emilia just about reached the limit of what her heart could handle. Perhaps feeling some pity at seeing her like this, Roswaal clapped his hands, “Understood.”

“Then, let’s say this shall substitute for all the rent you owed until now…”

“Ah! That’s my map!”

Roswaal pulled a rolled up map out of his breast pocket in an exaggerated manner, surprising Emilia. Roswaal smiled in response as he casually waved the rolled up map.

“In truth, this map is a very precious item. Because of the countless witchbeasts prowling around Elior Forest, there has not been oooooone single person so reckless as to attempt to make a map of the area!”

“Really? It is really dangerous, after all.”

“That’s certainly true, but that’s not the only reason. For instance, the fact that investigation groups are unable to eeeeeenter the forest in the first place. It seems that a barrier surrounding the forest repels those who would attempt to enter, and if one were to force themselves through, they would be attacked by a Hollow appearing out of nowhere.”

“Ehh, I didn’t know about that. I’ve never even met anything like a Hollow.”

“Well, that goes for me too. You see, I too passed through the barrier to get here and I did not encounter any Hollows.”

Emilia’s white cheeks turned pale, in response to which Roswaal nodded as if concerned. Right next to Emilia, Puck’s expression turned sour,

“Hmm, I ended up relying on the barrier too much, I wasn’t cautious enough about the possibility that someone would get past it.”

Although he said such things, Emilia took no notice. Anyhow,

“So, you want to take that map as compensation for all the charges until now?”

“Yes, that is correct. Of course, if you believe this to be unfair we could always discuss…”

“No, that’s fine. Keep it. You’ll probably make much better use of it than I would.”

"…"

Emilia interrupted Roswaal before he could say whatever he was going to, she then transferred ownership of the map to him. This made Roswaal's eyes widen, but Emilia had already turned back to Puck,

"Take a good look, it wasn't useless or anything. Because I made that map, we just barely kept our lives. So it was a good thing after all, wasn't it?"

"Is that right? Hmm, that might be the case. Even I can refute that…"

"Right? Alright, I managed to beat Puck. Who did? I did!"

"I suppose so. You did indeed do that, Lia."

The map's unexpected usefulness made Emilia happy, and she was in high spirits as Puck put on a bittersweet smile with a defeated expression.

And then—

"I see. —This coooould certainly pose a problem."

As he watched the two, Roswaal muttered this in a satisfied manner.

"—? Did you just say something?"

Unable to hear what he had muttered, Emilia turned towards him and tilted her head. But Roswaal did not answer her question, he instead stared at her intently with his yellow eye.

"…"

His gaze somehow felt uncomfortable, like he was observing her, like he was peering into her. As his gaze overwhelmed her, she suddenly realized.

Thinking about it clearly, this was the first time she had been able to converse with someone like it was natural.

She didn't even have her robe on right now, so her silver hair and amethyst eyes were out in the open—

"—Are you not afraid of me?"

This was so unexpected to her that she ended up asking him this upfront. The moment she said it, she started to wonder if she had been too direct, but,

"If I had to say whether or not I'm afraid of you, I'd have to say I'm not."

In response to her question, Roswaal solemnly shook his head. He then continued,

"The reeeeason being that I knew from the very start that a half-elf possessing silver hair and amethyst eyes dwelled in this forest, and it was in order to find this person that I came here."

"—Then, don't tell me, you're like those guys."

When she heard that he had come to this forest specifically seeking her, a half-elf with silver hair and amethyst eyes, the characteristics of the witch, what first came to mind was from a long time ago, when those scoundrels invaded the forest. Those people had brought a caged witchbeast with them, and said they were going to make Emilia and her companions slaves.

"You need not worry. My goals are faaaaar nobler than those of such a bunch."

"You sure like to dance around the subject, huh. Setting Lia aside, I'm not a very patient guy. Because I'm a cat, you see."

"I wooooould rather avoid your ire, I shall get to the point then. But first, Lady Lia… Do you wish to be addressed in this manner?"

Shrugging his shoulders in response to Puck's intimidating words, Roswaal directed his gaze towards Emilia. Receiving his gaze, Emilia realized that this was the first time anyone had ever asked to hear her name.

Come to think of it she never did introduce herself, and Puck only ever used his affectionate nickname to refer to her.

So—

"—No, my name is Emilia. I have no family name. Just call me Emilia."

Introducing herself like so, she seemed to thrust her chest toward Roswaal with pride. And Puck was sitting on her shoulder as she did so, she had nothing to be afraid of right now.

One person and one animal, Roswaal drew in his chin when he saw the spirit arts user and spirit line up side by side. He then took a step backward, and got down on one knee as he respectfully bowed to her.

"Very well, Lady Emilia. Allow me to start over, I am Margrave Roswaal L Mathers. As a noble affiliated with the Kingdom of Lugunica, I have come to visit you on this occasion in order to enlist the aid of your esteemed self."

"…Aid?"

"Yes, that is correct. —Lady Emilia, would you please accept this?"

Roswaal took something out of his pocket and offered it to Emilia who was somewhat troubled by his respectful stance and tone. In his palm was a small object with a red jewel embedded in it. There was a design engraved onto the triangular black object—It seemed to be a dragon. She could tell at a glance that it was of great value.

"…"

Still uncomfortable, Emilia nervously extended her hand towards the object in Roswaal's palm. When her finger touched it, she momentarily withdrew her hand as if scared.

"Lia"

She heard Puck call her name as he gently snuggled up to her cheek, and she gave a slight nod in response.

She then took it from Roswaal's hand—

"—It's beautiful. What is this?"

She instinctively sighed as if entranced.

The jewel she accepted somehow started to shine in her palm. The red jewel glowed brilliantly, illuminating the forest cloaked in nightfall.

"This is proof, Lady Emilia."

"Proof… This proves something? What does it prove?"

"That's right!—It proves that you cannot escape your fate."

Roswaal answered her question as he brushed the dust off his knee and stood up. It was not Emilia, but Puck who was somewhat offended by this answer.

"I can't say I like that word."

"Is that so, that's unfortunate."

"Phrases like fated meeting or fated partner are a different matter, though. Because Lia and I have a super strong relationship, a bond bound by fate itself. Tight, super tight. Right, Lia?"

"Sorry, I don't really understand what you're talking about."

Ignoring Puck who was clinging to her cheek, Emilia turned back to Roswaal.

"Well then, Roswaal, what exactly do you want from me?"

"And once I tell you?"

"I think I want to help you if it's something I can do, but…"

She wasn't sure whether or not she would be able to do whatever it was. Roswaal smiled in response to her attitude.

“Then I must request your cooperation with all my heart. This is something only you can do.”

“Something only I can do.”

“A task only you can fulfill. There will be a reward, of course.”

“You don’t really need to…”

“—The reward is a method to awaken the people frozen in this forest.”

“…”

Emilia was about to turn down any sort of reward, but Roswaal’s words completely drowned that out. Taking notice of this reaction, Roswaal nodded deeply.

“I see your eyes have chaaaaanged.”

“—Could you explain in greater detail? What exactly it is that you want me to do.”

“Of course. Well then, let us sit down and… Oh dear, it would seem your home no longer exists. Weeeeell then, there’s no helping it. There is a dragon carriage waiting for us. Might I ask you to accompany me?”

Roswaal shamelessly said this as he extended his arm to indicate the outside of the forest.

Even Emilia who knew her judgement wasn’t very good understood the reason he waited for them at her home. He was planning to cut off any path of escape from the very start.

“You didn’t need to go that far.”

Even if he hadn’t cornered her like this, Emilia would not falter. If by following him she could free her frozen companions, if she could just find out how to do that.

“—Lia.”

Having received her assent, Roswaal started walking ahead of her. As she followed after him, Puck who was on her shoulder whispered in a voice only she could hear.

Emilia was prepared to hear something like how she should be careful about doing something so dangerous, or how it would be best if she stopped.

However—

“No matter where you go or what you decide to do, I’ll stay by your side.”

“…”

“Because it’s also a father’s duty to accept his daughter’s wishes, you see.”

Touching her cheek as if caressing it, Puck winked at her as she looked at him in surprise. His unchanging attitude and behavior saved her, and she nodded.

“Yeah. I’m counting on you. —So stay with me.”

“Until you no longer want to enter the bath with me, I’ll always be with you.”

“…You dummy.”

Emilia suppressed her laughter as she said this in response to his carefree and facetious tone.

As they had their exchange, Roswaal who was walking ahead of them stopped and looked back at them.

“Sorry, I’ll be right there—”

Saying this, with Puck by her side, Emilia started running—

—What awaited the girl and the spirit beyond the forest?

—That’s a story for another day.

END

The Oni Sisters of the Hidden Village

Prologue:
The Hornless Twins

—There exists a race called “Oni”.

In this world, humans were called the weak race that was the most abundant.

In this world, Demi-humans were called the race that was powerful to make up for the lack of numbers they had in comparison to people.

Onis and Humans looked like two peas in a pod with their appearances, but they were unmistakably true Demi-humans. They had the best body and mental strength for Demi-humans, and they earned the title as the world’s strongest race.

Should an Oni clan’s warrior appear on the battlefield, they’d wipe out thousands of soldiers. They would display powerful, unrivaled, almighty movements, and everyone would have stories to tell about that unmatched strength, their excellent magic techniques, and above all, the fascinating, shining white horns on their forehead.

However, all the activities and glory and such of the Oni clan admired in the legends were all things of the past.

In the present, the Onis had the multitude of their passed down anecdotes completely forgotten, and the race was slowly coming close to extinction.

The Oni clan’s downfall—there were two causes that stood out noticeably above the rest for the impending historical demise.

First of all, there was the fact that the Oni clan was too strong.

For many people, the Oni clan’s power that overwhelmed other races became something to fear and drive out. To put it appropriately, for the people afraid of the return of the “Witch of Envy”, it seemed really close to how the Elves became persecuted. Similarly, it’s said that in ancient times there was also a similar type of rejection towards giants.

Ironically enough, the Oni clan’s unrivaled power people found out about became the cause of other races making them their enemy.

And then there was the second cause, the Oni clan’s reproduction ability. Onis were strong as individuals, but on the other hand, their ability to bear children was remarkably poor, and they couldn’t increase their numbers like other races could.

The Oni clan population decreased rapidly as a result of that and the rejection from other races. They disappeared from the center stage of history, and they had to live in villages in the mountains. And so, even after that, the Oni clan’s numbers continued to decrease slowly—the destruction of the Oni clan’s final village was also now in front of their eyes.

???: “—They’re twins.”

The midwife lifts the bloodstained baby, and she said that as her sweaty cheeks stiffened up.

The hoarse, tired speaking of the old woman makes everyone at that place open their eyes wide all at once. Meanwhile, what resounded throughout the gathering was the first cry of a baby that had just came out of her mother’s womb.

The twins born on this day were new life the Oni clan was looking forward to.

The one who raised her voice and cried very loudly was the younger sister. The older sister had already been picked up and lain on a white, clean cloth. She didn’t cry, but she opened her eyes.

She looks around the assembly hall with her light pink eyes, and lastly she stared at her little sister that was just born.

???: “Twins, they’re twins, meaning that…”

The old woman who continued to hold onto the born twins repeats herself in a hoarse voice to make sure this was the reality.

That voice did not have the color of joy; it had only shock and acute sadness.

And everyone in this place felt the same way as the old woman, no exceptions.

???: “To think that you’d get pregnant with twins on this opportunity…you’ve done something unbelievably foolish, Temae!!”

Temae: “Eep…”

Inside the room ruled by surprise and sorrow, the one person who shook in anger was a gray haired old man. The old but muscular man shouts at the woman out of breath next to the midwife. The women that had just gave birth stiffens her pale face, and she shrieked at that angry voice.

Quark: “Setanta-sama! Temae…my wife has done nothing wrong! My wife…”

Setanta: “Be quiet, Quark! Do you even understand? Are you even aware of just how many expectations we had in you and Temae…if you are, then keep your mouth shut!”

Quark: “Gulp…”

Setanta: “Chika! Hand me the baby!”

The husband, whose wife got shouted at, stood up, but a grey elder silences them in anger. The grey elder goes towards the assembly hall room, and he stretched his arms towards the old woman who was holding onto the baby that was still crying.

Midwife: “Chief, these children are…”

Setanta: “There are no exceptions to the law. No matter what anyone says, that's final."

The grey elder's firm attitude makes the old woman lose her breath, and after that, she looked down at the baby in her chest. She gazes at the light pink eyes of the baby who wouldn't cry, and the old woman holds out that baby to the grey elder

Temae: "Se-Senta-sama…please have mercy…"

"…"

The twins' mother begs for mercy from the grey elder while she sprawled on the futon wet with blood. However, the grey elder ignored those words, and he placed the baby he was given next to the one that was born first.

The newborn twin sisters. The quiet older sister, and the crying younger sister. The grey elder looks towards the younger sister's forehead, and he said,—

Setanta: "One horn…they're cursed children after all."

What protruded from the crying baby's forehead was a bump that was white and the size an adult's pinky.

It was an organ unique to the Oni clan, and also proof that she was an Oni; it was a "Horn". Of course, everyone in this place had a horn. However, everyone had two of them.

Setanta: "The horns were divided and the twins were born lacking a horn. To think that I'd come across cursed children in my generation…"

Temae: "Chief! Can't you…can't you have some mercy? To us, to this village, these are babies we've been waiting for!"

Setanta: "Quit it! There will be no mercy! There are no exceptions to the law, even if that means going into ruins as a result of protecting the law. Bending the law is unforgivable."

The grey elder covered up the twins' father's shouting with a louder angry voice. The crying baby's voice became even louder and stronger, perhaps because of the raise of emotion in their two voices.

The grey elder faces the wall to shake off the baby's crying that filled the whole gathering, and he picked up the long sword that hung. It was a broken edged piece of iron, and it was used for rituals.

Setanta: "Cursed children shall not live. If they're going to live disgraceful lives hornless, then the only way to show sympathy is cutting off that path right now when they've just been born."

Temae: "M-My children…"

Seeing the white older facing the twins with a long sword makes their gasping mother let out a heartbreaking voice. That sound causes pain to run across the grey elder's profile, and when the grey elder blocked her vision with his own back, he said

Setanta: "Cover Temae's eyes and ears. It'll scar her."

He was going to kill that child in front of the mother. The grey elder also knew just how cruel this act was.

The twins' father holds down their exhausted, weak, resisting mother. Nobody went against the decision of the grey elder who was the chief. But, nobody tried to look away from that act.

"…"

The grey elder feels the readiness of those around him, and he raises the gripped sword. The grey elder bites his molars, focusing strength into his eyes, and two white, long horns protruded from his forehead.

Since they were born in the Oni clan village, it would be a death they could be proud of as Onis—.

"…"

The grey elder giving off his Oni spirit like a Rakshasa makes the baby raise her voice, and she cries as the intent to murder pierced her. This was the younger twin's most powerful cry of all. The older twin looks at her with a side glance.

Setanta: "—Forgive me."

The situation burns into the white man's memory at the end, and he faced the twins as he swung the long sword downward. The blow of the sword that held onto two lives went towards the twins' thin heads flawlessly.

However—

Setanta: "Nu—?!"

Wind envelopes the gathering. The grey elder who swung his long sword gets overwhelmed by the impact, and he backed off.

The grey elder steps on his heels with such force that it could have removed the wooden floor, and in response to the incident that happened just before, he opens his eyes wide. The old white man clearly saw what happened.

Setanta: "Was that…"

There was a white light being produced throughout the gathering in front of the grey elder, whose voice trembled in amazement. The two twins lying down on the floor—no, the light pink eyed older twin gave off the light.

On that baby's forehead, there was only one horn. It was only a single horn, something abominable to the Oni clan. It was proof of being damaged, a symbol of being incomplete, an absence that defiled pride, the lack of a horn—and yet

"…"

Nobody could speak. They were all fascinated by that older twin's white horn.

That was the beautiful, powerful, robust, and prideful proof of an Oni.

The Oni clan valued their pride and strength more than anything. That made the Oni clan what it was today.

That’s exactly why everyone in the gathering hung their heads and kneeled.

The grey elder, old woman, and the twins’ father and mother were no exceptions. All the Onis at that place kneeled as they submitted to the newly born peak of pride and strength.

This was the day when the Oni clan, which had their slow destruction right before their eyes, witnessed the birth of the final Oni god.

The Oni clan felt like it was their last hope, and also the last path to glory.

However, that was—

???: “Ah…”

The younger twin stops her crying, and she reaches out gently towards the older twin beside her.

The older twin looks at her younger sister’s held out hand with squinted eyes. While surging enormous power from the sprouted horn on her forehead, the older twin intertwines her fingers with the fingers of her other half.

The Oni clan’s hope, the arrival of a new Oni god, all those circumstances of the surrounding adults were nothing but trivial things to these girls who were brought into this world as twins.

Chapter 1:
A Fiery Night

1

—Rem slowly wakes up at a veranda bathed in pleasant sunlight.

It seemed like the light of the sun was so comfortable that she fell asleep while day dreaming. Rem rubs her sleepy eyes, wipes the drool she felt on her cheek with her sleeve, and she looked around.

She was a very young girl. She had on a white kimono, which was a native dress, and she wore Zoris on her feet. Even though the playful age was evident in her short, blue hair, she seemed to be squinting the eyes of her lovely face in a lonely way.

With her squinted eyes, she sees a familiar scenery. Rem suddenly notices the zabuton placed below her body. Rem, who had been sleeping, had an idea of who would do such a nice thing for her.

The person that came to mind was not by her side. When Rem jumped uneasily off the veranda, she scurried to the plaza in the middle of the village.

How long did she sleep? The sun above her head was still high, so she'd like to think that not a long time had passed, but she didn't even have confidence in that judgement. She slowly begins to feel tears coming from her eyes.

???: "Oh, Rem-chan. You're full of energy today again."

Rem: "…"

A woman's voice stops Rem, who felt unease in her chest. When she turned around, she saw a lady in her prime, who lived next door. They lived in the same village, and they were the same race. It was a face Rem was familiar with for as long as she could remember, but—

Rem: “Ah…”

Rem’s face flushes as she grumbles and looks down. Rem was feeling embarrassment and shame as she blushed, so she couldn’t respond. But, the woman didn’t notice that state of hers, and she said,

???: “It’s warm today, so playing outside does sound like fun. Children being lively makes me happy.”

Rem: “Um, um…”

???: “Oh yeah, is Ram-sama not with you today? That’s unusual.”

Rem: “…”

Rem holds her breath shortly at the end of the seemingly friendly voice. The reason she did was because of the name she said—it was the name of her sister, which she said with an honorific attached. No doubt about it, that was the cause of Rem’s heart burning.

???: “Ram-sama is the Oni clan’s next chief, so if she isn’t taken care of…”

Rem: “I, um…I…I’ll go…to…Onee-chan…erm…I’m sorry.”

Rem forcefully interrupts the conversation. Once she bowed her head while blushing, she ran away in a hurry. Rem’s sudden actions surprised the woman, but she waved Rem goodbye as she became distant and she said,

???: “Rem-chan, make sure to tell Ram-sama to return home before it gets daaaark.”

Then, she threw kindness at her that was not meant to be harmful at all.

While hearing the woman’s voice from behind, Rem’s eyes gradually become wet with tears. Rem gets disappointed with herself again and she starts to feel bad, and she forced herself to speed up as she closed her eyes.

Rem: “…”

Rem makes it to the plaza, and she looks for a crowd. Her older sister was always surrounded by people. This meant that if there was a crowd, her sister would be there, and if there wasn’t, she wouldn’t be at that place.

So, her sister was nowhere in sight at this plaza that had no crowd. Rem’s feeling of hopelessness gets worse and worse.

She had to find her now. She had to look for where she was—

???: “—Rem?”

Rem’s whole body shakes quietly in reaction to the voice that reached her ears and kept asking for her.

A pink haired little girl was looking at Rem, who turned around as if on demand. She had the same hairdo and clothes as Rem, and she had beautiful, light pink eyes. It was a girl who looked like she was full of dignity and self-confidence.

She was Rem’s other half, and the most respected and loved being in this generation—it was her older twin, Ram.

Ram stares at Rem, who had turned around, and when she gently touched her stiff cheeks, she said

Ram: “Rem, what happened? You look like you’re going to cry.”

Rem: “Because when I woke up, Onee-chan wasn’t there…”

Rem frantically shakes her head at her older sister as she implicitly asked who was cruel to her. She told her that it was just that she felt uneasy from not seeing Ram as she should’ve been with her before she fell asleep.

When Ram lowered her eyebrows in response to that reply, she gently hugged Rem, who looked lonely.

Ram: “Ah, I’m sorry. You looked like you were enjoying your sleep so much, so I’d feel bad for waking you up, Rem…”

Rem: “I-It’s my fault for falling asleep. But please don’t leave me behind…”

Ram: “You’re right, I won’t then. Next time I’ll call your name, Rem. But if you slept a little longer, I would’ve came back. …Rem has to deal with the boring duties, anyway.”

Getting hugged and patted on the head gently, Rem closed her eyes in reaction to Ram’s kindness.

Rem understood what her older sister did after she left her behind while she was sleeping—actually, her duties at this time were Ram’s daily routine. This was just Rem forgetting about that and becoming uneasy on her own.

Rem: “How were…your…duties…?”

Ram: “It was as boring as always. The reincarnation of an Oni God, the restoration of the race and all that…it’s so stupid.”

Rem: “Is that so…?”

Ram: “I understand that the adults are desperate and that they have expectations in me. I know how outstanding I am. But we can’t go back in time…those adults don’t understand that.”

Rem: “—?”

Someone still young like Rem could not understand much of what Ram was saying. Rem’s own sister who was the same age as her showed a level of wisdom that put adults to shame, and that made her feel worthless.

She was pathetic for not being able to understand how Ram felt with the constant troubles she had to face. The most painful thing for Rem was the unconditional love Ram gave to someone like herself.

Ram: “You don’t have to hurry, Rem. Rem, you can walk at your own pace. I’m an older sister, so I’ll wait for you, Rem.”

Rem: “Y…yes.”

Rem accepts the security she felt from the hand caressing her back, and she gets wrapped in love that felt like it was going to melt.

Everyone in the village adored and respected Ram. But on the other hand, Ram didn’t open up to anyone in the village, and she thought that expectations and respect and such were troublesome.

The younger twin Rem was the only one Ram truly loved from the bottom of her heart.

It was the treasure that Rem was the most proud of, and at the same time, the most suffocating burden.

Rem: “…”

But still, Rem hugged her sister back, making sure not to let go of that warmth.

For Ram, Rem was her lovable other half, and Rem felt the same way about her. Well, actually Ram was more than a half to Rem—

Rem: “…Onee-chan?”

Rem lets out an uneasy sounding voice in response to Ram suddenly turning away and glaring at the opposite side of the village. Listening to her, Ram says this while looking over there.

Ram: “Someone’s entered the village. I’m gonna go check this out.”

Rem: “—W-We should get hel…”

Ram: “I won’t be gone for long. Rem, you stay behind and…”

Rem: “I want to go! I’m going, too. Go with Onee-chan…!”

Since she was always getting left behind, her loneliness won over the fear of the unknown being. Ram pondered a little about Rem, who clung onto her, but as she immediately let out a sigh she said, Ram: “Stay by my side. Okay?”

Ram gives that order, and they go to the opposite side of the plaza—the entrance that connected the village and the mountain path, while holding hands. Rem felt anxiety now because of the outsider that came into the village while doing her best to run after Ram, who ran quickly.

If Ram was there, there wouldn’t be any problems. But still, she was worried about what she’d do if it was someone scary.

However, Ram arrived at the destination much faster than the worry hit Rem.

Ram: “—Stop right there, swine. This is not a village you can just simply enter without permission.”

Ram blocks the village’s entrance, chest thrown out with confidence, and she declared that as she faced forward. Being out of breathe as she chased after her, Rem nervously took a look at the person behind her sister.

The one who was greeted by those two little Onis was a bald, old man that had on shabby clothes. However, that old person looked two times taller than the old people Rem knew about from common knowledge. Her eyes were not deceiving her. The old person really did have a strangely large constitution and a scary look.

???: “Oh, it’s the little Onis of this village. Back then there weren’t any children.”

At first the old man was surprised, but once he found out that he was dealing with kids, he immediately made a relieved look. However, Ram snorted her nose as she went “Huh” in response to that reaction, and she said,

Ram: “Bringing up outdated information and acting as if you know someone is a trite and poor trick. Rem, get back. I’m going to tear him apart.”

???: “You’re quite the aggressive kid! Isn’t your Oni blood showing a little too much?!”

Ram: “I am the reincarnation of an Oni God and a famous prodigy. Not very memorable for your last words, Giant.”

???: “Are you really going to say those sharp words after knowing that I’m a Giant…”

The old man responds to Ram’s harsh speaking by stroking his head in a troubled way. Watching their interaction close by, Rem becomes flustered by the situation while being left out.

However, in contrast with Rem’s flustering, Ram and the old man ease up.

Ram: “So? Why is a Giant, whose tribe is close to extinction, at a hidden Oni village?”

???: “Hey you, a leader in extinction came to see you guys, Onis who are on the verge of extinction. Show some respect.”

Ram: “Acting all high and mighty just because you’re going to die first proves that old people are problematic.”

???: “You sure are a charmless girl…you should learn from your sister behind you.”

Rem quickly hides behind Ram as the topic of the conversation suddenly switched to her. The old man makes a hurt expression because of that reaction, and Ram clicks her tongue loathingly.

Ram: “You deserve to die 1000 times for frightening my cute little sister.”

???: “Spare me from having it happen 1000 times. —I came to see an old friend, Setanta. He should still be the chief. I haven’t heard of him dying, after all.”

Ram: “The Chief…”

Setanta was the Oni clan chief, as well as an old person that was this hidden village's mediator. He had grey hair, a large build, an awfully strong sense of intimidation, and he was someone Rem couldn't deal with very well. Although, Ram and her parents were just about the only people she was fine with.

Ram: "What do you need from the chief? If you get the chief killed now, the role would be handed over to me and that would be troublesome, so I would appreciate it if you didn't try that."

???: "The jokes kids have these days are thrilling…still, doesn't seem like you're entirely lying."

After dropping his shoulders dejectedly, the old man squinted his eyes to take a good look at Ram. Those eyes disturbed Ram, but he looked at Rem, as if done incidentally, and it made her feel uncomfortable.

In any case—

Ram: "Fine. I will guide you to the chief's residence. Even if you say you don't need me to, I will go with you anyway."

???: "You're a cautious little oni, aren't you. It's not like…I don't understand how you feel, though."

Ram: "Rem, if you ever think this Giant is acting weird, let me know. I'll kill him."

???: "You're gonna make me angry if you don't cut this out now!"

Rem: "O-Okay, got it. Let Onee-chan know, right?"

???: "This girl too?! What kind of manners have you been taught to welcome guests like this…"

Rem and Ram bring along the old man, who hung his head more out of defeat rather than shock, and they guided him to the chief's residence—a wooden building in the deepest part of the village.

That place was called the "Chief's Residence", but there weren't any big differences between the building and the other houses in the village.

However, there were only two people living in it, the chief and his wife, so it had enough space.

Ram: “Chief, I brought a large old man who claims he’s an acquaintance of yours. Is he really an acquaintance?”

???: “There you go again…”

Ram makes the old person frown, and she calls out from the building’s entrance. Then, after a short moment of silence, the door opens, and Setanta appeared with a stern face. Setanta stares at Ram and Rem, and then finally he sees the old person as he said,—

Setanta: “That’s a face that takes me back, Cromwell. Surprising to see you come here.”

Cromwell: “You haven’t changed…is what I’d like to say, but I can’t. You got old, too. You look as if your body got a size smaller.”

Setanta: “With your body, everyone around you looks like children…probably.”

They have a conversation that was like renewing friendship, and Setanta turned his attention to Rem and the others. When the grey elder stiffened his loose cheeks, he said,

Setanta: “Thanks a lot for guiding him, you two. He’s definitely someone I know. He’s called Cromwell of the Giants.”

Cromwell: “I don’t like that way of saying my name. I go by Rom now.”

Ram: “What a crude name change.”

Rom: “It just had to be done. If you said it would be easy to call me that, that is.”

The old man, who was formerly known as Giant and called himself Rom, lowered his eyebrows slightly and made that response. He seemed different from before, and he somehow gave off a feeling of deep affection, but nothing more than that could be understood.

Setanta: “You must’ve came a long way, Cromwell. Let’s talk inside. —Also, Ram, you stay. Rem, you go home before her.”

Rem: “…”

Setanta continued the conversation indifferently, while Rem held her breathe as she held onto Ram’s sleeve. Ram was going to carry a burden again with Rem being unable to help her.

But, Ram put her hand on Rem’s shaking fingers to cover them. And then she said,

Ram: “With all due respect, Chief, I think a young person like myself will only be a nuisance to a renewal of an old friendship. Besides, I promised to sprinkle the village’s fields after this.”

Setanta: “…Hmph. Your true feelings?”

Ram: “Rem would feel lonely, and I don’t want to be shut in a room for old geezers.”

“…”

She gives a rejection with details that were too frank, and it makes even Setanta open his eyes wide. Rem was also surprised by her sister’s intense, sharp tongue, but Ram kept a composed expression.

Rom: “Haaahaha! You’ve lost, Setanta! Children have their own stubborn viewpoints. I’d feel sorry for making her tag along on our old people tea drinking, too. Just let her go.”

Ram: “Even the guest is saying these sort of things, so I’ll be excusing myself. —Let’s go, Rem.”

Rem: “Eh…ah…okay, Onee-chan…”

Rem takes advantage of Rom’s words, who laughed wildly, and she took Rem’s hand as she quickly left that place. Following her sister who was walking fast, Rem looked back at the chief out of slight curiosity.

Rem: “Ee—”

Setanta’s glaring eyes make Rem regret looking back. She hurries up greatly to match the pace of Ram, and the sisters go far away from the residence.

Ram: “Rem, it’s fine now. The two of them entered the residence. Nobody is looking anymore.”

Rem: “—Ah”

Rem calms down because of Ram’s voice, who stopped in the middle of returning to the village’s plaza. In response to her sister who was looking at her straight on with her light pink eyes, Rem said this while being slightly out of breathe:

Rem: “I wonder why that guest came to this village.”

Ram: “Who knows? He’s at least able to enter this village, so he’s definitely a worthless acquaintance of the chief. Which means that he probably has some very worthless things to do.”

Rem: “Doesn’t Onee-chan have a lot to do, too? Are you going to be busy?”

Ram: “If you think of it as the adults wanting to rely on me, I will be. It’s going to be a pain.”

Ram folds her arms, and she sighs with a mature expression that didn’t match her age. She was an older sister that took a cold attitude towards basically everything, but Rem understood the subtle differences of her sister.

This reaction of Ram was an attitude she would have when she was seriously shunning the fact that something was right before her eyes.

Rem: “Is there something I can do for Onee-chan?”

Ram: “Rem…”

Rem: “If it’s something Onee-chan doesn’t like, then I want to help.

I might not be able to do anything since it's me…but I want to be with you."

Ram gazed in wonderment at Rem's words, her facing down as she rubbed her fingers together. Then, immediately after, when Ram stood in front of Rem, she touched her forehead with her own as she said,

Ram: "It's okay. Just having Rem care about me like that makes me 100 times stronger. I'm already this amazing, so with that, now I'm unstoppable."

Rem: "Onee-chan's amazing…"

Ram: "Yes, I am amazing. I mean, I am Rem's Onee-chan."

That was not really the basis for Ram being an Oni, being the next chief, and being called the "Reincarnation of an Oni God". It was more the basis for her being proud of being Rem's older sister.

That made Rem feel embarrassed, but it made her so happy that it seemed like her body was going to melt.

Ram: "Now, let's go, Rem. I want to play with Rem all day today."

Rem: "O-Okay…but Onee-chan, the field watering…"

Ram: "Ah, that. —Yeah."

Rem mentions pouring water to Ram, her smiling, and she immediately regrets it. However, when Ram squinted in reaction to that point, she looked towards where the village's fields were. And then—

"…"

Ram produces wind, and the sand at her feet starts a spiral with her in the center. Next to Rem, who was surprised by the aftermath of that power, a white horn extended from Ram's forehead as she had her eyes squinted.

Even Rem, her twin, was captivated by the beauty of that horn.

The tremendous power produced from Ram's horn, who was respected and admired by every Oni, gushed out towards the field—to put it precisely, it gushed out not towards the field, but the stream next to it.

The stream's water undulates wildly, bathing in the power of Ram's eyes. Immediately after that, the force of the water current producing ripples rises towards the sky, and it came up to the surface right above the field like a serpent. And then the body of the water serpent explodes above the field as water scatters all over the field.

Ram: "—Now my business is taken care of. Let's go, Rem."

The paranormal phenomenon finishes just like that. Rem nods at Ram's words, who put away her horn.

The ability to shoot that much water from such a far range—that truly was the outstanding work of an Oni God. Rem and everyone in the village could not possibly try to imitate something like that.

Ram was special, and the fact that she had unreachable power was the greatest proof for that.

It was something Rem was proud of more than anything—

Rem: "Okay, Onee-chan."

She takes her older sister's hand, chasing after her as she ran ahead.

Even if Ram hurried and hurried, she would always care for Rem and match her pace.

—Rem was proud of that, but at the same time, it became a very strong thorn, and it pierced her chest.

2

Once it became the evening, Rem and Ram returned to the village, and they were covered in mud.

What these two carried with their hands, their white kimonos so dirty that they turned black, was a basket that had countless loot of yams.

The yams were buried in soil and connected by vines, and there were as much yams as the two of them could handle with their arms. Ram was in a good mood, having harvested more than 10 of them.

Rem: “Onee-chan, you look happy.”

Ram: “Well of course. It’s because we’ll be able to eat tons of Rem’s steamed potatoes if we have this much. That’s the best treat of all for me.”

She shows a big smile that she would seldom show, and Rem smiles at her sister, who showed an unusually childish smile.

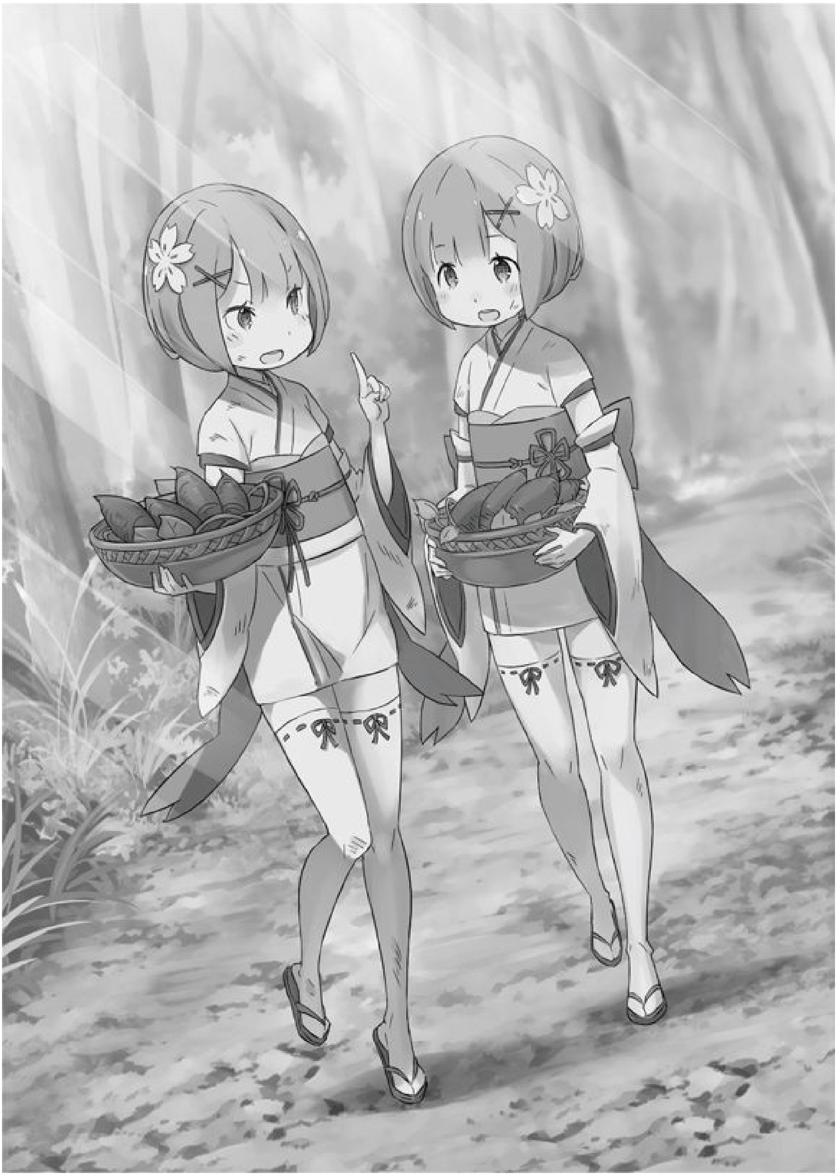
The steamed potato Ram talked about was a simple dish Rem made by borrowing the kitchen from her mother, and it would only be made whenever they’d harvest yams like this. It wasn’t complex enough be called a dish, but Ram was happy with Rem’s steamed potato more than she was with anything else. The village would put their best efforts into making various things for Ram if she wished for it, and yet what Ram wanted was Rem’s steamed potato.

Ram: “Your seasoning is perfect. Rem is the only one who can make a steamed potato that would make me happy.”

Rem: “Ehehe…then I’ll try my best again today and steam them for Onee-chan.”

Ram: “Yes, steam a lot. I’ll be having seconds.”

Rem smiles at Ram, who declared her gluttony with a gallant expression, and she fixes the way she carried the basket filled with yams.



They return to the village from the mountain path like that, and they headed home—then, suddenly they stopped.

The reason being because there were two long shadows at the village's entrance bathing in the setting sun.

Ram: "The chief and that Giant person?"

There were two people standing at the village entrance: "Rom, who they guided to the residence a few hours ago, and Setanta, who greeted him. Once again, the two old people appear to have noticed Rem and Ram returning to the village, as one of them said,

Setanta: "—Went to the potato fields in the mountains again I see."

Ram: "Yes, as it is my only hobby. So, are you finished with your evil scheme?"

Ram's remark to Setanta, who had a grim look, even had a bite in it. Rem could only feel uneasy about that blunt attitude as someone who was aware of how Ram had been harsh to Setanta lately.

However, a big, gigantic old person shook his head in between the two who were about to cause a sense of insecurity.

Rom: "Can't you stop being tense with a kid? It's shameful. Besides, your opinion isn't going to get you anywhere…it looks like she's not convinced."

Setanta: "That's because she's still young. Should she start to have self-awareness and pride, things will take care of themse…"

Rom: "You oughtn't treat her like a kid only when it's convenient. Plus, well, in my eyes, it looks like this girl's nature has nothing to do with age and readiness."

Ram: "…"

Ram calmly answers Rom's eyes, which seemed like they were seeing through her, with a wise expression of her own eyes. Rem understood that Setanta and Rom were talking about Ram, but she still couldn't understand the details. But, Rem sensed that her sister resented it, and she held tight onto the basket of yams that she was carrying.

Rom: "Anyway, my answer is final. I'm pretty worn-out."

Setanta: "You sure have lost your energy, Cromwell. Or maybe I should say you don't take the initiative anymore?"

Rom: "You should say that I've gotten old. You and I, it's the same deal for both of us."

Rom responds quietly to Setanta's hateful sounding remark, and he turned his back on him. Stepping hard on the ground, the old man sought to leave the village as he went down the mountain path.

As he passed through Rem and Ram's side, he said—

Rom: "Always be close sisters. Don't forget that."

Rom leaves just those words behind, passes through the mountain path without stopping, and he went out of sight. Watching that large back become distant, Rem said nothing in confusion. She just wanted either Ram or Setanta to move so that the situation could end quickly.

Setanta: "He may be like that, but he was once a warrior that worried about being a brother. …Not a trace of his former self is left."

However, in contrast with Rem's wish, Setanta started talking about the old man that left. Rem couldn't understand the details, but Ram snorted in response.

Ram: "Time changes people. The change is unavoidable, for better or worse."

Setanta: "…He got involved with people too much for such a long time. He pandered that much to people he must've hated, so much that his anger faded overtime. A hopeless weakling."

The grey elder grinds his teeth, and he spits towards the back that couldn't be seen anymore. Seeing that anger, Rem remembers the words Rom said and the eyes he had when he left.

She felt like those eyes didn't have the spineless weakness the chief was calling him out for. There was the emotion of treasuring someone in those eyes. That would definitely be the reason why he'd seem different from back then.

But, Rem didn't even have a bit of the courage needed to say that out loud.

Setanta: "There's not a chance I'll see his face again. I feel relieved."

Ram: "Congrats on losing one of the few friends you have. I'd like to celebrate by treating you with steamed potatoes. How about it?"

Rem gets startled by Ram, who held up a bunch of potatoes as she invited the chief to dinner. However, Ram wasn't even serious. She knew what he'd say, so you could say it was a joke.

Setanta: "Unfortunately, I'm not in the mood for it. Perhaps another time."

Ram: "Miss one chance to eat Rem's steamed potatoes and you'll never come across one again. Go and regret having declined this invitation for an eternity. Let's go, Rem."

Rem: "Um, okay, yes. Chief, excuse me."

Continuing after Ram, who had a triumphant expression, Rem also bowed her head and left quickly. Afterwards, only the frowning chief remained, and Rem looked back at him over and over as she said "Is it really fine?".

Ram: "Rem is so nice. It's fine. A stupid adult just had his stupid plan belittled, that's all."

Rem: "Onee-chan, are you fine with it?"

Ram: "Yeah. I'm relieved that the stupid plan ended with a stupid conversation. In that respect, I'll have to thank that old Giant for making fun of the stupid adult."

She felt like she had been relatively bitter towards Rom until the end, but Ram had her own deep thoughts. Rem understood that, and she didn't really try poke her nose into it.

If there was one thing that was on her mind, it would be—

Rem: "He said that person used to be scary…he didn't seem like it at all."

Ram: "Yeah. The answer for the friction between Humans and Demi-humans was found through interaction. It was something like that, I suppose. In that case—"

Rem: "Onee-chan?"

With a curious look, Rem calls Ram, who stopped and went into deep thought. But there was still no reaction from Rem, her eyes closed. It was the first time the older sister didn't notice Rem calling her.

Rem: "Onee-chan, Onee-chan"

Ram: "—Don't worry, nothing's wrong. I was just thinking for a bit."

Rem: "Thinking? About what?"

Ram: "About eating the steamed potatoes Rem made, of course."

Then, Ram's stomach rumbled at the same time she said that. The stomach that sounded like the growling of a beast astonishes Rem, and Ram let her hear that sound with much pride as she said,

Ram: "It's just like you hear it. Let's get going. If we don't hurry, my stomach will break and I'll die."

Rem: "O-Okay. Got it. Let's get going then, Onee-chan."

Rem nods many times as she got overwhelmed by Ram appealing with a serious look. Afterwards, Rem was able to think of all sorts of ways to make the steamed potatoes efficiently while she hurried back home with her sister.

That was how Rem's head was filled with steamed potatoes, and not once did she remember Ram seriously thinking about something.

And not once did Rem feel regret from it.

With that, she also completely forgot about the visitor that came to the Oni village, and the days went by.

The sun rises and the sun sets repeatedly without Ram, Rem, or any of the Onis changing.

And so, time went on—

3

—For Rem, that fateful night was too sudden.

Rem: "…Onee-chan?"

Waking up at night alone, Rem let out her voice as she searched for her sister in the darkness.

Inside the room, she didn't see Ram, who should've been sleeping right by her side.

The sisters shared a room, and they shared a bed as well as they'd sleep next to each other. No matter how many times Rem reached her hand out, she couldn't find her sister's body which would usually be in a place where she could feel her.

Rem: "Maybe…she went to the bathroom."

Rem sits up in the darkness, and she ponders her sister's absence.

Ram would usually wake up earlier than Rem, and she would sleep later than Rem. Therefore, Rem never got to see her sister's sleeping face. Should Rem wake up at night to pee, Ram would wake up with her as if she knew. However, that also was something that only happened in the same room.

Not once was she gone from the room leaving Rem behind like she was today.

Rem: “…”

That makes Rem feel like something was off, and so she stepped on the floor barefoot when she removed the bed cover. She feels a strange uneasiness, and she reached for the door, feeling that she had to find Ram right away.

—That’s when she finally noticed it, although it was too late.

Rem: “—Huh?”

An intoxicating, burnt smell, and strangely humid air that reached the skin to caress it. The heat that made her wet with sweat clearly did not match this hidden village’s climate, not to mention climate of the night.

—There was fire. Flames. Fire was produced outside the door, and it enveloped the building.

Rem: “It burns!”

She puts her hand on the door in panic, and she screams because of the hotness of the heated door. Rem tears up because of her own foolishness while her palm became red with a burn as she wondered why was she stupid like this.

If she had the time to think about this and that, then she had to meet up with her sister as soon as possible—.

Rem: “—Aah”

She concentrates on her forehead and exhales, shaking slightly. Then, Rem starts sharpening her body’s five senses, and she perceives the world with every sense focused on her forehead.

A single white horn formed on her forehead that messed up her blue hair. Rem releases the power of an Oni, and when she raised her empowered foot, she kicked down the door without hesitation.

The next moment, flames of hell cross the corridor as if making fun of her, and Rem's vision was dyed in red light.

The overwhelming amount of heat causes the strength of her horn to die down, and she starts to feel fear once again.

However, Rem uses all the strength she had to suppress that fear, and she stepped into the corridor with rising flames.

She looks into her parent's bedroom at the front. The door to the room was wide open, and there was no sign of her parents. Of course, her sister wasn't there, either. She stepped back immediately and went towards the living room. The flames raged relentlessly at the place where her family spent time together. The dining table, the hanging scroll, and the cupboard were all burning in flames. Flames even burst out from the kitchen, so heading over there would be suicide. There was no one in the house. That's what she concluded.

Rem: "Whew!"

The flames in the entranceway were especially strong, so she needed the readiness to become burnt black to go through it.

Rem immediately crosses off the option to escape from the entranceway, and she strikes the burnt, fragile wall with her body to break through it. She bathes in the outside air, and she lifted her face while lying on the ground.

—Find Ram and meet up with her.

Whether it be a crisis or a regular day, Rem's judgement was always the same. She would rely on her judgement to leave to the plaza and meet up with her sister. But the next moment, that thought froze.

"…"

Her cheeks stiffen in terror. Her eyes open wide, frozen in place.

Rem stops moving, dumbfounded.

What she saw before her eyes was a never before seen collapsing of the scenery she was familiar with.

All the houses and the fields were engulfed in bright red flames, turning into ash. However, those weren't the only things exposed to the fury of the flames. Not only were the Oni villages burning, but the Onis themselves as well.

In front of Rem, who came out of the house, there was a burning house next door. The woman living there was engulfed in flames, and she turned into a burnt black corpse. Her limbs were twisted. Her face was distorted from anguish, and she couldn't even tell what it looked like when she was alive. Her mouth was wide open to cry for help.

The reason she was able to distinguish who this woman was, even when she was in this state, was solely because of the two horns protruding from the burnt corpse's forehead. The two horns with slightly twisted ends facing inward.

Rem had an inferiority complex from having only one horn, so she had a habit of looking at other people's horns in detail.

Thus, she was the only one who would never mistake one horn for another for her race in the village. And it became a pain that fell onto Rem. There couldn't be any pain that would be harder to endure.

"…"

All over the village, there were her race's burnt black corpses lying down.

If Rem saw the horns, she would immediately know who the burnt black corpse was. She immediately knew which burnt corpse was her father and which was her mother.

Her parents' burnt corpses were on top of each other, and they collapsed trying to protect each other. It was a tragic demise since they fought against death until the very end. It was a visit from death in the midst of pain.

Rem: “—Ah, u”

The death of her race, the death of parents, the repeated shock of death causes Rem to lose the strength in her hands and legs. The swirl of power produced on her forehead disperses. She breaks down, and at the same time, her horn pulls back into her skull.

What was happening? What the heck was this unbelievable situation—

???: “Ga… aaaahhh—!!”

Broken down, Rem hears a lively roar that kills the night.

The roar that sounded like a beast’s came from the blazing houses—she ran to the plaza from the deepest part of the village, and she saw a muscular, grey haired Oni.

The upper part of his Kinagashi was open, and he was naked from the waist up; it was the grey elder Setanta. The grey elder had two large horns extended on his forehead, and he was swinging a sword with eyes of insanity colored in rage.

The sword was a decoration for the venue, and it was considered a super heavy object that only Setanta could handle. It had lost its sharpness for a long time, but it would still be appropriate to call this piece of iron a dangerous weapon as it was longer than two meters.

And now Setanta was swinging the piece of iron so smoothly as if it was part of his body because there was an opponent that deserved to be hit with a weapon and anger.

“…”

Rem saw a squirming shadow in her eyes.

The flaming light of the houses shines brightly on the vicinity, and countless corpses appear in her eyes. The only one living and moving was Setanta—no, around Setanta, it seemed as if there were black dressed beings merging into a shadow crawling about.

The shadow wrapped in black clothes from top to bottom was clinging onto Setanta as he went into a rampage. However, Setanta had the power of an Oni, who were known to be a match for a thousand, and among them, he was someone who stood out.

Setanta: "—Meun!"

The wind slashing piece of iron catches the shadow from the front, and that might cuts the being in black clothes in half. Pieces of flesh scatter, and his opponent's body becomes a dead body within an instant as Setanta jumped at his next prey.

Rem sees the chief's brave fighting with her own eyes, and some strength returns to her legs. Among the corpses lying down, she didn't see Ram, who she was looking for. This wasn't the time to be devastated.

From what she's seen, the black clothed beings' abilities were no match for Setanta. While their attention was on the chief, Rem had to look for Ram—

???: "Che che che che che"

A sound suddenly slips into Rem's ears as she tried to leave that place in a hurry.

It was a sequence of an unpleasant sound—it was similar to tongue clicking. Someone's continuous tongue clicking arrives by the wind, and Rem's eyes wander around as she wondered what it was.

And then, she saw this.

"…"

Setanta blew fire.

Fire blew from the grey elder's mouth, nose, and ears, and his whole body was completely engulfed in deep crimson flames. Setanta drops his sword, holds onto his face, and he screams from the pain of having his internal organs burned.

However, the flames burn his screaming throat, and his voice was no more. The large fire evaporates his eyeballs, his tongue gets inflamed, and the grey elder Oni burned before her eyes. And then finally,

???: “Ho…rn.”

The surrounding silhouettes throw the swords they had in their hands, which had the shape of a cross. They pierce Setanta’s whole body, being engulfed in flames, and they heartlessly end his life.

The burnt black grey elder gets struck with countless swords, and he stood still just for a moment. But, he couldn’t leave behind any words in that moment. The giant figure falls backward, and it never moved again.

Rem sees that tragic death with her very own eyes, and now her body lost its will to fight.

There was none of her moving race as far as the eye could see. What she did see were dead bodies…dead bodies, nothing but dead bodies. Either those, or the black shadows that made them into the dead bodies that they were.

“…”

Rem was surrounded by those black shadows before she knew it.

The black clothed beings point cross swords at Rem, which were the same type of swords that pierced Setanta. Rem wasn’t sure if she’d prefer getting burnt to death or getting stabbed to death.

She wasn’t sure, but her lips moved. Her hands and legs didn’t move, and her brain wasn’t working. However, even if her body and mind weren’t working, Rem knew who she should rely on.

Thus—

Rem: “Onee-chan.”

—The moment she said that out loud, a wind blew violently.

The wind equally caresses the flames burning the village, the clouds concealing the moon, and Rem's bangs on her forehead. However, the results each of them had weren't equal.

Cries of pain and blood spray rise, and the black clothed beings that surrounded Rem lose the strength in their bodies. It was a natural result from having lost the neck and up part of the body. The shadows become corpses, and Rem was now surrounded by fresh death.

And then, right next to Rem there was

Ram: "Rem! Rem! Are you hurt?! Anything at all?!"

The one who rushed over with a frantic look and embraced Rem's sunken body was Ram. Horn out on her forehead, the older sister makes a tragic look with her face, which would usually be emotionless, and she hugged Rem, who was emotionally damaged.

Rem accepts Ram's hug, and she felt awkward relief and happiness.

She was glad to be reunited with her older sister. Her relief was also natural. However, what was this feeling of happiness? She saw her parents, her race, and the death of the chief with her own eyes, and yet what she felt in her chest was—

Rem: "O-Onee-chan…I…I…"

Her thoughts become white, and her consciousness turns off and on. The shock successively thrown at her was too intense for little Rem's heart to handle. Seeking for an outlet for that shock, Rem clings onto her sister right next to her. Ram accepts Rem's confusion, and she hugs her tightly. But—

Ram: "One after another…"

Ram, who had been caressing Rem's head to comfort her, speaks resentfully, and she looked back. Different black clothed beings appear again in her light pink eyes burning with passion, as if creeping out from shadows.

There were even more than the amount she had just wiped out. Just how many of them were crowded into this village? There was no room to hope for survivors.

That is why—

Ram: “I won’t let them lay a hand on Rem, no matter what. —All of you here, suffer a swift death.”

The silent black clothed beings answer Ram’s stern verdict by drawing their cross swords at the same time. Ram confronts the silent insanity closing in, and the horn on her forehead shines even brighter.

Right after that, what developed before Rem’s eyes was a massacre created by overwhelming power.

Ram: “Ah, aaaah—!!”

Ram roars, jumping right and left with her small body, and she fatally gouges the black clothed beings’ bodies with her own nails. Their heads, faces, and chests get torn up like paper, and the black clothed beings fall mercilessly before the unbelievable difference in power.

It was astounding physical strength—however, that wasn’t the only secret of Ram’s terrifying strength.

Ram swings her hand, pulverizing the black clothed being with a blow. Her light pink eyes trace the sky, and wind cuts down the black clothed being above her eyes. The black clothed being meets its end by the blade of the wind within an instant, and a corpse was left on the ground.

An overwhelmingly strong body, and magic usage that was so enormous that it seemed as if the world was in the palm of her hand. It was the demonstration of Ram’s true abilities, who was said to be the reincarnation of an Oni God once considered to be the strongest out of the Oni clan.

Every time there was a crushing sound, there was another dead corpse with a broken skull. The attacks from Ram, who transformed into a violent machine, did not stop. The people jumping out in front of the Oni God were basically volunteering to suicide. She smashes and cuts all the shadows that continued to jump at her, and it wouldn't be long until the battle was over.

Over there—

???: "Che che che che che"

She hears that tongue clicking again.

That unpleasant sound makes Rem come back to her senses, as she was in a trance.

Being in the middle of the battlefield of the clashing between Ram and the black clothed beings, Rem couldn't tell where that sound came from. She didn't have the slightest clue.

However, Ram didn't worry about that sound. It looked like she didn't even notice. That was frightening.

What happened earlier? What happened after this tongue clicking? —Setanta burned. That's what happened.

Rem: "Onee…"

Ram: "Remm!!"

Within an instant, Rem's vision becomes dyed in red, and her body was trapped in explosive flames—no, it wasn't explosive flames she was trapped in; it was Ram's chest that held her after she jumped in just before.

The blast that came from behind tosses the Oni sisters, and they get blown away like that. Rem feels dizzy, her internal organs are jumbled, and her face was dirty with tears and saliva. And as for Ram—

Ram: "You people…"

Breathing hard, Ram had an angry look while having raising her bloody knee.

Her white Kimono was torn into pieces, and the intense bleeding was creating a pool of blood at her feet. Her delicate body had a painful laceration—however, the wound heals within an instant in response to the radiance of Ram's horn. The regenerating flesh emits extremely hot heat, and the wound generated red steam.

Taking all the mana in the atmosphere and changing it into power to fight was a special characteristic of the Oni's horn. Ram had an outstanding horn, so she could easily heal non-fatal wounds.

However, it was never something that could help with pain and fatigue.

Ram: "…"

Ram checks if she could still feel with her feet, and she steps forward to attack the enemy again. But, that one step gets repelled by the generating explosive flames, and Ram was sent flying backward as she let out cries of pain.

Seeing her sister lying down right beside her, Rem opens her eyes wide, and immediately after, she hears a voice.

???: "Little Oni sisters, off again, huh. …Actually, not exactly."

It was low and hoarse tone, but it was filled with smoky sort of excitement.

It felt like the voice loved this scenery. It felt like the voice had affection for this scenery. It felt like the voice climaxed because of this scenery.

—In the village engulfed in flames, a backlit black shadow appeared.

Rem couldn't see the person's face from where she was. But, he was at a different place than all the other countless shadows, and she understood that it was the worst reality for the present situation.

Rem: "…Onee-chan?"

Ram: "Ple—ease…Rem, anything but Rem…"

Lying down next to her, Ram crawls and she hugs Rem, who sunk down to the floor, to cling onto her shoulder. And then the older sister desperately pushes Rem's face into her chest, and her voice shook as she faced the dark shadow.

It was a voice that sounded like it was begging, or perhaps asking for forgiveness, and it made Rem dumbfounded.

She never imagined Ram who was always full of confidence, always dignified, and who was always the strongest, most noble, most splendid twin sister in the world, begging like that.

And so, as for the person who the older sister made that clinging wish to—

???: "Such beautiful sisterly love. That makes it perfect. I was just about to check if Oni siblings smelled different burnt."

Ram: "…"

Ram bites her teeth so hard that she could've broken them, and she stands up as she faces the voice. However, she was hugging Rem, had injuries, and was distant. Even the reincarnation of an Oni God, Ram, couldn't take that one step.

He shoots steel from his raised arm, and it was aimed right towards Rem, who was in Ram's chest. Realizing that, Ram opens her arms, and she stands in front of her beloved sister to block her.

Protected by that small back, Rem only opened her eyes wide while feeling powerless.

And then—

"…"

There was a shrill sound, and blood spray and broken white splinters fell down.

A scream, and someone's laughter. White light flew through the red sky in the midst of that noise.

It was a white horn. The beautiful, most noble, precious horn of an Oni. The horn of Ram, the Oni clan's hope.

Her own life, the village engulfed in flames, and her sister screaming as she wiped the tears of blood she had from the pain, none of that was left in Rem's mind at this time.

She was only broken from the cruelty, and she stared at the blown off horn—

Rem: "Aah—"

—Rem lets out a shaky sigh, and the rest did not remain in her memory.

Chapter 2:
The Prideful Oni Clan

1

Voices. She would hear voices.

The usual voices. Whenever she walked through the village, whenever they'd see her, everyone would say it.

???: "Rem. You learn from Ram, too. Work harder."

???: "Rem, don't look so sad. Both Ram and Rem are my cute daughters to me. I won't play favorites. …It's just that Ram is a little special."

Her father smiled with a stern look on his face, and her mother smiled while she lowered her eyebrows in a troubled way as they said that.

???: "Rem-chan, is Ram-sama doing well today? See, that girl needs to grow up healthily. Because she is the future of the Oni clan, after all."

???: "Don't you forget about it, Rem. A cursed child like you lived this long because Ram was blessed with the Oni God's blood that should've been gone. Never, ever forget to be aware of that, and don't forget to understand it, either."

Her race that lived in the same village as her and the chief who governed them said those things to Rem.

???: "Compared to Ram-sama, Rem is still just a no-horn…but that girl is Ram-sama's sister. The 'Other Oni God' might not be just a dream after all."

???: "They do look like two peas in a pod. I'm sure these two jewels will make the future bright!"

Even though Rem was the very essence of mediocrity, she was compared to Ram, who excelled ever since she was a baby, and everyone had expectations of her.

It was because she was Ram's sister. It was because she was the Oni God's twin. It was because she was born along with the Oni clan's hope.

And so, more than anyone—

Ram: "Don't let it get to you, Rem. You don't need to worry about anything people say. I will—Onee-chan will always, always protect Rem. —It'll be alright."

The fact that her most beloved other half with the same face continued saying that made Rem feel pain, like she was being torn apart, but at the same time it made her so happy that it melted her heart.

2

Rem: "…"

The moment Rem woke up, she truly had no idea what was happening to her.

Her whole body was wrapped in an unbelievably smooth feeling, and she was seeing a white ceiling that she had never seen before. Rem was most likely facing upward, but her back and head felt such a softness that her usual bed could not possibly compare.

Even the material that touched her skin felt unusually slippery, so it felt like Rem was lying on a bed made of sand. She was struck with that sort of anxious feeling.

Like that, Rem looked for someone to rely on, and when her eyes wandered along with her hands—

Ram: "—Rem"

Her fingers trembling in loneliness get caught by a kind sounding voice and someone else's fingers.

Rem knew whose fingers they belonged to even without seeing her face. This is because those hands always made Rem feel this way whenever she felt anxious.

Rem: “Onee-chan…?”

Ram: “Yes, this is Onee-chan. Jeez, you overslept quite a bit, Rem.”

Rem calls out to her, and she responds affectionately. She turned around as she felt awkward. Then, Rem, lying down, saw the face of her older sister right by the bed as she looked at her.

Ram: “…”

She sees Ram pale, having a haggard face with a pitiful bandage wrapped around her head, and she lost her voice.

The beautiful, dignified face of her older sister wearing a white kantoui looked gloomy because of her tiredness, and she didn’t have strength in her light pink eyes; she looked at Rem with only kindness in them.

Rem: “O-Onee-chan, what happ…e”

Just when Rem was about to say ‘happened’, the memories came back to her mind fiercely.

It was a gruesome memory that started with the night engulfed in flames when she found her parents and her race who were burned to death after their resistance, ending with her twin sister screaming —.

That’s right. Ram looked up at the sky, and she screamed as if coughing up blood. The reason she did was because—

Rem: “Onee-chan, the village…everyone…in the village…Mom… Dad…”

Ram: “—Oh. You remember. I wish you’d forgotten about it, since it’s too much to handle.”

Rem, voice shaking, suddenly talks about her family, race, and home that were taken away from her. Ram's sister's state of confusion makes her lower her eyes, and she hugged her as she leaned forward.

She gently caresses her back, and her unstable heartbeat gradually calms down.

Ram: "It's okay. Give anything and everything to me. Your crying, your anger, I'll take it all. Onee-chan will be the outlet for the pain you feel."

Rem: "Onee-chan…Onee-chan…Onee-chan…Onee-chan…"

Rem, sobbing hesitantly, pushes her face onto her sister's body, feeling it over the light cloth. They went through the same suffering, sadness, and pain, and yet Ram's heart stayed strong no matter what. She was again spoiling herself with how big it was, just like always.

Like that, the older sister tried her very best to make her sister forget about her sadness. In response to that scene—

???: "—Just when I was thinking about where you went…so you were here after all."

Rem: "Ee"

A voice suddenly interrupts them, and Rem, who was burying her face in Ram's chest, let out her voice slightly. Ram responds to that reaction by caressing Rem's head, and then she looked back with a displeased expression.

Ram: "An emotional meeting between sisters is going on here. I'd like to ask for no insensitive interruptions from outsiders."

???: "As long as it's in times of peace, I highly agree with your opinion. However, the situation isn't like that right now. …You should at least know how your body is, too."

Ram: "You don't know just how lonely Rem will be if I'm gone… this girl is my priority."

???: “Always have something to say…you sure are a sassy guest.”

The person sighs at Ram’s unwavering protests in an appalled way. Rem stirred in the midst of that interaction and she finally got a look of the person who spoke next to her sister. And then,

???: “Good morning, Guest. I am truly happy to see that you’ve woken up safe and sound.”

The person saying that, politely pinching her skirt as she bowed to Rem while having eye contact, was a girl with beautiful, long blond hair wearing an apron that was based around the color black.

She was around 14-15 years old. She had blonde hair that would glisten in the sunlight, and clear white skin. Combining that with her refreshing, jade green eyes gazing at Rem that sparkled like gems made her looks have a latent, captivating charm. However—

???: “I’ve been ordered by the master to look after you two. My name is Frederica. I’m delighted to make your acquaintance.”

Right after she bowed perfectly, she took a look at the woman who lifted her head—at Frederica’s mouth. She saw a full set of fangs that were sharp enough to make her forget about what she thought of her hair and eyes.

The feature that changed even her graceful smile turn into something ferocious within an instant made Rem widen her eyes unconsciously in shock.

Frederica, upon seeing Rem’s reaction, looked down just slightly as she said,

Frederica: “My dearest apologies for startling you. I was born with these fangs, and they became really sharp because of my growth period…”

Rem: “Eh…ah…u…”

Rem, hesitant to speak, sees Frederica’s lonesome reaction and she regretted her surprise.

She was an adolescent girl. Frederica had her own inferiority complex because of her mouth. And Rem also knew how it felt to worry about having a hopeless nature. She knew the feeling so well that it hurt.

Apologize. I should apologize. Rem immediately has those thoughts, and she tried to move her tongue. And yet…

Rem: “—u”

Unable to express her thoughts in words, neither an apology nor denial came out of her mouth.

Frederica: “Alright, Ram-sama. Your sister is awake now, so please return back to your room. Next time I really will tie you to the bed since you’ve sneaked away so many times like this.”

Ram: “How uncivilized. If the blood of half-beasts makes you do that, how about you go lose some of it?”

Frederica: “I’d like you to kindly join me as a part of that suggestion.”

Even while Rem was mumbling, Ram and Frederica butted heads with each other. It seemed that Ram continued to behave recklessly to visit Rem as she slept.

In reality, her older sister standing next to bad looked pale, and even her breathing sounded beat. However, Ram, being the firm one that she was, rejected Frederica, who reached her hand out anxiously, and she said,

Ram: “I can walk by myself. Don’t touch me like you know me.”

Frederica: “Quite the stubborn one, aren’t you.”

Ram, acting stubborn in her kantoui, let out a sigh. Then, she looked back at Rem, lying down on the bed, and she smiled slightly.

Ram: “Rem, you can sleep a little longer. Let’s talk when you wake up again.”

Rem: "…Onee-chan, I can't be with you?"

Ram: "…"

Rem shakes from her recalled memories, sense of loss, and the loneliness of being left behind at an unfamiliar place. Seeing Rem like that causes affection and hesitation to go through Ram's eyes. However, before she used that as a reason to pamper Rem…

Frederica: "Master told me firmly, "Make sure to bring Ram-sama back to her room"."

Ram: "Frederica…"

Frederica: "Even if you glare at me like that, I feel conflicted. —You can't control your power after having your horn broken, right? It's awfully unreasonable to let you do what you want if you're like this."

Rem: "—Horn"

Frederica says that to Ram, who wouldn't back down, and tried to persuade her. However, the one who had a strong reaction to that persuasion wasn't Ram, but Rem, who was there listening.

A horn, the Oni horn. —The broken horn.

In the last piece of her recalled memories, there was Ram screaming as her horn broke—

Rem: "Ah…Aaaahhh?!"

It came back in her memory. Ram's broken, white horn fluttered down in the sky illuminated by flames.

The sense of helplessness she felt when she saw it, the feelings of guilt she had for letting it happen, the silence she had for the broken horn, all of it agonized Rem to the core, and her heart was smashed into pieces.

Rem, arms swinging mindlessly, screamed to fight against the flames that shouldn't have been there.

Ram: “What happened?! Rem, pull yourself together! Look at me, at Onee-chan!”

Frederica: “I-Is it my fault…?!”

Ram: “Whatever, just hold down her legs! Rem! Can you hear me?! Rem!”

The bed towel gets sent flying. Ram and Frederica hold down Rem as she struggled with her swell of emotions. However, Rem couldn’t be stopped, horn formed on her forehead as she fought back with the power of an Oni. Rem forcibly shakes them off in that state.

Rem: “—Ka…u”

The next moment, her arms that she uncontrollably shook stop, and Rem lost the strength in her body.

The cause was the horn—the organ that was the source of an Oni’s strength, and the thing that had to be what made Rem go out of control. Ram, having responsibility for that horn, bites on it as she stimulated it to caress it with her tongue.

Rem gives in to that electrifying, sweet feeling, and she breaks down. Because of that and her chaotic state of mind, Rem fell onto the bed sideways.

Frederica: “H-Has she calmed…down?”

Ram: “Probably. Sheesh, she really is a troublesome girl…”

Lying on the bed, Rem’s expression turned back to her sleeping face that she had just before, and in contrast with her tone, Ram affectionately caressed her sister’s forehead.

Immediately after that, when Ram turned around to face Frederica, she said,

Ram: “Frederica. I’m going to pass out, so I’ll leave the rest to up to you.”

Frederica: “Okay, understood…wait, ‘pass out’?!”

In front of Frederica, who agreed with her in the heat of the moment, Ram wobbled as she made a firm assertion. The peach haired girl collapses to lay next to her sister who looked just like her, and she fell asleep at once.

Frederica, who was pushed around by the Oni sisters, opened her mouth with visible fangs and she said,

Frederica: “…Seriously, what selfish guests!”

Then, raising her voice angrily, she spit out her rage.

3

Fortunately, the second awakening didn’t cause as much confusion to Rem as the first awakening did.

Rem: “…”

A soft bed and pillow, and the feeling of the smooth silk, wrapping her body.

The feelings she perceived even though she was barely awake made Rem understand that what happened before she fell asleep was not just a dream.

She woke up to a room of an unfamiliar building somewhere in the world. Ram, who waited for Rem to wake up, and Frederica, dressed as a maid while having an angry look, had called out to her. And then—

Rem: “Onee-chan’s…horn…”

???: “—It’s an honorable injuuuury. Or at least, that’s what your sister keeps saying. So, you don’t need to feel responsible at all.”

Rem: “…”

Someone replied to her when she was talking to herself, making Rem jump in surprise as she looked to the side. Then, her eyes met the eyes of a white faced man looking at her as he sat in a chair next to the bed.

It was a man who had long indigo blue hair and an aura that strangely stood out. Looks that were too well kept. Heterochromatic eyes that released the charm of his magical looks. But what made his aura seem even stranger was the eccentric, excessive amount of clown makeup that vividly colored his face.

Clown makeup painted his face white and colored along his eyes and lips. He had clothes to go with it, based around stimulating colors, and he wore many unnecessary ornaments.

???: “You look surprised. Well, it makes sense. You just had all these cumbersome incidents happen one after another. Not being able to understand everything right away is natuuuural.”

Rem: “Eh…u-um…”

???: “No no no nooo, you don’t need to force yourself to speak. I’ll wait however long it takes, even if you take your time. Even if it’s after your body heals, again I’ll…”

Putting up his hands, the clown interrupts Rem, who was confused, and he continued speaking. Rem, still feeling the shock from waking up to a clown, becomes flustered by his pushiness.

And then—

Frederica: “—Master, you’ve gone too far with your jokes. Just watching it makes me feel bad for her.”

???l: “…Sheesh, what a kill-joy. Frederica, you are excellent, but you don’t loosen up enouuuugh. And wouldn’t that make you butt heads wiiiiith Clind?”

Frederica: “You don’t have to tell me about my poor compatibility with that thing, Master. Anyways…”

The one who sighed at the smiling clown and lastly looked at Rem was a blond haired maid with an evil face—it was Frederica. Frederica, having her face seen by Rem, did everything she could to speak without showing her fangs.

Frederica: “I’m very glad to see that you’ve woken up again. —You won’t act up this time, right?”

Rem: “…Where’s Onee…-chan?”

Frederica: “—She’s currently in her room. She snuck out of her room many times until you woke up. …You sure are loved.”

Rem: “…”

The word ‘loved’ makes Rem hang her head.

Even she herself didn’t know if it was out of shyness, or if it was out of shame. However, she wanted to see Ram so much right now. I have to go see her, is what she thought to herself.

Rem: “Let me…go see Onee-chan. See Onee-chan…”

???: “Beeeeefore that…”

Rem, removing the blanket as she tried to get up, felt a gentle poke hit her forehead. It was the finger of the clown sitting beside the bed. Rem knew she couldn’t move because of that one finger.

It was a simple touch to the forehead. That was it, and yet she couldn’t move as she shuddered.

???: “I am very aware that you are full of unease from waking up at an unknown place, not seeing your sister, who is your other half. However, that doesn’t mean I can just leave you to do whatever you want…theeeere’s no way I can give you permission to do that. Can I get you to understand that?”

Rem: “…”

???: “Good girl.”

The clown smiles at Rem, who was unable to move her head as she showed approval with just her eyes. And then, once the clown took his finger off her forehead, he waved his finger left and right.

???: “By the way, Rem…or, is it okay if I call you that? Do you remember and understand the truth of what happened to you guys?”

Rem: “…”

???: “Do you know what happened at your guys’ village and why you’re here?”

Rem concentrates on her forehead that had been touched as the clown continued asking her questions. The memory she recalled was one that came back to her from touching Ram when she woke up.

Rem: “…The village…burned. Then, Mom, Dad, Chief, everyone, all of them burned.”

Rem, while searching through her memory with difficulty, imagines the scene of hell in her mind.

The village dyed in red engulfed in flames. Her race so burned that it was impossible to distinguish who was who. Setanta, bursting into flames with a yell. And Ram, horn broken as she screamed, covered in blood—.

Frederica: “…So cruel.”

The memory of the disaster Rem talked about makes Frederica knit her brows sorrowfully.

She talked about it indifferently and emotionlessly, but on the contrary it showed the depth of the emotion scar of the girl who happened to be at the scene.

???: “I seeee. It seems you remember more than I expected, so I guess you understand the situation, too.”

However, the clown nods at Rem’s recollection without batting an eye, and something convinced him. That tone and behavior had neither pity nor sympathy, and as for proof, he clapped his hands lightly and said

???: “Your memory is pretty much accurate. Your village was destroyed, and the only survivors are you and your sister. It’s no longer an exaggeration to say that death is right around the corner for the Oni clan, who have been said to be on the verge of the extinction."

Frederica: "Master?!"

Frederica shrieks at the clown's words that summarized the tragedy lightly to object. However, the clown shook his head at the maid's reaction.

???: "The truth is no different even if I change the way I put it. Beeeesides, the only survivors are the twins Ram and Rem. Surely they know this as well."

Frederica: "But, even so…"

???: " You cannot mix up kindness and spoiling others. The former shows composure, while the latter is a misinterpretation of arrogance."

Frederica keeps silent in response to the sharp speaking, and the clown continued to look at Rem. The clown's behavior didn't hurt Rem, nor did it make her feel sad.

The clown's points were the truth.

She and her sister were the two survivors of the Oni clan now. You could say that her race was practically deprived of their hope and dearest wish. To Rem, that was—

Rem: "As long Onee-chan is there…"

???: "The Oni clan will be peaceful? Sorry to say this, but she lost her horn. An Oni without a horn is not an Oni…that's your guys' unwritten rule, isn't iiiiit?"

Rem: "…"

???: "Or is your sister special to the point of absurdity? It may be true that she had the appropriate qualities to be called the second coming of the Oni God before she lost her horn. Hooooowever, that's now just a dream that faded away like heat haze…the current Ram is a mere no-horn."

Rem: "—! What could you possibly know about Onee-chan?!"

The clown looks upon her sister, and it makes Rem have an outburst of emotions for the first time. Anger returns to her eyes that looked like they were dead up until this point, and the clown delightfully shakes off her hand.

Rem, in her night clothes, shrieks and she messes up the bed sheets. Then,

???: "You finally have a nice expreeeession. Having a conversation with a corpse is no fun. For better or worse, we've finally talked nooooow."

Rem: "You…what? What are you talking about?!"

Rem shows her anger with a loud voice at the clown who made exaggerations frankly as he fixed his collar.

When he listened to that comforting angry voice, the clown got up from his chair and looked down on her. The eyes of the skinny but tall clown make Rem flinch just a bit.

That reaction makes the clown look more and more entertained, while Frederica, standing next to him, sighed and said,

Frederica: "My apologies for introducing him late, Guest. This man is the owner of the mansion and my master, Mr. Roswaal L Mathers the Margrave."

Rem: "Margwabe…"

It was a formal introduction by Frederica, but it was all Greek to Rem.

This place is what she said was a mansion, and the landlord was the clown right before her. Also, if the clown's name was that long, she wouldn't be able to remember it. That's all she understood.

In response to Rem pronouncing the title poorly, the clown looks at Frederica with one eye closed.

Roswaal: “Looks like you’re strict with what a standard response is, even though there’s no way a girl raised in a hidden village deep in the mountains could understand a title of the kingdoooom.”

Frederica: “Urgh…”

Frederica, getting told that, frowns, and then Roswaal looked at Rem as he said,

Roswaal: “To tell you this frankly in a way that you could understand…hmm. I am you and your sister’s benefactor. That should do it, am I riiiiiight?”

The clown—Roswaal says that, and Rem was reflected in his yellow eye while he had his other eye closed. It was a radiance so beautiful that it was entrancing, and yet it was disturbing.

I’m not going to like this man, is what Rem thought to herself.

4

Roswaal: “When I came running to the village, it was already wrapped in flames. I barely managed to find Ram at the mountain path holding you and lying down on the ground. Bringing you home was all I could doooooo.”

Roswaal explains the details of the rescue simply to Rem, who sought an explanation for the truth.

In Rem’s memory, Ram’s horn was broken by shining steel, and it ended with the moment when she witnessed her sister screaming from pain and emptiness. She had no clue what happened to them or how they survived after that.

Roswaal’s explanation was also very much just a summary. However, Ram carried Rem when she was unconscious and fled. —That part felt very believable.

Frederica: “Basically, consider all the factors and believe in Master. That seems to be the conclusion here. Thank goodness there wasn’t anything like denial right off the bat, right Master?”

Roswaal: “Trying to get revenge earlier was quite bold thooouuugh. Anyhow, it’s a good thing that you believe me. As long as you guys are in this mansion, I’ll guarantee your safety.”

Rem: “…So, where is Onee-chan?”

Frederica looks at the master with indifferent eyes, while Roswaal responds to that with a deep nod. Rem skipped over their interaction and prioritized getting back together with Ram, who wasn’t there.

If Ram was in her position, she would be thinking carefully without caring about the lack of a horn. Rem should just follow her sister’s way of doing things and her way of thinking. Just like she always has. Thus—

Rem: “Let me see Onee-chan. I’m worried about Onee-chan.”

Roswaal: “Worried about Onee-chan, you saaaay.”

Roswaal repeats Rem’s words that showed her concern for her sister, and he squinted slightly. Those heterochromatic eyes and speaking that sounded like ridicule make Rem feel discomfort once again.

Once Roswaal responded to Rem by placing his chin on top of his stacked hands, he said,

Roswaal: “Aren’t you really doing this because you yourself can’t stand being anxious…miiiiight that be it?”

Rem: “…”

Frederica: “Master, I’ve been watching, but what is the meaning of all this?”

The one who took Rem’s place, holding her breath, and spoke out against Roswaal’s behavior was Frederica. Forgetting to hide her sharp fangs, she lashes out at the master.

Frederica: “Doing something like digging into the emotional scars of a very young girl over and over…Master would never do such a thing back then.”

Roswaal: “Be nice to little girls”, have you been influenced for worse by Clind?”

Frederica: “This is common sense, and it has nothing to do with that thing’s thoughts whatsoever. Don’t say such disgusting things plea…wait, Master?”

Frederica, who talked back reflexively, had a face that indicated that she noticed he changed the subject at once. She glares at Roswaal with a frown on her face, and she had anger in her jade green eyes.

Frederica: “Just what are you thinking about exactly?”

Roswaal: “About what you call common sense, making sure to be nice to very young girls, of couuuuurse. You know it too, riiiiiight?”

Stopping himself there, Roswaal dares to pause for a moment, and he says,

Roswaal: “—That even if this child were to meet with Ram, it wouldn’t be the result everyone wants.”

Frederica looks down, unable to refute Roswaal’s words. Rem felt like it was an awfully alarmed reaction, and she looked at their faces alternatingly.

She didn’t comprehend the flow of the conversation very well. But, there was something she understood.

Roswaal wouldn’t let Rem and Ram see each other right now. It’d be best for them to not see each other. That’s what he said.

Rem: “Don’t mess with me…”

There was no way in hell she could accept an opinion like that.

Rem stares at Roswaal, voice suppressed while holding grabbing onto the sheets.

Rem: “Let me…see Onee-chan…! Onee-chan…if Onee-chan…”

Roswaal: “You want to see Ram, no matter what?”

Rem: “I-Isn’t that…obvious…? I want to see Onee-chan…let me see her…”

Rem tops off her hostile tone with a question, and she made an ashamed expression unintentionally.

And then, while staring hard at her face, Roswaal said,

Roswaal: “—Sure thing. Well then, let’s bring you to heeeeer.”

Rem: “…Huh?”

Roswaal makes a complete 180 in his opinion, and he approved of Rem’s request just like that. Rem, surprised by that change in attitude, could no longer tell what was Roswaal’s true motive.

Frederica: “I understand your confusion. I feel the same way, after all.”

Frederica lets out a sigh mixed with sympathy and resignation, and she put a thin shawl over Rem’s shoulders. Then, leading Rem by the hand naturally, she makes her stand up next to the bed.

Frederica: “Well then, may I guide Rem-sama?”

Roswaal: “Do as you wish, of course. Hoooowever, don’t forget to do it with caution.”

Frederica: “Yes, I am fully aware. Alright, Rem-sama, come this way.”

Frederica receives the approval from Roswaal, waving his hand, and she guides her out the room. Rem looked back at Roswaal, still feeling unsatisfied while obeying her.

The man dressed as a clown smiles at that look as he went “Hmm?”

with a friendly attitude. That smile makes Rem feel the chills. Once she hurriedly turned away, she ran after Frederica who went ahead.

—The sheer size of the Roswaal mansion went far beyond the limit of Rem's little imagination.

Long, spacious corridors, and red, ankle-deep carpet. To the left and right, there was a multitude of doors to rooms lined up in the stone passageway, and there were furniture and paintings arranged equidistantly.

The scenery outside clearly showed the they were as high as the second floor or above, and the differences between this place and her home that just had one-story houses made the common knowledge inside Rem collapse noisily.

The building chief Sentana lived in was the type of residence Rem was familiar with. It was a house that was just a little big in comparison to Rem's home, but this mansion was a whole new ballpark.

Frederica: "—Please don't think too badly of Master."

Frederica suddenly stops walking and said that to Rem as she was captivated by the scenery that went beyond her imagination.

Those words make Rem look stupefied for a second, and she quickly realized she was having a misunderstanding; a misunderstanding in which she thought that the reason for her silence was because she distrusted Roswaal.

Frederica: "He may behave like that, but Master is a generous and compassionate person. I'm certain he will treat you and your sister well."

While having that misunderstanding, Frederica carefully defends the master that wasn't there.

Frankly speaking, Rem was not interested in Roswaal and Frederica's opinion. The only important matter to Rem was Ram, who should've been in the same mansion.

Roswaal would treat Rem and Ram well. If that was the case—

Rem: “Let me see Onee-chan please.”

For now, she just had to prioritize that over everything. She wouldn’t ask for anything else.

Frederica responds to Rem’s request by closing her eyes, and after that, she continued guiding her again. She exits the corridor along with her, and they used the stairs to head down. She guides Rem to a place very far away from the room she had been in, and Frederica stopped walking as she said “We’re here” to Rem who felt doubt.

Rem: “…”

Rem becomes dumbfounded in front of the door she was guided to, and she was at a loss for words.

In front of her, there was a door with many tightly wound chains with locks, and in addition, even the door itself had a magic circle drawn on it because it provided a perfect seal.

Frederica: “It will take just a minute to open it, so please wait.”

In front of Rem, who was dumbfounded, Frederica used the keys in her hand to undo the chains. Once the chains were unbound with an extremely heavy sound, Frederica put her hand on the door, and she whispered something.

Right after that, the door’s magic circle emitted faint light, and some sort of technique was canceled out. The subsiding light takes Rem’s breath away, and when the light finally completely disappeared from the door,

Frederica: “You’re free to come in.”

Frederica goes off to the side of the door, and she made way for her. Rem blinks her eyes in response to those words, and she timidly reached out for the doorknob as she pushed it open while the wooden door creaked.

Rem: “O-Onee-cha…”

Rem tries to look inside while calling out to her, and the next moment, she bent backwards in a sudden gust. —Actually, it was not wind, but an illusion. Nevertheless, it was so strong that it felt like that.

Rem: "…"

Rem, grinding her teeth, stood firm at that spot. All of her downy hair stood on end, and her instincts ringed an alarm that told her to get out of there as soon as possible. That was Rem's survival instincts; the Oni blood inside her urged her, and she bravely called out to the being she sought for.

However, Rem calms her shaking legs, clenches her chattering teeth, and she held in those desires.

Because inside of the eyes of this girl nearly in tears, her sister suffering in the middle of the room was reflected.

There was an aberrant mana torrent that gave off an oppressive feeling, surrounding the room. The one who was distorting the space into a such a dangerous state that the door had to have a seal applied, was Ram.

Ram: "Aaaah!!"

An empty room with a bed in the center, all other furniture removed. Ram was lying down on the bed, her limbs tied to it with chains, and she was twisting her body vehemently.

It was not movement wanting to be released, but writhing to endure pain. It was almost as if there was something like a raging witchbeast kept inside of Ram, and it startled her back many times.

The bandage on her forehead wrapped around the wound from having lost her horn was now covered with blood, and her beautiful face transformed entirely into an evil, bloody look with the bleeding still not stopping.

Rem: "…"

She was speechless. Rem no longer had any other reaction besides

that.

It was the first time Rem saw her sister have an uncalm expression and her being on a rampage. The feeling of oppression that pierced her whole body and even aroused her survival instincts was undoubtedly caused by Ram's Oni nature. It was something Ram, who spoiled her sister, never directed towards Rem up to this point.

Unexpectedly, the proof of this was that Ram wasn't able to recognize Rem at this time.

Frederica: "…I'm sure that she won't harm you if you get closer."

Frederica calls out to Rem, who stopped at the entrance, not stepping into the room. Her low voice makes Rem come to her senses, and she looked back at Frederica while being focused on her sister.

Rem: "Why…is she like this…she was calm when she woke up earlier…"

Frederica: "She continued to steel herself until Rem-sama came back to her senses. Meanwhile, she had many impulses that were like seizures, but she would pull herself together through sheer force of will. She has a strong heart. But even then…"

"That was what she dealt with until Rem woke up", is what Frederica said with her eyes, not her mouth. That truth shattered her, because after all, Ram simply wished for Rem's recovery, who continued to sleep, staying by her side while holding back her impulses.

Rem: "…"

Even after knowing that truth, Rem didn't try to run up to Ram. Rem's survival instincts, of course, made her fully realize her own powerlessness.

Ram was currently like this because of the disruption in mana circulation due to losing her horn.

As an Oni, Ram's body was extraordinary enough to be classified as something supernatural, and even maintaining it required an enormous amount of mana. Originally her horn would be there to make that mana circulate efficiently.

However, Ram lost her horn, and even then her body raised a voice of hunger, seeking mana.

Mana gathered accordingly with that scream, but the horn to take it in wasn't functioning. Therefore, the mana drifted into empty space, having lost its place to go, and it generated a semi-artificial mana storm.

At this rate, a colorless power would rage in the middle of this room before long, and destruction would commence. And when that happens, the one to be damaged would be Ram, who was in the middle of the room—.

Frederica: "Fortunately, it's never gotten to the point of a mana storm occurring. This is because of the she's held down by force just before that happens, scattering the collected mana."

Rem: "But that's…"

Frederica: "…I know. There's no way it could be done so many times."

Sooner or later, failure would arrive. And from seeing how Ram was currently, it wasn't going to be later.

When failure arrived, in that moment, Ram's life would—

Frederica: "Rem-sama?!"

The instant Rem came to that conclusion, she shook off her hesitation and ran. That behavior makes Frederica raise her voice, but Rem put her call behind her and ran as fast as she could.

She was…not headed towards Ram's side as she continued to suffer. Rem, rushing out of the room, dashes through the stairs and the corridor she had used to walk over there, and she tumbled into the very first room she woke up in.

She opens the door violently and looked inside angrily. Inside there was still a man dressed as a clown. He looks towards the door, as if he knew that Rem would return, and he smiled at the girl breathing heavily.

Roswaal: “Look at what we have here, why are you in such a rush? Didn’t you say that you wanted to see your sister?”

Rem: “…”

Roswaal’s superficial words make Rem open and close her mouth repeatedly while sweat showed on her forehead. She had words in her head that needed to be said, but there was also slight hesitation in there as well.

However, the hesitation was smashed by her sister’s look of anguish that came to her mind, and it vanished.

Rem: “P-Plea…se. …Save…Onee-chan.”

Rem, blue eyes filled with tears, desperately begged Roswaal while her voice shook.

She had no definite proof, and not even a basis that said this was the right choice. And yet, Rem was naturally convinced by her instincts.

—If it was Roswaal, Ram could be saved.

He could save her sister, who lost her horn and was suffering from her body that was out of control, and the mana that couldn’t be taken in.

Roswaal closed one eye in response to Rem’s begging. Once again, being stared at by his yellow eyes, Rem summons her spirit that cowered in fear, and she faced him. There were several tens of seconds with them being like that.

Roswaal: “I took you guys out from the burning Oni village. At that point, I’ve already saved your lives once. You still have something to ask of me on top of that?”

Rem: “…”

Roswaal: “If I do that, I would then have saved your guys’ lives not once, but twice. In that case, what can you do for me? What would you have to offer?”

Roswaal’s words demanding compensation make Rem stiffen her startled face.

Requesting something, and wishing for something. It would be natural to have to pay the price if one wanted to do those things. Rem realized that obvious fact just now.

It was proof of how much Rem had been spoiled growing up thus far.

All throughout Rem’s life so far, she would always—no, she would receive things only from her sister Ram. She never begged for something from her parents and her race. However, Ram was the only one who was different.

Rem was always spoiled by Ram’s love, and she lived her days only being the receiver.

That’s why not even one of the vital words were prepared when this natural fact was in front of her.

Rem: “…”

Rem kept silent in front of Roswaal, while he stayed silent and waited for an answer. He wasn’t doing it in a hurrying manner or a shocked manner, but the clear feeling of impatience burned Rem’s heart.

Even now, at this very moment Ram was still suffering in that room. And each second of this hesitation and doubt could be something fatal to her sister.

She couldn’t stand it, and it was something that couldn’t happen. So, before it did—

Rem: “What I…can give…”

Roswaal: “Go on.”

His urging words make Rem gulp, and she wets her dry lips as she closed her eyes.

Then, she immediately opened her eyes, and she stared at Roswaal from the front and said this.

Rem: “—What I can give…is only myself. I’ll do…anything. I’ll do anything you say. So, please. Save…Onee-chan.”

Roswaal: “…”

Rem: “Please. Please. Plea…se…”

Rem gets on her knees, and she begged while rubbing her forehead against the floor.

The reason tears welled up in her eyes wasn’t because she felt miserable or pathetic. It wasn’t even shame or chagrin. She didn’t know the reason. The tears just welled up.

Rem begs him again and again and again while dirtying the floor with tears and mucus.

Just how many times did she repeat her words while being like that? Suddenly, the presence of a person stood in front of her eyes. When she nervously lifted her head, she saw Roswaal.

Roswaal: “—Those are the words I wanted to hear.”

Rem: “…Ah”

Roswaal: “Offering yourself for your sister’s sake. Truly beautiful. That’s my type of answer.”

In front of Rem, her eyes blinking, Roswaal brought out a handkerchief from his pocket. He puts that on Rem’s cheek as she sobbed, and lifted her small body sunk down to the floor.

Roswaal winks at Rem, who was carried in his surprisingly sturdy arms as she held her breath.

Roswaal: “Well, let’s go. You seeee, I am used to becoming the benefactor of someone’s life. I’ll work something out somehow right away. After that, let’s talk about you guys.”

Rem: “About…us…?”

Roswaal: “You said that you’d do anything, didn’t you? Then that means you are mine. And if that’s the case, then it’s natural to talk about how you’ll be treated. —Is it not?”

While walking, Roswaal continued with a face that made it seem like he’d already saved Ram. Although that behavior and details made Rem open her eyes wide, she understood him.

There was no doubt that Rem chose the best hand she could get to save her sister.

However, that might’ve been as reckless as voluntarily taking the hand of a devil.

Roswaal: “For maid clothes that suit your physique…that’s something that should only be discussed with Clind, yeeeees.”

Then, that’s what Rem thought to herself while looking up at Roswaal who walked as he hummed a tune.

5

Rem: “…”

Rem, sitting on a chair next to the bed, stared at her calm sister’s sleeping face like a hawk.

This was the first time in her life Rem got the chance to see her sister’s sleeping face. Long eyelashes, and small, thin lips. She vaguely thought that her sister’s sleeping face was cute, contrary to her gallant behavior.

Ram, breathing in and out on the bed, was taken out of that firmly sealed room, and she was now put to sleep at a place next door to the room Rem first woke up in.

This was also proof of Roswaal guaranteeing that Ram wouldn't randomly damage her surroundings with her power.

—Roswaal dealt with Rem's appeal way too easily.

Roswaal, who had headed towards the room with Rem in his arms, had walked up to Ram as her power went out of control and put his hand on her forehead, using an enormous amount of mana. The treatment finished just like that in a matter of seconds, and when she realized it, Ram was already sound asleep.

However, even Rem, a failure as an Oni, understood at a glance just how unorthodox that treatment was, which was performed in mere seconds.

Roswaal made the enormous amount of mana Ram pulled in harmless, and at the same time he did work that sent in the mana necessary to maintain Ram's body. He was practically using multiple magic all at once, and it was basically a feat that could only be pulled off by someone that was far more skilled than others.

Frederica: "Master is the head of the Mathers family and the best magic user in the kingdom."

That was Frederica's prideful sounding explanation to Rem, who was amazed by that act.

She didn't really know what the extent of a kingdom was, but at the very least, she understood the fact that Roswaal was the best out of the many people he was compared to.

Having qualities of excellence, that basically meant he was the same as Ram, who was a top Oni.

She was forced to realize it at the Oni village, but it was the same deal even with the outside world. Rem was forced to realize that in this world there were many people out of her reach with extraordinary wit.

Even among such great men, Ram's qualities should've been conspicuously excellent, and yet—

Ram: “…Rem”

Rem: “—?! Onee-chan, you’re awake?!”

A voice slipped into Rem eardrums as she went into deep thought, and she jumped on the bed. Then, Ram, lying down, opened her eyes slightly and Rem reflected in her light pink eyes.

Her face still looked tired from suffering, but Rem was relieved by the fact that she woke up.

Ram: “I…”

Rem: “Y-You should get more rest. Ummm, it was really bad until just now, but…erm…”

Ram: “…Rem, you don’t to have to hurry yourself. Take your time speaking.”

Seeing Rem not having the words come out of her mouth while being flustered, Ram says that to her as she had a slight smile on her face.

Rem received care from Ram who had been sleeping just a moment ago, and she felt so pathetic that it was unbearable, just like always. However, she didn’t want to look down here.

Because if she made Ram worry by doing that, she would forget why she was even there.

Rem: “Onee-chan’s…body…it went through…a lot of trouble.”

Ram: “…That seems to be true. It troubles me that it didn’t listen even though it’s my own body. Though it was troublesome when it happened, what’s gone is gone, and that bothers me.”

Rem: “You mean…your horn?”

Ram: “Yes, my horn. Without that, my body can’t be maintained properly. This’ll even cause trouble for Rem. I’m worried about the future…”

Rem: “If you are! If you are…don’t worry, it’ll be fine…”

Rem made her voice louder in response to Ram, who touched her forehead wrapped in a bandage while making a pensive look. That makes Ram open her eyes wide as Rem continued while having her hands on the bed.

Rem: “It’s terrible that Onee-chan’s body…lost its horn…but I… made a request. And so, he’ll take care of it from now on, is what Roswaal-sama…”

Ram: “—’Roswaal-sama’?”

However, in the middle of that statement, Ram’s very displeased voice interrupts her.

When the sound of that dangerous voice made Rem gasp, Ram touched her cheeks softly with her eyes squinted. And then, while Ram gently caressed Rem’s cheeks she said,

Ram: “Tell me, Rem. Why did you say that man’s name with a ‘-sama’?”

Rem: “Because, erm…Onee-chan…looked like she was in pain…”

Ram: “I looked like I was in pain, and what else?”

Rem answers while being startled from her worry about if she had did something bad. She presses her to continue by saying “and what else?”, then Rem said this while looking down.

Rem: “I told him I’d do anything to save Onee-chan…and then Roswaal-sama…said that he wishes for me to work at this mansion…”

Ram: “…He said that he wishes for you to become his?”

She nodded. To put it accurately, he didn’t say it to her; Rem said it herself. However, there was a peremptory force in Ram’s voice, and so Rem nodded to end with a brief answer.

That answer makes Ram closes her eyes for a brief period, and after that, with a low voice as if forced out of her lips, she said,

Ram: "—That man really is toying with us."

Rem: "…What?"

Ram: "Him taking advantage of Rem's kindness and using me to make you his is proof that his heart is rotten to the core. And on top of that, he has a twisted personality and he's a sophist…aah, damnit!"

Ram expressed her emotions to an unusual extent and she clicked her tongue as she threw her head onto the pillow.

Ram was always calm, and she was never infuriated. That's exactly why she had never seen her raise her voice besides the night when the village was destroyed. And yet…

Rem: "Onee-chan, it's okay. I can…do my best. For Onee-chan's sake…"

Ram: "You can't, Rem. That won't work. The two of us have already been set up by that man."

Rem: "—?"

A question mark floated on Rem's head as she couldn't understand the reply. When Ram sat up again in response to Rem being like that, she brushed up the hair over her ears as she said,

Ram: "Let me rephrase that. The two of us have been set up by that man…by Roswaal-sama."

Rem: "By Roswaal-sama…ah"

Rem thinks over the way Ram said that, and that's when she too finally realized it.

Ram let out a long, deep sigh at Rem as she made that enlightened reaction.

Ram: "…I said it when I ran away from the village and was found by that man. “Save Rem, I beg of you.” And then that man asked me what I could do for him.”

Rem: “…”

Ram: “Even when he said that he wouldn’t force Rem to do anything…he set us up good.”

Ram clicks her tongue, feeling regret from the bottom of her heart. She understood that she did this because Ram herself was the cause for Rem seeking help from Roswaal, and that it wasn’t even because Roswaal violated the words “I won’t force Rem”, which he did because she sought help.

Ram’s body going out of control, Rem’s begging, none of that mattered to Roswaal. That was the truth—.

Ram: “And that’s how that man successively made you and I his… that’s how it is, huh.”

Rem: “…”

Ram: “Rem, why do you look so happy from listening to what I’ve said?”

Rem: “What?”

Rem puts her hands on her cheeks, flustered from her sister’s point, and she was surprised by the fact that she looked happy. Then her eyes wander as she tried to figure out what to say to Ram, who looked like she wanted to hear her reason.

Rem: “I was happy…that Onee-chan did the same as me. And, um…”

Just like she did, Ram also said that she’d offer herself for Rem’s sake. That was crystal clear, and yet she was so happy that she wanted to cry.

Ram: “…Good point.”

Ram, upon hearing Rem’s reply, nodded with a dumbfounded look on her face. The anger that she had in her eyes just now vanished, and she gazed at Rem with only the color of love in them.

Ram: “I’m happy, too. That Rem said such a thing for Onee-chan’s sake.”

Rem: “Yes, me too. …I’m happy, too.”

Rem climbs onto the bed, and she embraced Ram, who was smiling. And then Ram hugged her spoiled sister as she patted her head affectionately.

Something terribly heart-breaking happened, things were only being lost, and the pain that hurt them wasn’t healed. But even then, their existences for each other, that most precious thing in this world wasn’t lost.

The Oni sisters embrace each other to confirm that, and they spent a few moments together with just the two of them in the world.

Yes, they were two people in the world, not just twins who were irreplaceable to each other. Rem and Ram were now the only two left with the Oni blood.

Even in that sense, they were alone—.

Ram: “—The four people.”

Rem: “…Onee-chan?”

An impurity gets mixed into their time of love and embracing.

When Rem raised her face in response to Ram’s murmur, she saw her sister’s facial expression with her lips closed. And then Ram said this while keeping the same expression.

Ram: “The four people that attacked the village got away. We must find them.”

Rem: “The four people…that attacked the village…”

Upon hearing the details contents of Ram’s words, Rem opened her eyes wide and repeated them.

The damnable people who burned the Oni village with fire and killed her parents and her race. Those enemies were the four people.

Find them, is what Ram certainly said. And then Rem agreed not with her emotions, but by instinct. —That had to be accomplished.

“Since the four people who got away were trying to exterminate the Oni clan, they might be going for them, the survivors.” It wasn’t a self-protective idea like that. The matter was much more simple.

Ram: “Retribution. We have to obtain it. —We must wreak the grudge of our kind.”

Call it revenge, reprisal, retribution, vengeance, whatever. It didn’t matter.

In any case, it had to be done. It needed to be done.

Rem didn’t think this because her sister told her; it was the instincts that slept inside Rem as an Oni. It screamed loudly and spoke to her. Get revenge, get retribution, show your pride—.

Ram: “All of them will be found and killed. Otherwise, the disgrace of the Oni clan won’t get wiped out.”

Rem: “Find them…?”

Ram: “To do that, let’s use whatever’s available to us. —We might as well even use Roswaal-sama, who should be elated right now.”

Find the four enemies in this wide world—just how difficult could that be?

Ram nods reassuringly at Rem, who still had anxiety while her Oni instincts were pushing her. Seeing her sister’s determination, Rem felt the very same sense of security she had once felt before.

Even if she lost her horn, Ram was still Ram, and she was the noble “real deal”, stronger than everyone.

Thus—

Rem: “Yes, got it. …I’ll do my best along with Onee-chan.”

Rem’s sister simply having one word to say ignited her soul, even more than her instincts as an Oni did.

It came from Ram. Ram was always right. That’s why she was right now, from now on, and forever. Her sister would continue being Rem’s guide, no doubt about it.

The Oni village was gone, Ram lost her horn, but they could still be together.

If that was the case, then nothing would change. Rem believed that, and it was engraved in her mind.

With just a quiet voice—

Rem: “…I’m sorry.”

The village burned away, her parents and race were killed, and yet she didn’t feel any deep sorrow.

So many things were taken from her, but she was saved by the fact that Ram would still stay by her side.

Ram: “It’ll be okay, Rem. I will…Onee-chan will always be with you.”

Ram, without questioning her, said that in response to Rem’s words that were just an apology, just like always.

Closing her eyes from the feeling of her sister’s warmth and the gentle touch of her hands, Rem leaves everything up to her.

Praying that she could keep doing so from now on, just like she always has up to this point.

—Embracing each other, the Oni sisters both swear to get retribution in the world with just the two of them.

Chapter 3:
A New Life and the Start of Revenge

1

—The Oni sisters' life at the mansion first started with lots of learning.

Frederica: "Since we are becoming coworkers at the mansion, don't expect me to treat you like I have been. From now on I'll be guiding you without holding back, so please prepare yourself."

That was the first kind instruction Frederica gave on the first morning of their maid life.

They had been guests up until the day before, but the girl acted in a way that showed they were coworkers from this morning on, and Rem felt nervous as she stood next to Ram. They were gathered at the mansion's entry hall, and from here their new life would truly begin. However, she was worried about—

Rem: "Onee-chan, are you really fine? You can still rest…"

Ram: "I'm fine. Don't make me act like a monster by letting Rem work alone. I want to be the one to suffer instead of Rem. If that's not possible, then I want to suffer together."

Rem: "Onee-chan…"

Frederica: "I didn't say that you should have such tragic readiness! You're making me look bad!"

Ram still wasn't even fully recovered, and yet she insisted on working with Rem. While worrying about Ram's stubborn attitude, Rem gazed at her sister's appearance from top to bottom.

Rem: "Onee-chan looks cute…"

Ram: "Yep. I look good in anything, so that's a given. But, Rem is cute, too. To be honest, you're so cute that I'm just dying to stroke you.”

Ram, thin chest puffed up with pride, smiled pridefully—she was wearing a pinafore based around the colors white and black, and it was what people called maid clothes. Of course, Rem was also wearing the same uniform, but in comparison to Ram who was as gorgeous as her dress, she couldn’t help worrying about how poor she looked in it.

It was far too early for an eight year old girl to worry about something like that. Besides, the question was if there were maid clothes in this mansion that fit little girls.

Although, the answer to that question was standing at this place calmly with confidence.

???: “—Yes, I feel the exact same way. It fits you two very well. It was well worth the trouble to make over the maid clothes the beautiful Oni sisters are wearing. A sight for sore eyes.”

The one who said that with a bow was a slender faced handsome young man wearing black butler clothes. His hair, more dark blue than Rem’s, was carefully fixed, and the impression of his sharp eyes was softened by a monocle. He looked around 20 years old, but there was something strange about his aura that wouldn’t let her sense his age.

This smiling young man was the one behind the tailored maid clothes that fit the sisters perfectly. Using flowery words, the young man complemented the sisters standing close to each other. However—

Frederica: “You mind not looking at them with filthy eyes?”

It was the disapproval of Frederica as she stepped in between the young man and the sisters with scorn in her jade eyes. And then the young man also sharpened his look at Frederica, who interfered.

???: “Stop being so sure that it’s the outrageous, Frederica. I was just genuinely loving those with a pure soul. The reason why you feel like that is filthy is simply because your eyes and heart are filthy as someone who is reading too much into it. You should reflect upon yourself. Reflect.”

Frederica: “Now don’t you have a way with words. How do you rephrase having a messed up lust for little girls like that? Simply calling it a mystery won’t cut it.”

???: “One-sided views and close minded, truly foolish. Besides, it’s wrong to think of it as having lust for young girls. I love pure souls. Therefore, boys are also included. Indiscriminate.”

Frederica: “I’m not concerned with how it’s inconsistent, I am saying that you ought to know better!”

Frederica, face red as she yelled at the young man that threw his chest out confidently, held onto her head in her hands.

Frederica: “Good grief…why is this our head butler? I support most of Master’s judgements, but this one is definitely wrong.”

???: “The master trusts my work, so I’m responsible for everything. That’s all. Natural.”

Frederica: “Your sound arguments seriously irritate me, Clind…!”

The young man kept a cool face in response to Frederica who shouted regretfully. Rem, using that pause in the conversation, pinches the edges of her skirt as she said,

Rem: “Umm, Clind-san…thank you. It fits…perfectly.”

Frederica: “So perfectly that it’s suspicious, that is. When did you take the measurements of their bodies?”

Clind: “It’s a divine protection power. When I look at a person’s body, I can see through all of it. Magical eyes.”

Frederica: “That’s a lie! Right?”

Clind: “Of course, I was joking. We have known each other for such a long time, why are you so surprised? Does not compute.”

Frederica had no words for the behavior of the young boy—Clind who told a lie shamelessly. Apparently Clind always had a slight edge on Frederica. That was how Rem grasped their relationship.

Frederica and Clind, these were the two people taking charge of guiding Rem and Ram's maid life at the mansion. They may be quarrelling like this at the moment, but their conduct actually looked resolved even to the untrained eye, and Rem also unconsciously stood as stiff as a ramrod as someone who wasn't taught anything yet.

Ram: "I understand our position now. On another note, may I ask something?"

Clind: "Ask away, Miss."

Ram: "About the employees working at the mansion, there's an awful lot of Demi-humans. …Or well, that's not quite it. I'm concerned about how there are only Demi-humans. Why is it like this?"

Rem tilts her head at her sister's words prompting them to shift their attention towards contemplating the mansion.

Rem: "Is there something weird…about having a lot of Demi-humans?"

Ram: "Rem might not get it right away since there was only our race at the village. But, that's strange for the outside world. Besides, Roswaal-sama is a human, right?"

Clind: "Indeed, Master is a human. An eagle eye."

Ram: "And so, this is the Kingdom of Lugunica. Mind giving me a logical explanation for all this?"

When Clind agreed with her point, Ram sharpened her eyes. They weren't sharp enough to call them dangerous, but Ram was being cautious of something. Rem also held onto her sister's sleeve because of her anxiety.

Frederica: "Indeed, everyone in this mansion is a Demi-human.

Among the gossip that goes around, there are also voices that call Master “Demi-human Lover”.”

Ram: “That’s quite the crude name.”

Frederica: “Frankly, I assert it to be groundless.”

When Frederica took a step forward in response to Ram’s scornful tone, she continued while looking down on the sisters.

Frederica: “Master invites Demi-humans with no place to go into the mansion, and he gives them work and education. That’s how he gives, and he doesn’t ask for anything in return. It’s all purely Master’s good will.”

Ram: “Right. However, that doesn’t seem to apply to Rem and I.”

Rem also nodded many times in her head to agree with Ram’s objection.

He doesn’t ask for anything in return for his charity. That’s what Frederica said about Roswaal, but it was the exact opposite Rem and Ram. Rem and Ram were asked for compensation to save their respective sister, and this current situation came about by offering themselves. It was a completely different story.

When Frederica quickly squinted her jade green eyes at their reaction, she said,

Frederica: “Perhaps he thought about how you two would rush out of the mansion if he didn’t create ties like that. Can you deny that?”

Ram: “…”

Frederica: “Then that silence proves the accuracy of Master’s thoughts.”

Ram chose to be silent because that was most likely the bulls-eye.

The sisters were both put under Roswaal’s care. If they weren’t, they would’ve rushed out of the mansion, and at about this time they might’ve been on a reckless journey for the Oni clan’s revenge.

Even Rem, someone ignorant, could imagine that to be something absurd.

Ram: "…Fine. Roswaal-sama is a benevolent person that helps Demi-humans who lack the ability to live uneducated. Let's leave it at that. Besides, it's not like we are in a position to complain, being under Roswaal-sama's care."

Frederica: "You have a sharp way of speaking, don't you. I understand how Master feels, too. If he doesn't make ties with reasons, you'll leave…that's what makes him anxious."

Ram, with a discouraged look, snorts at Frederica's speaking.

Ram: "Whatever the case is, we have a goal. Whether we stay in the mansion or not won't change that fact. We have strong determination to accomplish it. And well…until we accomplish it, I swear to "Ban Steamed Potatoes"."

Rem: "O-Onee-chan…no way, are you serious…?!"

Frederica: "There's a very huge gap between Rem's reaction and how I feel!"

Rem was extremely disturbed by Ram's oath, but Frederica didn't feel that shock.

Frederica: "…Anyway, I'm going to start guiding you. But, I must first explain an important rule."

Rem: "A rule…"

Frederica, arms folded, says those words, and it makes Rem's ears twitch. A rule. Perhaps that was something like the laws at the Oni village. She didn't have a very good impression of laws.

According to an Oni clan law, twins were cursed children, and if that was true, then the sisters Rem and Ram would've been killed. She couldn't remember how many hundreds of times she was told, "It didn't end like that thanks to Ram".

It was painful whenever she was told that, but it was engraved so deeply in her mind that she'd never forget it.

That's why Rem got ready for Frederica to tell her something harsh. But—

Frederica: "In this mansion, the leading servants are to be referred to as Nii-sama and Nee-sama, me included. As for myself, it would be Frederica Nee-sama."

Rem: "—Huh?"

Frederica: "As I said, 'Nee-sama'. You would call me Frederica Nee-sama…why are you giving me that look?"

Frederica opens her eyes wide at Rem, who was baffled as she couldn't understand what she was told. To her side, Ram had a completely unamused look, and Frederica compared the sisters' faces as she says this in panic,

Frederica: "Might you wait a second? I am not the one who suggested this. It's a tradition of this mansion…and it's also a rule for those who become servants of the Mathers family…"

Rem: "But, Frederica-san…doesn't even call Clind-san 'Nii-san'…"

Based off of their appearances, Clind was definitely Frederica's senior.

Frederica was unable to respond to Rem's genuine question as she went "Agh".

Frederica: "Y-You see, that's because…"

Clind: "She may be like this now, but there was a time when even Frederica was pure and innocent. Back then she was charming in that she'd look up to me as 'Clind Nii-sama'…but time is cruel. Heartless."

Frederica: "Don't just talk about that so calmly!! A-Anyways…"

Frederica shouts at Clind, who shook his head regretfully, and she cleared her throat.

Frederica: “The tradition should be protected. So, try it. Call me Frederica Nee-sama.”

Rem: “Um, but…”

Frederica: “It’s just a tradition, come on now. Moreover, I’ll be moving a lot closer to you, which is for the future, too.”

Rem looks at Ram, who was next to her, in response to Frederica’s firm insistence as she brought her face close at once. Ram had no words for Rem’s look, but the corners of her eyes and her cheeks were slightly stiff.

It was because she was feeling angry or irritated. Those type of emotions. To put it frankly, Ram was in a bad mood now.

As for the reason why she was—

Ram: “Rem’s sister…Rem has only one Nee-sama, and that’s me. Don’t be so selfish.”

Frederica: “…That’s a surprisingly cute reason for your sulkiness.”

Ram: “Huh? You’re ridiculous. I stand by my reasoning. Can there be anything more important in this world?”

Ram, slender arms folded, stuck her chest out and confidently declared that. She still looked pitiful with a bandage wrapped under her head dress, but that attitude certainly was the almighty Ram Rem knew.

Thus, Rem also nodded in accordance with Ram’s intentions.

Rem: “Um, there…is only one Onee-chan for me and that’s Onee-chan, so…”

Frederica: “Hmph, even Rem-san, too. …But, it’s a tradition, you know?”

Rem: “I’m sorry.”

Rem, bowing as she apologized, made Frederica’s shoulders tremble slightly. Clind said “Apologize” once he gently tapped her shoulder as he shook his head.

Clind: “When they’re this insistent, it’s time to give it up. Besides, even though they’re going to be maids at the mansion, they’re still young. Little girls.”

Frederica: “They’re young”, that’s your reasoning?”

Clind: “—? Yes, that’s it. What about it? Argument.”

Frederica: “I am sick and tired of your reasoning!!”

Frederica shakes off Clind’s hand, who had a curious look, and she let out a deep sigh. Then, she smoothed down her blond hair, and she looked down regretfully.

Frederica: “Understood. Shelving the tradition for now, let’s move on to the next topic. …Ahh, I was hoping that they’d call me Nee-sama too…”

Ram: “Sounds like Frederica is just as sinful as Clind.”

Frederica: “I may have given up on being called Nee-sama, but at least say my name with a ‘-san’!”

Frederica, who was disappointed, raised her voice at Ram, and then she started to move at once. Clind also walks next to her, and Rem and Ram follow from behind as well.

And then, when Rem suddenly had a realization and looked back at Ram she said,

Rem: “…Nee-sama”

Ram: “…”

Rem: “Erm, I just wanted to try saying it.”

Rem, becoming embarrassed, looks away, and she walked faster as even her ears turned red. Seeing Rem walk ahead hastily like that, Ram’s mouth loosened slightly.

Ram: “Haha”

Then, she snorted her nose in a pleased way.

2

Roswaal: “Heeeeey, Rem. Good work. Are you used to the mansion noooooow?”

Rem: “Ah, Roswaal-sama…ah”

Rem gets called out to while she was cleaning the mansion’s parlor, and she turns around in surprise. Rem, bucket of water in her hands, staggers slightly, but

Roswaal: “Oh, careful careful.”

Roswaal, coming a step closer to her, holds up her shoulder, and she just barely avoided falling. When Rem let out a sigh of relief, she immediately panicked and bowed her head.

Rem: “Thank you very much. My sincere apologies for this.”

Roswaal: “What, it’s no big deeeeal. …Oh another thing, I should’ve said this earlier, but you’ve got the style of speech down as well.”

Rem: “Frederica-sama…treats me with tender care, so…”

Rem, responding while sounding embarrassed, speaks of the results from Frederica’s guidance.

Rem and Ram have already been working at the Mathers mansion as maids for one month—during that time, Frederica and Clind helped them as their leaders.

They both were very kind to the young sisters, and although they quarreled with each other, they showed loving care. Apparently, in the mansion training plan, work wasn’t the only thing they had to learn. Speech was a given, then there was reading and writing of the alphabet, numerical calculations, as well as common knowledge—there were too many things to count.

Roswaal: “It seems like you’re enjoying your time here somewhaaaat.”

Rem: “I have fun learning new things. …But…”

Rem smiled as she chatted with the master, but she suddenly looked down sadly and stopped talking. It had to be because of something about the contents of this conversation.

Roswaal: “Do you feel guilt in your chest? Or is it perhaps pangs of your conscience?”

Rem: “…”

Roswaal: “The Oni village burned down, and your parents and kind were all killed. And yet, here you are starting a new life. …Is that weighing on your conscience?”

She didn’t say anything, and yet Roswaal correctly guessed what Rem was feeling inside as if he’d seen it.

She felt satisfied. It may not have been perfect, but at the very least, Rem spent her days at the mansion until today without feeling anything that seemed like dissatisfaction.

Rem had a surprising aptitude for housework, manual labor, and service. It was something that was improving conspicuously during this one month under Frederica and the others’ guidance.

It was a fact Rem didn’t know at the Oni village, and it was something she was never able to feel as someone who always had an “I can’t do anything” inferiority complex at the village.

—She came here after the village was ruined, and yet she felt more fulfilled than before it fell into ruin.

If that was the case, then it was as if she was happy now because of the village being destroyed.

Roswaal: “You see, I believe that the environment is more important than living.”

Rem: “…What?”

Roswaal: “No matter what talent you’re born with, suitable soil, sunlight, and water are needed for that seed to grow. That’s what an environment is, and that’s what the most important factor is for many things.”

Roswaal tells that to Rem, who hung her head, with a soft tone. He had very calm emotion in his eyes, Rem couldn’t move and it was as if she was entranced.

Roswaal: “If the environment changes you for the better, then that would be something you should be happy about. No matter what, do not curse the events. That would be a sin and a whole different matter.”

Rem: “…”

Roswaal: “Someone said something similar to me before too. In actuality, I do believe it. If the environment is a part of life’s journey, then meetings are, too. I was blessed with an environment. I was blessed with meetings. I’ve never regretted that, nor have I ever cursed it.”

Rem, seeing Roswaal declare that frankly, trembles so much that she started to feel a mysterious emotion.

It was strength. It was the same thing as Rem’s longing to be strong like her sister.

Rem: “I see that even Roswaal-sama has someone in his life like that.”

Roswaal: “Woops, that was a slip of the tooooongue. It’s embarrassing, so keep it a secret from the others, alright?”

Rem, with a slight smile, nodded at Roswaal, who put his finger on his lips. The behavior of this funny and friendly master made Rem change her opinion on him quite a bit in this past month.

At the very start, she thought he was someone she wouldn’t like when she first met him, but her feelings changed when he was this considerate and kind to her. Her doubt became gratitude, and then her gratitude became loyalty.

Rem had no problems at all with working at the mansion now like this.

However—

Rem: “The witch cult”

Roswaal: “Hmm”

Rem: “They are the people who attacked the village.”

Roswaal: “I guess Frederica and maybe Clind told you. They do spoil you, after all. I could’ve sworn I told them specifically to not let you know about it.”

Roswaal’s reaction of looking up with a troubled expression convinced Rem.

The witch cult—that was a part of her maid education, and it was a name that came up many times when she was studying the outside world’s common knowledge and history. They were a group of heretics that were treated as those to be detest throughout the world. Their numbers, their principles behind activities, everything was veiled in mystery, but the one thing that was certain was the worshipping of their “Witch of Envy”.

The worst existence that engulfed half of the world with shadow, known as the disaster of all disasters—even Rem, someone who was secluded at a village, knew that much about the rare evil existence.

This group that believed in such a witch surely were the ones who attacked the Oni village.

Rem: “It was neither Frederica-sama nor Clind-sama. I just heard about the witch cult, and when I thought about the village again…”

Roswaal: “You thought that they did it. If that’s the case, then I was the one to make a slip of the tongue, not the two of them. You sure got me theeeere. Today I am just a hopeless blabbermouth.”

Roswaal sighed exaggeratedly as he went “I screwed up”. He turns around his body there, and with his closed eye he faced Rem as she stared at him.

Roswaal: “About my answer just now…I meant that I think it was probably them. For circumstantial evidence, them being the witch cult indicates it, but it does nothing more than that, and nothing less than that.”

Rem: “Is it because…the witch cult…doesn’t leave behind anything?”

Roswaal: “Whether they are the assailants or the victims, that’s how it is. They won’t leave anything behind at the devastated scene. Soooo, it’s the same deal with your guys’ village.”

When the witch cult decides on their target, the place, people, and soil are extirpated. Even if the witch cult is repelled, the driven off witch believers wouldn’t leave behind anything and they’d hold their tongues.

Therefore, even though witch cult was detested everywhere, for hundreds of years they acted as they pleased.

Rem: “Witch cult…”

Once again, Rem grits her teeth at the truth Roswaal told her. Her small chest burned with endless regret, the flame of anger, and above all, a strong sense of duty.

It wasn’t just because her Oni blood wanted retribution; it was also for her oath with Ram.

Getting revenge on them was something Ram decided, and it was even a wish. That’s why, no matter what,— Roswaal: “That’s why, Rem. If possible, I don’t want you guys to live only for revenge.”

Rem: “—Huh?”

However, Roswaal suddenly poured cold water on Rem, who had her spirit burning.

When Rem opened her eyes wide in response to the master's statement, with sorrow clouding his eyes, Roswaal said,

Roswaal: "It is true that you should detest someone who burned your brethren unreasonably. But you see, you and Ram are still young, and you have a future ahead of you. There's no need to insist on getting revenge, doing something that would be like wearing away your body and soul. That's what I believe."

He denies her revenge in an unexpected way, and Rem wasn't sure how to answer.

In the eyes of Roswaal, who looked down on Rem, there was only the color of pure concern for her. Those numerous factors were speaking to her saying that getting the Oni clan's revenge wasn't realistic.

Even Rem understood that. But, even then, this was something Ram wanted.

Just that was more than enough to—

Rem: "Roswaal-sama, thank you for your concern. I will think about it."

Roswaal: "I see, for now, that'll be fiiiiine. Anyhow…oh"

Roswaal approves of Rem's answer, and he tried to end the conversation. But, that's when he was stopped as he tried to exit the room, and a pleasant color was drawn in his eyes. The reason being —

Ram: "Don't carelessly get so close to my cute sister. Roswaal…-sama."

Roswaal: "An honorific that sounds forced, truly pleasaaaant, Ram."

Roswaal shrugs his shoulders at Ram, who was standing at the entrance to the room as she glared at him in a displeased way. When that behavior made Ram even more irritated, Roswaal let out a forced sigh.

Roswaal: “I am being this affectionate, and yet you are always so cooooold. We even spend every evening and every night together alone intimately too.”

Ram: “I’m just reluctantly accepting treatment for the sake of maintaining my body. So disgusting.”

Ram, with a frown that really made her look offended, entered the room hurriedly, and she stood in front of Rem. Ram, who interfered the master and her little sister, touched Rem’s face gently at that spot.

Ram: “Are you okay? He didn’t do anything weird to you, did he?”

Roswaal: “You don’t trust me, do youuuuu. We’ve known each other for a month now, so I think it’s about time we built a relationship of truuuuuust.”

Ram: “A relationship of trust? In this one month, my suspicions have only been increasing during my time with Roswaal-sama.”

Roswaal: “What a strict evaluation. But I wonder, is the reason why I think that your sister and I have built a good relationship because I’m conceiteeeeed?”

Roswaal smiles strangely at Ram’s cold response, and he waves his hand at Rem. Seeing him do that, Ram looks at Rem in the eye, and she said,

Ram: “Is this true, Rem?”

Rem: “He’s lying. Onee-chan is right.”

Roswaal: “Betrayed within an instant, my heart has been shatteeered.”

Rem had no reason to worry about if she should choose to be on Ram’s side or Roswaal’s side.

Seeing that Roswaal was sighing with his hands raised, Ram smiled triumphantly. However, Rem touched her sister's hand, and starting with "Onee-chan", she said,

Rem: "So, are you finished cleaning upstairs?"

Ram: "—. ——. —Not yet."

Ram answered Rem's question with a little hesitation while looking away. When Rem nodded at the answer she expected, she grasped her sister's hand that touched her as she said,

Rem: "Well then, since I'm finished with the place I'm responsible for, let's go finish the rest of Onee-chan's work."

Ram: "…Thanks as always, Rem."

Ram: "It's no big deal. It's for Onee-chan, after all."

Rem shook her head calmly in response to Ram's slightly apologetic sounding words.

In this past month, Rem's surprising aptitude for housework became clear, but at the same time, various truths also became clear for Ram. As for what they were—

Roswaal: "Still, it is surpriiiising. Frederica was awful at first too, but I didn't expect you to have such outstanding talent to be even worse."

Ram: "I produce outstanding results in everything. That's my karma."

Rem: "He isn't lying. No lies."

Roswaal sounded like he was teasing her, but Rem and Ram couldn't refute it.

In this past month, there was one big problem that became clear to Ram upon living at the mansion. It was the harmful effect of losing her horn, which was the chronic mana deficiency that threatened her body.

Currently, Ram's condition was kept stable because of Roswaal's treatment every evening. However, originally this was supposed to only take care of the role that a horn should fulfill. It was also a treatment that was solely limited to preventing her rampages, and it was far off from being the ability she had when her horn wasn't gone.

In conclusion, Ram's body was always in a malnutrition-like condition, and she couldn't even do activities by the book. She was only able to go on as a result of her tough mental strength, no doubt about it.

Of course, there was no way she could accomplish her duties as a maid satisfactorily. Still, Ram stubbornly engaged in roles, and she bestirred herself to try and do the same work as Rem.

Rem: "It's all clean. Onee-chan."

Ram: "Yes, understood."

So, making up for her sister's deficits has been Rem's daily routine. She finished cleaning the parlor, and she headed to upstairs with Ram as she nodded. But before that, when Rem bowed to Roswaal, she said,

Rem: "Well then, Roswaal-sama, we'll be leaving. See you later."

Roswaal: "Okay okay, keep up the good work. Also, Ram. I think my business is going to take longer tonight. I'm probably going to be late for your treatment, but just wait for me without feeling loneeely."

Ram: "It would be nice if you did it while I was sleeping."

Roswaal: "But then I wouldn't be able to enjoy your reaction…not, but you see, I wouldn't be able to tell if the treatment went well or not."

Ram, mood worsened, snorts at Roswaal who made exaggerations, and then Rem left the parlor along with her. Just after that, while they were both headed upstairs side by side, Ram took a side glance at her as she said, Ram: “He really didn’t do anything, right?”

Rem: “No need to worry. Onee-chan, you doubt Roswaal-sama far too much.”

Ram: “…You don’t have to speak formally with me too.”

Rem: “Ah, my apolog…sorry. It’s become a habit now to speak like that…”

Rem unconsciously started to speak formally, and she put her hand on her mouth in a panic.

She was completely blended in with the mansion life. That proved it was natural for her now. She got used to the maid dress that she was embarrassed of at first, and was even no longer reluctant with the manner of speaking and the work.

If there was still one thing that she wasn’t used to it would be—

“…”

There was the profile of Ram, who walked next to her. She steals a glance at her firm look and her gallant eyes. Her sister looked the same as before, but even then, she was definitely different now.

Even Ram, who she thought wouldn’t change no matter what happened, was no exception to the effects of losing a horn. There was no trace left of the power of her sister that was deemed the reincarnation of an Oni God.

If this was the Ram back at the village, she wouldn’t need help from Rem for anything. And that’s because Ram was far above Rem in everything.

Ram, who was supposed to be a truly outstanding being, was now standing close to Rem like this.

It didn’t seem like she would get used to it, no matter how much time passed. Or maybe, maybe one day she’d at least get used to this sense of discomfort. Maybe at least she’d get used to Ram not having a horn, just like how she did with her clothes and manner of speaking.

And if she really did, how would that be any different from losing her Oni pride?

Ram: “—Rem?”

Rem: “…Ah”

Ram, at the end of the corridor, calls out to Rem, who got lost in her thoughts too long and stopped walking.

Rem: “No, it is nothing. I am fine.”

Ram: “—Oh.”

Rem watches Ram give a slight nod as she accepted that reply, and she quickly stood next to her sister.

She didn’t realize that the words she let out automatically were formal, and she didn’t notice that her older sister was sensitive to the change happening inside of her—.

3

Even when Rem was feeling conflicted and worried, time went on irreversibly.

During this time that passed while she engaged in the mansion work, Rem became uneasy because of her heart, which was diminishing her anger that was supposed to be in her chest.

Her race’s revenge, her attachment towards getting revenge she promised with Ram faded every day, weakening.

That wasn’t happening because she was always going after them everyday; it was related to the feeling of happiness she had living in the mansion and Ram’s condition that looked like it wasn’t going to get better at all.

Ram was necessary for revenge, for the retribution. Nevertheless, Ram’s body no longer had any of the power needed to do that as she lost her horn. It wasn't that she wasn't losing the mettle for revenge; the practical power needed to carry out revenge wasn't in the sisters' hands.

That became a stone weighing on Rem's heart, and it cast a shadow on the flame of her desire for revenge.

At this rate, she'd forget about how she was an Oni, and she and her sister would continue living as maids along with Frederica and Clind. —Was there an option like that?

Rem never talked about it, and it wasn't like she clearly considered it to be one, either. However, it would be a lie to say that she didn't have those feelings growing inside her.

While having those feelings, Rem continued to work hard everyday to distract herself from that.

Being afraid of change, sinking into stagnation.

However, change would always come by seeking slothful peace.

—That was something inevitable to Rem at this time.

Rem: "Onee-chan is going to go with Roswaal-sama on his trip?"

Rem ponders the beginning topic, and she widens her eyes in surprise.

The details were of course like a bolt from the blue, but that wasn't the main reason why she was surprised. The thing Rem was surprised about the most was the schedule for the trip.

The schedule—basically, they were plans that would make the trip take several days, and during that time, Ram would be away from the mansion. The sisters were going to be separated for the first time in their lives.

Roswaal: "Normally, only a certain number of people are supposed to come near "Sanctuary". However, I have a duty to protect you guys safely. The treatment I give to Ram is a part of that. I shouldn't abandon that duty due to my own selfish reasons."

Ram: "I'm telling you, skipping a day or two won't do any harm…"

Ram was unhappy with Roswaal, who leaned on the sofa with his long legs crossed elegantly. But, sitting next to Roswaal, the older sister didn't shake off his hand caressing her hair.

Rem, sitting face to face with them, did not hide her surprise from that change.

Rem: "Onee-chan, will you be okay with Roswaal-sama?"

Ram: "If by okay you mean my neck won't break from being unable to take it, then yeah I'll live."

Roswaal: "It's a chance to look forward to Ram's perseverance that was bound to come up sooner or later. Consider this as a challenge, and I would like you to accept iiiiiiit."

Rem: "A challenge? What kind of…"

Roswaal: "Of course, the older sister separation and the little sister separation…or maybe I should call it the sisters separation?"

Roswaal's words make Rem and Ram's cheeks stiffen. Roswaal smiles at that sister-like reaction, and he put his chin on his stacked hands.

Roswaal: "Since you guys left the village, you both were never separated, not even for a second. So, I can easily imagine that it was the same at the village as well. How about you try taking a little breather now?"

Ram: "If we do that, does it even mean anything to Rem and I?"

Roswaal: "It does! You have to believe that everything has meaaaning. I just wanted to try it, wanted to see it, wanted to know how it'd be…that's why I'm doing this."

Ram: "If that's the case, then it's obvious that we should end the conversation here. Rem, let's go."

Roswaal: "You have a short temper. Sheeeeesh, you sure are a sassy girl."

He stops Ram from getting up and pulled her arm as he sat her on the sofa. Then, once Roswaal cleared his throat, he made a genuine, serious look.

Roswaal: "I really am worried. One day, you guys will have to choose your future. Whether you stay here or leave is up to you."

Rem: "—. But you said that Onee-chan and I belong to Roswaal-sama."

Roswaal: "I meant that to solely be something like an expeeeedient. I can't force you. If you guys really want to leave, then the door out the mansion is always there. And I won't maliciously insist on ownership to try and bring you guys back as you leave on your own."

The statement makes Rem widen her eyes, and even Ram had her eyes slightly widen, too. Seeing that reaction, Roswaal continued with a serious look.

Roswaal: "Even if it comes to that, you are free to do what you want. Buuuut, no matter what future you choose, there's no way you'll live without being separated forever. And then when that time comes, if you guys drown in suffering…well, if a time comes where I could lend a hand, I'll personally save youuuu."

Ram: "…Stop beating around the bush. What exactly are you trying to say?"

Roswaal: "To put it frankly, I'm worried about you guys. So I want to help as much as possible while I can. —Do you understand?"

Roswaal winks at Ram, who pouted, and Rem, whose eyes widened in surprise. That clown gesture and the kindness of his blue eyes make Rem dumbfounded.

However, she understood that this ridiculous looking master really was caring for Rem and Ram. Thus—

Rem: "Onee-chan…"

Ram: "Don't make that look, Rem. —I guess I understand what he's trying to say."

Upon being called out to, Rem looks down, but she still let out a reluctant sounding sigh. Just from that gesture, Rem understood she and her sister came to the same conclusion.

Being separated would make them lonely. Even if it was just a few days. But, Roswaal was saying the truth. Holding hands forever as sisters and living life without being separated for an instant was impossible. Even if they wanted it, unfairness would attack them occasionally with a perfect surprise attack.

Just like how the witch cult absurdly destroyed the Oni village.

Roswaal: "What, you're only going to be separated for three days at most, you knooooow. It's not like it's going to be a final faaaarewell. Spend this time without your sister's vision as well as possible."

Ram: "It's as if you're saying that I'm a burden to Rem. I don't like it."

Rem: "I'm going to be lonely and anxious without Onee-chan. Please come back soon."

Ram: "See, look how cute Rem is. …I shouldn't go after all."

Roswaal: "It's already been decided, so you can't do that obvioooously."

He ends the interaction with a smile, and Rem and Ram were going to be split up for the first time.

And then, after three days, the promised day where Ram and Roswaal would leave the mansion together came.

The two gigantic headed earth dragons pull the dragon carriage, and the two of them leave for their destination on it. But before that, Ram and Rem spent some time reluctantly saying their goodbyes, and they just wouldn't stop embracing each other.

Ram: "Listen, Rem. Don't cry at night, even though I won't be there."

Rem: "Okay, I won't Onee-chan, you be careful too…"

Roswaal: "You make it sound like you're going off to war. This isn't a final farewell, is iiiiiiit?"

They spent so much time that Roswaal ended up teasing them. Once the sisters finally separated from each other, Frederica stepped up to Ram as if deciding to do so on purpose when that happened.

When she fixed Ram's appearance just like always, she finally brought something out of her pocket.

Ram: "Is that…a letter?"

Frederica: "Yes, it is. My brother is at "Sanctuary". He's intrusive and noisy, so you'll definitely come across him. Can you give it to him?"

Ram: "If he's intrusive and noisy, I might end up shutting him up by force. If you're okay with that, then I'll take it."

Frederica: "That's fine. It'll teach him a good lesson."

There were bitterness and regret on Frederica's profile as she handed over the letter, perhaps because there were some sort of complicated circumstances. Ram appeared to have noticed it, but she accepted her letter without mentioning it.

And then, she stepped onto the dragon carriage that Roswaal boarded first as she said,

Ram: "Rem, I'll write a letter when we get there."

Frederica: "Don't you know that you'll be back before she gets the letter?!”

Frederica sees them off saying that, and the dragon carriage they were on departed. Rem watches the dragon carriage fade away on the other side of the cloud of dust caused by the earth dragons, and she puts her hand on her chest.

There wasn’t as much uneasiness in her chest as she thought. Although, she did have a feeling that she might’ve collapsed right there after her tears overflowed because of her separation from Ram.

Rem: “Thank goodness that didn’t happen.”

Frederica: “It would be worrying if that happened when it’s only going to be three days! Garfiel and I have…”

Then, Frederica unconsciously stopped herself from talking as if she blurted something out, and she looked down awkwardly. Based off that reaction, Rem guessed this person she spoke of, Garfiel, was the brother she was talking about earlier.

Rem: “Frederica-sama, have you always been separated from your little brother?”

Frederica: “—The situation is complicated. I haven’t seen him for quite a long time.”

Frederica made a slightly distant look in response to Rem’s question.

Frederica: “If an opportunity ever comes up, Rem might end up going to “Sanctuary” with Master too. If that happens, please get along well with Garfiel. He’s about the same age as you guys.”

Just for a moment, Rem was charmed by Frederica, who was smiling slightly, perhaps because she had remembered her brother. Her profile as she put her hand on her mouth with her fangs hidden certainly was just like a painting—.

Clind: “—Frederica, we have no time to smile. We’ll be thoroughly taking care of the mansion’s duties while Master is away from the mansion. It’d be nice if I got help from even a cat right now…yes, this has to be your time to shine as a cat half-beast. I really will be looking forward to it. Anticipation.”

Frederica: “So annoying! I’ll be right there!!”

Although, it also felt like Clind’s usual jokes being shattered instantly.

4

Despite the start, the time without Ram at the Mathers mansion had begun.

Not having her sister by her side certainly did cause loneliness and anxiety, but it didn’t bring about the hopeless sadness that she expected.

It wasn’t because she had succeeded in the sister separation, but rather due to Frederica’s care—there were many times when she threw her into one job after another, so often that she didn’t have the time to think about Ram’s absence.

In the end, Rem cried slightly about Ram’s absence only at night; the night where she finished her work, returned to her room, and spent the night on her bed without someone to cry to.

And then it happened the next day on the afternoon of the second day.

Frederica: “Well then, Rem. I’ll be accompanying those kids, so please take care of the mansion while I’m gone.”

Rem: “Yes, Frederica-sama. Have a safe trip.”

In front of the mansion, Rem sees off Frederica, who had her back against the dragon carriage, and she gave a deep bow.

Inside of the dragon carriage up front, there several little girls dressed like Rem and Frederica. The girls weren’t similar to the two of them just with their clothes, but their circumstances as well. —In other words, they were Demi-humans.

Just like Rem and the others, they were found by Roswaal with no place to go, and they were trained to work as maids at the mansion. Their training ended, and these girls, who were deemed to have adequate skills as maids, were now being sent out to service at another mansion.

Rem: "…"

In response to the women nodding at her from the passenger window, Rem also bowed her head politely and quickly.

Even though they were at the same mansion, Rem wasn't involved with them very much as someone still in training. Nevertheless, Rem hoped the best for her coworkers traveling to a new workplace.

At first, when Frederica talked to her about Roswaal, she said that he had a benevolent and tolerant personality, but that really was the truth.

He educated Demi-humans, gave them work, and sent them off to different places. This wasn't the first time Rem saw off travelling coworkers like this as someone who has been at the mansion for two months. She felt thankful that so many Demi-humans were saved by Roswaal.

Frederica: "Though Clind is unlucky, and I am worried about leaving you alone at the mansion."

Putting Rem showing admiration aside, that was Frederica worrying, who was acting as the girls' attendant. It was the first time Clind was going to be out while she was away from the mansion, and if things went as planned, Rem was going to be left alone at the mansion for half the day.

Frederica: "Having no one at the mansion is out of the question. But still, for you to be the one left alone…"

Rem: "It'll be fine, Frederica-sama. I've gotten somewhat used to the mansion. I'll be able to take care of it while you're out."

Rem nods back at Frederica, who worried about her, and she tried sticking out her chest, something she would rarely do.

There were already many times when Rem had to wait for her sister's return alone while she was mixed with the adults' meetings at the village, which Ram called duties. A situation like this was nothing to her.

Rem: "Besides, Clind-sama also left some work for me to do."

Frederica: "There's no doubt that…arranging the mansion's basement warehouse will be a lot of work for one person. I'm really sorry, Rem. When I get back, I promise I'll help out right away."

Frederica, continuing to show care, says that and worried about Rem until the end, but she finally departed from the mansion, though she still had a conflicted look on her face.

And so, once Rem saw off Frederica and the others, she was now the only one left at the mansion.

Rem: "But I have no time to just stand around absentminded."

Once Rem said that to herself, she quickly returned to the mansion and headed towards the wing with the basement warehouse. The old looking key in her pocket was something Clind gave her, who was out to do some errands.

It seemed that Clind was planning on doing a makeover of the mansion, cleaning it during these three days without Roswaal. The big job of rearranging the basement warehouse that started yesterday was also part of that.

Rem: "—It's here, right?"

The west wing, east wing, and then the third wing in the middle made up the Mathers mansion, and the basement warehouse Clind left her to take care of was at the middle wing. It was there at the deepest part of the first floor. People rarely came to the deepest part of the cold, stone passageway, and this was also the first time Rem came here.

That's how it was, so she wasn't sure if she'd be able to tell if the warehouse would need to be rearranged or not, but—

Rem: "Clind-sama said that you'd be able to tell once you see it, so…"

Clind was basically never wrong. Contrary to Frederica's fears, he was always gentlemanly and kind, so he even patiently worked with someone unskilled like Rem. He really did bother her sometimes, but it actually was only when she'd get surprised by him looking at her from afar.

With the help of her trust in Clind, Rem reaches for the door to the basement warehouse without hesitation. When she inserted the old key into the keyhole, it unlocked easily making a rough sound, and the door opened with a creak.

Rem: "…"

But, the next moment, Rem shrieked softly at the stink leaking through the door.

She closes the door reflexively and fell to her knees on the spot. The stink was that strong.

Rem: "Wh-What was that…? Huh, what? Wh-What in the world…?"

It was a shock way beyond comprehension, and so Rem became confused while she leaned against the door.

A stink—yes, it was something that could only be described as a stink, and a cruel, hideous odor.

It differed from a rotting smell and the smell of blood, and it didn't even smell like feces or stimulants. She couldn't compared it to anything. Rem had never came across this smell—actually, that's not right.

Rem: "Where have I…come across this smell…"

She smelled it before. She came across this smell somewhere once.

She didn't have a clear picture that appeared in her memory. But, she definitely did smell it. Sometimes sense of smell would be more accurately connected to memory than images and sounds. This was proof of that.

Rem: "…"

While not knowing which memory it connected to, Rem slowly opened the door.

Once again, she grimaced at the suffocating, enveloping stink, and Rem shakes her head dizzily. Even if she stopped breathing from her nose, she couldn't prevent the truly strong smell from breaking into her nasal cavity.

Despite the stink assaulting her sense of smell, Rem stepped forward and entered the basement warehouse.

—The basement warehouse was shut in darkness, and there wasn't anything she could use.

Rem: "…"

Rem, putting her hand on the cold wall while using it to move forward, goes down the stairs. Dry footsteps sound throughout the darkness, and Rem felt as if she was sinking endlessly. As sound came down, so did her body, into the abyss. That was the type of illusion she felt.

However, that nightmarish delusion ended quickly, and Rem reached the basement warehouse.

Rem: "…The…lights"

The moment she thought "I have to find them", Rem's vision suddenly became white light in front of her. When that shocked Rem and made her jump, she saw her surroundings, the state of the basement illuminated by faint light.

Miscellaneous tool shelves, piles of old books, tools of unknown use covered in dust, many very old furnishings that decorated the warehouse, all those kind of countless, unnecessary things filled the basement warehouse.

She agreed with what Clind had said. “Once you see it, you’ll know if it’s necessary or not.” I get it, I’m positive that anything and everything in here are unneeded things. So he’s telling me to take out all of it.

The light that shined on the room was a magic light installed on the basement wall. It seemed to be a mechanism in which it would light up automatically whenever someone came to the basement, and once that became clear to her, she wasn’t surprised

She understood her goal, and her anxiety disappeared. Now she should engage in her work while feeling like this. That’s what Rem concluded, and she would quickly clean up the basement warehouse —

Rem: “It stinks…it’s far worse than it was before…”

If Rem’s spirit wasn’t so strong that she could divide it like that, she wouldn’t have been able to kill her senses.

Rem, holding onto her breath, turns her head around to find the source of the stink. Once she tried following that smell in the cramped underground basement, she found what she was looking for in merely 10 seconds.

Then it was right before her eyes, and this was truly when Rem’s throat froze up.

Rem: “…”

In front of Rem, gazing dumbfoundedly, there was a door to another room that lead to the inner part of the basement warehouse.

The existence of it in itself wasn’t something to be surprised about, but she was concerned about what was inscribed on the door itself. —Several tight chains were wound on the door, and a magic circle was drawn to seal it.

Rem: “This was Onee-chan’s…”

She came across it before. This door had the same exact seal spell that isolated Ram as she went out of control without her horn, applied to ensure outside safety.

Rem: “…”

No doubt about it, the stink was coming from the other side of this door. Even if it was a strictly sealed door, it couldn’t prevent the escape of the intense smell.

The moment Rem understood that, the loudest alarm bell sounded in her brain. Rem feels something that was like a direct hit to her skull, and her instincts were telling her to leave this place immediately.

Rem’s senses that perceived the stink also surrendered in agreement with her instincts calls. You shouldn’t be here. You can’t be here. That’s what her senses and her instincts clearly answered together.

She remembered being irritated by the stink before. Rem forcibly holds down the cover of her closed memories that tried to open itself, and she came to the conclusion that she should leave this place for now.

And then, while being careful to not make a sound with her footsteps, she turns around quickly, and she sought to leave the basement—.

???: “—Che che che che che”

She heard a noise. A sound that opened the cover of her memories.

The next moment, Rem broke the chains by sheer strength, and she kicks down the sealed down as she jumped into the room.

Inside the room, on the other side of the broken door, there was someone that opened his eyes wide because of her Oni impulse. He opened his eyes wide, and right after that, he laughed and laughed —

???: “Welcome, little girl. Can you give a nice cry for me?”

Immediately after, the raging flames completely cover Rem’s vision, and she was blown away by the blast.

5

???: “Does this mean I’m free now that the magic circle is broken?”

Rem: “…”

???: “Oh, it’s the great little girl. I guess this is where I should say “I want to thank you”?”

Rem: “…”

???: “Ah! Guess you got too close. I guess you wanna say “Ouch my ears, I can’t hear”?”

Someone, someone was…something, something…someone was saying something.

Rem, falling over on the hard floor, did everything she could to restore the blank space created in her head. I have to gather the thoughts blown away by the impact, find a voice I can speak with, and do my absolute best to break the stalemate and understand the situation—that’s what she thought, but the dark anger rising in her heart stood in her way.

Just previously, a sound Rem heard through the door released something that was shut inside her memory. The fire that died down day by day at the mansion flared up into a flame extreme enough to destroy the world.

Rem: “—Ah…AAAH”

Rem, mouth open, glares at the dirty ceiling, and she raised a distorted voice that shook the atmosphere. In response to that low voice, a white horn—the proof of an Oni showed up on her forehead. Her horn spreads the black smoke clouding the room, and it usurps a very minimal amount of mana from the world, turning it into energy.

She touches the ground with her hands, lifts her body up, slowly stands, and she glares at the man standing still in front.

It was an extremely skinny, unhealthy looking man. He had depressing cheeks and eye sockets, and a countenance that was so vapid that it looked ill. He wore nothing over his upper half of his body, and he only had hemp trousers for his lower half, but there were many burns and lacerations on his exposed skin. It looked as if he had been tortured before.

???: "…Wow, so I guess that horn means you're an Oni survivor. If that's the case, then did you come here for your family's revenge?"

Rem: "…"

???: "No response. But you do want it, don't you?"

She wasn't obligated to answer. Rem faces the man with a sadistic smile on his face, and she decides to attack.

She steps forward, kicks the miscellaneous waste around her, gets right in front of the man, and while relying on the strength produced by the horn, she punches his guts—

???: "Okay, boom!"

That moment, a blast was produced beside her face, and Rem's consciousness and her upper body shook violently. She felt dizzy, and her brain bounces in her cranium because of the blow that came from her blind spot. She staggers, and a complete gap was created.

???: "That's 6 now! If you can handle this, then this is where I should say impressive, right?"

Explosions occurred, following the man's voice. Three shocks were shot into Rem's chest, stomach, and abdomen one by one going into her small body from behind, and she was blown away.

Rem: “My…abdom—”

She tumbles doing a somersault, and a lot of blood came out of her throat coughing violently. The shock jumbles her intestines, and her broken ribs felt pain because of the vibration from her vomiting blood and coughing. She couldn’t tell if she was seeing red because of the pain, or if it was because her face was split in half.

???: “As expected, Onis are tough even when they’re brats. You were hit that much and you still aren’t damaged?”

Based off what the man looking down on her said, she was now sure that her body was the same as before. She was breathing heavily from the pain, but her shining horn wouldn’t let her lose her will to fight. Rem’s wounds blew red steam, the damage of her limbs were healed in an instant, her disconnected bones were reconnected with a sound, and she stood up fiercely.

???: “I saw it at that mountain many times, but man you guys are literally monsters. Will this be when I’m forced to torture you?”

Rem: “GaAAA—!!”

Rem roars, and once she jumped back to make time, she faced the man at front and attacked him as she brandished her Oni nails. But there’s no way she could rush forward like a madman after it already failed once. Hearing that little girl’s battle cry, the man raised his arms covered with scars and went,

???: “Che che che che che”

He clicks his tongue, and right after that, there was the stink that would brush against her nasal cavity. Rem twisted her body at once, and she avoided coming in contact with the space where the stink gathered. However, she couldn’t escape from the produced blast.

Even if she escaped from a direct hit, the explosion would create heat, impact, and destruction. Rem gets engulfed in those things immediately, and she was repelled again as she raised cries of pain. She rolls on the floor, and she hits the wall.

???: “No technique, no plan, no tricks. Are these the effects of somehow making it by, using only the strength of some power? You guys are all just like kids who swing their arms and legs around, so aren’t you the same as beasts?”

Rem: “Oo…Oooooo!”

???: “You even cry like beasts, how dull. If you’re going to cry, then do it in a cute way. Entertain me by barking. You’re a let-down, you know?”

Rem, crouching, roars in frustration, and she senses the stink again. She hits the floor, and jumps back at that spot. But, it was too late. Immediately, there was another explosion, and she was blown off, rolling.

She bleeds, and the clotted blood that became a splash stains all over the basement. The scattering unneeded things were crumpled up by the impact turning them into waste, and Rem was going to meet the same fate very soon.

She was going to die. She was going to get killed. At a place like this, in an incomprehensible state, to the enemy—

???: “You may do this much, but no one will come. Actually, you have no one. If that’s the case, then this is a golden opportunity. This is where I should kill the little Oni with a slash and get the hell out of here, right?”

When Rem heard the man’s statement that didn’t hide his intent to murder, she felt herself losing the will to fight back.

In proportion to her blood coming out the desire for revenge inside Rem—the Oni blood inside her also poured out. When she finally became empty inside, that would be the end of her life and the oath for retribution. If that happened—

Rem: “…”

If that happened, Ram would surely start the retribution for Rem.

Rem: “No, no…”

She can’t. No, she can’t. She can’t she can’t she can’t she can’t no no no no no no no.

With Ram’s current state, even if she had the same will and intentions she had when her horn wasn’t gone, she didn’t have the body to make it happen. That’s what she understood in this past month in her days at the mansion. She understood it so well it hurt.

If revenge was put into Ram’s hands only, she would definitely die in vain. And even if she knew it was in vain, there’s no way her sister would give up. She couldn’t leave revenge up to Ram.

Her sister won’t die. She couldn’t die. Her sister couldn’t have revenge. She couldn’t accomplish it.

Why? The answer to that is simple. —It was because of Rem.

Rem: “…”

The village burned, her race died, and Ram’s horn broke. If Ram went to fight recklessly with how she was, then it would be Rem’s fault. Because Rem let her sister do everything.

She couldn’t let that happen. There’s not a chance she’d let this man kill her precious sister.

???: “It’s about time I put an end to this. Little Oni, don’t you know that you’re no fun when you don’t cry?”

The man turned his palm towards her, and he was trying to stab Rem with the finishing blow while she faced up on the floor.

She focuses her eyes, will, everything she could feel into her Oni horn, and gathers them. She works out a countermeasure, changing it into an idea that was “Determine what this man is doing, and ruin it”.

In this extreme situation, that’s what her violent Oni blood and her instincts as the Oni fighter race burst open and shined on.

???: “Die—”

When the man said that cruel death sentence, his intentions became bursting heat, and there was an explosion with Rem in the center of it. That burst and scattered the little girl's body, and it was enough to throw out her blood and flesh.

However, that was if it were a direct hit.

Rem: "Ha—ah"

Rem kicks the floor and clings to the ceiling, and she looked down on the basement enveloped in the blast. She wasn't seeing with her bloodshot light blue eyes. She threw all of her senses into her sense of smell that has been sounding an alarm this whole time.

???: "Hold on hold on, let's not get carried away just because you dodged it by pure luck, alright?"

She escapes the certainty of the deadly blow, and the man looks up at Rem, who was above his head, with his eyes that had irritation in them. Signs of an explosion rose when the man concentrated on his consciousness, and Rem immediately got away from there as if on impulse. The blast was produced shortly after, but this time it couldn't capture Rem.

???: "What…!! Gaguwa?!"

Rem: "AAAaah!"

Her roar blots out his surprise, and her swinging Oni nails stabbed the man's shoulder. It was the first time in the basement blood and screaming came out of someone other than Rem, and she jumped as she escaped from the blast that came right after.

The man holds onto the wound on his shoulder, breaking into a cold sweat, and he followed Rem frantically with his eyes

???: "You, have you really…!"

Rem didn't respond to the man's trembling as he forced himself to speak.

She simply answered by dodging the countless produced blasts in the cramped basement.

Rem: "…"

She cracked the code to the man's explosive magic. The answer was shown to her on the door from the beginning.

He was a man who was sealed by chains and a magic circle. That situation was the same as Ram's, who went out of control without her horn. In other words, they were measures to prevent the mana manipulated by the man from damaging the surroundings. They were the same measures taken for Ram, who caused a chaotic mana storm, and if that was the case, then the principle behind the man's powers had to be the same too—

???: "Damn it, damn it, damn it damn it damn it damn it damn it!"

The man, causing chain explosions in the space, gets desperate to blow off Rem's limbs. However, Rem scents out the stink by using her sense of smell, and they didn't reach her as she predicted the "Explosion Spots".

The man's invisible explosions. That trick was plain and simple—the man sets up explosive techniques in a space beforehand and he was detonating them in accordance with his target's approach.

Therefore, the technique wouldn't detonate at unset spaces, and he was limited to using extremely minor firepower so that he wouldn't blast himself away.

The most fatal thing to the man was the fact that he wasn't the only one who could detonate.

Rem: "GaAAA!"

???: "How could someone…the one thing I've mastered…"

The man jumped back and dodged Rem, who kicked the wall and came at him as fast as a bullet. Without a pause, the man tried to detonate the technique while Rem was as close as she could be, but Rem threw something even faster than that.

???: "—Ah?"

In front of the man's eyes, a red, glowing crystal was thrown.

It was one of the magic stones inserted in the magic lights that lit up the basement, and it was something that Rem had been carrying after she removed it from the wall and took in the mid battle.

The magic stone gives a slight amount of mana, and a spark was produced right near the man's face. —The next instant, the technique arranged there reacts with the fire and it explodes with the man's face getting caught in it.

???: "Boo, gyaaaa—!!"

The explosive heat produced around the man's face blew off his ear and nose. Face burned, eyes wide open, the man holds his face up, and falls down while screaming.

Rem: "…"

Rem wasn't going to miss this chance. She rushes up to the man in agony and crushes his neck by stepping on it. 'Kill when the opportunity is given', not one bit of such mercy was given.

The hunting instincts as an Oni, stronger than hatred and anger. The man probably had a hunch that death was near. When he reached his hand towards the ceiling desperately to stop his screaming from the pain—

???: "Ch, Ch ch ch—"

It was painful sounding tongue clicking and his attempt to get himself out of a hopeless situation.

The detonations set up in the basement warehouse all go off in reflection with the man's intention. Tremendous, explosive heat and impact engulf the basement, and Rem also was caught in them as she lost her escape from the stink.

From top to bottom, the impact goes through her whole body, enough so that she couldn't even recognize her own hands and legs anymore—

"…"

Hearing the piles of scraps wood collapsing, the man covered in snute crawls out of the ground.

The blast shook the whole mansion, and it produced a power that could have buried the basement warehouse in a cave. Although the man didn't want to make the choice that got himself caught in it, on the contrary it did bring him luck.

???: "He, hee, haa…ha…haha"

The man pushes the metal shelf off of his body, and he looks around the disastrous scene as he laughed convulsively. It was a blessing in disguise—no, to the man, this was good luck for sure.

The first explosion of the chain explosions that blew up the whole basement turned over this shelf, and it acted as a shield that protected the man's body from the blasts. Thanks to that, the man miraculously cheated death.

???: "That kid…whatever, first I have to get out of here…"

The man thinks of the girl who brought him both good luck and bad luck—releasing him unexpectedly and fighting back unexpectedly—however, he quickly stopped caring about it, and he hurriedly headed towards the way out of the basement.

He lost his right ear, nose, and some of his front teeth because of the explosion, but it didn't cost him his life. After he found even just a random cloth to stop his bleeding, he had to escape before getting seen by the people in the mansion.

???: "And then I guess I'll hurry and meet up with them…?"

The man, who was thinking of what his plan would be after escaping, suddenly feels strange as he tilted his head. The basement warehouse no longer had its original form because of the explosion, but even now he still heard weird sounds in the spaces here and there where the crumbling continued.

It was metal clustering, or maybe the metals meshing with each other, a scraping sound, like they were locking—

???: “Wha—”

Without being able to finish saying ‘What’ even in this short moment, something glancing passes by the man’s body. That made an aberrant, destructive noise, and it fiercely broke down the wall right next to the man.

???: “Wh…”

He was speechless, having no idea what sort of destruction that was, and he watched it. It came out of the wall and cracked the floor making a heavy noise in front of the man gazing in wonderment

It was a piece of steel. It had a round shape. It had countless thorns on the sphere. It had chains tied to it. The chains were connected by a handle, and a girl was holding onto it.

Inside the collapsed basement warehouse, there was a girl that had an iron sphere with chains on it.

???: “It’s yo—u?”

The man turns around, discovering the girl ahead of the chains, and he threw his arm up at once as he tried to set off the detonations in the area. However, the arm he tried to raise wouldn’t lift itself.

Once he took a look, he saw the top of his upper right arm blowing off, being torn away.

???: “…”

He looks at his feet. There were the remains of the man’s arm. The ruins of his torn off arm that was cut up by an iron sphere.

???: “Gi, eeaaaa—?!”

The moment he understood the reality he was seeing, the man screams from the swelling pain. It hurt even more than when his face was burst open, and a scream that literally sounded like he was coughing up blood echoed throughout the basement warehouse.

???: "…"

Still, the scream that was painful to listen to didn't stop the girl from walking forward. —While the chains made a sound with each step, the girl pulled in the cruel chains and brandished them.

She throws, and misses. It gouges his left shoulder. She throws, and misses. Just his hipbone broke. She throws, and misses. Just his face's skin was ripped off. She throws, and misses. Just his shin was blown off from his left foot. She throws, and misses. Right next to the senseless face, the ground collapses.

??? Ee, ee, eee…"

The man, pain and fear taking over his brain, couldn't get his explosion techniques to work at all. In order to set up the techniques, he needed to calculate accurately and calmly use his magic. With the man's current state, he couldn't possibly hope to do any of that. As for the mana scattered aimlessly, that was just the result of the Oni horn sucking it in.

The man lost his right arm and his left foot, his bones were broken, but he was still alive. The footsteps nearby reach the man, and an Oni that looked like a little girl reflected in his eyes clouded with pain.

She had blue hair covered in blood, maid clothes with burn holes all over, a pure white horn protruding from her forehead, and her light blue eyes were shining, wet with desire and madness.

Rem: "You're the one…who did that to…me and Onee-chan's village"

???: "Wa-Wait, wait, come on wait… I was just…gugyaa!"

The man quickly tries to give an explanation in a low voice, and a scream came from his open mouth. The heel swinging downward breaks the man's left shoulder by stepping on it, and now both of his hands were useless.

He looked down on it. He made fun of it. The Oni's…the Oni's, the strongest Demi-human horn, the bone of the Onis, the flesh of the Onis—.

Rem: "Onee-chan said there were four people. So if you're one of them…"

???: "Ah, ha…ye-yes, that's right. That's right! If you kill me, you wouldn't know the names of the other three, right?! So, you can't kill me, you can't kill me!"

The man strains his voice, desperately clinging onto the hope of his life being possibly connected to others. Hearing that scream, the Oni girl's face contorts in anger. The man instantly regretted rubbing the young girl the wrong way. However, immediately after that, she held her hand, opposite to the one holding the handle, over the man's wound.

Rem: "Water mana, healing wave…"

???: "Ri-Right…"

A blue, soft wave forms in the girl's hand. That gently wraps the man's wound, and the pain was slightly relieved as it covered the painful looking wound. The water mana healing power was a healing technique she was poor at and wasn't skilled enough to do, but it was good enough just to relieve the pain.

The certainty that she wanted to communicate with him more than anything made the man recover his temper.

???: "Now we can…"

Rem: "—Now we can talk."

The girl, as ready to talk as to act, whispers to the man, repeating him as he used his craftiness to try and do a surprise attack as he enveloped her in fumes. Then, in front of the man with a dubious look, the girl raises the iron sphere over his arm

She strikes downward, and the hit crushes his arm along with his broken left shoulder, blowing it away.

???: “Goaaaa—?!”

That instant, the man screams belatedly in pain without knowing what just happened. While the fresh blood gushing out stained the floor, the girl puts her hand over the wound again, and she healed it.

Seeing that with a sidelong glance, a question mark flew on the man’s head. But, he knew the answer immediately.

The girl, the Oni girl looks down at the confused man, and with a lovely, evil countenance, she spoke.

Rem: “—I will break it, and then heal it, break it, and then heal it, over and over until you tell me everything you’re hiding.”

???: “Wh—a…”

Rem: “I will have retribution. For the honor of the Oni clan. —No, for Onee-chan.”

The girl tightened the chains in between the shocked man’s thin arms to show her determination. The light sound the metal made almost sounded like an ultimatum to the man—

???: “Wait, wait, wait! Wait, please waiiiit—!!”

The man’s sorrowful, high pitched begging resounded throughout the basement in vain.

Then, as for the whether or not she listened to his begging, the painful screaming that continued afterwards is your answer.

6

—Immediately after Rem woke up, she completely lost track of where she was.

Rem: “…”

She was in a room without lights, she couldn't move her hands and legs freely, her whole body was wrapped in a smooth feeling, and there was warm, soft weight on her chest.

She blinks many times in the silence, and when her eyes adjusted to the darkness, she figured out that she was in the mansion's guest room she frequented everyday to clean, and she also identified what exactly was the weight on her chest.

Rem: "…Onee-chan"

Rem faces up on the bed, and sees that it was Ram who was embracing her chest. She had her arms around Rem's body, keeping close to her to not be separated, and she was fast asleep. Once Rem smiled slightly, feeling her sister's sleeping breath with her ears and seeing her sleeping face, she unconsciously caressed her pink hair.

This wasn't a servant room given to them as a private room. Rem, having doubts about sleeping in a room for guests, searches her memory to figure out what happened.

I'm sure that I was taking of the mansion alone while everyone was away—

???: "Although you made the basement warehouse collapse in your fight with the enemy, you destroyed him. You were found by Clind, covered in blood, and you were brought to the room to rest because Ram begged."

Rem: "—?!"

Roswaal: "That's a rough outline of the situaaation. Did you get it?"

The person standing at the corner of the room, who appeared God knows when—Roswaal surprises Rem.

Seeing that reaction, Roswaal calmly walks up to the bed with a pleased look and says,

Roswaal: "Ram is taking a rest because she's exhausted from taking care of you. She's been doing it since we came from "Sanctuary", despite being on a tight schedule. She wouldn't leave your side ever since she got back…and she was always keeping an eye on your sleeping faaaace.”

Rem: “That’s because…Onee-chan is amazing…or, Onee-chan is important, but well…”

When they started talking about Ram, who fell asleep, Rem immediately began a different topic. Her memory came back to her when she heard Roswaal’s words. The basement, the man, and then —

Rem: “Roswaal-sama, my dearest apologies. I damaged the mansion’s basement so much.”

Roswaal: “…I’m surprised. I certainly didn’t think that you’d apologize for destroying the warehouse right away.”

Rem lowers her head and apologies, and Roswaal smiles in response.

Roswaal: “You have nothing to apologize for. Your safety is what’s most important, after all. Whatever happened in that building doesn’t matter. Still, once your life and existence are gone, that can’t be undone.”

Rem: “It can’t be undone…”

Roswaal: “Nooope, it can’t. So be sure to take care of yourself.”

Seeing Roswaal nod dramatically, Rem lowers her eyes quietly.

Then, Rem speaks of the question stuck in her mind, the beginning of the incident at the basement. First of all, why was a man at that place?—

Rem: “Roswaal-sama, why was someone locked up in the mansion’s basement? Plus, that person…that man is”

Roswaal: “—One of the people that attacked your guys’ village, yeeees.”

Roswaal unashamedly and sincerely affirmed Rem’s doubt.

The master dressed as a clown sighs pensively at the girl who held her breath upon hearing that reply.

Roswaal: “Indeed, it must’ve been very shocking to you. Locking him up was a secret that could’ve possibly created a crack in our trust that built up in these past 2 months.”

Rem: “No that’s… well, but…that’s…true.”

He affirms it. Roswaal was hiding an enemy of the Oni clan from Rem and the others. If that wasn’t betrayal, then betrayal didn’t exist in this world.

Rem’s shaking fingers grab onto the sheets, but she doesn’t have a fit. That was because of the heavy influence from her sister’s sleeping face on her lap. She didn’t want to disturb her sleeping.

Seeing Rem suppressing her intense emotions like that, Roswaal continues with a sad look on his face.

Roswaal: “I captured that man the same day I brought you guys home to the mansion…so the day the village burned. I captured the man as he failed to escape, and I tied him to the basement. Of course, I didn’t treat him the same way I did with you guys. I didn’t show any kindness besides giving him the minimum amount of food to eat. Plus, it was obvious that he wasn’t worth it.”

Rem: “If so, then why…”

Roswaal: “—Because I wanted to see what you guys would choose, that’s why.”

That answer bewilders Rem.

‘What would we choose’, what was that about? What choices?

Roswaal: “Do you remember, Rem? I said it to you and Ram. —Whether you guys stay at this mansion or leave it is up to you.”

Rem: “I do remember. You said that the promise is only an expedient and…”

Roswaal: “Correct, an expedient. And I also said this. “…”Forget about revenge and live, maybe you should consider that.”“

Rem: “—Ah”

That moment, the memory where Roswaal told Rem her choices came to her mind.

She told her. She definitely told her. Roswaal sure did tell Rem that there was a way to forget about revenge and live. Rem told him that she’d think about it with Ram and give an answer, but she didn’t have the chance to talk about it with her sister.

That was because, since the beginning, she disagreed with Ram’s opinion, and she thought that it’d be impossible to call off revenge.

Roswaal: “Allow me to put this clearly. I knew the man was one of your guys’ enemies. And if you really did wish for the Oni clan’s revenge, I was going to hand him over.”

Rem: “…”

Roswaal: “But, if you didn’t want revenge anymore and you were going to your life at this mansion in peace…I was going to bury that man without telling you guys, and I would’ve hid everything.”

It was Roswaal’s arrangement, and a part of his consideration that wasn’t shown to the sisters.

—How would the sisters tackle revenge, the retribution for the Oni clan?

Should they really commit to it earnestly, do it so show them the possibility of a clue.

Should they throw away their desire for revenge, do it to eliminate the possibility of stopping them from moving on.

Roswaal: “But, you came in contact with that man in a way I didn’t want to happen, and you suffered serious injuries. I really feel like I should apologize for that. Plus, Ram did criticize me a lot for it.”

Rem: “That man…”

Roswaal: “—Died. In the end, he didn’t even look the same, and it was a cruel death. Although, since it was a man who deserved it, I don’t have any sympathy for him at all.”

Roswaal put it as ‘died’, but Rem felt like he should’ve put it in an entirely different way.

He didn’t just die; Rem killed him. She crushed his limbs, healed his wounds, repeated it over and over, tortured him, while making him regret the crime he committed. And then—

Roswaal: “You have carried out the Oni clan retribution, though you had no choice in that situation. So now…”

Rem: “…No, not yet.”

She killed one, but not all of them. There were still three left.

Rem: “Only one has been killed so far. There are three left that ought to be punished.”

Roswaal: “Well, what are you going to do? Find those three and carry out retribution? Are you saying you’ve realized how right it was to have revenge after killing the first one? Is that it?”

Hearing Rem’s unclear words, Roswaal questions her determination that still sounded like doubt.

What was left in Rem’s heart after smashing that man with an iron sphere?

It was the first time she took away someone’s life. It was revenge for her family, for her parents. Rem certainly took one step forward to obtain the vengeance that she swore on, but what did she feel?

Was it the aversion to killing? Or was it the feeling of achievement from accomplishing revenge? Inside Rem’s heart, there was—

Rem: “…There’s not really anything.”

Roswaal: "…"

Rem: "I don't feel anything in particular from killing that man. Is that odd?"

Rem, with emotionless eyes, tilts her head at Roswaal, who said nothing.

The shock of killing a person shocked her so much that her heart couldn't accept reality. That's probably what Rem looked like right now. However, Rem knew that wasn't true.

There was nothing that shook Rem's heart from the man's death.

If she had to say there was something she felt from the way the man died, it would be—

Rem: "—I will grant Onee-chan's wish."

Roswaal: "You will grant Ram's wish?"

Rem: "Yes, I will."

The Oni clan's retribution, the four targets, to kill them was Ram's wish and her pride.

However, without her horn, Ram didn't have the power to get revenge on them. But still, Ram was more right than anything and anyone, so her wish had to be fulfilled.

So, what could she do? How could she grant Ram's wish?—That was simple.

Rem: "I will"

—I will just become the replacement for Ram's lost horn.

To prove how right Ram was, to wipe away Ram's shame, the one who was the hope of the Oni clan, Rem would be her hands and legs, her sister's horn—she would fill Ram's shoes.

Rem: "Roswaal-sama. …Will you teach me the basics of magic?"

Roswaal: "—Hm. You want me to teach you magic?"

Rem: "Yes. I heard from Frederica-sama and Clind-sama that Roswaal-sama is the kingdom's best magic user. They said you use all magic, and that you're an extraordinary magic user."

Roswaal: "They aren't wrong. In the kingdom…well, even if you consider the whole world, there's no one out there as knowledgeable on magic as I aaaam. But why?"

Roswaal affirms an evaluation about himself without even being humble, and after that, he asks a question about Rem's intentions. The reason why she was asking to study magic under him.

Hearing that question, Rem closes her eyes once, and then she opens her light blue eyes slowly as she said,

Rem: "—For Onee-chan. To become Onee-chan's horn."

Roswaal: "You will become Ram's horn?"

Rem: "Yes. Onee-chan swore on retribution, and it's the Oni clan's dearest wish. But, Onee-chan can't accomplish that without her horn. So, I will fill Onee-chan's shoes."

Roswaal: "So that you sisters can carry out the Oni clan's retribution?"

Rem: "No. —So that Onee-chan can be herself."

Ram was right. More right than anything. She was going to prove it. She would become the horn to do that.

Rem says her decision, and her mouth begins to open, creating a lovely smile. It was one that had more happiness than any of the many smiles she had in her days at the mansion.

When Roswaal closed his eyes upon seeing that smile, he opened his lips with lipstick and said,

Roswaal: "—Okay. Sure thing. If retribution is what you and Ram want, then I shall respect that wish. I shall support that wish.

Revenge shall be attained by all means possible.”

Rem: “…You won’t…go against it?”

Rem wouldn’t let go even if he was against it, but she was still surprised with his answer.

It was because out of the two choices Roswaal presented, Rem thought that he wanted them to choose to “abandon revenge”.

However, Roswaal closed one of his eyes in front of Rem, who felt surprised. He looks at Rem with his yellow eye.

Roswaal: “Whether you choose to forget about it or not, I will respect your decision. But, I know which one is the difficult choice. And well, the reason why I want to help you guys who chose the difficult road is because I’m no stranger to not wanting to forget as well.”

Rem: “Roswaal-sama…there’s something you don’t want to forget too, huh.”

Roswaal: “Not even for a moment. No matter much time passes.”

Roswaal says that reply, making a distant look for a second, and it pierced her heart. The grief and envy heard in his voice were emotions Rem knew well.

This was the first time when Rem and Roswaal formed something that was close to genuine trust.

Roswaal: “Rem, did you get that man to tell you the names of the people whom you ought to get revenge on?”

Rem: “—Sade. Sergey. Faust. The man who died is Fogg.”

Roswaal: “Those are the names of those that must be punished. Got it. I will definitely help with you with your wish.”

She tells him the names she got out of the man who screamed in the basement when his torture ended. Roswaal said that he’d help, so he should use all means possible and find the men.

And then, they'd find those three people, and they would atone just like the man she killed.

Roswaal: "Fill Ram shoes, be Ram's hands and legs, be Ram's horn —"

"…"

Roswaal: "—So you're saying that you want to be Ram's substitute."

Rem: "…Aah"

Hearing Roswaal's words, Rem a shiver ran down her spine. Her cheeks lose heat, and her heart flutters.

Ram's "Substitute"—that was really, truly, so easy to understand for Rem.

Rem: "—Yes, I am. I want to be Onee-chan's substitute."

The Oni girl being shined on by the moonlight coming from the window gives that answer, entranced.

7

Roswaal puts the Oni sisters to sleep on the same bed, and he leaves the bedroom.

Waving his cloak, he tramps through the empty corridor, and he headed to the office on the mansion's top floor. He returns to his own private room, and he faces the desk as he closes the toor with the hand he had behind him. Then,

Roswaal: "For you to enter the room without the master being there, don't you think that's a quiiiite rude?"

Clind: "My apologies. I had an important trifle, and so I figured it'd be okay to use Master's absence as a reason to come again. Explanation."

Roswaal: “For you to call it a trifle even though you said it was important, what does that even mean? Well, I mustn’t get maaaad. Because…”

Roswaal, cutting off his words there, snaps his fingers. In response to that sound, the magic lights in the room turn on all at once, and the room that had been in dim light starts to light up.

The office design was extremely simple to concentrate on business. There was a desk for duties, a sofa and table for receptions, and then nothing but several bookshelves and some art to decorate it.

And then, inside the room, there was a tall butler standing calmly with his back against the window that let in moonlight. The butler entered the room without the master’s permission, but Roswaal didn’t blame him.

Roswaal: “She couldn’t just turn down the loyal subject who I made into the villaaaaain.”

Clind: “Yes, it is extremely regrettable. This is why, if Ram and Rem…if those young sisters hated me, I wouldn’t be able to put the loss into words. The readiness I would need for the influence that would heavily affect my daily work as a butler. Major loss.”

Roswaal: “It’s just like you to put that into words without hesitation. Still, I swear to be as careful as possible so that doesn’t happen. —Though, I’m not sure how much you can trust me on that.”

Hearing Roswaal say that in a masochistic manner, the butler—Clind neither supports him nor corrects him. Seeing that behavior makes Roswaal more and more pleased, and his smile deepens.

Roswaal: “So, what is your oh so important triiiiiifle?”

Clind: “It’s about the thing that happened, of course. —The result that happened because I gave the key to the basement warehouse to Rem and ordered her to rearrange it, just like Master told me to. That disastrous scene. Explanation.”

Roswaal: “Disastrous scene, eh. It sure was that terrible. Rem was hurt heavily and the basement had her blood all over…though it was the man that turned into meat who was being scattered.”

Clind: “I don’t have any thoughts on that man’s death because of the circumstances. But what I want to hear from Master is an explanation for why you made Rem do that. Rights and wrongs.”

Roswaal: “Explanation, an explanation, huh. Let’s seeeee.”

Roswaal, without changing his expression, ponders the question asked by the butler who kept his tone the same. He then waits for a moment, and when he raised his finger and faced Clind he said,

Roswaal: “Well, let’s leave that as a secret like always.”

Clind: “—Understood. Comprehension.”

Clind bows in response to the playful answer without any opposition. Roswaal gives a wry smile unconsciously.

Roswaal: “Though this is just the usual, I feel uneasy rather than good because of your compliance. Are you really okay with not asking anythiiiing?”

Clind: “I’m sure Master has his own well thought out plans. It is reasonable for you to not reveal your true motive to someone like me…but I do have something on my mind. Worry.”

Roswaal: “Hm, you do?”

Clind: “Master doesn’t reveal his thoughts, his goals, not even what’s inside his heart, to anyone. I do think that’s because of Master’s excellent abilities and it’s a result of the strength of his heart…but sometimes, I feel pity for you. Presumptuous.”

Roswaal: “…Continue.”

Roswaal closes one eye in interest, and he sat on the sofa. Once he crossed his long legs and urged him to continue, Clind, who closed his eyes, speaks on with his back straight.

Clind: “Glass is hard, but fragile. Sometimes your heart that tries to be strong and solid seems more like glass, not steal. Hardship.”

Roswaal: “So you’re saying that my heart is like glass, is that it?”

Clind: “If there are times it is steel, then there are times when it is glass. A person’s heart truly is a mysterious thing. However, if you’re alone when you’re glass, you’ll have no way to defend against a stone thrown at you. Defenseless.”

Roswaal: “…”

Clind: “If, say, you have someone to come close to when your heart is a glass, then that’s a different story. It depends on if you’re interested in having such a thing, and that you wish for it. Report.”

Clind adds a bow with his last word because he said something too forward. A perfect, deep bow. Head kept down, perhaps not intending to bring it back up without Roswaal’s permission.

While seeing that with a sidelong glance, Roswaal puts his slender finger on his chin, and he let out a soft sigh.

Roswaal: “So basically you used this incident as an excuse to scold me and that I should go get married?”

Clind: “What a misunderstanding. If I could, I would meet a wife I could trust, have kids with her, and have those kids tell me what to do. Pure.”

Roswaal: “For you to let babies take care of you, that’s a pretty courageous decisioooon.”

Clind gives an explanation, speaking somewhat fast, and Roswaal made a faint, bitter smile. That interaction showed Roswaal’s answer to the previous question.

Then, his impulse to smile fades, and they both tighten their mouths.

Roswaal: “I shall take your advice. Though I think it’ll be hard to doooo.”

Clind: “There are probably a lot of women who won’t go any further because of the rumors about Master and his personality, but if you drop the makeup and dress properly, I don’t think there will be any problems. Advice.”

Roswaal: “Theeeen, I can’t. If I wash my face and change my clothes, then I can’t be who I am.”

Roswaal throws away the most realistic advice that’s been said thus far, and he puts his elbow on the table.

Roswaal: “Well, if you’re fine with it, then the previous matter is settled. Ram and Rem might hit you coldly for a bit, but please do your best to deceive theeem.”

Clind: “I have no problem with those little girls hitting me. Pleasure.”

Roswaal: “Sinful. Ah, right right, so I do believe that there was an iron sphere with chains kept in the basement warehouse…can you change it so that it’d be easy for Rem to use?”

Clind: “I wanted to remake cute clothing and stuff, but I accept. Reluctantly.”

Rem got her vengeance during her battle with the man tied to the basement using that special weapon. Out of all the weapons in the basement that were difficult to use, Rem dared to choose that one.

Roswaal: “I never used it before, but it surprisingly ended up being something worthwhile.”

Clind: “Considering everything and use everything, I think that’s the thing to learn here. Humble opinion.”

Roswaal: “Yeah, you certainly are right. Well, Clind, you may go back down now.”

Seeing Roswaal give a gesture that said the conversation was over, Clind bows and moves towards the door smoothly. Then, while he went over Roswaal said “Oh yeah” from behind and added, Roswaal: “Though Ram and Rem are angry, I’m sure that you and Frederica are mad about the commotion that happened in the basement too. Actually, that girl’s angry look was the strongest. Make sure to dodge her well.”

Clind: “…All right. Melancholy.”

Roswaal finally makes bitterness show on Clind’s profile, and he smiles like a bad boy seeing that his teasing was a success. Then, once the butler left the room, one person was left inside.

Roswaal: “…”

In silence, Roswaal rests on the sofa, and he looks up at the moon out the window.

He gazes at the moon missing its upper half, and while bathing in the silver moonlight, he closes one eye.

—It looked as if the bright moon was shaking inside of his yellow eye.

Chapter 4:
A Festival Dyed in Blood

1

—Rem was completely overwhelmed by the force of that overpowering crowd.

Rem: “Eh…ah…u…”

Rem gets pushed around left and right, overwhelmed by that scene.

The frail voice that leaked from her lips almost made it seem like she returned to the person she was back at the village. Although, if you were to ask if Rem’s true nature had changed from back then, the answer would be no.

She just became capable of doing a few things, and so she became good at misleading people. It was also something that quickly exposed her true colors in unexpected situations. That’s why her old self would show up suddenly, just like how it was now.

Ram: “Rem, you’ll get lost.”

Rem: “—?!”

A familiar voice suddenly hits Rem’s ear drums while she was surrounded by the surging crowd. Rem’s name was called, which made her shoulders jump, and she turned around. She looks at the face of her beloved sister who worried about her.

Ram: “Are you okay? Is the abundance of people too much for you to handle? I guess it’s expected. After all, it is your first time being somewhere with this many people.”

Rem: “Er…mm…”

The way Ram gently caressed her cheek with her fingers allows her to calm down. Rem puts her hand on her sister’s hand to get a better feeling of it, and when she sighed, she said, Rem: "…Nee-sama, sorry for making you worried. I'm fine."

Ram: "Are you sure? You don't have to push yourself. If you can't do it, then you can wait in the dragon carriage quietly…"

Rem: "No really, I'm fine. I can't be disheartened from something like this."

When she replied with a smile on her face, Ram pulled her hand back while still feeling a little worried. Rem, who was now more relaxed thanks to her sister, looks around at her surroundings again.

It was still the same. She saw a crowd of an enormous amount of people passing by. The noise and the abundance of presences of people made Rem feel like she was going to faint.

She couldn't say that there were a lot of humans at the Oni village or at the Mathers residence. That was the only experience Rem had with villages, so to her, this amount of people defied common knowledge.

—The Royal Capital Lugunica, the center of the Dragon Kingdom Lugunica.

The biggest capital of the dragon kingdom, a diverse melting pot with a population of over 300,000.

That was the name and title of the land Rem and Ram were standing on.

Roswaal: "How's your first time being at the royal capital? It's preeeetty splendid, right?"

Frederica: "You two, please be very careful so that you don't get lost. Finding a lost child in this city is no simple task. It's very difficult."

Then, the two people who spoke to the attached sisters in the surging crowd were Roswaal and Frederica.

Unlike Rem and Ram, they had plenty of experience with kingdoms and so there was no sign of them being nervous from the abundance of people. With how Rem was now, just that was enough for her to look up to them.

Ram: “It would still be difficult to search for us even when we look this conspicuous?”

Roswaal: “Maid clothes aren’t even unusual in the kingdooom. Innovators with foresight even run restaurants where the workers wear maid uniforms and serve customers. Weeeell, there aren’t really many young maids like you and Rem, so we win in that regard.”

Ram: “I don’t want to know why you feel like you’ve won.”

Ram, pinching the edge of her maid clothes she was now used to, says that in a bored manner.

Since the basement warehouse incident, her sister’s attitude towards Roswaal had been growing more and more bitter.

It seemed tying up a dangerous man, who was even their enemy, in the basement was enough for Ram to be more cautious of Roswaal. But on the other hand, Roswaal showed that he was intending on helping them with their revenge, so Ram felt quite conflicted inside.

Rem: “Sorry, Roswaal-sama. That’s not what Nee-sama truly feels. She just kinda has this lovely side of her that is dishonest.”

In contrast with Ram, Rem was obedient to Roswaal. Ram and Roswaal had opposite reactions to those words that were considerate towards both her master and her sister.

Ram pouted reluctantly, while Roswaal smiled.

Roswaal: “I know. Ram and I talk to each other enough. After all, we do spend sweet time together alone every night until we’re completely satisfied.”

Ram: “Sweet time? Apparently Roswaal-sama’s standard for tastes and my standard for tastes don’t match. Looks like this means the kitchen work you bothered to teach me was a waste.”

Rem: “But Nee-sama…hasn’t your treatment with Roswaal-sama been taking longer lately?”

Ram: “Hmph…”

Rem picks on Ram, who tried to respond sarcastically, with an objective fact.

In actuality, her treatment at night—lately it tended to take a long time. If there was no changes in the details of the treatment, then there had to be a change in their interactions.

Rem: “It would make me happy if Nee-sama and Roswaal-sama got along well.”

Roswaal: “So she saaaays.”

Ram: “—. ——. ——. —I’ll do my best.”

Rem nodded as she was satisfied with her sister’s answer, though it did take some time for her to say it.

Frederica: “Okay, let’s leave it at that. If this gets dragged out too long, we won’t be able to take care of our business, though it isn’t an awful lot. But I do agree that a master and his servant should get along well.”

Rem: “Oh, sorry. You’re right.”

Frederica claps her hands and moves the conversation forward. Rem apologies quietly in response to her and renews her consciousness, as she was getting carried away by being in the royal capital for the first time. It was her first time going far and her first time at a royal capital, but they weren’t there to fool around—

Rem: “Roswaal-sama’s relatives are having a baby. We are looking for gifts.”

Roswaal: “Yes. The Miload family will be the collateral descendants of the Mathers family. Grace, who will soon be a mother, is a close friend of mine. I want to celebrate her and her child graaaandly.”

Ram: “For you to go through the trouble going to the royal capital for that, you must have a lot of spare time.”

Roswaal: “I’m giving a gift to a close friend. Of course I’d find the time to choose one myself.”

Ram: “…”

When Roswaal replied, Ram, who acted cynical again, was the one to stay silent. Even Rem thought that the odds were against her sister in this conversation.

Unwilling to let the mood stay like this, Rem points at the crowds of people.

Rem: “S-Still, that’s quite a lot of people. Is the royal capital always like this?”

Roswaal: “It’s not an unusual scene for the royal capital…is what I’d like to say. But today is just speciaaaaal. Today is the day of the “Tammuz Festival”, one of the moon festivals that happen once a month.”

Rem: “Tammuz…festival?”

Rem tilts her head upon hearing a word she was unfamiliar with. Seeing Rem do that, Frederica begins a lecture as she held up a finger.

Frederica: “Laguna history is divided into 12 months, right? The days in the middle of those months are the days when moon festivals are held, and people celebrate. This month is Tammuz month…in this area, ice season ends and it’s the time when it starts getting warm, so flowers and fruit and such are on sale a lot.”

Roswaal: “Anyhow, if there’s a moon festival, you’ll find rare stuff that usually doesn’t appear on the market. If you’re going to be giving a present, you might as well make it a special one. And that’s why I came to the capital on the day of a festivaaaaal.”

Rem: “I see, that’s good to know.”

Rem, who got informed about festivals, understood the flamboyant atmosphere of people passing by the capital. She sure was getting glimpses of faces that were more or less carefree. The Oni village also had customs for days of celebration. —Although, they were mostly days where Ram's birth was celebrated.

Frederica: "So, Master. What are you looking for today?"

Ram: "He doesn't know, and I bet that's why we're in the capital crowded with people on festival day."

Frederica: "Gr…Even so, he should have an idea."

Ram's cold words anger Frederica, and she looks at Roswaal as if to confirm her conjecture. Then, Roswaal responds by saying "Of course" as he nodded delightfully.

Roswaal: "Frankly, what I'm looking for is something the baby will be happy with. If it satisfies that condition, then I don't care what it iiiiiis."

Frederica: "…The gift isn't for Grace-sama?"

Roswaal: "A gift for Grace would be a present for the Miload family. This is something I want to give to celebrate the baby. That's the plan."

He was probably saying that the gift would change depending on if it was for the family or if it was for a specific person. Rem and Frederica tug their chins in upon hearing Roswaal's words, while Ram was the only one to knit her brows pensively.

Rem: "So you want to choose something the baby will like even though it hasn't been born yet. You sure are asking for quite the feat."

Roswaal: "Right? It is going to be veeeery difficult. After all, I am famous for not being able to understand feelings even with those whom I talk with face to faaaace."

Ram: "That's not something you should be proud of."

Ram snorted slightly because of Roswaal's modesty, or at the very least, because of Rem's judgement. Seeing that girl's reaction happily, Roswaal clapped his hands as he said "That's where…".

Roswaal gathers the attention of the three maids, and he continues while having his hands together.

Roswaal: "Today, starting now, I would like to find a gift with all your help. Since you guys would most likely be better at choosing something than I would beeeee."

Frederica: "It is an honor to be counted on by Master. But still, what are we going to do?"

Roswaal reveals his intention, and Frederica asks him that with a look that appeared to be just a little nervous. It was an omen that could only be sensed between people who knew each other for a long time, one that Rem and Ram couldn't understand.

It was her sense of smell reacting to Roswaal's absurdity he spoke of. Although, even if her sense of smell grasped the omen, she couldn't escape it, nor could she prevent it.

Then, sure enough, Roswaal's smile deepened upon hearing Frederica's question, and he spoke.

Roswaal: "—We'll decide on a time and place to meet, and we'll split into two groups to find a present. A present suitable for a soon to be born child. There will be a prize for the one that does a good jooooob."

2

Frederica: "Master sure has some troubling ideas…"

Rem: "It's Roswaal-sama's idea, so we'll just have to do it. But what I'm unhappy with is how we were split. I wanted to be with Nee-sama…"

Frederica: "I know you don't mean any harm, but it does kinda hurt when you say that."

While walking around the capital's shopping street together, Rem's frank statement makes Frederica's cheeks twitch. Seeing that reaction, Rem immediately bows her head as she said "Sorry".

Roswaal's idea—or rather, as a result of the "Birthday Celebration Selection" division, as you can see, Ram and Roswaal were paired together, while Rem and Frederica were grouped together.

It was inevitable for Roswaal and Frederica to be split, who were knowledgeable of the capital's geography and were unlikely to get lost, and take care of Rem and Ram. Rem would be happy if the sisters were one group and Roswaal and Frederica were another, but then it would be difficult to get back together afterwards.

Rem: "If we can't do that, as long as Roswaal-sama or Frederica-sama goes alone, we can be divided into a 3 man group, with me and Nee-sama, and a one man group…"

Frederica: "You're being pretty absurd! I'll be lonely if I have to go alone!"

Rem: "Frederica-sama really is so honest."

When Rem smiled at the honest girl, Frederica sees it and she squinted her jade green eyes. Then, she murmured "Thank goodness" to catch her breath.

Rem: "Frederica-sama?"

Frederica: "It looks like this trip to the capital has allowed you to relax a bit. That makes me feel relieved. I was worried about your recent behavior."

Rem: "…"

Frederica: "I wasn't sure how much the incident of the enemy sneaking into the basement warehouse scarred you."

Rem couldn't find the words to respond to Frederica, who cared for her in a gloomy voice.

As indicated by how Frederica put it as "an enemy sneaking in", it appeared that she wasn't aware of the details of the man that was tied to the basement warehouse. According to Roswaal, Clind was the only other person who knew about the man's existence, and it seemed that the other servants were given an explanation that differed from the truth.

And the only three who knew about the man's background were Roswaal, Rem, and Ram.

Rem: "Thank you for worrying about me. But I'm fine."

Frederica: "I can't just be convinced with that when I see those injuries. Ram's face was burning red in anger…all of it happened because Clind had bad timing…!"

Rem: "It's true that Clind-sama had bad timing, but he is the one who found me worn-out. Besides, Roswaal is teaching me magic now, and so even if something like that happens again, I'll be able to heal my wounds"

She decided to let Frederica falsely accuse Clind, who Frederica had a grudge against. Moreover, what Rem spoke of was the basic magic Roswaal was teaching her, as promised.

Although Rem know about it at the village, apparently she had an aptitude for "Water" magic, and her technique was improving steadily thanks to Roswaal's teachings. She was still inexperienced, but soon enough, surely she'd put her attacks and healing techniques to use, and she'd even be able to hold her own in battle.

However—

Frederica: "Please don't say that it'll happen again. There's no need for an omen like that."

Frederica did not accept Rem's response.

Frederica: "I was doing some serious reflection. About that day when I left Rem alone at the mansion. If I was there, you would have never suffered injuries like that."

Rem: "…I appreciate your feelings."

That honest affection makes Rem look away reflexively.

Frederica was truly a kind woman for how she spoke. The woman who was always worrying about her was so nice that she felt inferior for hiding something.

Still, the moment she thought like that, Rem said this to herself.

—Those feelings are too much for a girl for me.

Rem: “…Oh! Frederica-sama, look. Doesn’t that look like a good place for gifts?”

Looking away from her, Rem finds a gorgeous store, and she gets attracted by it, thinking that she got lucky. It was a jewelry store. Frederica’s eyes widen upon seeing Rem moving quickly.

Frederica: “Dangit, wait, Rem! If you move by yourself, you’ll get lost!}

Then, she raised her voice, back to acting like the nagging teacher she usually was.

Even after that, Rem and Frederica’s “Present Searching” continued endlessly.

They walked around being fascinated by the full bloom flowers, felt the horror from the eye-popping prices at the jewelry store, and sat down and ate the food they bought at food stands since they figured eating while walking would be indecent—.

Frederica: “All right, now’s about time we should really narrow down our choices.”

After using about half of the 6 hours they had to search for a gift, the two of them had a strategy meeting while taking a break in front of a water fountain at a park.

In Frederica’s hand there was a note that had all the names of the stores they had visited and potential gifts written down. As they looked at that, in a friendly way, they thought deeply about what would be good choice.

Rem: “A gift, something it would be happy with…when I think about it like that, it feels really difficult.”

Frederica: “It really does, huh. Rem, if, for example, Ram was going to give a present to you, what would make you happy?”

Rem: “The fact that Nee-sama is willing to give me a gift would make me happy.”

Frederica: “That was a bad example. Hmm, let’s see…switching places, what would you give Ram? To your precious twin sister.”

Upon hearing that question, Rem feels a shock that was like getting hit by lighting, and it made her whole body tremble.

If Rem was going to give Ram a gift…what in the world would she give her? Rem had already given Ram things before. But all those things were given when they were at the village, and in that life that had nothing to do with money, Rem only gave her things like corollas and steamed potatoes—.

Rem: “But now that I’m being paid, I can give Nee-sama presents…!”

Frederica: “Rem? Hey, Rem. Are you listening to me? Reeemmm, I shouldn’t have aaasked.”

Rem: “Sorry, Frederica-sama. I have to find a present for Nee-sama now!”

Frederica: “I admit that it’s all my fault for asking! Sit down! Please sit down!”

Frederica stops Rem, who stood up and was about to run off as fast as she could at any moment.

Without her horn out, Rem couldn’t match her physical strength, so she gave in reluctantly. Frederica, who dealt with Rem’s unexpected resistance, felt relieved as she caressed her long blond hair.

Frederica: “You’re just like Ram with how you’re sometimes hard to deal with, and it sure does give the feeling that you’re both twins.”

Rem: “My…your praise is going to make me blush…”

Frederica: “Sorry for making you blush, but I’ll be moving on. By the way, seeing how you just acted, I’m guessing that you’ve never given a present to someone?”

Rem: “Umm…nope. Nobody besides Nee-sama. And Nee-sama never has either.”

Frederica’s question probably also meant to imply things like “gifts for babies and young people”, similar to what they were looking for now. Unfortunately, Rem never had opportunities like that.

Rem: “The Oni village never bore much children at all, and Nee-sama and I were the youngest there. There was no one near our age, and Nee-sama received special treatment…”

Frederica: “…I said something insensitive again.”

Rem: “Oh! So, Frederica-sama, how about you? Has your little brother ever given you a present?”

Rem senses Frederica reflecting upon herself, so she panics and changes the subject.

Rem: “You did say that he is at “Sanctuary. And you did send him a letter.”

When Ram and Roswaal left to “Sanctuary” the other day, Frederica gave Ram a letter. That was also when she found out that she had a brother.

Frederica nods at Rem, who remembered the name Garfiel.

Frederica: “Uhh, I send him a letter and a present on his birthday. That said, he doesn’t respond, but I still continue to send him gifts.”

Rem: “What do you send him?”

Frederica: “When I talked with Master, he said that Garfiel likes to read books. He wants to become heroic, so I send him heroic tales of the past.”

Frederica, with eyes that looked kind but lonesome, reminisces about the past. However, when her eyes widened immediately after she spoke, almost in a whisper, she murmured “That’s true” as if she had been convinced.

Frederica: “I’m sure that would be fine. It is a gift for a baby whose face we haven’t even seen yet, after all. As long as we give something that tells it that we wish for it to have a future full of happiness, then it should be fine.”

Rem: “Frederica-sama?”

Frederica: “I found a solution thanks to Rem. It’ll make Master tear up too.”

Rem: “That…makes me a bit excited.”

Although she wasn’t sure how her opinion helped, Frederica seemed to have found the answer to their test. If that was the case, then there shouldn’t be any problem if she went along with her idea.

Rem, being hurried by Frederica who said “Hurry hurry” as she was impatient, left the park with her, and they return to the shopping street. They were probably going to one of the shops decorated with several white stars.

Rem: “Frederica-sama, where are we headed?”

Frederica: “We’re going to find a gift that will let the baby know that we wish for it to grow up into a healthy and graceful woman.”

Rem: “But we don’t know for sure that it’s a girl, since it hasn’t been born yet.”

Rem, while Frederica gave her a wry smile and acted premature, chases after the tall girl who went ahead of her. Frederica enters the crowd, and she moves forward while pushing her way through the surging crowd. She heads toward the street with the shop they were going to while copying the way she walked and—

Rem: "—?!"

In the middle of doing that, Rem smelled an unbearable stink that slipped into her nasal cavity, and she stopped moving.

Rem: "…"

The chills go through Rem's whole body, and she looks all around her as she stood still.

The crowd of people walking avoid the girl who stood still, as if they were annoyed. Without even minding those reactions, Rem sharpened her sense of smell as she looked for the source of the stink.

This feeling, this scent, it had to be the smell she came across in that basement. It was the scent she smelled on that fiery night when Rem and Ram's village burned.

She didn't have a reason nor any proof. However, this was the evil scent that deserved to be punished.

Frederica: "—Rem, what's wrong?"

Frederica notices that Rem stopped, and she calls out to her. However, Rem turned around without answering her, and the stink —she turned her attention towards the path that lead to the alley where that wafted.

Frederica: "Rem—?!"

Rem, following the smell, pushes her way through the crowd and rushes into the alley. Behind her, Frederica called Rem, almost sounding like she was screaming, but it didn't make her slow down.

When she entered the alley, the capital's main street lost its splendor, and she rushed into a dim space that blocked sunlight and sound. While Rem blotted out the noise that could be heard from afar with her footsteps and breathing, she looked in the narrow path with her eyes wide-open.

The smell was near. Rem gets closer at once while she stopped the rage in her throat from exploding. The path curves over and over. She starts running so fast that her footsteps were practically burning onto the ground, and she arrived at the deepest part of the alley.

But—

Rem: “There’s no one here…?!”

Rem, hitting a dead end, growls that while grinding her teeth in anger.

She saw no one at the deepest part of the alley surrounded by the city’s outer wall. There truly was a stink in the space enveloped in darkness, but there was neither the shadow nor the form of the villain that caused it.

Rem: “Why…why why…why…!”

Rem’s vision turns red from the absurdity, and she stamps her feet to distract herself from her irritation. She was cracking the stone paving with her Oni leg power, but her anger wasn’t fading at all. She stomps, stomps, and stomps—

Frederica: “Rem, stop this now! This the capital, the territory of the highest nobles!”

Rem, taking her anger out on the alley, has her arm grabbed by Frederica, who had been chasing her from behind. While breathing lightly, Frederica frowns upon seeing Rem’s behavior.

Frederica: “What happened to you? You started running all of a sudden, and now this…”

Rem: “Nee-sama’s and my enemy was here.”

Frederica: “…”

Hearing that firm answer, Frederica freezes, unable to speak. But when she swallowed her saliva, she immediately came back to her senses.

Frederica: “Nee-sama and your enemy…you mean the witch cult?”

Rem: “Yes. The witch cult. One of the remaining three was here.”

She was sure he was there. No doubt about it. Rem nods at Frederica over and over with confidence.

However, Frederica looked displeased with Rem’s assertion.

Frederica: “Why do you say that? The witch cultists can’t be found so easily…”

Rem: “—! I can! I can tell! Their…I can sense their smell! The disgusting, awful smell of an evil person!”

Frederica gazes in wonderment at Rem, whose voice cracked as she pleaded with her.

Even Rem herself didn’t know why she could sense the witch cultists smell. If Rem had to give a reason for it, it would be that her Oni hunting instincts were commanding her. Her Oni blood granted her something necessary to carry out retribution for the Oni clan and so that she could be Ram’s horn.

There was nothing more to it. And there didn’t have to be.

Rem: “Why don’t you believe me?! If I noticed sooner, they wouldn’t have gotten away…! If it was Nee-sama…if it was Nee-sama, they definitely wouldn’t have gotten away…!”

They were in a capital with so many people. Even finding only three people would be impossible if they disappeared into this crowd. She missed a golden opportunity.

It was the worst failure. If it was Ram, this wouldn’t have happened. And yet—

Rem: “For…Nee-sama…I will…!”

Frederica: “…”

Rem clenches her fist so tight that she starts bleeding, and she roars while feeling regret from the bottom of her heart. Frederica lowered her eyes, unable to bear looking at Rem acting like that, and then she raised her voice saying “Ah” as she noticed something.

Frederica: “Could that be…”

Frederica ran up close to the wall while she murmured. At her feet, there was something small that fell out, something Rem overlooked. Frederica picks it up carefully.

Rem: “Frederica-sama, what is that…?”

Rem, who tried to walk up to Frederica, grimaces from the sudden stink. The stink characteristic of the witch cult was coming from Frederica’s hand—from the small bag she picked up.

Frederica: “Rem, well done.”

Rem: “Huh…?”

Frederica: “Let’s meet back up with Master right away. We have to get rid of those who will disturb the moon festival.”

With a firm tone, Frederica says that to Rem, who was disturbed by the small bag. Then, without waiting for Rem’s reply, Frederica tightly closes the small bag.

Frederica: “—The witch cultists were here for sure. I believe it now.”

That’s what she said with a nod to affirm Rem’s sense of smell.

3

Roswaal: “I seeeee. So this was kept in the alley. I’m surprised you found it.”

Frederica: “Rem found it. She chased after the witch cultists’ stink… or well, the miasma.”

Roswaal joined them earlier than he had planned. He figured there was something wrong with the two servants who had stiff and pale expressions, and he immediately sought an explanation for the situation at a deserted place.

The sensing of the stink, the empty alley, and the small bag with a stink that was left in the alley—Frederica quickly explains the situation, disregarding Rem, and Roswaal tugged his chin in upon hearing those details.

The master, leaning his back against the wall next to the street, ponders over the small bag in his hand. During this time when Roswaal stayed silent, Rem stood still with nothing to do, and someone pulled on her sleeve.

When she turned around, she saw Ram. But her appearance was completely different from how she looked like when she left to go shopping. That was because—

Rem: “Nee-sama, you have completely different clothes and hair ornaments.”

Ram: “…Roswaal-sama had some fun and dressed me up in all kinds of clothes.”

She wore a pink dress as her maid clothes. She had a tiara with jewels as hair ornaments. Her whole outfit was new, and Ram looked pretty like a fairy.

But Ram was displeased with those clothes, and above all, that wasn’t what she was concerned with at this time.

Ram: “Putting that matter aside, Rem, nothing happened to you? Nothing dangerous happened?”

Rem: “I’m fine. But, I’m sorry, Nee-sama. I was sure I found one of the remaining three people, but I let them get away…”

Ram: “It’s okay. Don’t worry about it. Rem’s safety comes first. Retribution…should be carried out by the two of us together. Isn’t that right?”

Rem: “…Yes.”

Ram starts to feel her face. Rem puts her hand over her fingers, and she nods to agree with her sister.

They were going to carry out retribution for the Oni clan together. That's what Ram said. However, Rem was under a vow that was different from what her sister vowed with those words.

—Retribution was what Ram wished for. And so Rem had to grant that as her sister's back up.

She was glad that Ram worried and cared for her, but she wanted to avoid exposing her sister to danger if possible.

While keeping that wish a secret, Rem responded to Rem's sincere eyes with a lying smile. Then, before Ram could say something in response to Rem, Roswaal spoke.

Roswaal: "Rem, first of all, this is a glorious achievement. Had nobody noticed that this was left behind in the alley, a terrible disaster might have happened in the capital. Truuuuly a great feat."

Rem: "Is it really that big of a deal?"

Roswaal: "This isn't something that is dangerous by itself. But if it's left alone for a long time, there's a high chance for it to harm those around iiiiit."

Roswaal shakes the small bag in his hand, and with one eye he looks at Rem, who had a virtual question mark above her head.

Roswaal: "Inside there is a magical stone soaked in miasma… they're called magical miasma stones. If you swallow it, you might die instantly, so you shouldn't it eat them no matter what."

Ram: "There is no idiot out there that would swallow a stone."

Roswaal: "Exactly. If it's a human, they wouldn't make that mistake. If they're human."

He responds to Ram with a statement that sounded like cynical banter, and she knits her brows dubiously.

Ram: “…In other words, they’re going for non-humans? Like animals or something?”

Roswaal: “Only the criminals themselves know who the real targets are. Still, if the miasma slips by for too long, people will go mad. Animals are no exceptions either. Plus, there is a theory which says that they become witchbeasts by taking in magical miasma stones. Surprisingly, they might actually be going for animals.”

Rem: “Animals eating magical miasma stones…that’s how witchbeasts are born?”

Witchbeasts are evil entities that are born and only have intentions to harm other life.

Every witchbeast has a horn on their forehead, and they do not attack other life out of hunger, but because of their intent to murder and their malice. The many mysteries behind their ecology were even frequently observed near the Oni village, and they were dealt with accordingly.

Rem: “I’m pretty sure Nee-sama’s first prey was a witchbeast too.”

Ram: “…Yeah, it was a Guiltylawe. Even though it had a large body, it was stupid, so I had no trouble.”

Roswaal: “That story makes me wonder what you’ll be in the future. However, it doesn’t have to do with how witchbeasts actually multiply. There are a lot of rumors related to magical miasma stones that sound fishy. …Though, they all tend to say that they have adverse effects.”

While speaking, Roswaal puts the contents of the small bag into his palm. That’s when the suffocating stink came out, Rem frowned, and Ram looked at it with interest.

It was a dark, magical stone dyed deep black, and if you took a glimpse at it, your instincts would tell you that it was dangerous.

Frederica: “The minds and bodies of people and animals can be ruined if they’re affected by miasma. Regardless of whether or not it transforms animals into witchbeasts, it is a wafting miasma that would infect the people in the capital.”

Roswaal: “This is a place that bustles with so many people everyday. If the miasma’s effect spread, there would have been significant damaaaage. So good job, Rem.”

With their explanation, Rem understood that she had prevented a disaster before anything happened. She was happy because of that in itself, but her regret about letting the enemy escape still wasn’t going to go away.

And what poured salt on Rem’s wound—

Ram: “—Is that the only magical miasma stone set in the capital?”

Ram, sharpening her light pink eyes, glares at the magical stone in Roswaal’s palm.

Ram: “The witch cult’s goals…there’s no use in guessing what those low-lifes are thinking, but this is clearly a trap that indiscriminately aimed for an unspecified number of humans. I can’t bring myself to think that those low-lives would do this little when they’re people who do so much.”

Roswaal: “Hmmm. So what do you make out of this?”

Ram: “I figured it out with a map when I was walking around town. Considering how big the capital is and how many areas the magical miasma stone could affect…worst case scenario, there are 24 more places with traps. That’s what I would do.”

Rem: “—Nee-sama?!”

Rem raised a startled voice when she heard Ram’s surprising statement. Next to her, Frederica also had her eyes open wide. Roswaal was the only one who had quiet admiration in his eyes.

And then, when Roswaal nodded at Ram as she looked at him, he said,

Roswaal: “I do pretty much agree with your conjecture…but do you have an idea of where they’re set up and how many?”

Ram: “If it was me, I wouldn’t choose a roundabout way like stones to hunt prey in the capital.”

Roswaal: “I see. —You always exceed my expectaaaations.”

Rem felt like behind in this conversation where it seemed as if only Ram and Roswaal understood each other.

Without a pause, Roswaal cracks his knuckles, and Rem, who was puzzled, returns back to reality.

Roswaal: “Then I will now assign roles to each of you. There are people who have evil plans for the moon festival, so how about we smash their scheme into bits and pieceeees?”

Frederica: “All right, Master. —So what are we going to do?”

Frederica pinches her skirt, and she bows elegantly. Roswaal nods approvingly Frederica, who accepted his orders without any qualms.

Roswaal: “I will go to the station right nearby with Ram. There are a lot of guards in the city during moon festivals, so let’s get them involved in the search for magical stones. Ram will pinpoint the locations. I can count on you, riiiiight?”

Ram: “I’m okay with that. …But what are you going to make Rem do?”

Ram looks at Rem with concerned eyes while agreeing to Roswaal’s request. Her sister’s eyes were saying, “Don’t make her do anything dangerous”. However, when Roswaal’s smile disappeared from his face, he said,

Roswaal: “Rem and Frederica will carry out the search and destroy mission in the city. Rem’s ability to recognize the miasma’s smell, even while being far away from it, is valuable. She can tell where the magical stones are placed more accurately than you can guess where it is.”

Ram: “—! But!”

Roswaal: “Aaaand there’s more. If she’s lucky, she might even run into the witch cultists going around that placed the magical stones. Am I wrooooong?”

Roswaal interrupts Ram as she objected, continues speaking up to that point, and finally looks at Rem.

Rem, who had been completely left behind with the topic, widens her eyes upon hearing those words. If the witch cultists were still setting up magical stones, they would appear at other places where they would do so. —The enemies that deserved to be punished.

Rem: “—I’ll do it. Let me do it.”

Ram: “Rem—”

Ram raised her voice when Rem took a step forward and replied. But Rem still shook her head at her sister.

Rem: “It’ll be fine, Nee-sama. Besides, I absolutely can’t miss this chance.”

Ram: “Wait, Rem. Please don’t rush by yourself. I…”

Rem: “I’m not rushing by myself. Nee-sama and I are always together. It’s always the two of us. So, the retribution will be carried out with the use of both of our powers too.”

Rem removes Ram’s fingers that were clinging onto her, and she says that with a smile. Rem didn’t back down, even after seeing Ram shocked from those words.

Then, taking the place of Ram who couldn’t stop her sister with her words or her strength,

Frederica: “Ram, it’ll be fine. Rem won’t have to fight alone, nothing like that. I’m someone who regrets not being at the basement on that day, after all.”

Ram: “Frederica…”

Frederica: “Have some faith in your senior maid. I may not look like it, but I am strong, you know?”

Frederica winks at Ram, and she quickly mumbled, unsure of how to respond. Roswaal taps her slender shoulder from behind as he smiled.

Roswaal: “Relax. Besides, Frederica is actually stronger than Rem. In the mansion, me or Clind are just about the only ones who are strooooonger.”

Frederica: “That irritates me since it’s the truth. Anyways, leave it up to me. Everything.”

Frederica sticks her chest out after giving a wry smile, and she confidently declared that she would help. After Ram stayed silent for a few moments upon hearing her answer she said,

Ram: “Listen, Rem. If you think you might get hurt, use Frederica as a shield and run away, okay?”

Frederica: “I do at least want to shield her, but I’m not sure how I feel about being told to do it!”

Frederica’s scream resounds throughout the crowd, and the matter was settled, at least for now.

Ram and Roswaal would ask for help from the guards and crush the places set with magical stones through sheer numbers. Meanwhile, Rem and Frederica would track down the magical stones and the criminals by following the stink.

Frederica: “Master, we’ll be careful to avoid being seen, so can I have your permission?”

Roswaal: “Sure thing. If you do your best to run carefully, you won’t be found anywaaaay.”

They have a confusing interaction at the end, and then Rem and Frederica break up with Roswaal and Ram. Ram worried about Rem until the very end, but Rem still responded by waving her small hand to say goodbye.

Rem and Frederica confirm that they could no longer see them, and they enter the back alley. Rem wanted to hurry, but Frederica beckoned her in the alley.

Rem: “Frederica-sama? I would like to move as soon as possible…”

Frederica: “I know how you feel. So, I want to help you as much as I can. …Do not tell the others about this.”

Rem: “—?”

When Rem tilted her head upon hearing an ambiguous reply, Frederica smiled wryly. Usually she would hide her mouth when smiling, but she had no intention of hiding her sharp fangs with this wry smile.

And so, Frederica sighed softly, and she put her hands around the back of her maid clothes. She removes the hook of her clothes, and the knot was coming off.

Rem: “…U-Um, Frederica-sama? We’re outside, you know?”

Frederica: “I know. But I have to do this!”

Rem was disturbed by Frederica taking off her clothes all of a sudden, but she still didn’t stop, face flushed. Soon enough, Frederica’s apron dress was off, and she even put her hands on her daring underwear and took that off, placing it on top of the dress that she folded carefully.

Rem now saw Frederica standing with her white body exposed, and so she was utterly confused.

When Frederica simply looked down upon seeing Rem’s confusion,

Frederica: “—! Rem, please don’t scream.”

Frederica says that and closes her eyes. The tall woman faced down glaring at the ground—that was what Rem was faced with, and she lost her breath as she sensed hints of the atmosphere suddenly becoming tense.

A sign of the air drying up, and a sense that hurt Rem's whole body. Right after she understood that those reactions were concerning Frederica, Frederica's appearance changed.

Frederica's long, blond hair shrunk, and at the same time, golden hair on her body started to grow to cover her naked body. Frederica, standing up straight, stretches her limbs to the ground as that happened, and her build transforms with a creaking sound, enlarging.

Her characteristic fangs showing from her wide-open mouth were clearly bigger and sharper than usual, and even her looks no longer appeared to be human as she transformed into a wild cat.

In front of Rem, who was speechless, there wasn't the Frederica she was used to. The entity that had just been Frederica was now a beautiful, huge cat covered in golden fur.

Frederica: "It's my beast form, characteristic of half beasts."

Rem: "Y-You can talk like normal?!"

Frederica: "I am still who I am, after all. That's just natural."

That was the only thing that didn't change. She was still the Frederica with reason in her jade green eyes. Despite being shocked by her voice being the same even after transforming into a beast, Rem walked up to her.

Frederica: "Good job not screaming, Rem. …wait, why are you patting my head?"

Rem: "Oh, my hand just kinda…moved on its own…"

Rem was unconsciously caressing Frederica's fur that she had as a large cat. Her fur was strangely soft and smooth, so it was refreshing.

Frederica: "Hey, don't just tickle my neck like that! Plus, we don't have time to fool around. Here, get on my back please."

Rem: "—?! I can grab onto you?!"

Frederica: “I wasn’t expecting you to be so interested…but yes, go ahead and grab onto me. You have to, since a girl as light as you will get blown away if you don’t.”

After nodding vigorously at Frederica, who was full of confidence, Rem got on her back. While holding tight onto her body, Rem said “Good to go” as she enjoyed her fur with her cheeks and body.

After that, when Frederica bent her light limbs—

Frederica: “Let’s go!”

Frederica’s body immediately jumped towards the capital’s sky when she yelled. Rem’s whole body feels the wind, and she was amazed by that speed while hushing her voice.

Frederica: “First we’ll be checking out the east shopping street in accordance with Ram’s instructions.”

Frederica was saying something inside the windstorm, but Rem wasn’t in the right state of mind to answer. When Frederica softly landed on the building’s roof, that’s when they dashed at an astonishing speed, and they were running through the capital, so fast that one would think they were the wind.

4

—The wind direction is unfavorable.

The man senses that bothersome matter with his intuition, something you could call a sixth sense, and he clicked his tongue.

One could say that the wind was the most important factor to the man. To know which direction the wind created by nature was blowing from the hardest, he always had to carefully determine the level of humidity and the temperature.

Otherwise, it would significantly affect his goals and actions. Even a large fire that burns everything starts as just a mere spark. A supporting wind is needed to burst it into big, intense flames. And that was his exact role.

Nevertheless, this was the moment when the unfavorability of the wind got in the way of the man's goals.

???: "…"

It was a sudden change. Just a little while ago, the man thought that the wind was truly favorable. But, the wind suddenly became alarming, and soon there'd be dark clouds.

The preparations were perfect for this day.

He'd been reading the climate and the weather for several days, and based off the capital's terrain, he deduced which would be the ideal spots to set up. He loved the result so much that he was happy that there was going to be a festival soon.

He stuffed the magical miasma stones into small bags one by one diligently, and set them up at spots he decided on beforehand. Next, all he had to do was wait for the feast of blood and cries in the capital to start after the effect of the magical miasma stone spread.

—The wind's direction ruined that plan.

???: "…Oh…well."

When the man saw how dangerous the wind was, he decided to abandon his whole plan. He gave up on it so quickly, but this decisiveness was also an ability that allowed the man to live up to this point.

Since he lived by the wind, it wouldn't make sense to doubt it. It was a natural decision for the man to jump off the wind he had been on when he sensed the unfavorability of it.

The man let go of the magical stones that hadn't been set yet, and he quickly decides to leave the capital. He also ensured a way out of the capital beforehand. Nothing was even happening at this time, anyway. There was nothing to stop the man. Still, he was careful.

Being so careful to the point of excessiveness was how the man managed to live up to this point. So—

Rem: “Found the second one.”

The moment he encountered the small Oni with eyes shining with Oni spirit on a ferocious, large cat the man understood it.

—That this was how the worst wind came about.

5

Rem: “—Found the second one.”

They were at the capital’s slums, the section facing the outer wall—a large cat kicked the roof of the ruined house, and it landed as it raised a cloud of dust. The little Oni on its back looked right through the man standing before her with piercing eyes.

He was a sluggy, short, and somewhat fat man. His face and clothes weren’t unique at all; he was so ordinary that if he slipped into a crowd, you’d lose sight of him instantly. Even that was probably part of what the man wanted.

But that ulterior motive was pointless now that there was nothing he could do about this situation.

Frederica: “What a perfect spot for evil schemes.”

Rem: “—It’s also a perfect place for a scoundrel to suffer a lonesome death.”

Rem, who said a cruel statement, smelled a stink that was stronger than anything she had smelled before. It was as strong as the smell of the man that was tied to the basement warehouse. In others words, he was a part of them.

—Rem and Ram’s enemy, an evil that had to be punished by the Onis.

Rem and Frederica followed Ram’s instructions and went all around the capital as they pleased, destroying the magical miasma stone traps one by one. The combination of Ram’s predictions and Rem’s sense of smell thwarted the witch cult’s plan perfectly, but it was all thanks to Rem that they were able to chase down the principal offender.

While Rem was ruining his plan, she had a realization. —That the principal offender of setting up magical miasma stones was so hung up on predicting the wind's direction in the capital and moving while hiding his traces.

???: "…I sensed the unfavorability of the wind's direction, but I didn't notice the beast smell."

Frederica: "Rem was right about the enemy being careful with the wind."

The small man, who had an expressionless look on his face, stood face to face with the small Oni and large cat while they showed him hostility. He wasn't expressionless because he gave up or because he wasn't regretful; he was expressionless because emotions did not come out in waves for him.

Rem: "You look calm. Did you not notice the headwind with your wind reading skill that you're so proud of?"

???: "…Letting emotions come out in wind and waves is for second-rate wind readers. I won't make a fool of myself like that."

Rem: "You should probably go ahead and let it all out. Since, soon enough, you won't even have that freedom anymore."

Rem answers the man, and a white horn appears from her forehead with a sound. While the pure white horn shone faintly, it sucks in the mana in the atmosphere, and it fills her Oni body with energy.

The man's facial expression changed for the first time when he saw Rem's horn.

???: "…A horn, huh. I see. A survivor from that day of the burning of the hot wind."

Rem: "You will burn to death in the embers of the fire you guys created."

???: "…I'm a wind reader. Suffering a ridiculous death like that is the one thing that will never happen."

Rem: "—Well, we'll see about that."

Rem, who lost interest in the man's replies and got off Frederica's back, was holding onto an iron sphere with chains. After the fight in the basement warehouse, Roswaal instructed Clind to readjust it for Rem. It was Rem's personal weapon—Rem's fang for revenge.

"…"

Behind Rem, Frederica crouched down, and she was ready to jump out whenever she would choose to. She was someone who knew that this was Rem and Ram's revenge, so she looked like she was set on not getting involved if possible, but if Rem lost the upper hand, she wouldn't be able to do anything but reach out for her.

In other words, Rem had to completely beat him to death, a complete victory.

"…"

The man sees Rem take a step forward, and he keeps silent.

Thus, their clash surely would start like this in silence, with only the sound of chains to be heard.

"…"

Rem, with all the might she had put into her arms, releases the destructive power of the iron sphere tied with chains at the man. The chains wriggle, almost sounding like a beast raging, and the blow was shot at the man as it silenced the air.

The spinning iron sphere with thorns had more than enough power to crush the human body. If one were hit directly, their body would turn into meat; even if they had armor and a helmet on, they'd turn into meat from the impact; even if, say, they were a witchbeast, they'd turn into meat. In any case, it had the power to turn things into meat.

Although the fight in the basement warehouse was mere child's play where she just swung it around, she was now trained and so she could hit wherever she pleased. So, just like last time, she threw it to blow off the man's legs.

However——

Rem: "Damn…!"

???: "…Too cocky. You should have almost killed me with that first attack."

Rem grinds her teeth, as her attack that aimed for his legs got dodged, and the man talks to her in an unconcerned voice while looking down on her. Frederica's eyes widen, surprised that he had dodged it.

Frederica: "Is that flight magic?! There are people out there besides Master that could use it?!"

The man that got away from Rem's attack jumped and was floating in the air. The man sighs at Frederica, who raised her voice upon seeing that unexpected scene.

???: "…Sorry to disappoint, but this isn't that sort of high-class magic. It's wind riding that's just for show."

Rem: "Do you really think you can escape just by…"

???: "…Of course, I don't think that I can escape just by flying. However. I had a feeling that the wind's direction was bad. It would only be natural for me to prepare wind protection, don't you think?"

Frederica: "—Rem!"

Frederica, sounding worried, calls out to Rem, who was glaring at the man floating in the sky. When Rem heard her, she turned her attention towards the ground, and that's when her horn sensed countless signs.

Several shadows dressed in black appeared as they practically painted out her surroundings—the desolate scene of the slums.

They were a vanguard with a stink that wasn't easy to bear with, and they had swords that looked like crosses—they were a part of the beings that surrounded Ram and Setanta on the night the village burned down.

Rem: "Witch cultists…!"

???: "…I'm someone who likes insurance. I do set the magical stones myself, but that doesn't mean I ride solo. I can use others for guards. It's the usual to prepare wind protection when reading the wind, too."

The small man says that to Rem and Frederica, who grind their teeth, and he looked like he was going away from the battlefield. Rem gazes in wonderment at his actions, and Frederica also yelled with her mouth wide open.

Frederica: "You're going to run away?!"

???: "…It's only natural if you think about it. I have no reason to fight here."

Rem: "—! Witch cultists—!"

???: "…I don't feel like being named, nor do I feel like hearing names. Now, perish by the wind, little Oni."

The small man leaves behind just those words, gains altitude, and leaves the battlefield. While following the man escaping without regrets with her eyes, Rem raised her iron sphere over her head to throw it. But—

Rem: "Get out…of my way!!"

The black clothed beings get closer as if slithering, and she counterattacks the swords with the handle, smashing their heads like a fruits. Their skulls explode, and the enemy starts to rush in for Rem and Frederica when the witch cultists collapsed and scattered blood and spinal fluid.

To greedily protect the small man escaping and get in the way of Rem and Ram's dearest wish.

Rem: “Why…!”

He’s getting away, I failed. That sort of weakness was stuck in Rem’s mind.

The enemy fading away, and the hindrances coming near. Rem’s self condemnation and her anger blot out her mind and—

Frederica: “Gaurururururuu—!”

Right after a yell, blood splatters, and three witch cultists were blown away like spinning tops. The three black clothed beings thrown to the ground all had their heads gouged fatally.

Frederica: “We have no time to feel discouraged, Rem! We’ll finish them off quickly and chase after him!”

Rem: “Frederica-sama…”

Frederica: “I shouldn’t have any problem jumping after him! So…”

Frederica mowed down the black clothed beings rushing over with her forefeet, smashing their heads, and she motivated Rem with her words. Rem comes to her senses thanks to her voice, and she immediately nodded.

There was no time to be dejected. Chase after him as soon as possible like Frederica told me to.

Annihilate them so I can do that—

Rem: “But there’s so many of them…!”

Rem was determined to pull herself together thanks to Frederica, but the forces closing in on Rem and Frederica were cornering them.

The witch cultists appearing one after another as if swarming from the shadows—none of them were as strong as the two of them, but it seemed like they weren’t even disturbed by their comrades deaths, and it was the most insane thing to the two people facing each other.

Every second that went by, the enemy they found was getting farther; never mind that, at this rate, the enemy's forces were going to crush them, and they were going to die halfway through getting revenge.

—She was going to make Ram worry again.

Frederica: "We can't deal with this many…! Rem, grab onto me! We're withdrawing!"

Rem: "But then…!"

Frederica: "We need to throw them off, so we can't go after the guy that got away! But…"

As they fought with their backs against each other, Rem frantically shook her head in response to Frederica's proposal. Still, deep inside, Rem also knew that they couldn't turn their numerical disadvantage around.

She understood that following Frederica's plan and escaping from this place was the best option. Even if they missed that man, they could still fight as long as they were breathing. And yet—

Rem: "—If that man escapes now, he'll never show up before us again!"

That belief was what Rem felt inside and it wasn't going to change.

Rem understood it. In the short time she confronted that man, she understood his traits and mentality. That man who realized that he was being targeted would never show up before Rem again.

It was quite obvious that if he got away now, he would immediately try to flee out of the country.

Rem: "And yet…"

Rem didn't have it in her. She didn't have enough strength to capture that small man and make him atone for his sins.

Rem came here, had the enemy right before her own eyes, and she was stopped by none other than herself.

Frederica: “—If you’re going to blame someone, blame me.”

Frederica, looking down for just a second, murmured to Rem, who grumbled imploringly. Then, she put Rem’s thin waist in her mouth and lifted her carefully with her fangs.

Rem: “Frederica-sama…!”

Frederica: “…”

It was silent. Frederica was ready to withdraw from the battlefield without even listening to Rem’s complaints. She would channel strength into her hind legs, give a battle cry, and try to break through the surrounding of the black clothed beings—.

It happened right before that.

???: “—Stop right there.”

They were powerful words. It was a powerful entity. It was the very manifestation of power.

Something was coming down onto the ground from the gigantic outer wall that surrounded the capital. The moment its feet reached the ground, a producing shock wave travels through the ground, and the crowding black clothed beings went flying.

The shock wave blowing fiercely creates a gale. Rem and Frederica were shocked as they shook in the sudden gust because the wind that sent the black clothed beings flying weren’t affecting the two of them.

They didn’t understanding what was going on. Rem, who was released from Frederica’s mouth and sunk down to the ground, sees a shadow walking toward them from the shrouding cloud of dust.

—No, it wasn’t a shadow. It was a flame. A flame was walking towards them.

???: “You see, the guards were making a ruckus, and a large cat was jumping all around the sky. Even if it's the day of the moon festival, I thought something was off."

While the fire said those words, it came right before Rem and Frederica. That's when Rem finally saw that the fire's form, and on top of that, it looked like a child.

It was a boy with fire-red hair and blue eyes that looked like a clear sky. He was probably one or two years older than Rem. He had a smile on his face, and it may have looked young, but it looked good. Surely one day he would grow into a handsome man that would dazzle anyone.

However, the vision of the good-looking boy's future wasn't what took over her mind; a more straightforward and fundamental emotion did—that is, the absolute fear understood by Oni instincts.

"…"

What is it?

What was this entity that was standing right before her, smiling? Whether it was an adult or a child, it definitely wasn't the same type of life as one.

The entity was that disparate. Only one person in Rem's life has ever made her feel this sort of emotion.

Rem: "—Nee-sama"

This was the feeling Rem had for her sister, the one that was admired as the reincarnation of an Oni god.

Rem was simply astonished to find out that there was a being in this world that could rival Ram, someone who had a power like no other, even among all the existences out there.

The boy shakes his head in a troubled manner in response to Rem's words, who was dumbfounded.

???: "Sorry. Unfortunately, I'm not your sister. I do know that my face lacks manliness and toughness, but this is the first time I've been mistaken for a girl."

Rem: "N-No…that's…not what I meant…"

???: "—?"

The aloof boy shook his head, smiling at Rem as she trembled.

Even that answer felt deviant for some reason, but what frightened her the most was how he kept his calm in this situation.

Although, with the power this boy had, that may have just been something natural.

???: "Alright, we can't spare the time to talk right now. That's how you guys feel, right?"

"…"

???: "If you don't mind, I will handle these guys. I was already patrolling this area for my father, anyway. I'm the one who should fight them."

Frederica: "…Are you sure we can leave it up to you?"

???: "As long as you believe that I am capable of taking care of them."

The boy nods at Rem and Frederica while keeping an eye on the black clothed beings glaring at them. Afterwards, Rem was unsure of how to respond, but Frederica moved quickly.

The large cat puts Rem, who was sitting, in her mouth again, and she jumps after placing her on her back. Frederica, landing on top of the deserted house, hung her head when she saw the boy below her.

Frederica: "I'm sorry. I pray for good fortune in your battle."

???: "I hope all of that fortune shines upon you and not myself."

He sees Frederica off with a smile, and she sped up at once, leaving the area. The boy and the battlefield behind them are left behind, and while Rem clung onto the large, running cat—

Rem: “Was it really okay for us to leave him behind?!”

Frederica: “Rem, you do realize it too, don’t you? There’s no need to be so worried about him! He’s this generation’s…actually, the strongest in history…”

Rem: “—!”

When Frederica was mentioning the boy’s background, a shadow hidden in the sun appeared in the corner of Rem’s eye.

It was the receding figure of the small man that blended with the sunlight and escaped temporarily.

Rem: “Frederica-sama, towards the sun!”

Frederica: “—I see him!”

Frederica notices the same thing Rem pointed out, and she speeds up, kicking the roof.

The small man riding the wind, practically swimming in the sky, was going as fast as the wind itself, but he could only move from the windward and the downwind. If he was going in a fixed direction, even if there was distance between them, he wouldn’t escape.

Rem: “We’ll catch up to him soon and…”

Frederica: “—Actually, this is bad. At this rate, we’ll come out of the slums and will go towards the center of the city and then I will have no place to hide!”

Rem: “That’s…”

If Frederica showed herself in front of people as a beast, just that would be enough to make a commotion. And on top of that, guards were now looking out for witch cultists because of Roswaal’s report.

If she made a commotion, guards would come rushing right away. They would be accused as witch cultists.

Rem: “Frederica-sama! Please, go after him!”

Frederica: “…”

Frederica listens to Rem’s begging, and she speeds up while grinding her teeth to suppress a growl. Still, the more people there were and the closer they came to the festival crowd, the more hesitant she became to run.

Soon enough, Frederica came to a complete stop. Below, there was a large water fountain park on the side of a noble street, and it would be impossible for Frederica to go through it without being seen with how big she was.

I know that. But still—

Rem: “—But he’s right there!”

Rem glares at the faraway shadow that pretty much became as small as a black spot, and she raised a voice of regret.

She would never be able to catch him again once he escaped out of the capital. She wouldn’t be able to fulfill Ram’s dearest wish. Rem wouldn’t be able to accomplish her goal that she had to do.

“…”

The small man riding the wind turns around, looks at her, and says something. She didn’t know if they words that mocked her, or something else.

Still, the moment Rem saw that, the sense of defeat inside of her spread—

Rem: “—Nee-sama?”

The will of her twin sister that shared her blood and flesh flowed into the horn on her head, as if shocking her.

Synesthesia—a rare transmission between twins and siblings where emotions went from one person to another. Rem gets struck by that lightning, and she looks up at the sky with wide eyes.

She felt like her sister told her to not take her eyes off of it—.

Rem: “—Ah”

—The next moment, a wind slash going through the sky teared the small man’s limbs into shreds.

6

Ram: “Nice job keeping your eyes on it. Good job, Rem.”

A peach-haired girl kneeling down on one knee with her arms stretched out on the rooftop of the guard station in the capital shopping street murmured.

She was holding onto a staff with her delicate, white fingers, and it was shining white at the tip. The radiance was a swirling mana light. That enormous power warps the atmosphere, and it was burning the world with an overwhelming torrent.

Ram: “Thanks to you, I ‘saw’ exactly what I wanted.”

She drops the staff, and lets out a sigh of exhaustion. The moment she relaxed, the sweat that suddenly started trickling down wets her forehead, and she started to fall over because of her trembling knees. The man standing right next to her catches her hot body as she collapsed.

Roswaal: “Well done. Buuuut, you pushed yourself too far. For you to use sniping magic without any help when you’re this far away, have you forgotten that you are hornless?”

Ram: “Shut your annoying mouth. Also, take your unpleasant hands off of me.”

Roswaal: “You’re so exhausted that you’ll pass out if I let go, so it wouldn’t be smart to be stubborn, you know?”

Ram: “Leave me…alone.”

The girl—Ram pushed away the chest she was held in, and she escapes from Roswaal’s arms. Roswaal had one eye closed when he saw that stubborn attitude, but his open one was looking at her hand.

Ram: “What?”

Roswaal: “Oh it’s noooothing. You didn’t like the clothes, the jewels, the food, or the cosmetics, but it seems you at least like the staff present, and that makes me haaaappy.”

Ram: “…”

Ram, eyes squinted, looks at the staff in her hand and grinds her teeth. She honestly wanted to smash the staff because of Roswaal’s attitude. But of course, even Ram couldn’t do that.

It was impossible to break this staff unless there were extreme circumstances and there was an exchange. The reason being—

Roswaal: “It’s a special staff. It took a lot of work and time to make iiiiit. After all, it is made out of the horn of the most outstanding being in the Oni clan.”

Ram: “Stop putting it in such an unnatural way. Be more direct about it. —Just say that this staff is made of my broken horn.”

Roswaal nods delightfully because he made Ram say it herself. Ram, seeing that unpleasant reaction, hides the staff from his eyes.

Ram: “I can’t believe you found and picked up one broken horn from that village’s disastrous scene.”

Roswaal: “It’s your precious horn, you know? It’s a given to secure it even if it gets changed into something elseeee. Even if an Oni and its horn get separated, it should be kept somewhere.”

Ram: “I thought at that point Rem and I weren’t yours?”

Roswaal: “Whaaaat I’m saying is that I’ve been keeping an eye on you and Rem ever since. —To be exact, it might be more correct to say I've been keeping an eye on just you, not you and Rem."

Roswaal spoke carelessly at first, but he spoke solemnly for the latter half of his statement. When Ram looked embarrassed upon hearing that answer, the man dressed as a clown put his finger on her chin and he made her look up.

Roswaal: "The reincarnation of an Oni god, the Oni among Onis…I regret that I couldn't make it in time when the Oni village was destroyed. That's why I want to make it up to you now as much as I can."

Ram: "…So…selfish."

Roswaal: "I will be selfish if I want to. That's why I made a staff out of your horn, and why I act selfish by giving it to you calmly tooooo."

Ram: "So foolish."

Ram spat those words out, and once again she looks up at the sky where the enemy was shot down.

—The witch cultist Rem was pursuing that flew in the air by riding on the wind was shot down by Ram, who was far, far away from Rem and the man.

Of course, she wasn't able to see the man from the rooftop of the guard station. Casting magic on an enemy that you couldn't even see because of distance would classify as an impossible magic skill for any high class magic user.

Roswaal: "Buuuuut you accomplished that with your own ability. That was a surprising result. It shouldn't be so convenient, you know?—Your Clairvoyance power that uses other people's eyes."

Ram: "I just used what I could and achieved retribution. Like with this staff."

"Clairvoyance" is like a secret skill that only Onis could use.

The person putting it into practice can see scenes far away by synchronizing with someone's vision if they are within perception range and their mana wavelengths match. By synchronizing with another person in that field of vision and increasing the range over and over, it's possible to literally see 1000 miles away.

Ram, who was left at the station out of necessity, used the secret skill to back up Rem, and through her persistence, she found the field of vision of her sister running all around the capital, and she synchronized with it.

Then, she perceived the figure of the enemy flying away in the sky, took over for Rem, who was expressing regret, and brought death upon him.

Ram: "It's irritating, but if I didn't have this staff, I probably wouldn't have been able to do it."

Putting it as "A staff that uses my own horn" would irritate her so much that she would want to die in a fit of anger. However, she could be sure that there was no other staff out there that her hand was this familiar with.

What irritated her even more than that was Roswaal's attitude.

He seriously just casually gave this staff while she was doing her very best to cover Rem. It was despicable.

Ram: "You were happily waiting for a time when it'd be necessary to make staff for me, weren't you?"

Roswaal: "You both vowed to get retribution as sisters. You doing it for Rem, and Rem doing it for you. That relationship is beautiful, but it is fragile and delicate. I will do anything and everything it takes so that you guys can go on without breaking, despite being delicate, and you can think of me what you will for it."

Ram: "And your true feelings?"

Roswaal: "I wanted to see your long face and your pleased look when you feel like you've achieved something. That's aaaaaalll."

Ram snorts at the winking clown, and quickly goes from the station rooftop down to the stairs. Roswaal shrugs at that cold attitude, and he asks her a question from behind.

Roswaal: “That was the second person…now there are two left. You haven’t forgotten the contract, riiiiight?”

Ram: “…”

Ram stops upon hearing his question, but she just started walking again without saying anything. However, Roswaal nodded approvingly understanding that the silence was her answer, and she follows behind her small back.

One small bag was left behind on the rooftop after they left. The magical stone brought into the station to prove the witch cult’s involvement broke, and the miasma disappears while scattering with the wind.

As if signifying a gentle end to the strife that happened on the other side of the festival.

7

When they followed the traces of blood into an alley, they saw a man lying down, breathing very feebly.

???: “…paint, pant”

Every now and then, the sound of water was mixed with the sound of rough breathing. He was torn limb from limb, and he was bleeding out more than half of the blood that flowed through a human body—he was undoubtedly on the verge of death.

Rem: “As expected of Nee-sama.”

Rem, with a hoarse voice, praises the ability of her sister who shot down her village’s enemy, the small man on the verge of death.

After the synesthesia, Rem was positive that Ram did this.

That Ram somehow perceived the flying man and achieved retribution by using that magical skill.

Once Rem witnessed the man’s last breath, revenge would be achieved.

Frederica: “Rem, we don’t have much time. Make it quick and easy…”

Rem: “I want to ask him something.”

Frederica, still in her large cat form, asks for mercy for the dying man. But when Rem shook her head cruelly, she stepped up to the small man’s side.

???: “…It…was a bad wind, eh.”

The man feels Rem come near, and his eyes that lost light blinked. The man with a slight smile on his face still behaved like he lost his mind as he talked about the wind. That irritated her so much.

Rem: “You were cut up by Nee-sama’s wind. It’s all over for you. Is it frustrating? Do have any regrets at all? That’s pay-back for everyone at the village…no, for Nee-sama.”

???: “…”

Rem: “Come on, say it. “It hurts, I can’t take this, I regret it”. “Help me, I don’t want to die”…say it. Say it. Say it!”

???: “…I pity you, little Oni.”

The small man says that to Rem, who sought atonement, sounding like he felt pity from the bottom of his heart.

That moment, a horn appeared on Rem’s forehead again, and she grabs onto the small man and pulls him up with her Oni face on. Rem brings her face close to him without any resistance coming from him, and she grins at him.

Rem: “You’re going…you’re going to say that, of all people?!”

???: “All winds are destined to die out someday. My life also will end here simply because I failed to read the wind's direction."

Rem: "That doesn't answer my question! What is your motive?!"

Sade: "… Sade. Remember it, and forget it at once."

The small man tells her that without caring to answer Rem's question.

It sounded familiar. She couldn't have forgotten. It was one of the three names she got out of Fogg, the man tied to the basement. Sade, Sergey, and Faust—.

He revealed that his name was Sade. Perhaps that was the sole bit of pity the man gave.

Rem: "Say something! Answer me!"

Frederica: "Rem, it's no use. …He's dead now."

Frederica, standing next to her, shakes her head at Rem, who shook the drained small man. Just like she said, the small man was already dead. He could no longer say anything.

And he never spoke of his motive behind what he did, the reason why they attacked the village, or where the remaining two enemies were.

Frederica: "The guards are going to be hurrying over shortly, too. The root of all evil has been destroyed, and their plan has been ruined. Isn't this result good enough?"

Rem: "But…!"

Frederica: "Rem is safe, Ram and Master are safe. And I am safe. Is that not enough?"

Rem tried to respond by reflex, but she hesitated when she saw Frederica's gentle look.

Nothing would come out of disregarding her care. Besides, even if they took revenge, Frederica helped them.

To keep track of things you can't do more than what you have done. —That was a bad habit of Rem.

???: "Looks like things ended safely here too."

Rem: "—!"

It happened right after Rem stopped acting up and sighed. Rem and Frederica got nervous when they suddenly heard a voice in the alley. Then, seeing their reactions, the owner of the voice gave a wry smile.

Standing at the entrance of the alley was a red haired and blue eyed boy—the person that saved them.

Frederica: "Sorry…for earlier. Are you hurt anywhere?"

???: "As you can see, I was apparently blessed with luck. Maybe it's because you two prayed for me."

The boy smiles refreshingly, and he opens his arms to show that he was fine.

He had nothing that looked like external injures—actually, that's not what should be pointed out. Not even a scratch from the battle could be found on the boy, let alone any wounds. Even if he just ran away from the battle, there's no way he should've been able to escape the situation that cleanly.

Truthfully, this boy literally had the embodiment of an abnormal result.

???: "First of all, I captured all the witch cultists that were there. I'm just not sure how cooperative they were with the investigation. I'm guessing they didn't tell anything."

The boy, paying no attention to Rem trembling, continues the conversation indifferently. The fact that the boy captured dozens of people alive by himself was no surprise at all when you considered that he was the one who did it.

???: "That body right there, is he the ringleader of all this?"

Rem: “…”

Frederica: “He should be. As you can see, he was killed, so I figure their plan is ruined now.”

???: “A hint of miasma…No wonder the guards were running around the capital.”

Frederica took over for Rem, as words didn’t come out of her mouth, and he answers the boy’s question. When the boy was convinced with her answer, her serious look suddenly loosened up.

???: “But if that’s the case, then I guess my work here is done. I should go home soon, or else my dad will get mad at me.”

Frederica: “Your father scolds you?”

???: “Yes, of course. Dad is a serious worry-wart, so I can’t let him find out that I’m doing stuff like this. Please keep this a secret.”

The mood makes a complete 180 as the boy shows playfulness you’d expect with his age, and he asks them to tell the same story while facing them with one eye closed. Seeing him do that, Rem and Frederica widen their eyes.

Because they had the same level of surprise one would have when faced with some kind of disaster.

???: “By the way, Miss Half-beast. The guards will be running over here sooner or later. If you don’t want to shock them, I suggest taking off your fur.”

Frederica: “Hmph, that’s true. …But to keep this place as is…”

???: “I can preserve this place. Once you’re done changing, you can tell the guards about this place.”

Frederica: “But, that’s…not dangerous. Not a chance it will be for you.”

The boy, with a smile on his face, neither agrees nor denies it.

Frederica accepts that smile as an answer, and she pushes her head against Rem, who was beside her. That feeling calms down Rem, and she hurries onto the large cat's back as they jumped again.

Frederica: "Thank you for your help. "…"Sword Saint" Reinhard-sama."

Reinhard: "I'm apart of the "Sword Saint" family. I don't have to bear the responsibility of that name yet."

The boy answers the compliment that came from the rooftop with a slight smile on his face. It felt like that voice was the only thing that had a loneliness that didn't show before, but they didn't have the time to make sure of it as they were leaving.

Frederica moves her limbs, the scenery is put behind them within an instant, and they went as fast as the wind.

Frederica: "You've been quiet this whole time, Rem."

While running, Frederica checks on Rem, who was on her back. Rem never spoke ever since that boy showed up. But, that wasn't why Frederica was worried.

She would be lying if she said that she didn't have regrets about that man's death. They got no information about the remaining two enemies out of him. Retribution was coming along, but it might have been delayed.

However, it didn't cloud her mind, nor did it stop her from moving forward.

So, when Rem heard Frederica's voice, she closes her eyes tight just once and then answered.

Rem: "When we get back and Frederica-sama finishes changing…"

Frederica: "Yes?"

Rem: "We'll definitely have to find a gift now."

Frederica: "…"

Frederica's throat clogged just for a moment, perhaps because she had said something unexpected. But, when the golden, large cat quickly returned to herself, she purred cheerfully and said,

Frederica: "Yes, we do. I'm looking forward to getting Master's gift, after all."

Rem: "Yes, me too."

Rem nods back at Frederica and grabs tightly onto the large cat's nape fur.

It was true that there were plenty of problems before them that should be taken care of.

Still, one step…she really was one step closer. So, it was fine to just be happy, at least for now. Just for now, she'd forget about her grudge and be allowed to enjoy the large cat's fur.

Yes, for now—.

Rem: "Two left…"

For now, I'll forget about the hatred burning my chest and enjoy the capital's festival.

Rem: "Two left, I swear I'll find them for Nee-sama…"

Rem, while having thoughts that were inconsistent with her words, makes a wish with a smile of hatred on her face.

Chapter 5:
The Oni That Cried

1

The Miload family is a branch family with Mathers as the main family, and their mansion is southeast of the Mathers margrave territory, close to the industrial city Costuul.

The head of the Miload family, Dudley Miload, is an energetic person who will be turning 30 years old, and he is related by blood with Roswaal, although they are distant relatives. That said, Roswaal associates with the Miload family more because of Dudley's wife, Grace Miload, rather than because of Dudley.

This is because—

Roswaal: "Grace was born with defects in controlling mana. Her body's gate doesn't work well, and her irregular flow of mana was almost harmful to her. I fiiiiix that. That's why we've been acquaintances ever siiiiince."

Grace: "After that, I married my husband Dudley and became related to Roswaal-sama. I didn't think that it'd turn out like this, so it's strange."

Roswaal: "No no nooooo, it isn't. I was sure of it the first time I saw you. I was sure that you were going to be a very important person to me."

Grace: "Oh, you flatter me."

Then, hearing Roswaal's quick joke, the young woman—Grace Miload's cheeks blush just a little bit, and she pushed the clown's shoulder with her hand in embarrassment.

They were in Grace's bedroom at the Miload residence. Next to Grace, who was lying down on the bed in the room, Roswaal was chatting with her while sitting on a chair. The situation was like that.

The one utterly confused with their friendly conversation was Rem. Rem didn't know why she was even there in the first place.

Ram: "—So? Roswaal-sama, why did you bring us along?"

Seeing Rem's doubt, Ram, who was sitting next to her, speaks up for her. She spoke frankly like you'd expect, though the one who chuckled slightly in response was Grace.

She acknowledges Ram, whose eyes were squinted, with a "Sorry" and said,

Grace: "I have no intentions of taking away Roswaal-sama from you. Don't get so offended."

Ram: "…I really don't get what you're talking about."

Grace: "Oh, is that so? You don't seem to be that slow of a child, though."

Ram sighs at Grace, who says that with one eye closed. It was rare to see Ram back down in an argument, so Rem's eyes widened in surprise.

Roswaal: "It makes me feel good seeing Ram defeated in an argument."

Grace: "Roswaal-sama, you should stop teasing kids you like, too. Soon they really will hate you, and you've already hurt them, after all."

Roswaal: "Woooow, that's harsh. You can give a real punch with your words now, huh. Moms are just good at it…I guess that's how it iiiiis?"

Roswaal says that, looking at Grace as he was scolded while acting triumphant. Those words make Grace smile slightly, and she softly stroked her stomach—her very large stomach.

The bulging that you couldn't imagine someone thin like Grace having was proof that there was new life in there.

Roswaal: “Shall I predict if it’s going to be a boy or a girl?”

Rem: “You can figure out something like that with magic?”

Roswaal: “It’s not magic, it’s simply prediction…maybe something like fortune-telling? I’m confident that I’ll get it riiiight.”

Grace: “…Well, I’ll pass. It’ll be a surprise until it’s born.”

Grace shakes her head in response to Roswaal’s proposal and she continues to rub her belly affectionately. Roswaal shrugs his shoulders to let Rem know that it’d be insensitive to say anything after that gesture.

—They went to the capital the other day to find a gift for the baby inside of Grace’s stomach.

Grace was already in the last month of pregnancy with her large stomach, so the baby could be born at any time. Normally, pregnant women shouldn’t have to deal with visitors, but—

Roswaal: “Sorry, Grace. I just thought that this would be a good experience for these two. I wanted them to see the beauty of a pregnant woman with new life inside of her.”

Grace: “How awful of you to call it beautiful despite my stomach being this big.”

Roswaal: “You don’t need to feel ashamed. This is an important ritual that keeps life going. Right now, as a woman you are…yes, this is the second most beautiful point of your life. The first being when you were at your wedding in a wedding dreeess.”

There was nothing weird about Roswaal saying exaggerative things, as he was someone who was usually pompous.

In fact, Grace smiled shyly, and Rem also felt admiration for him inside of her. Although, with her synesthesia, she sensed that Ram, who was next to her, was the one and only one whose mood was worsening.

Roswaal: “Well then, it’d be fun to keep chit-chatting, but I wouldn’t want to push a pregnant woman too hard. We still have more time. Let’s call it a day for now.”

Grace: “You sure? I’d still like to talk…ah”

Then, Grace, who was somewhat disappointed, took a side glance at Ram with a look that indicated that she realized something. And then, when the wife cleared her throat, she said,

Grace: “Okay. Well then, I’ll see you later. I’m sorry that I couldn’t be a very good host for you.”

Roswaal: “A pregnant woman shouldn’t worry about something like thaaaat. Anyways, see you later.”

Leaving those words behind, Roswaal leaves the room with Rem and Ram. On her bed, Grace continued to wave the three of them goodbye with a kind smile until they were gone.

Afterwards, the maid that was waiting in the hall guides the three of them to the mansion’s guest room.

The Miload residence was pretty big, though it wasn’t as big as the Mathers residence. There were a lot of maids, and it couldn’t compare to the Mathers residence, which only had a select few.

And so, when they were guided from Grace’s bedroom to the room for special visitors, saw off the maid that guided them, and took a breather,

Ram: “—So? Why did Roswaal-sama bring us along?”

When the maid left, the first thing Ram said was the question that had been evaded earlier. Every word was the same, but she spoke with eyes that indicated she wouldn’t accept the same result.

Roswaal, being glared at by her light red eyes as he sat down on a couch in the room, smiled wryly.

Roswaal: “I’m sorry that you’re so suspicious of me, but you’re overthinking this. I made you meet Grace because I truly wanted to show you guys signs of new life. There was no one younger than you at the Oni village…meaning, you guys never came in contact with a pregnant woman, right?”

Rem: “…Umm, no, never. Since Nee-sama and I were the first kids at the village.”

There was not a single child born after Ram and Rem, as the Onis had low birth rates. Therefore, strictly speaking, Rem, the younger sister, was the youngest at the village. Although, it isn’t really necessary to be technical, since they were twins.

In any case, Rem understood Roswaal’s goal, but she didn’t know what was his intent. What would come out of making Ram and Rem meet a woman with a baby inside of her womb?

Nevertheless, Rem tilted her head puzzling over that, whereas Ram had a dramatic reaction.

Rem: “Nee-sama?”

Ram: “…Seriously, he fools around so much.”

Sounding annoyed, Ram forces those words out, and she bit her lip in vexation. Rem winced, not knowing why she was angry. However, as Ram showed violent emotion, Roswaal closed one eye, and while seeing the sisters in his yellow eye he said,

Roswaal: “It’d be perfect if you guys would be there to witness the moment the child is boooorn.”

Ram: “How ridiculous. Rem and I won’t go for a reason like that. Besides, Grace-sama’s baby doesn’t know about your expectations.”

Rem: “—?”

Rem couldn’t keep up with Roswaal and Ram’s conversation and she was left behind.

Ram hugs her confused sister’s shoulder softly. And then, while still hugging her sister, Ram glares at Roswaal at firmly, and she spoke.

Ram: “Don’t disturb me and Rem anymore.”

Roswaal: “That’s a cruel misunderstanding. That said, I have no way to dispel your doubts. …Weeeell, there’s three days left. Be patient and go with it until then.”

Roswaal concludes the conversation, and he looks towards the window as he leaned back in the chair. Rem, being allured by his look, also gets captivated by the sky dyed in the color of a sunset.

Ram: “To be more precise, there are two days and a half left. —I do hope that there won’t be any evil schemes.”

However, judging from those words that came from Ram, who looked at the same sky, her bitterness and suspicions were still there.

2

10 days after the moon festival incident at the capital, Roswaal visited the Miload residence with Rem and Ram. The secret feud that happened behind the scenes of the moon festival was settled safely with the death of the witch cultist, who was the ringleader, and the information was not revealed to the public. All of the magical miasma stones set up all over the capital were found thanks to Ram’s reasoning and Rem’s sense of smell; it was a successful disposal.

The witch cult’s objective with the moon festival never became clear. There was no choice but to hope that it’d be revealed in the interrogation with the witch cultists the “Sword Saint” boy captured.

Ram: “Well, there probably isn’t much hope with that. Just by doing a little investigation, you can get overwhelmed by how dirty the witch cultists are. …If they were people who just simply confessed, they wouldn’t have made it this far.”

Rem: “That’s…yes, I agree.”

In the guest room they were provided with, Rem lowers her eyes upon hearing Ram say those words while drinking her cup of black tea.

In her mind, she saw the witch cultist who didn't even beg for his life when he was on the verge of death. The small man faced Rem and only spouted nonsense until he lost his life. Apparently he was more of a witch cultist than Rem's first opponent who died of extreme pain and fear caused by her torture.

Ram: "Rem, are you worried?"

Ram worries about Rem, who was looking down and not drinking her cup. Hearing her sister's words, Rem gasps quietly, and she shares the depressing anxiety that was weighing on her mind.

Rem: "I achieved retribution. Out of the four people, I've made two of them pay. But I got nothing out of the second one, and I'm not sure if I'll be able to find the remaining two…"

Ram: "The captured witch cultists might all suicide…would be as dirty as I've heard they are."

Rem: "Besides, I wasn't helpful at all at the capital. I have the nose to find them, but he outsmarted me and got away…if Nee-sama wasn't there, I might have never found him again."

Rem may have got too cocky because of her first opponent—Fogg.

Rem defeated the man at the end of a fight to the death, and she got him to fess up the names of the remaining three enemies. After that, she didn't know what to do with herself, and she was persuaded by Roswaal to live as 'Ram's Substitute' and by trying her best to be that, she no longer saw her imperfect self.

By training with a weapon she was given, striving to master water magic—which she had an aptitude for—and seeking revenge, Rem felt like she had forgotten about her past self.

She felt like she'd forgotten about her past self that was a disgrace to the Oni clan, who could not possibly even try to be her sister's substitute, as she was an imperfect tool that couldn't hope to compare to Ram, the one admired as the reincarnation of an Oni God.

Ram: “Rem, you really are such a fool.”

She couldn’t just simply say to her sister that she’d accomplish something in place of her.

Besides, Rem didn’t accomplish a single thing on her own since the start of retribution. Roswaal was the one who captured Fogg, confined him, and weakened him. It was nothing more than Rem undoing the seal and beating Fogg to death from behind as he tried to take advantage of that.

Unbelievable how she could still shamelessly say stuff like “Retribution has been achieved”. Now she understood how much things were set up for her. She knew it so well that she wanted to die because of her lack of shame.

Ram: “—Rem, it’s not like that. Relax.”

However, Ram, who put her cup down and got close to her, put a stop to such self-tormenting thoughts. Their shoulders touch. She wraps her shaking hand, and Rem looked at Ram’s face as she felt that warmth.

She nods at the wet, light blue eyes with only deep affection in her light pink eyes.

Ram: “Don’t say you were useless. I was able to shoot down that small man at the capital thanks to you. At the beginning, I was also able to figure out that the witch cult was planning something thanks to you. I’m able to be happy and well everyday thanks to you. Although the last part is what’s most important, you’re always contributing.”

Rem: “…”

Ram: “You’re always doing your very best, and I…Onee-chan knows that. So you don’t need to blame yourself. There’s no need for you take all of it by yourself.”

Rem: “…Nee-sama.”

Ram: “In fact, I’m the one that—”

Ram pats Rem's head, as she looked like she was going to start sobbing because of the comfort, and she tried to continue saying something. However, her throat clogged when she was just about to say her last words.

What ran through Ram's eyes were unusual hesitation and indecision, even though she was someone who always felt imposing. But, those complex emotions disappeared when she blinked, and she touched Rem's cheek as she stopped patting Ram's head.

Ram: "Never mind, it's nothing. —Besides, the enemy's' whereabouts isn't something that should be worried about. I'm sure that Roswaal-sama will find the remaining two."

Rem: "It is Roswaal-sama, but will he be able to find them easily?"

It wasn't like she didn't believe in Roswaal. In fact, as of right now, Roswaal was the one she trusted the most after her sister. Next people that came to her mind were her coworkers at the mansion, such as Frederica and Clind.

But, of course, they couldn't possibly compete with Ram, no matter how much control they had.

Rem: "The witch cultists have hid themselves around the world for 400 years…even if they're found, I have no idea how long it'd take."

She wasn't even sure if the remaining three enemies were still in the Kingdom of Lugunica. If they escaped to another kingdom, following their tracks would be no easy task. The flame of revenge continuing to burn for years, for decades—imagining it was horrifying.

Still, Ram smiled at Rem as she had those worries and said,

Ram: "Don't worry, it won't take that long. I mean, it took three months to defeat two enemies…doing some simple calculations, it'll take three more months to find the remaining two."

Rem: "'Doing some simple calculations'…oh Nee-sama."

Ram's joke makes Rem let out a smile as she put her hand on her mouth. It wasn't going to be that easy, but she was happy that her sister tried to soothe her.

Rem: "It's not going to go that well, and that's just a fact. I just…I just happened to coincidentally find the first two."

Ram: "—Just happened to coincidentally find them, eh. Yeah… maybe that's right."

Rem: "Yes, it is. …But I'm happy that Nee-sama cares. I'm more relaxed now, though just a little bit. Nee-sama is as lovely as ever."

With a smile, Rem expresses her gratitude as she put her chest. Not all of the anxiety disturbing her chest was gone. But, she was able to ease up thanks to Ram, although it was just a little.

As expected, Ram is amazing. She knows everything about me. She tells me the words I want to hear the most when I want to hear them the most, does things I want her to do when I want it.

That's why—

—I'll give everything I have to be the replacement for Ram's horn.

Ram: "Yes, I'm looking forward to it. Still…"

Ram responds with a smile without knowing about Rem's determination she was thinking about, and she looks around the guest room. She paused in the middle of her sentence, and when she sighed slightly she said,

Ram: "This mansion is boring. There's nothing to do since we're treated as guests."

Rem: "That's…yes, I think so too. This is boring."

Rem agrees with Ram's listless sigh. Currently, they were being treated as guests as Roswaal's servants at the Miload residence. They were, of course, provided with a guest room for visitors, and they weren't assigned any work. To put it as it is, they had free time.

Rem: “…”

Rem was always a girl who was terrible at putting time to use. Back then at the Oni village, whenever Ram was called over by the adults for ‘duties’, Rem would wait alone waiting for her sister’s return. No friends of her generation, no adults to look after her, alone—.

Ram: “Whenever there’s nothing to do like this, it brings me back to the days at the village.”

Rem: “—Nee-sama, you’re amazing.”

Ram: “I am, as I’m Rem’s Onee-chan, after all. …So, what about me is amazing?”

Rem: “You had said my exact thoughts.”

Ram proudly snorts at Rem, who was surprised by her innermost thoughts being read correctly. Seeing her sister in a good mood makes Rem smile, and then she was slightly surprised.

Since she noticed that this was the first time Ram brought up the village without it being out of anger or the desire for revenge.

Ram: “Come to think of it, there’s nothing memorable about the village. That’s why there are more noteworthy points even at Roswaal-sama’s mansion. Boring adults, and a village that never changes. A cute little sister.”

Rem: “My lovely sister was there, and that’s enough for me.”

Ram: “Well…yeah. There was nothing, but just running around in the hills and fields was fun as long as I was with you. Obviously we can’t act as we want like that in this mansion, though.”

She smiles wryly at Ram, who talked about a way to kill time and was looking at the door to the corridor this whole time. Ram was the world to Rem in those days. Her reason to live was being with Ram.

She pulls herself together as she thought about how much things have changed in just three months.

Rem: “As long as Nee-sama is with me, I don’t need anything else. I’ll be completely satisfied.”

Ram: “…But all I did was make you feel lonely in those days.”

Rem: “Nee-sama had an important role, so it couldn’t be helped. Besides, I did fine alone. I would collect a bunch of stones at a river beach near home and pile them up. As I made a pile of stones, the evening arrived, and so it’d be another day where I spent my time properly…”

Ram: “Re-Rem? You wasted time doing something like that…?”

The truth nobody knew about is revealed and it startles Ram. After that, she looked at Rem with a compassionate expression and said,

Ram: “Sorry, Rem. I’m supposed to be the big sister, and yet I never noticed…”

Rem: “N-No, it’s not your fault, Nee-sama. It’s my fault for being bad at killing time. And on top of that, I…I’m too weak to have the same duties as Nee-sama.”

Ram apologized while looking down, making Rem panic as she shook her head.

Ram’s apology—Ram was always full of confidence and she is the greatest existence in this world, but for Rem, seeing her lovable sister apologize wasn’t that rare.

After all, whenever her sister was taken away by the adults, she would always apologize to Rem; for leaving her alone, for not going with her, for being different than her little sister, and for making her feel all sorts of complex emotions.

And so it moved her deeply, so deeply—deeper than any words, fists, or circumstances could.

Ram: “—After all retribution is achieved, let’s put the Onis’ souls to rest. We’ll return to the village and tell the souls that have unfortunately lost a place to go that retribution is over.”

Rem: "…Yes, Nee-sama. I want to do that as soon as possible."

Ram: "Going to yam fields and getting covered in mud with Rem will have to wait until that's accomplished."

With a slight smile, Ram ends the conversation about the village like that. Rem's sister's words make her break into a smile, and she remembered the times when they'd run around the hills and fields together until they got in trouble with their parents.

And so, Ram, who nodded in response to Rem's smile, suddenly headed towards the door out the room.

Rem: "Nee-sama?"

Ram: "Since we apparently can't run around in the mansion, we'll just have to kill time by getting the adults in the corridor to help us out."

???: "Kya—"

As Ram said that, she opened the door straight away without doing anything else. That's when the people outside lost their support and fell to the floor while screaming softly.

They were girls dressed as maids. Rem, who was surprised, noticed that they looked familiar.

They were all demi-humans that were at the Mathers residence with her for a month—they were the girls who were sent to a different workplace after receiving maid training.

Them being here meant that—

Rem: "So you were all being taken care of at the Miload family's mansion."

???: "Umm, yes, that's right. Long time no see, Ram-san and Rem-san."

They stand back up with awkward expressions, fixing their postures, and one of them, a rabbit eared girl, replies. Seeing her act like that, Ram snorts quietly with her arms folded.

Ram: “So? I thought you were all trained properly to be maids, so why were you naughtily eavesdropping on guests in a room?”

???: “Agh! You see, we didn’t mean any harm. It’s just, uh, Master… or well, not anymore, Madam and Roswaal-sama told us too.”

Ram: “Roswaal-sama and Grace-sama did?”

???: “Yes. They said to talk to you two since you guys might be bored…”

The girls speak nervously while looking at each other as they were scared of Ram. They should be 3-4 years older than Ram, but her calm aura was not that of an eight year old.

Ram had her eyes squinted and was pondering something. However, Rem felt pity for the girls who had pale faces because of Ram’s silence, and so she helped them out.

Rem: “Nee-sama, come on now, we’ve finally reunited with everyone.”

Ram: “…It’s not like I doubt them or anything. I can definitely see Roswaal-sama saying something like that, and we really were bored.”

Ram tugs on her chin while sighing, sounding like she had surrendered. As she made that reaction, Rem and the girls look at each other, and then they were all felt relieved.

???: “W-Well then, let’s have some tea. We have permission now, and there’s also sweets.”

With Ram’s permission, the rabbit eared girl brought the cart inside the room. Seeing the sweet aroma and warm steam waft, Rem finally loosened up.

???: “Please drink some tea and tell me about some things while you eat sweets. …Like, you know, what’s Ram-san’s relationship with Master?”

Rem: “Nee-sama’s relationship with Roswaal-sama?”

The girls screamed noisily while blushing as Rem gave them a blank look. Being put in the spotlight, Ram shrugged her shoulders tiredly.

Ram: “I knew it. —Good grief.”

3

The scheduled three days to stay at the Miload residence went by without anything happening just like that. For Rem, the three days at the mansion turned into something like an unexpected day off, and Rem and Ram never had to do anything like witnessing Grace giving birth, which Roswaal was looking forward to.

Rem: “Grace-sama was very kind. Good thing we came, huh, Nee-sama.”

Ram: “…Yeah. As long as you had fun, I’m satisfied too.”

As opposed to Rem, who looked back at the three days peacefully, Ram responded with some tiredness showing in her voice.

During their stay, the girls at the Miload residence pried into truths and lies about Ram. It seemed that her iron strength of will lost to the curiosity the teenage girls had for love.

Ram: “How ridiculous. Just how much of an age difference do they think there is between me and Roswaal-sama anyway? If they get this turned on by someone younger than them, then they have some problems.”

Rem: “Nee-sama is mature, unlike a lot of 8 year olds, after all. …Come to think of it, I wonder how old Roswaal-sama is. I never heard about that.”

Ram: “Despite how he looks, it seems that he’s 21. When I looked under his white make-up, surprisingly, I discovered a face appropriate of his age. It seems he uses makeup as a weapon to avoid being looked down upon for the difference between his position and age.”

Rem: “…I’ve never seen Roswaal-sama without his clown makeup on. So Roswaal-sama really does let his guard down with Nee-sama.”

Ram: “That’s not…true.”

Hearing Rem’s honest doubt, Ram replies in a slightly evasive way.

They met up every night for Ram’s treatment as she’d lost her horn. Since Rem had no idea what her sister was doing when they did that, she couldn’t tell what they truly felt inside.

Plus, Ram and Roswaal were both good at hiding their inner thoughts. Still, Ram’s inner thoughts on Roswaal were different from what they were at first. She was sure about that.

Although, she didn’t know if it was because she liked Roswaal or if it was because she disliked him.

Ram: “Anyway, I’m free from that rain-like barrage of questions for today. If I can think of it as being patient until Dudley-sama returns, then it’s no big deal for me.”

Rem: “Nee-sama, you were having some trouble after all…”

The head of the Miload family, Dudley Miload, has been gone from the mansion these past three days.

Dudley is going to the Industrial City Costuul and leaving behind his pregnant wife at the mansion because of his work. Rem and the others stayed at the mansion also to keep Grace company for the time being.

Accompanying the pregnant woman will also no longer be needed once Dulley returned to the mansion. That truly was something Ram was eagerly waiting for as someone who was tired from the maids’ curiosity.

Rem: “But I’m just a little sad. We won’t get to see Grace-sama giving birth.”

Ram: “…Yeah, maybe not.”

Hearing Rem's brief comment, Ram also showed her agreement with a few words.

At first, Ram was against childbirth as she hated going along with Roswaal's expectations, but once she got to know Grace's personality and started to like her, naturally, her thoughts also changed.

Ram: "But it's like I'm on the palm of Roswaal-sama's hand, and I hate it…"

Rem vaguely avoids touching on Ram's extremely complicated feelings with a bitter smile.

Still, Rem was glad that they came. She smiled more, even though they were wry smiles. It was undoubtedly because of the people living in the mansion, Grace and the maids.

Her failure at the capital and the anxiety to accomplish retribution—it felt like those things were forgotten about, just a little bit.

The third day at the Miload residence began peacefully while she felt relieved like that.

Dudley will be back home in the afternoon, and Rem and the others will be leaving then. Since this was a special occasion, Rem showed her cooking skills for lunch, and she received lavish praise from Grace and the maids.

Furthermore, this was when they started to ease up quite a bit with how they treated Rem and the others as guests; they were given the permission to walk around the mansion pretty freely, and they started to feel more and more reluctant to leave.

Still, those times would have to come to an end. After things were cleaned up at lunch, it was the time when Dudley Miload was scheduled to return, and an earth dragon arrived at the Miload residence entrance.

However, the news the earth dragon had was a bit different from what they'd imagined and—

Roswaal: "Dudley had to stop midway because of dragon carriage trouble?"

???: "Y-Yes, please forgive me. There was just a little bit more to go to reach the mansion, but we had to change dragon carriages because of a wheel problem. Which is why I came back like this…"

The young male servant says that and bows to Roswaal while having such a pale face that it was pitiful.

According to the young man who was Dudley's servant, a wheel was taken off of the imperial carriage because of the mud on the way back from the city Costuul, and it could no longer be used to travel. As a result, the young man returned to the mansion alone on the earth dragon as ordered by Dudley, and came to pick up a replacement dragon carriage. —That was the situation.

Roswaal: "Dudley suuuure is unlucky at crucial times, though it's always been like that. If Grace was going into labor right now, he'd regret it for a very long time."

???: "Master wants to come back to his wife as soon as possible too…"

Roswaal: "I understand how he feels, of course. —Let's see, if that's the case, then there's a lot of catching up to do, so I guess we'll go pick him up ourselves. Since we'll make Dudley feel uncomfortable that waaaay."

With a malicious smile, Roswaal taps the astonished servant's shoulder. After that, he looked back at the mansion and winked at Rem and Ram, who were listening, and the maids.

Roswaal: "Aaaaand so, let's take my dragon carriage. Ram, if you would."

Ram: "Understood. Please wait a…"

Roswaal naturally calls on Ram, and Ram calmly accepts. That interaction makes the maids' eyes light up for a moment. Seeing their reaction in the corner of her eye, Ram stops talking. Then, she looks at Roswaal, who was tilting his head, and said,

Ram: “Or well, I was going to go, but since I don’t feel well today, you should ask Rem.”

Roswaal: “You sure? I hope you’re alright. I was sure that nothing happened last niiiiight.”

Ram: “Yes, I’ll be fine. —As long as you don’t say any more unnecessary things.”

Ram kept endorsing Rem while being wary of the eyes of the maids, which were shining brighter and brighter. Rem gives a bittersweet smile in response to Ram’s feelings, and she bows to Roswaal.

Rem: “As requested by Nee-sama, I’ll be taking over for her. Is that okay?”

Roswaal: “Yeeees, I don’t mind. I just called on Ram first because she looked gruuumpy. I have no problems with Rem. Let’s go, shall we?”

Rem: “Yes. I’ll get it ready right away.”

Rem does a courtesy, and she went to go get the imperial carriage left at the other side of the mansion. The dragon carriage was medium-sized, and the earth dragon held at the stable was a four legged large earth dragon. She takes out the dark brown earth dragon from the stable, and gets on the driver’s seat connected to the dragon carriage. She controls the reigns skillfully, and it took less than five minutes for the dragon carriage to return to the main entrance.

Roswaal: “Impressive. Truly excellent.”

Ram: “She’s my little sister, after all. That’s just natural.”

Roswaal: “I’m glad to see that you’re in a good mood agaaaain. —Well then, we’ll bring back Dudley as soon as possible.”

Ram praises Rem, and Roswaal catches her off her guard and pats her head gently. The feeling flusters Ram, but she didn't stop Roswaal because of it. Roswaal dashingly steps onto the dragon carriage Rem was controlling, and then he nodded at the boy who was Dudley's servant.

Roswaal: "Alright, would you please show us the way? Think of it this way, every second we're delayed, Grace gets more loooonely."

???: "Ah, yes! Understood I will guide you!"

Hearing Roswaal call out to him, the young man jumps onto the earth dragon next to him respectfully.

He did come to get a replacement dragon carriage, but he was probably feeling disturbed inside since the Margrave made him come along. But, Roswaal being whimsical was nothing unusual, so Rem wasn't surprised.

Rem: "Alright, Nee-sama. We'll be gone for a little bit."

Ram: "Don't cry, Rem."

Rem: "I haven't cried over things like this lately."

Ram: "Then that makes me feel a bit lonely."

Rem has that exchange with Ram, they smile at each other, and she drives the dragon carriage. They leave the Miload residence, and the dragon carriage proceeded straight over the main road while following the guiding young man.

Rem: "By the way, Roswaal-sama, what do you think of Dudley-sama?"

Along the way, from the back of the driver's seat—Rem speaks while facing the small window connecting the passenger carriage and the driver's seat. After that, Roswaal, who was looking outside the small window, went "Oh?" as he raised an eyebrow.

Roswaal: "Did Grace and the maids not tell you about Dulley?"

Rem: "Everyone told me that he's a good husband and a good master. Incidentally, I was wondering what impression Roswaal-sama had of him, so I asked.”

Roswaal: “I see. Weeell, my impression is no different from theirs, either. He’s a good friend, a good relative…definitely a good person. So good that I get a little irritated just by looking at hiiiiim.”

Rem: “Irritated, you say?”

Thinking that it was unusual for him to lean towards an assessment of ‘close friend’ or ‘relative’, Rem asks again.

Roswaal: “He’s not the one to doubt others, you see. He tries to accept everything. It’s a part of how he married his wife, who had a problem with her Gate, and why he helps with my hobby.”

Rem: “Your hobby…I guess this is about the “Demi-human Lover” thing.”

Frederica had told her before about those words in an annoyed manner.

Roswaal took care of Demi-humans with no place to go, trained them, and gave them word. And there was gossip that insulted Roswaal as a “Demi-human Lover” for his actions.

Rem: “Roswaal-sama is a splendid gentleman. That’s what I think.”

Roswaal: “Hahaha, thaaaank you. Well, even though people talk about me behind my back like that, Dudley still is more than happy to help me. There were a lot of Demi-human maids in his mansion, right?”

Rem: “…He helps you, and yet you feel irritated by him?”

Roswaal: “He’s someone that can believe people without doubting them one bit. Even more so when he owes the person. Weeeell, anyone could say that, though.”

Roswaal’s thinking was complicated, so Rem couldn’t really understand what he meant. She just understood that he liked

Dudley, but also couldn't deal with him very well.

Having innate goodness and being a nice person don't always go hand in hand. Rem keeps that thought in mind. In any case—

Rem: "—I see it. I think that's the dragon carriage."

With the conversation put on pause, a stopped carriage comes into view right at the end of the main road. They stop at the end of the road, and there was a slightly tilted carriage. —This had to be the dragon carriage talked about earlier.

Rem: "There, there…"

Rem stops the earth dragon right by that dragon carriage, and she jumps off the driver's seat after exchanging looks with Roswaal. The young male servant next to her also gets off the earth dragon, and he ran up to his master's dragon carriage.

???: "Master, I'm sorry to have kept you waiting! I came back with a replacement dragon carriage…or rather, I came back with more amazing people!"

Noticing chaos and agitation in the young man's voice, Rem reflexively broke into a smile. It looked like the Margrave accompanying him stressed out his heart more than she'd thought. After the young man practically said that he was finally free from uncomfortableness, he jumped onto the dragon carriage and called out to him inside.

???: "Yes, yes, it'll be fine. No, in that dragon carriage. …Ahh, for crying out loud, you'll know once you see it! Oh, young maid, come on in."

The young man gives a confusing explanation to the master inside, and he beckons Rem. Hearing him call out to her, Rem steps on the ramp, and she—was going to bow to Dudley inside and call out to him. But then her thoughts froze.

Rem: "…"

Rem: “Ah…”

Rem lets out a moan upon seeing the scene before her eyes, and she couldn’t move, legs becoming numb. It was as if her vision had poisoned her. In fact, it was a hell that would prevent you from moving an inch.

—The luxurious dragon carriage was turned into an unimaginable sea of blood.

The small dragon carriage was full of a suffocating smell of blood, and there were several large, red pieces of meat in a pool of blood on the floor. ‘Pieces of meat’ is what they should be called. You couldn’t call them dead bodies when they were this damaged.

You shouldn’t call them stuff like dead bodies when their dignities were damaged this much.

???: “The one inside is Master, and the two in the front are the driver and the real servant.”

Rem: “…”

The young man standing right by Rem, who was stiffening up, faces her, and he gives an explanation as he pointed at the pieces of meat. Rem couldn’t even move an inch when she heard that level voice.

She felt nauseated. Her whole body became weak. Gastric juice from her writhing stomach ran up her throat.

Rem: “Oo…eh…”

???: “Don’t breath with your nose. Make sure you breath with your mouth. Then, if you focus on your stomach, it’ll settle down immediately. If you feel pain, then at your feet there’s…ahh, it might be hard to tell, but the things on the seat are feet. Start with that to grasp the whole body in order.”

She was dizzy. Her thoughts were breaking. Her knees were shaking, and she felt like she was going to collapse into the pool of blood.

Why, why, why—it was so hard to move her body. Her mind and her consciousness were unstable.

But, even if her limbs gave up on her, there was one sense working vehemently.

It was too late. Fatally late. Why hadn't she noticed it? Even though the scent was this strong—

???: "—Juuuuust calm down. That's just pieces of meat, after all."

Rem: "Witch cultist…!!"

Rem senses the miasma, though it was too late, and she tried to jump back with the strength she scraped up in her body. However, for some reason, Rem fell down to her knees against her will, and she felt like she was going to faint.

The young man grabbed her body with his arms and he lifted her forcibly.

Rem: "Ka…ah…!"

???: "You sure are light. All Onis have is physical strength, so where does the weight of their muscles go? I wonder if I'd find out by dissecting one. There was no time to do that at that mountain, you see."

While holding onto Rem, the young man kept laughing with a frivolous and innocent look. It wasn't like he'd completely changed. He was extremely calm, extremely composed. That was dreadful.

Rem: "Ros…"

???: "Ahh, you want to ask your Master to save you? Well you can't. All the fun would be ruined once someone gets in the way of this meeting, right? So…"

The dragon carriage that turned into a horrible scene was shady, and Roswaal couldn't see the interaction from the passenger carriage. Seeing Rem trying to tell her master about the dilemma, the young man flaps his free hand cruelly.

A light, air-expelling sound—right after that, Rem saw red light on the other side of the dragon carriage.

Rem: "…"

The hot wind blowing through shakes her maid outfit, and she bellowed as she opened her mouth. However, even her own yell was drowned out by the explosion, and the high pitched ringing in her ears destroys her eardrums. But, it was still easy to guess what'd happened by looking at the flames that rose with the produced shock wave and hot wind.

???: "They're the flames that burned your home. Or perhaps the flames that burned your family. Though, that was a failure."

She didn't know what he meant by saying it was a failure. Still, the result was clear.

The eruption of smoke closes in, and the heated sand envelops Rem and the young man. On the other side of the dragon carriage tilted by the impact, there was serious damage to the dragon carriage Roswaal was on, and it was most likely being engulfed in flames.

With her master on it, the young man—no, the witch cultist, blew away the dragon carriage.

???: "How's it feel to be so powerless that even your master gets burnt after your village and family? How's it feel being unable to reach the enemy you hate so much that you want to kill him, even though he's right before your eyes?"

Rem: "I'll…kill you…!"

???: "Yes, that's it. Those eyes, that voice, and that horn are what I wanted."

In response to Rem's anger and her desire for revenge, the horn of an Oni comes out on her forehead. The white horn shining brightly sucks in the mana in the atmosphere, filling her whole body with over the top energy.

However—

Rem: “Oo…?”

???: “It is a beautiful, splendid horn…but power didn’t go in like you expected, huh?”

Hearing Rem’s moan, the young man chuckles with a complacent smile.

Just like the young man said, forget about power surging in her hands and legs, Rem’s horn was dying down in proportion to its radiance. There weren’t even any strange problems with her horn sucking in the mana in the atmosphere. If that was the case—

Rem: “The mana…”

???: “is being interfered with, yes. I was born with this nature. I randomly contaminate the mana around me. If it’s in my surroundings, the mana turns into poison. That’s why it was easy to take control of your village.”

Rem: “…”

Being told the shocking truth, Rem was at a lost for words.

The Onis are admired as the strongest race among Demi-humans. Rem had thought that it didn’t make sense for them to be annihilated in one night by witch cultists, even if there were disadvantages like it being a night attack and a difference in numbers. Her suspicions were cleared after finding out that the young man had an unusual ability that was the worst for the Oni horn.

As long as she was faced with the young man’s special characteristic, the Oni horn was invalidated—no, more like a detrimental result would be caused.

That’s how the witch cultists cornered the Oni clan, her father, and her mother and killed them—

???: “And so, the few survivors, you and your sister, will fall prey to us too.”

Rem: “E-Even Nee-sama…!”

???: “Of course. Otherwise, it wouldn’t have been worth going through the trouble to do all sorts of cheap tricks. We worked really hard for you and your sister. Although…”

Stopping there, the young man looks at the center of the explosion, whose fumes were still not settled down yet.

???: “I’d thought that the Margrave was going to be the biggest obstacle, but I didn’t expect him to get blown away this easily.”

Rem: “…”

???: “Surprisingly, it was no big deal. There were rumors saying that he is the strongest magic user in the kingdom, so I even brought forces, thinking that he was going to give me some trouble.”

Around the young man tilting his head, dark shadows suddenly appear in the dragon carriage from every direction. Countless shadows dressed in black from their heads appeared as if coming out of the ground.

The unmistakable stink and malice, without a doubt, were the witch cultists—.

???: “Now then, what’s left is the fun of choking you out and retrieving you with your sister. I’ll be expecting you to act honorably as a descendant of the prideful Oni clan.”

The young man grabs her neck harder as he said that scornfully. Rem, getting exhausted, couldn’t fight against the large amount of harmful mana being taken in. Even her thoughts slowed down, and her eyelids were strangely heavy.

Rem: “—Ah”

Ram, Roswaal, Frederica, Clind, Grace, and the maids come to her mind.

And yet, everything was swallowed up by the darkness of her distant consciousness—

???: "—Al Goa"

Just then, a crimson red fire blast swirled in the air, and the surrounding dark shadows were blown away with the heat weave.

???: "Wha—?!"

The young man, suddenly seeing the produced blast and soil, raised his voice in surprise. Without a pause, the young man reflexively jumps back, and attempts to get away from danger.

???: "You little…!"

However, Rem didn't overlook the fact that the young man turned his attention away from himself. Rem shook off his arms right away, and she escaped his control as she fell to the ground. Her body got held up in someone else's arms.

They were surprisingly strong arms, and Rem knew this feeling. It was—

Rem: "—Roswaal-sama!"

Roswaal: "Now I've saved your life three times. Peeeerhaps now's about the time you should seriously think about how you'll pay back your debt for real."

Roswaal winks at Rem, who gave an applause while being held by him. No doubt about it, he acted calm because of his use of magic, and it also made Rem's eyes shine, who still felt tired.

Keeping his distance while looking amazed, the young man shrugs his shoulders at Roswaal, who didn't even have any burn marks on his clothes and was standing in his way.

???: "Oi oi, I'm beaten. I did consider the possibility of you not getting killed by that, but you not even getting scratched sure as hell didn't cross my mind. What kind of magic did you use?"

Roswaal: "That's a secret. Unlike a certain someone, I'm not an idiot who shows off his own cards for self saaaaatifaction. Anyhow, that sure is a troublesome nature."

Roswaal responds sarcastically to the young man who had talked about his own special characteristic, and he looks down on his right hand. While opening and shutting his palm, with one eye closed, he said,

Roswaal: "The mana around turns into poison. In other words, the space becomes very troubling for magic users. To think that Ur magic can actually repress power to such an extent…"

???: "…Usually you wouldn't be able to cast magic freely either, and yet you pulled it off. I'll have to give you props for that. But, this place has to feel uncomfortable for you, huh?"

Roswaal: "It sure does. Buuuut, apart from that…"

While staying cautious of the witch cultists slowly closing in, Roswaal looked at the young man profoundly. Then he let Rem down from his arms. After being saved by Roswaal from a predicament, strength somehow returns to Rem's hands and legs, and she felt like she could even run.

However, Rem couldn't fight at all without her horn. Although, the Oni horn was useless in this situation, anyways. Rem came here, and she was held back by her own powerlessness again.

Seeing Rem look like she was going to cry, Roswaal tugs his chin in and says,

Roswaal: "Listen, Rem. I'll take care of this place. Return to the mansion, and save Ram and Grace. —I want you to take care of that."

Rem: "Roswaal-sama?! But…"

Roswaal's proposal to split up and have him handle a dangerous situation surprises Rem.

Around them, witch cultists were flooding in and it didn't even seem like they lost numbers after the first attack, and the young man who was a magic user's worst enemy was still in good shape. Roswaal's disadvantage was as clear as day.

But at the same time. Ram and Grace were left at the mansion defenseless. That was also terrifying to Rem.

She hesitated and worried. An answer wasn't coming to her. Even so, time still passed cruelly—.

Roswaal: "Rem, leave this up to me."

Rem: "…"

Roswaal: "You should relax. Also, allow me to deeeeeemonstrate. —Demonstrate how your master is the strongest magic user out there. I'll burn the limbs of that enemy over there and give them to you guys."

As Rem's eyes widened, Roswaal pointed at the young man and declared that confidently. Those words made the young man make an unpleasant expression, but after Rem blinked several times, she nodded deeply.

Her master said that much. And they certainly had created a bond for her to believe that.

Rem: "—Good luck."

Roswaal: "You and Ram get home safely, too."

Rem bows, and she starts to run away from that place at once. She had far from enough power to dash without relying on her Oni horn. But still, Rem kicked the dirt and broke through the enclosure.

Of course, the witch cultists brandished their cross swords over their heads and threw themselves at her, but—

Roswaal(?): "El huma. El fura."

The swirling wind carries slashes of ice, cutting up the dark shadows throwing themselves at the girl carelessly. The blood gushing out freezes, and the slashing blood cuts up another dark shadow. The damage spreads.

And so, meanwhile, Rem was leaving the battlefield at full speed without turning back once. That was the indication that she trusted in him to protect her back, no matter what.

Roswaal: “I did hope that she’d trust me innocently like that, but it does make me feel ticklish.”

??? You’re quite calm, huh, Margrave. Do you not see what the situation’s like?”

With a firm voice, the young man speaks to Roswaal, who watched Rem go off with a slight smile on his face. The boy, who had kept his calm up until then, glares at Roswaal, who was in front of the dragon carriage, and said,

???: “The situation has changed a little bit, but the forces to kill you are still alive. Plus, that Oni girl will still have a bad time once she gets back to the mansion. You are cruel.”

Roswaal: “Hmmmm, that seems to be a bit different from the flow of events I see.”

???: “How interesting.”

Roswaal: “Not even. It sounds like your source of confidence are at the mansion…but my Oni sisters, who I’m proud of, will deal with them. Unfortunately, you guys will also turn into dust with me here. Oh, but you’re the only one that’s going to get captured alive, so don’t fret. Your life should be taken away by the two of them.”

Completely relaxed, Roswaal calmly states that while putting up his hands. Rather than getting angered by that attitude, the young man puts his hands together with an impressed expression and claps.

???: “If you can talk big that much in a situation where you can’t even work out mana properly, then color me impressed. Man, I can’t wait for those sisters to turn into dead bodies with their original form still there…guess I’ll deal with it by using you.”

The young man smiles delightfully all of a sudden, and that’s when the witch cultists around him started to move simultaneously. The dark shadows prepare the weapons in their hands, and they went to tear the lone man limb from limb.

Roswaal: “You’ll ‘deal with it’. ‘Deal with it’, huh. That’s a pretty cocky way of putting it.”

Inside this silent delusion that completely covered his vision with black, Roswaal checks on the dead bodies lying in the back—in the dragon carriage—that disastrous scene, and he sighed.

And then—

Roswaal: “—I guess I’ll make up for Dudley’s death by taking your guys’ lives.”

4

The first one to sense a change with the situation was Ram, who had steeled herself for her sister’s absence.

Grace: “Ram-chan?”

Grace tilted her head curiously at Ram, who looked up in the middle of the conversation. Ram directed a narrow-eyed look out the window without responding to those words at all.

The mansion’s atmosphere completely chills, and the sound of the wind felt silent. Bitterness mixes with the dry atmosphere, and while tasting the increasing tension with the tip of her tongue, Ram quietly squinted her light pink eyes.

The change in the atmosphere irritating her skin—that was a sign of a hunting ground.

For Ram, as someone who was born in an Oni village among the mountains, hunting signs and her daily life were inseparable. Of course, the adults never took a young girl like her to go hunting, but she went into the mountains without telling them, and killing stray witchbeasts wasn’t just a one or two time thing.

It was not hunting for fun, but a procedure necessary to measure her own capacities accurately.

Although, Ram was also proud of her innocent sister praising her enthusiastically every time she told her that she'd killed a witchbeast. It's just that she'd never told anyone other than her sister about her actions.

Getting back on track, what Ram felt in the mansion's surroundings at this time was that sort of hunting sign that reminded her of the past. However, there was one point that was clearly different.

A change in her position—here, at this time, Ram was not the hunter, but the hunted.

Ram: "Neither Roswaal-sama nor Rem are here…"

They were vulnerable. This couldn't possibly be just a coincidental attack. Something had to have happened to Rem and Roswaal after they were lured away from the mansion. —But, Ram's mind was as calm as possible.

She was worried about Rem, but Roswaal was also with her. Though she hated to admit it, as long as Rem had that master dressed as a clown by her side, her life wouldn't be exposed to danger.

The current problem was this person next to her who didn't have those two to protect her.

???: "Ram-san, what have you been…"

Ram: "—Get ready to move Grace-sama immediately. In this occasion, lifting her up will have to do. Furthermore, call the guards in the mansion right away."

???: "…"

The maid, who had a dubious expression, blinked in surprise, becoming dumbfounded upon hearing Ram's instructions. That reaction made Ram want to click her tongue, but she couldn't blame her for not having sense of urgency.

Because Ram and the others were the ones who brought this attack's danger into the mansion, after all.

Ram: "Anyhow, just do as I say. This mansion is—"

Without trying to convince her, Ram raises her voice to force the best course of action. However, before she declared that, an intense impact was pushing up the building from below.

???: "…"

A roaring sound and a shock appears at the maid's feet, making her lose balance, and she fell to the floor as she screamed. Ram also felt such a shock that she had to kneel down on one knee, and she jumped onto the couch immediately. On it, there was Grace, holding onto her stomach, her beautiful face pale from anxiety and shock.

Ram: "…"

"I have to protect them", is what Ram thinks instinctively.

For Ram, that was something she would very rarely feel for anyone except for Rem. However, Grace, with how she was now, made her act like this, and she just naturally judged her to be someone that she ought to protect.

—She had no horn.

But, even so, there still was the blood of the reincarnation of an Oni god flowing within her body.

Ram: "—Look."

She puts her determination and her secret skill to use.

Ram started using "Clairvoyance", a secret skill of the Onis', without the mana that would normally circulate through the horn. The power goes around the Miload residence—its limited range—and finds an existence that could synchronize with the kneeling girl's mana, even though it was just slightly. —Just then, Ram's field of vision suddenly opened.

Ram: “…”

It was red, a very red scene.

The bottom and top of her field of vision were dyed bright red, and a figure was blurred over and over while flickering. It had to be because Ram’s target was wildly writhing on the floor.

Her vision was red, red as far as she could see. It wasn’t deep red that made her think of blood; it was bright red that reminded her of bright light. This is what people call flames.

The person who Ram borrowed her vision from gets engulfed in flames, and now was the exact moment she started burning to death.

Ram: “…”

Seeing that cruel scene didn’t crush Ram’s heart. She focuses on finding a clue inside the vision dyed red. Once the body she’s borrowing vision from dies, needles to say, the connection breaks. If that happens, then the owner of this body dies in vain.

That couldn’t happen. She wouldn’t let it. Get a hold of something, just something, no matter what—.

Ram: “—!”

A figure passes by the corner of her vision, and right after Ram gasped upon seeing it, the connection breaks. It was proof of the target of the magic being burned by flames and dying once and for all.

But, she obtained a clue. In exchange for her death, she obtained information on the attacker. However, it was Ram’s worst enemy.

What went through her vision was a large, muscular, short-haired man—Ram had encountered that man once before in red scenery like the one happening right now.

It was when she was surrounded by her kind’s burnt corpses in the Oni village burning down. That disastrous scene.

Ram: “A thief has broken into the mansion’s east wing. Guards are rushing over, but half of them have been burned. I can’t say that this place is safe either. Let’s move somewhere else.”

???: “Th-Thief, no way…there must be some mistake…”

Ram: “Did you not hear the shaking and noise just now? Moreover, the thief is actually the witch cult…I saw their black clothes come into mansion outside the window. Must I explain even further?”

The maid who couldn’t accept reality for a moment gazes in wonderment upon hearing ‘witch cult’. They were words convenient for making her understand that this was an emergency. The unfortunate thing was that it wasn’t a lie, but the truth.

This was a terrible attack by the witch cult to eradicate the Oni clan.

Ram: “In any case, it would be stupid to stay in this mansion. You are too insistent on keeping Grace-sama here. We have to move her.”

???: “But we can’t put such a burden on her! She should stay he…”

Grace: “No, let’s do what Ram-chan…no, what Ram-san says.”

It was Grace who interrupted the objecting maid and agreed with Ram in a firm tone. The pregnant girl sits up in the bed, and despite having a pale face, she stared at Ram with courageous eyes.

Grace: “You’re Roswaal-sama’s dear child. I’m positive that you are capable of making the best judgements.”

Ram: “…If that disgraceful title helps, then I won’t deny it in this situation.”

Grace: “Aww, you don’t have to be embarrassed.”

Ram responds to Grace, who acted unexpectedly relaxed. Then, the rabbit eared girl who’d been watching them rolls up the sleeves of her maid outfit.

???: “O-Okay, understood. I’m ready, too. Madam, it’s going to be a little uncomfortable, but please grab onto me.”

Grace: “Yes, Limrear, if you would.”

Even though her arms were thin, demi-humans are demi-humans. The rabbit eared maid—Limrear picks up Grace in her arms, and Ram put her ears against the door out the room as she watched that. No presences in the corridor. For starters, they had to move.

How long was it going to take for Rem and Roswaal to break past the witch cult and return to the mansion? She had to escape from the attackers hiding in the mansion until they did—.

Ram: “It’s definitely easier said than done.”

Most likely, that was going to be a hopelessly difficult obstacle.

However, as Ram said that out loud, she didn’t let the two of them with her notice her anxiety whatsoever.

5

And so, their fierce escape play began on the stage, the Miload residence.

The three of them leave Grace’s bedroom, and they escaped upstairs for now. After just a few tens of seconds, there was the sound of the bedroom downstairs breaking in the mansion, proving that Ram’s judgement was correct.

Ram: “Although, it really sucks how I can’t be proud of it at all even though I was right.”

Ram speaks her thoughts while she held her breath in the room she ran away into.

After muttering, almost in a whisper, she used ‘Clairvoyance’ and strived to find an escape route. Inside the mansion, there were several people hiding from the witch cult attack, just like Ram and the others were. For now, she had to guarantee Grace’s safety by borrowing their—the girls’ eyes.

Ram: “I can’t really say that it’d be wise to stay in one place. Fortunately, there aren’t many enemies. Let’s move.”

Limrear: “But that’d be dangerous…”

Ram: “This’ll get hit at some point if we don’t move since the pursuer is hitting places one by one. Besides…it seems they aren’t that naive, either.”

Sensing presences nearing downstairs, Ram tells the two of them to run away while they still have places they could run to. They exit the room, and run off to a different wing, carefully destroying their traces so they don’t get caught by their pursuers.

Relying on her secret skill and insight, Ram grasped the attackers’ characteristics pretty much correctly.

He was a witch cultist who was the village’s enemy. He was invading the mansion by himself. She was sure of that after what she’d seen. However, this wasn’t information that she could accept with open arms.

Since he was alone, this proved that he has the power to take control of the mansion on his own. In fact, as Ram checked her memory, she came to the conclusion that they were at a disadvantage.

If they fought, their chances of winning were slim. But even if they weren’t, they’d get burnt to death once found. That’s just a cold, hard fact.

Limrear: “In that case, can’t we go through the garden and flee outside the premise?”

Ram: “…Someone has already tried that and failed. As for what happened, that’s better left unsaid.”

Hearing Ram’s cruel explanation, Limrear understood that she’d lost her coworker, and she was at a loss for words.

When she was using ‘Clairvoyance’, she saw her target forcefully trying to run away from the mansion and she ended up failing.

The reason being because of the invisible explosive spells set outside the mansion—it was the trap used by the witch cultist Roswaal had kept in the mansion before.

Most likely, there were countless of the same kind of traps set up around the mansion. Evade that carefully, escape, and don't get found by the witch cultist. —That would be impossible.

Ram: "He's scrupulous with preparations, and on top of that, he's excellent at pursuit…it's as if he's reading the wind."

The pursuer, on top of blocking their way out, was definitely cornering them, and it made Ram grind her teeth.

The distance between them and the enemy had neither decreased nor increased since leaving Grace's bedroom; they were getting nowhere. His pursuit magic was excellent. He was so crafty that Ram praised him without exaggerating.

Ram: "…"

Time passed and passed, and the silence starts to spread heavily between the three of them. They speak less about focusing on escaping, and everyone besides Ram had their faces turn pale slowly.

They hadn't run into any of the other servants in the mansion, not even once. Surely the two of them weren't thickheaded enough to not understand what that meant.

And so, Ram's heart also tore apart when the pursuer, who they couldn't shake off, came to mind.

Limrear: "—! Ram-san, you're bleeding."

Ram: "…It's no…big deal."

Wiping the nose blood Limrear pointed out, Ram grinds her teeth while breathing heavily.

Ram's body had already passed its limit a long time ago from the repeated use of her secret skill. Her headache and the buzzing her ears wouldn't go away, and her hot head and body were strangely heavy. If she lost focus, she'd probably fall to her knees soon after.

Ram was able to prevent that from happening precisely because she had tough force of will. —Still, it wasn't so far from its limit. Sooner or later, it would definitely fail.

Ram: "Why…"

Is this body so fragile? Why does it have so many problems just from doing something?

Irritation with herself is exactly what she felt since her time at the village.

Ram: "—Damn it."

Limrear: "Ram-san! Please, that's enough. Don't force yourself!"

Limrear supports Ram's unsteady body, and she turns around. And then, while holding Grace, she went into a nearby room she had her eyes on, bringing Ram along.

Limrear: "Anyway, let your body rest for a little bit…"

Ram: "— You idiot, this room is"

Limrear speaks considerate words, and Ram's voice gets covered up as her eyes widened.

But, she was still late to stop her, and the three of them looked straight at the scene in the room.

???: "—Ah"

It wasn't clear who let out a sigh out of the three of them. That question was just blown away by the scene they were faced with, right before their own eyes.

—Piled up messily at the corner of the room were several burnt corpses turned into black.

Although she couldn’t tell with her nose clogged with blood, the room was most likely filled with the stench of burnt flesh. There were at least 10 corpses lying on top of each other. It almost felt like the evaporated, hollow eye sockets were giving them a resentful, empty look.

Limrear: “…”

Ram: “Careful…”

Next to her, Limrear falls to her knees with a ‘thump’. Grace, who she had in her arms, almost gets thrown down to the floor because she lost her strength, and Ram just barely caught her.

Still, it was understandable. Limrear’s long bunny ears sag, and she continued to shed tears from her eyes, stupefied as her voice wouldn’t even come out.

Grace: “How could…they…”

And so, Grace, who’d been rescued from falling down, also received unfathomable shock to her heart. She was shaking her head over and over in denial, staring at the burnt corpses in shock.

Ram grinds her teeth, seeing their reaction, as she thought, “I’ve failed”.

Ram felt a lot of regret for letting them see this scene. Not encountering corpses even once was supposed to be the bulwark to protect their hearts. That condition was broken once they saw these cruel, burnt corpses right in front of them.

And then that shock led the situation to a vicious spiral.

Grace: “…Ah…koo”

Ram: “Grace-sama?”

Grace, who had been stupefied with the disastrous scene, had the color of anguish go across her profile, and Ram knits her brows. It was clearly a reaction different from the surprise she had upon seeing dead bodies. In fact, Grace’s breathing became heavy, sweat appeared on her forehead, and she was going to collapse on the spot.

Ram: “Grace-sama? Grace-sama, pull yourself together! Fainting here now would be…”

Grace: “N-No, you’ve got it wrong, Ram-san…that’s not it…”

Grace holds onto Ram’s sleeve as she called out to her, and she shakes her head with a look of pain. That reaction makes Ram’s eyes widen in confusion, but she noticed it right after.

At Grace’s feet, a large amount of liquid was dripping from her nightgown. It was something caused by being faced with a horrible scene—how nice that would be if that was the case.

Ram: “No way, her water broke…?!”

A part of Ram’s knowledge on the flow of events for childbirth came to mind, and her voice trembles.

Once Ram said those words, Grace held onto her big belly and hung her head. It was nothing other than her clenching her teeth and dealing with the on and off pain.

Her water broke, and then she had labor pains—although the order was incorrect, they were signs of one’s first childbirth, and it was expected for them to happen at anytime for Grace as someone who was entering the last month of pregnancy. But she had to say that this was the worst time.

The worst time for labor pains to start in a situation where they were being attacked by witch cultists and the whole mansion turned into a battlefield.

Grace: “—Ah…hou…oo”

Ram: “…”

Grace breathes in and out painfully, grabbing onto Ram’s arm, and her hands were full of strength. It was such a grip that you wouldn’t believe it was coming from a girl with thin arms like hers, and it made Ram's head spin fast while she dealt with the pain.

The witch cultist wouldn't slow down his pursuit. Still, dragging Grace around with her current situation was impossible. It'd expose the mother and the child to danger. And she couldn't give birth here, either—.

Ram: "Limrear! Limrear, snap out of it!"

Limrear: "…"

Ram: "Limrear!"

With a dry sound, Ram slaps Limrear's cheek. That shock makes Limrear topple over, and her eyes widen as she held onto her hit cheek.

Ram shouts at the maid.

Ram: "Carry Grace-sama into a bedroom nearby! Get hot water and lots of clean cloth! That's as far as my knowledge goes. Now you just have to do something!"

Even a genius like Ram could only understand the surface when it came to stuff like knowledge on childbirth. However, Limrear, as the pregnant woman Grace's maid, should've been trained in case of emergencies.

Roswaal was thorough in that area. Thus—

Limrear: "U-Under-Understood…I will…take care of her…but, the witch cult"

Ram: "—I'll take care of them."

Ram, while standing back up, says that to Limrear, who somehow came back to her senses. Although two of them gazed in wonderment upon hearing her declaration, Ram confidently takes out the staff she'd equipped on her thigh.

It was a staff she was comfortable with, made out of her own horn —as of now, it was unpleasantly reassuring.

Ram: “Don’t worry about me. Worry about yourselves. Giving birth to a child is a major task, much more difficult than my cleaning that’ll begin after this.”

As Ram said that while preparing her staff, she braced herself to face an unavoidable battle.

6

—Feeling that Ram was straight ahead, he came to the corridor where Ram was standing in without hesitation.

???: “…Oh.”

Appearing at the end of the corridor, the man lets out a sigh in admiration upon seeing the girl standing dauntingly. Hearing that sound, which sounded like excitement in a way, Ram truly felt disgusted.

However, her fighting spirit and anger were stronger than her disgust, and they burned it into nothing within an instant.

The anger towards the witch cult—her kind’s enemy and a symbol of unreasonable fate—flared up in her light red eyes.

Seeing those angry eyes, the large man shrugs his shoulders in an unconcerned manner.

???: “Why has a little Oni, who had been running everywhere, suddenly decided to show up?”

Ram: “To put it as ‘running all over the place’ is extremely wrong. I was not running; I simply walked without caring about anyone. Not catching up to me, not finding me, whichever slip-up it may be… don’t blame me for your own incompetence.”

???: “It seems you are the one who is mistaken, little Oni.”

The man, with a low and muffled voice, objects those provocative words spoken by Ram, who smiled. When Ram squinted as she heard his reply, the man put leaf tobacco, which he took out of his pocket, in his mouth. And then,

???: “You’ve been running away ever since that mountain village died down, right? I’m asking how did you end up showing yourself here.”

Ram: “You sure know how to run your mouth well. —I’ll sew that mouth my way.”

???: “Hmph.”

While watching Ram, who twirled the staff in her hand and expressed her fighting spirit, the man cracked his knuckles. Just then, a faintly produced spark lights the end of the leaf tobacco. With a deep breath, he breathed tobacco smoke.

???: “You have fighting spirit, but I don’t sense any strength. I came to burn the reincarnation of an Oni God, a real Oni…but I guess I was off. The real one has been taken by Sergei. Unlucky.”

Ram: “—You sure do enjoy stupid hobbies, Faust.”

Faust: “—Fogg must be the one who couldn’t keep his mouth shut. He was an awful apprentice.”

Having his name guessed correctly, the large man—Faust spat out those words apathetically. Although Ram agreed with his opinion on Fogg, she tilted her head upon hearing ‘Apprentice’ and questioned him.

Faust: “He’s an arson apprentice. It makes sense to kill people, destroy things, and burn things. However, not everyone could do all that. If there isn’t anyone to teach it, then the skills won’t spread. So, I take the initiative and do so. It’s a practice that is a hobby and it has benefits.”

Ram: “…”

Faust: “Even the witch cult is desperate to enlighten people. Lately, there’s been no hesitation to convert those with no interest at all in their ideas into believers. Their deviousness is comfortable to evildoers.”

While enjoying the taste of tobacco smoke, Faust talks about his position thoroughly. The details go through Ram's eyes, and her hornless forehead starts to ache terribly.

She tilts her head without speaking of the sort of pain that felt like her skull was being pierced with a drill.

Ram: "In other words, although you help the witch cult, you aren't influenced by the witch. In that case, why did you help burn down the village?"

Faust: "I thought I told you. It's a hobby and it has benefits."

Ram: "Meaning?"

Faust: "I love fire. Plus, I wanted to try burning Onis. I wanted to know the smell."

Stating that, Faust spits out the shortened leaf tobacco and said,

Faust: "Everyone loves rare things, right?"

Ram: "Yes. And so I'll let you smell one of the rare smells in this world."

He drops the leaf tobacco onto the carpet, and the tip of the fabric burns with a scorching sound.

That becomes a sign, and Ram kicks the floor with her small body and starts sprinting. Faust raises his palm towards the girl running like the wind and says,

Faust: "What rare smell?"

Ram: "The smell of you being burnt to death. The best lingering scent in the whole world."

Her sharp words make Faust deepen his smile, and the next moment, his thirst for blood explodes.

Ram senses the concentration of heat in the space up front, and she evades the threat with a jump to the side. The produced blast grazed her cheek right after she blinked, but she steadied herself and continued on.

The invisible explosions—Rem had already saw through that trick. It's a special magic where he can cause explosions on the spot by setting up magic formulas in the air beforehand. It definitely would've been very troublesome for her without her background knowledge. However, once she'd figured out the trick, it was no big deal.

Rem had exposed it with her sense of smell, but Ram saw through it by the disturbance in mana right before the explosions.

Faust: "Wow, not bad."

Ram: "Kohhh—!"

Faust dodges her first attack, and he ignited countless spells while falling back. While he freely covered the corridor with explosive flames, Ram avoided fatal wounds with her supernatural body movement.

Yes, she avoided just the fatal wounds. She couldn't avoid her arm getting lacerated, her legs getting burnt, and her hair burning. But they were still miraculously minor injuries once you considered the amount of explosions and the scale of them.

There were no interferences in the battle, and she got close enough to get hit.

Ram: "…"

She clenches her teeth and bears with pain. The pain was not only coming from her wounds, but her exhaustion as well.

Her body could fight for a long time, but it could not fight perfectly. Besides, she suffered defeat against Faust even when it was perfect. Her chances of winning were slim from the start.

Still, even if they were slim, she'd take her chances. As long as she fought, she wouldn't think about stuff like losing.

In many situations, Ram was forced to fight. Ram's options to not fight would get ruined one by one, and she'd choose to fight. However, she would never make excuses when she had no other choices.

"Do it, and I'll win." That was a belief Ram told herself—

Ram: "Al Fura!!"

—Because it was an essential will as the proud older sister of Rem, her cute little sister.

Fierce, magical power concentrates at the tip of the staff she stuck out. Without a pause, it completely covers the Miload residence's spacious, long corridor just like that, constricting it.

The 'Al' rank is magic praised as the highest ranked power in wind magic, 'Fura'.

Ram, without her horn, was even easily manipulating the enormous amount of mana an ordinary person needed to summon up in order to use it, despite it being an unreachable level of skill.

Ram: "…"

The wind rages, like an intense force of a gigantic dragon, and the building gets ravaged by a sharpness that not even a treasured sword could compare to, making it lose all of its original form. The carpet tears into pieces. The pottery disintegrates without a sound. The windows crush like grains of sand. The paintings go from pieces of paper to fine powder.

The windstorm destroys people's eardrums, tearing through their bodies by breaking into the holes in them. Once that destruction blew through, all that's left was a scene without any bloodstains.

Ram: "Ha…ah…"

Ram drops her shaking staff, and she falls to her knees on the spot while breathing hoarsely.

It was an all or nothing maximum firepower attack where she threw in everything. Hit the opponent with your trump card when he starts taking you lightly and achieve victory—there was no other way to win.

Fatigue suddenly weighs on Ram's body, and as she looked down, blood dripped from her face onto the floor. She couldn't tell if it was coming from her nasal cavity or her painful horn wound. Ram just bore with the urge to fall over at once and tried to stand with her shaking legs.

If the battle was over, then she had to report that to Grace and the others. And then they'd move to a more safe and clean place for childbirth—

Faust: "How about I give you a hand there, young lady."

Ram: "Kooa—"

Without being given the chance to respond with her voice, Ram's body gets lifted up easily.

Her head was caught, and her legs were in the air. A strange man with finely chiseled features comes into Ram's vision.

It was Faust. He lifted Ram with his right arm, and was fixing his hair with his left arm. In his behavior, there were practically no signs that he'd been caught in the destruction.

Faust: "I really enjoyed your trap card. But, you were unlucky."

Ram: "Un…lu…"

Faust: "I didn't expect your trump card to be related to wind. That's my specialty. I was the one who taught Sade how to read wind. I know how wind protection works."

By looking at Faust, she knew that he wasn't lying. Even Faust wasn't unharmed by that murderous wind. However, most of his important organs avoided injury, and he wasn't dealt any hard blows that could be called severe wounds.

She had certainly put in her whole soul into the attack, and yet this was the result. She'd completely missed her chance to win.

Faust: “However, you haven’t lost your fighting spirit. I like those eyes. Just like an Oni. They’re genuine.”

Ram: “You…should’ve…seen many of them…at the village…”

Faust: “I said real ones. I wanted to burn a real Oni. That wish hasn’t come true yet. —I’m just sad about you. You’re such a great wind user that I want to make you my apprentice.”

Ram: “…”

At the last second, Faust strengthens his grip on her neck. While having her thin neck crushed, Ram stared fixedly at Faust without letting the pain show on her face.

It looked like Faust was impressed with her courage, and when he suddenly pulled her face close to his, he said,

Faust: “I thought there’d be no use in asking, but I’ll try. Would you become my apprentice? We’ll stand out, be famous, and go around burning anything and everything.”

Faust asks her that, almost sounding like he was saying “It’ll be fun”.

When Ram heard that excited man’s sigh, she took a breather while having both ringing in her ears and a headache.

Ram: “I had…always…thought that…”

Ram says that in somewhat of a careless tone, and she looks at Faust, who was right by her. And then, without any hesitation, she spat on his face. There was saliva on his cheek. Looking at that, she says,

Ram: “When your heart is rotten to the core, your face becomes dirty. …You should clean your face with my spit.”

Despite being on the verge of death, Ram smiled with a face that couldn’t look any more triumphant. Seeing that smile, Faust’s eyes brighten intensely.

Faust: “My apologies for my initial impoliteness. You are the real deal. No doubt about it, you’re it. Which is exactly why I’ll pay my respects and burn you to nothing—”

Faust wipes off the spit on his cheek with the back of his hand, and he faced the window while grabbing Ram. Most of the wall facing the garden was blown away by the aftermath of the magic, and the courtyard could be viewed from the third floor of the colonnade.

Contrary to the aspects of the mansion that turned into a disastrous scene, the garden remained in a peaceful state, such as the water fountain and the carefully trimmed garden trees and flower beds. Although, there were already countless spells set up in the garden to prevent escape, and they still should be intact even now.

Faust: “Once the explosions start at one spot, it causes a chain reaction. Don’t you think it’d be a magnificent and splendid farewell gift for a genuine Oni like yourself?”

Ram: “…Ight”

Faust: “—?”

Faust was talking about paying a tribute to her, but Ram murmured something in a muffled voice. That makes the man knit his brows, and he bent his ears to hear her murmuring.

Ram mutters something again, and it was almost like she was talking deliriously. What she said was—

Ram: “—More…to the right, Rem.”

—Right after that, an iron sphere of destruction struck Faust from above his head.

7

—I made it.

I made it. I made it. I made it…I made it…I made it I made it I made it I made it I made it I made it I made it I made it—.

Ram: “…Nee-sama!!”

Ram: “You came back. Nice job, Rem.”

Ram smiles at Ram, who hugged her bloody sister and came through the eruption of smoke. Her exhausted sister smiled, but Rem still nodded vigorously with tears in her eyes.

Rem barged in and attacked, causing the partially destructed mansion’s corridor to completely collapse. The floor of the 3rd floor and the 2nd floor passages crumbled, making them into one. When Rem, who kicked away the debris and stopped moving, wiped off the blood on Ram’s face, she rubbed her cheeks against her chest and checked her heartbeat.

She feels her hot body and her beating heart, and she lets out a sigh of relief and happiness.

Rem: “Thank goodness I made it…”

Her grievous voice sounded like sobbing, so Ram gently patted Rem’s head that she rubbed against her chest.

Rem, who had been caught in the witch cult’s trap on the main road, left Roswaal behind, and retreated to the mansion. After she escaped the mana contaminating zone that restricted the power of her horn, along the way she pushed her body and continued running until she reached her limit. All while being guided by the synesthesia that could be felt between twins.

She also made it past the garden set with invisible spells because of the synesthesia from Ram. She avoided the garden, jumped onto the building from the outer wall, arrived walking on the roof, and threw an attack.

And so, Ram was rescued safely, and here they are.

Ram: “Where’s Roswaal-sama?”

Rem: “He was fighting a lot of witch cultists at the main road…but he told me to leave them up to him.”

Ram: “I see. In that case, if, say, he does die, you don’t have feel responsible. Besides, it’s not like he’ll die, anyway.”

Ram’s strange trust in her master. Those words allow Rem to recover strength in her heart that had been uneasy. Seeing the light of her sister’s eyes, Ram smiles slightly.

And then—

Ram: “Then we’ll have to finish the cleaning before Roswaal-sama gets back.”

Rem: “—Yes. It’s our 462nd work together!”

As Ram declared that, Rem stuck her chest out and carried her sister on her back since she couldn’t move. After that, when she turned around to the enveloping eruption of smoke behind, she pulled back the iron sphere she had brought down. The sound of chains rattle shrilly, and the iron sphere with thorns rolled to her feet. However—

Rem: “There’s no blood. So, I didn’t kill him.”

???: “…Though I did hear that you’re a blockhead that just has a horn, if anything.”

Rem, who judged whether the man was dead or not based off the existence of bloodstains, feels only signs of a wry smile coming from the smoke. What eventually came out of that smoke and walked forward was a large built man. The man puffs out tobacco smoke from the leaf tobacco he had in his mouth, and he looked at the sisters with deep interest in his eyes.

She sniffs. She couldn’t sense a witch cult like smell, but—

Rem: “I will not hold back against men who have hurt Nee-sama and wronged Roswaal-sama.”

Ram: “—It’s Faust, one of the enemies. One of the remaining two.”

Rem: “…Then this is terrific.”

Rem's hostility increased regardless of her opponent's background, and Ram added the last fuel to the fire. Ram raised an eyebrow when she heard Rem's response, but Rem enlightened her without turning around.

Rem: "The person Roswaal-sama is fighting with is one enemy. The remaining two have been gathered. —We can accomplish retribution."

Ram: "—Yes."

Ram answers Rem's quiet voice briefly

For a moment, she felt like there was intense emotion in that reply, but Ram immediately got rid of it and said,

Ram: "Let's avenge our kind."

Rem: "Yes, Nee-sama."

Rem gains strength from her sister's next words, and she advances with her on her back.

Rem's horn shines even brighter, and the white light fills her whole body with overwhelming power.

Seeing that before his own eyes, Faust smiled happily, rather than getting scared.

Faust: "The Oni sisters are all together, eh. Sisters born from the same woman's womb…I wanted to see the differences between the smells of a real Oni and a fake Oni. That wish will have to be granted."

Rem: "Obviously Nee-sama smells better."

Ram: "The opportunity for you to confirm that will never come."

They have somewhat of an aloof exchange, and three—two of their shadows clash.

With her sister on her back, Rem rushed to the front with everything she had in her.

Ram, who turned in her arms, continued to hold on tight, and she left everything up to her sister's will. Feeling that she had to prove herself worthy of that trust, Rem struck Faust's body with her left hand with all her might.

Faust: "…"

Faust takes Rem's fist attack, which was strong enough to smash a large tree and even twist an iron plate, from the front without showing any intention of dodging it. The power of her fist that hit the middle of his crossed arms makes the large 100 kilogram man blow back like leaves of a tree. Easily, like he didn't weigh anything.

Rem: "So light—!"

Contrary to the flashy way he flew away, it felt light on Rem's hand, and so she raised her voice. At the same time, Faust, who was blown back, disappeared into the smoke. He gains distance, and hides himself. It was a temporary measure.

Rem was going to chase after him, but she stops right before she did. Instead, she threw her iron sphere sideways at the smokescreen. The iron sphere makes a circle in the direction of the missing wall, and she mows down everything lurking in the smoke to pulverize him.

The iron sphere is something that spins and has brutal thorns. If one is directly hit by it, their body simply turns into meat, and even if they're just grazed damage to the limbs is unavoidable. However—

Ram: "Rem! Look out above you!"

Rem: "—?!"

Hearing Ram's sudden warning, Rem falls backwards while crossing her arms over her head. Ram was sandwiched between the floor and her back, but the damage was minimal—facing upward, right after she thought that she saw the ceiling got cracked, explosive flames come down along with Faust.

Because of Rem's hit from earlier, the 2nd and 3rd floor passages were connected. Faust made use of that, slipped into the smoke, moved from the 2nd floor to the 3rd floor, and surprised them from the top floor.

Faust: "Your reading is top-notch. A real Oni's insight."

He swings his legs downward like a broadaxe, and the impact grinded against Rem's crossed arms. She barely managed to defend against the power with her iron handle, but if she didn't have that, her arms might've been smashed.

However, although Rem withstood that power, the second floor passage continuing to crumble couldn't.

Rem: "Ah—"

She feels the floor breaking behind her back. Within a blink of an eye, her whole body is taken over by a floating sensation. Rem forces her body to twist in the air, lands with her limbs like a mouse, immediately kicks the ground, falls back, and attempted to escape Faust's pursuit. Over there—

Rem: "Nee-sa…?!"

Hearing a sharp cry with synesthesia, Rem stops and jumps back. The next moment, Rem gets shaken by the blast produced before her eyes, and she was flicked back even further.

The explosive spell in itself had the same nature Fogg's magic. And yet, Rem's sense of smell didn't react to the signs. Come to think of it, Rem's nose hadn't been reacting to Faust since the beginning.

She didn't know why. Her fear got the best of her before she could find out. The moment Rem lacked the ability to smell her opponent that emitted a miasma, she went back to her pathetic, no-horn self.

A being back at the village who couldn't do anything but have her sister's back—.

Ram: "I'm fine, Rem."

Ram, on Rem's back, whispers that in her ears as Rem blocked pebbles and hot wind with her arm.

It was the world's most precious voice that was kind, passionate, and full of unconditional deep affection.

Ram: "—Believe my words."

Rem forgets about the situation and listens Ram's beloved voice that always loved Rem, was affectionate to Rem, and always guided Rem.

And so, in the very little time she was given, Ram clears Rem's doubt, who became silent.

With her words that would always free Rem from doubt.

Ram: "—Because I'm Rem's world's best Nee-sama, and you're my little sister."

Right after that, a blast and explosive flames completely covered Rem's vision all at once.

It was an inescapable, chain of explosions that practically cut off Rem. However, in response to those explosions, Rem walked towards them calmly, and she went into the shock wave.

Rem: "…"

Right now, Rem could understand the thoughts of her sister, who was close enough to touch her, faster with synesthesia than with words.

Through those communicated senses, Rem grasps all of the positions of the explosive spells Ram saw through, and she sipped through while keeping impact to a minimum.

While Rem protected her sister from the explosive flames and blasts, as if she was dancing and twirling, the horn on her forehead shined.

Rem: "Oh, that's right…"

It was a muttering voice that didn't escape her mouth. Nobody heard it, and it was etched in Rem's mind and nowhere else.

She remembered it. She had forgotten. Her stupid self immediately lost her decision and resolve.

It should've been decided from the start. She came to Roswaal, and swore to get retribution for her kind. Or maybe it was even further back on that fiery night when her sister wailed while she watched the glimmer of her broken horn—.

Rem: "I am…Nee-sama's horn. I am…Nee-sama's hands and legs. I am…Nee-sama's—"

The being identical to Ram, who was the most precious Oni, deemed the promising reincarnation of an Oni God.

When Rem caused her sister to lose her horn and felt '—' when she saw her without her horn, she made a decision.

Rem: "—I am…Nee-sama's substitute. That's my role, what I'm proud of, and what I live for."

She breaks out of the blast and mows down the explosive smoke with left hand. On the other side clear of smoke, Faust was smiling in admiration at Rem, who got past countless explosions.

Faust: "A fake Oni and a lacking real Oni have made…"

Rem: "Shut up."

Rem interrupts the man in the middle of his speech, and she hits the man with the iron handle in her hand. Faust took the Oni's hit with his raised left arm. His arms gets crushed, and it almost sounded like eggs cracking. His body gets penetrated, his bones fly out, and the madman laughs insanely while the scattering blood splatters onto his cheeks.

What shot at the same time as that vague, strange voice was a steel blow shining weakly. Faust shot a rod-shaped concealed weapon he'd kept in his sleeves, aiming for the horn on Rem's forehead.

What came back to her mind were a village dyed red, her kind burnt to death, and Ram wailing—

Rem: “…”

She flips up her head, and with her open mouth, she bites onto the piece of steel approaching her forehead, stopping it. Two of her left canine teeth get blown away by the impact. However, Rem focuses her strength onto her jaw without caring, and she crushes the steel instantly.

Faust: “Well done! But…oh?”

She smashes the concealed weapon, and Faust, who applauded, uses that chance to jump back. He gains distance, and was probably trying to reset. However, she wouldn’t allow that choice.

The iron sphere she controlled just by twisting her wrist circumvents the smoke and catches Faust’s back. The imperfect hit gouges his flesh with thorns, and the power crushes his spine.

Still, it was good enough. It stops him from moving. Just doing something unexpected was good enough.

Rem: “Ah…ahhh…AHHHHH—!!”

Rem roars at the top of her lungs, and she punches Faust’s jaw from beneath with her fist.

The power of her punch breaks his jaw, and Faust’s tall self was blown upward. Afterwards, Rem jumped and punched her opponent who couldn’t move in the air over and over tempestuously.

Rem: “AHHHHHH—!!”

She hits, crushing his bones. She hits, and his flesh burst open. She hits, rupturing his intestines. She hits, and his limbs break. Every hit was a hit for her kind’s revenge—.

They fly from the 1st floor to the 2nd floor, from the 2nd floor to the 3rd floor, out of the 3rd floor’s ceiling into the 4th floor, out of the 4th floor’s ceiling and finally into the sky above the mansion.

Rem: “…”

Rem, who went through the ceiling into the air, had her vision dyed in deep red.

It was neither flame nor blood; it was the red of a sunset dying the world warmly and majestically.

It was a scarlet sky that had absolutely nothing to do with countless corpses, creating one’s deathbed, and the man who believed in the red of blood and fire—.

While watching that sky, Rem positioned herself right above Faust, who was spinning, and—

Ram: “Rem.”

Rem: “Yes, Nee-sama—”

Once Rem’s name was called, she gave Faust the hardest hit while replying with deep affection.

Faust: “…”

Faust takes a severe hit to the guts, and his body falls to the ground. After getting hit by the might of Rem’s fist, his body descends diagonally, and it crashed right into the middle of the garden.

Faust was struck without defense at a height of tens of meters high, continued to have his body showered with grand blows, and was at the verge of death. However, he still had life in him. He was gazing at the sisters in the sky.

Faust: “…”

It looked like his mouth was whispering some sort of curse. But, his voice didn’t reach the two of them.

And so, Faust’s words would never make their eardrums vibrate again.

Ram: “One who wields a sword falls to the sword. One who clings to a devil dies falls to the devil. One devotes oneself to flames falls to flames—

Rem, who landed on the roof and had her hair fluttering in the strong wind, hears Ram's whisper.

It was a complicated voice that felt very sentimental despite being apathetic—.

Ram: "Thou shalt be destroyed by what thou relied on. —That shall be what puts our kind's souls to rest."

Ram says that, and she throws something that she'd held at her fingertips at Faust, who was in the garden. It was extremely light, and it went towards the madman's chest, as if being carried by the wind.

—It was something one would light the tip red, his leaf tobacco that he smoked.

Faust: "…"

The moment that leaf tobacco reached Faust, the set up spells activated.

Countless spells detonate consecutively. The explosive flames of the blast with Faust in the center sweep over the garden in one go, and it changes into a sea of flames.

Whether it be due to the fire power or the force of the flames, the madman's fate was easy to imagine.

Just like Ram said, the man who relied on fire turns into ashes, and he perishes.

Rem: "Now, it's ove…r…right?"

While kneeling and watching over the blazing park, Rem murmurs in amazement.

Faust…died. Rem murdered Fogg, and Ram killed Sade. And Sergei, the one recognized as the remaining one, should be fighting

Roswaal around now—.

Ram: “As long as Roswaal-sama isn’t getting beaten…that is.”

Rem: “It really…it really is…all…”

She couldn’t even hear Ram’s dishonest words. That’s how unreal it felt.

She was absorbed in the last battle, but it felt like she wasn’t fighting by herself. She let everything up to Ram, and fought with power she wouldn’t be able to bring out herself, being controlled by Ram.

That’s why—

Ram: “It makes sense for you to feel uneasy after all kinds of things got settled so suddenly. It probably won’t feel real until later. …But, I’ll just say this.”

Ren: “What…is it?”

Ram: “—Now, finally, ‘Steamed Potatoes’ are unbanned, and I can eat your steamed potatoes.”

Ram joking voice and smile makes Rem dumbfounded within an instant.

However, Rem immediately feels the urge to smile, and so she does so with her blue eyes full of tears.

Rem: “Nee-sama, you truly are a big eater.”

Ram: “Yes. Rem’s steamed potatoes are my source of life, after all. They’re what’s most important.”

Rem smiles even more, and at the same time, she felt tears on her cheeks. But she still kept smiling. Seeing that, with a sigh, Ram rubs her forehead against her sister’s forehead.

And so, the Oni sisters who achieved retribution thanked each other for their efforts, unseen by anyone else—.

And that let them know that this was the end of their retribution as they were wrapped in the red of the setting sun.

8

The night of a the baby's first cry had already came, and it was the dawn after that night.

Rem: "…"

Rem, who felt both tiredness and a sense of accomplishment, had been napping on Ram's shoulder, and she woke up as she was startled by a cry that was loud enough to be heard inside the mansion.

Rem: "Nee-sama…"

Ram: "You're awake, Rem. Don't worry, I'm here for you."

Once she looked towards the warmth close to her, she saw Ram sitting down next to her, nodding with sleepy eyes. Judging from the cry that Rem could still hear even now, she immediately understood that something had happened.

She understood that Grace, who had been fighting with the pain of giving birth this whole time, was done fighting.

Roswaal: "Sounds like it's been born without proooblems."

The one who talked about Rem's realization instead was Roswaal, who'd been waiting in the same room for the result. His outfit was neither messy nor dirty; he was his usual self.

It was very hard to believe that he'd annihilated the 20+ witch cultists that had surrounded him.

It took just about an hour for Roswaal to drag back the last enemy to where Rem and Ram defeated Faust. All of the other witch cultists were annihilated, and only Sergey, the so called young man that was their enemy, had been restrained with his limbs broken.

Rem didn't know how Roswaal dealt with a circumstance where he couldn't use magic perfectly and smashed the witch cultists, but seeing him come back safely made her feel relief from the bottom of her heart.

Now, retribution has been achieved. Now all that's left was Grace's childbirth and—

Rem: "…For Grace-sama to be informed of Dudley-sama's death."

Roswaal: "About that, you guys don't have to take responsibility. I will tell Grace about him. When the opportunity comes. I'll tell her. Please don't say anything."

When Rem showed him a depressed look, Roswaal shook his head to cheer her up. Not everything—yes not everything—can go back to how they once were.

Even in the mansion many servants became victims. Among them, Rem couldn't suppress her sadness that she felt for the deaths of the maids who had been trained at the Mathers residence. And, the husband of Grace and the father of her child had died.

The damage to the Miload family was unfathomable. And so, if the witch cult was aiming for the surviving Onis, then it was all because of Rem and Ram.

Roswaal: "People should not get blamed mistakenly. Besides, we should be celebrating the birth of new life. Limrear and the others should be coming s…"

Then, when Roswaal was in the middle of talking, someone knocks on the door of the guest room used as a waiting room. When Roswaal responded to that sound, the door slowly but surely opened.

Limrear: "…Excuse me, Roswaal-sama. Grace-sama's child has been delivered."

Roswaal: "Good work. Great job doing it without even having any help, despite it not being your specialty. You deserve the credit, no doubt about it. For taking over for Dudley, I thank…"

Limrear: “No, it was nothing…anyway, Roswaal-sama, Grace-sama needs…”

Limrear shakes her head in response to the words thanking her for her work, and she pulls on Roswaal’s sleeve. Roswaal knitted his brows when Limrear, who had a white dress on top of her maid outfit, acted impolite. However, the reaction was not out of displeasure, but out of suspicion.

Roswaal: “Limrear…?”

Limrear: “Please, Roswaal-sama. …We don’t have much time.”

Roswaal: “…”

Limrear, face lifted, murmurs softly, and a large teardrop dripped from her eyes. That makes Roswaal show rare signs of being disturbed, and so he exited the room quickly.

Ram: “Rem, let’s go.”

Rem: “Eh…ah…okay…understood…”

Ram, who had been silent up this point, chases after Roswaal. Rem’s arm gets pulled by her sister, and she hurried out of the room after standing up. While she did, she passed by Limrear, who was crying, but she still continued to weep, crouching down on the spot.

Why was Limrear crying? A baby was born, and revenge was over. Now all that’s left was some sorting and cleaning, and everything should’ve been heading towards the end—.

Roswaal: “—Grace.”

Roswaal opened the door to the room, stepped inside, and called Grace’s name.

It was the special guest room. Inside, there was a big bed for visitors, and Grace was sleeping on it in her nightgown. Next to the bed, there were many sheets dyed in blood, and there was a maid holding a baby that had just been washed with a yuto.

It was a little, little baby. The newborn baby's skin was dark red, and it was crying so much that its face was wrinkled like a monkey. However, it was lively and full of energy.

???: "Roswaal-sama, it's a girl. A lively, cute girl…"

The maid holding the baby hands over her to Roswaal, who approached the bed. The maid had a shrill voice, and her eyes were bright red. When Roswaal accepted the baby from the maid, she covered her face, and her coworker next to her supported her shoulders.

Roswaal: "…Grace, Grace. Can you speak?"

While holding the baby gently, Roswaal calls Grace, who was sleeping on the bed. Grace, who had been sleeping, opens her eyes when she hears her name, and she blinks several times.

Then, she looked at Roswaal and the baby in his arms and said,

Grace: "M-My…baby…"

Roswaal: "Yes, yes it is. The baby belongs to you and Dudley. It's an adorable girl. What'll you name her?"

Grace: "I…have one. I've been thinking about it…for so long…"

Grace speaks fraily, her shaking arms come out of the sheets, and she reached for her baby's cheeks with her finger. Her fingertips shake. Roswaal entwined Grace's hand with the baby's hand. The mother and her child feel each other, and tears flow from the mother's eyes.

Grace: "Anne…Annerose…Annerose Miload. That's her name."

Roswaal: "That's a great name. I definitely wouldn't be able to come up with that one."

Grace: "…Yeah, because, you're, you know, a very unskillful Master."

Roswaal: "…"

Grace smiles slightly, and she looks at the baby affectionately. Those words make Roswaal's cheeks stiffen for a moment, but they quickly relaxed.

A smile is what came out after he blinked. It was the artificial smile hidden under his clown mask.

Roswaal: "Annerose. I'm sure she'll grow up to be a kind, strong willed girl. Just like you."

Grace: "And then, I hope that she'll be loved by everyone, and will love everyone back. Just like you."

In a delirious sort of voice, Grace talks about the future of her daughter and an imitative husband standing near her.

When the mother held onto her daughter's fingers gently, the daughter gently held her hands back. Grace smiles the happiest smile possible, and she looked at Roswaal. And then,

Grace: "I love you. …Thanks so much…for giving me happiness."

Roswaal: "…"

That smile makes Roswaal pause for a moment. To swallow something.

After that, he had a smile on his face. It was neither a clown smile nor an artificial smile.

Roswaal: "I…love you too. Forever and always…"

Grace: "Hehe…"

That reply makes Grace laugh. As if she had to let it out, as if she'd heard the best joke ever.

The unexpected response makes Roswaal's eyes widen. Then, seeing his surprise, Grace says,

Grace: "Oh stop it. You aren't as good at lying as you think, after all."

Roswaal: "…"

Grace: "Thank…you…Please…take care of…Anne…"

The words slowly break up like a dream.

Grace closes her eyes. She brings down her finger that had been feeling Annerose, her daughter. Once Roswaal supported Grace's hand, he put it on her chest.

Roswaal: "…"

Right after that, Annerose started crying wildly again.

She was a baby who didn't know the world yet, but she still was loud, as if she'd understood what happened.

Influenced by Annerose's crying, the maids in the room also start crying, one after another. The sobbing doesn't stop. Everyone covers their faces, and starts crying loudly.

Rem: "—Huh?"

Rem was the only one who was dumbfounded and couldn't understand why they were doing this.

She didn't know what had happened or what was happening.

Why was everyone crying? Why did Roswaal look so mournful? Why was Ram hugging Rem so hard?

She didn't know. She didn't want to know. And yet, tears welled up in her eyes.

Rem: "—Huh?"

The tears didn't stop flowing. While the sobbing tormented her throat, Rem crushes her sadness with doubt.

She couldn't comprehend it. She couldn't understand it. So, there was no reason to cry.

That's what she thought, but the tears wouldn't stop. Why couldn't her stupid self figure it out, just this one time?

Ram: "—I'm sorry. I'm so sorry, Rem."

Ram just apologized over and over in a painful voice while hugging her from above her head.

Ram wasn't crying. But, the tears just weren't coming out; it was actually different.

Rem: "Nee-sama, Nee-sama…"

Rem is Ram's substitute. So, she cried for her sister, and shed tears.

These tears were for Ram, who was so strong that she couldn't cry. They were true tears.

Rem: "…"

So, she could cry all she wanted. Cry and cry, cry all of it out.

So that Rem could understand that she was crying to heal the wounds of Ram's heart.

—Please, I beg of you, don't make me think that these tears are for anyone besides my sister.

On this day, the head of the Miload family, Dudley Miload, and his wife, Grace Miload, were lost to the witch cult attack.

Because of this, Annerose Miload, the married couple's daughter that had just been born, had to succeed the Miload family. However, Margrave Roswaal L Mathers, as the guardian of the young girl, would also take care over the Miload family's businesses and duties.

Because of that, a new business and new territory were gained by the Mathers Margrave, and there would be rumors saying that the Margrave was directing things from behind the scenes.

However, later on, Annerose Miload would grow up, and she'd deny the rumors in a conversational exchange in the future with the Margrave who'd formerly succeed the family. The Margrave was a good friend of her parents, and he would gladly give back more to Annerose that what he was given.

And only the Demi-humans at this time involved in this situation knew that they were the Margrave's true, real feelings.

—Of course, the Oni sisters, who declared loyalty to their master, were also included among them.

Epilogue: The Clown, The Accomplice, and The Substitute

1

Clind: “Thank you so much, Master. I have never been so proud of working for you. I, Clind, will risk my life to accomplish my duties. My whole soul.”

Frederica: “Your unexpected level of motivation makes me feel nothing but anxious!”

It was another day where the routine quarrel unfolded in the entranceway at the Mathers residence.

The two quarrelling were Frederica and Clind. Frederica was the only one lashing out, while Clind just brushed her off in a calm manner. However, this was the only day Clind knitted his brows and talked back to Frederica.

Clind: “I’m not sure what you mean by anxious. I have always said that I’d never slack off with my duties, but I swear that I’ll do more than my best for this order. So I don’t get why you’re so anxious. Does not compute.”

Frederica: “Your fetishes! Your motivation! Combining them is what makes me explode with anxiety!”

Frederica, stamping her feet, turns around with anxiety showing on her scary face. Frederica sees people watching their exchange and decides to target the tall one among them.

Frederica: “Master, why are you laughing in this situation? I have told you over and over that there are problems with who you choose!”

Roswaal: “Well, your reaction was just so expected that it made me happy. Buuuut, it’s an obvious choice once you consider his ability and results, right? The scar left on the Miload residence is deep, and now at least one capable servant is needed to support the family. As a guardian, I have an obligation to do everything I can."

Frederica: "But…"

Roswaal: "Or can you recommend someone suitable for the job besides you aaaand Clind?"

Frederica mumbles and couldn't argue with Roswaal, who asked questions unkindly. And then Roswaal said "Besides" to her in a whisper as he continued,

Roswaal: "Clind will work beyond his ability since he knows that his master is going to be a baby. However, you are the only one who can stop him from getting out of control. You'll be getting the short end of the stick, but I'd like you to deal with it."

Frederica: "For Master, right?"

Roswaal: "Nooooope. For Dudley, Grace, and little Annerose."

Frederica: "…That sure is an unfair way to put it."

Frederica gives in to Roswaal's explanation, and she sighed after a short moment of silence. After that, she looks at the sisters waiting next to Roswaal—Rem and Ram, and says,

Frederica: "You'll probably have to deal with a lot of work. Are you two fine with that?"

Ram: "Yes, we'll be fine. We know that and we'll be staying here."

Rem: "What Nee-sama said. Besides, Frederica-sama and Clind-sama are the ones who are going to have a lot of work."

Frederica: "The work and the workplace are just going to be different. —Though, I don't get why I have to be with this guy."

Like always, Frederica had an unfairly low evaluation of Clind. Although, to Rem, they both were reliable seniors who had many respectable aspects about themselves.

Rem: “Of course, Nee-sama will always be number one. She’ll never move from that spot.”

Ram: “Yeah, obviously. I’m such a precious person to Rem, after all.”

Frederica: “Understanding each other despite the conversation being so disjointed…is this possible because of this synesthesia thing I’ve heard about…?”

The sisters see Frederica tilt her head, and so they looked at each other and smiled slightly.

—A few days after the Miload residence incident, signs of a resolution for the situation were showing, more or less.

The Miload family, which lost the married couple who were the head of it, stayed alive thanks to Roswaal becoming a guardian. However, because of the incident that happened, many servants died and many resigned, and as a result, Clind and Frederica have to be sent to the Miload residence so that it could be maintained.

On top of that, the job training for demi-humans that was carried out at the Mathers residence would have to take place at the Miload residence from now on.

Thus, the Mathers residence would be left with the bare minimum amount of workers—in other words, Rem and Ram would stay with Roswaal as his attendants.

Frederica: “As you know, taking care of Master is no simple task, but please be strong and hold on.”

Ram: “You have to deal with a weirdo, too. Do your best to hang in there, Frederica.”

Ram may have been offensive, but there was playfulness in her abuse. Frederica could also tell. It’s what they both felt in the words that they said to each other.

And so, Frederica faced Rem and kneeled down to match her eyesight level.

Frederica: “Rem, don’t push yourself too hard and stay healthy. You can call me any time if something ever comes up.”

Rem: “You worry too much, Frederica-sama. Besides, I will be fine anywhere as long as Nee-sama is with me.”

Frederica: “I see. Then that’s a relief.”

Then, Frederica smiles affectionately at Rem’s answer. The way Frederica smiled without hiding her mouth was like the sort of openness she’d show to someone she was close with.

Seeing that full set of large, sharp fangs, Rem suddenly feels the regret inside of her.

Rem: “Frederica-sama, I have…one thing I want to apologize for.”

Frederica: “Rem wants to apologize to me? Not Ram?”

Ram frowns at Frederica, who looked really curious. However, Rem puts their reactions aside, and she remembered the regret she had for her first meeting with Frederica that happened long ago.

It was when she got scared of the caring girl’s smile and didn’t get to apologize for it.

Rem: “The first time we met, I got scared of you, even though you worried about me. And to this day I still haven’t apologized…I’m sincerely sorry.”

Frederica: “…”

Rem apologizes with her head down, and it makes Frederica’s eyes widen. Immediately after that, Frederica looked like she understood something, and with a happy expression, she pats Rem’s head.

Frederica: “It’s okay, Rem. —You’re a very good girl.”

Ram: “I mean, she’s my little sister. That’s obvious.”

Frederica: “Forgetting about whether or not that actually means anything, yes, it is obvious.”

Getting her head pat gently, Rem made a surprised look. However, Frederica approvingly nodded at Rem, who lifted her head, and then she pinched her skirt as she did a curtsy.

The movement was so perfect that Rem and Ram wanted to copy her—

Frederica: “Please take good care of Roswaal-sama. I know I can leave it up to you guys.”

Then, she said that and smiled brightly without hiding her mouth.

2

—In an office under the shades of night, two shadows combined into one.

Ram: “—Oo”

Breathing intensely was a young girl with her cheeks red. The girl’s thin, small body trembles, and she weakly clings onto the man right by her. However, she did not do this to keep her balance, but rather to fight off waves of feelings. She wasn’t worried about shaking off.

Since she was on top of the man’s lap, being held in his arms, after all.

Roswaal: “There, aaaaall done.”

Then, their contact ends with the man’s slow voice. What faintly lighted the gloomy room was a four color light in the man’s hand—it was the radiance of mana.

By using several magic attributes simultaneously, he could heal the girl with a special constitution. That was the purpose of this night’s meeting, and it was the secret truth that happened every night.

Roswaal: “You must be beat. Are there any problems with your boooody?”

Ram: “…It’s fine for now. I don’t think there are any after-effects from overdoing it, either.”

While breathing somewhat unstably, Ram, who stepped onto the floor, put her hand on her forehead and shook her head. Every night she'd touch that place where her horn once was, but she could never get used to it.

Perhaps it was because her heart still wasn't accepting the fact that she'd lost her horn.

Roswaal: "Are you worried about something? You're making that look."

Ram: "Worried about something, huh. There certainly is something I'm worried about. My reliable seniors are leaving the mansion, and starting tomorrow, it's going to be just me and Rem. And yet, Master still won't reveal his true thoughts…right?"

Roswaal: "I seeeee. That's what you're anxious about…you're haaaarsh."

The one who shook his head with a bittersweet smile in response to Ram's cynicism was Roswaal, who was leaning back on a chair. He acted like he always would, poured alcohol into the wine glass on the business desk, and sips it.

It wasn't rare for Roswaal to drink alcohol. Ram was used to seeing it as someone who came to him every night for her treatment. However—

Rem: "You're having quite a lot today, and you're drinking fast. You're going to pass out."

Roswaal: "Sorry, this body has never passed out from alcohol. —Not getting drunk is a problem, though."

It was a strange, discomforting statement, but Ram didn't pay attention to that. What's important is the fact that Roswaal was trying to get drunk off of the taste of alcohol, and it was easy to imagine why he'd want to.

Ram: "Do you blame yourself for what happened to Dudley-sama and Grace-sama?"

Roswaal: "…"

Roswaal's expression didn't change when he was questioned. The ice inside the glass he was holding just cracked noisily. Feeling like it was the reflection of the wavering in his mind, Ram squints.

Being stared at by her light red eyes, he also stared back at them with his own heterochromatic eyes.

Ram: "That's surprising. I thought you couldn't care less about other people."

Roswaal: "That's basically correct. I don't mean to try and look tough, but I've mostly lived my life cold-heartedly. By choice, that is. …It's just that there are some rare exceptions."

Ram: "Rare…"

Roswaal: "Yes, rare. —In rare cases, I want the few people I like to be happy, and it has nothing to do with my own happiness. There are times when I wish for that."

He was probably implying that he felt that way for Dudley and Grace. Roswaal truly liked the two of them. However, they lost their lives.

On top of that, even though they had nothing to do with it, they were dragged into a fight with the witch cultists that started with the Onis—.

Ram: "Then do you blame us? Do you hate us?"

Roswaal: "I know a method to separate my feelings and results. So it would be truly unreasonable to blame you and such. Besides, the witch cultist attack was…"

Ram: "—Caused by you, right?"

Interrupting Roswaal, Ram gets to the main point herself.

Her assertive way of speaking makes Roswaal close one eye. Being stared at by his yellow eye, Ram continued while leaning against the desk.

Ram: “Rem, as someone who is pure, lovely, and innocent, doesn’t seem to find enemies appearing successively suspicious…but I, as someone who is wise, invincible, and gallant, beg to differ. Finding heretics one after another at the village can’t just be a coincidence. You’d be foolish to think of it as one.”

Roswaal: “So, wise one, you said that I made them do it. How’d I go about doing that?”

Ram: “It’s not about how you did it; it’s about consequences and motives. Well, it seemed like they had a thing for Oni survivors, so as long as we gave off the scent somewhere, they’d go for us. However, that only explains how they were lured over. There’s also the question of why you let them make the first move.”

Putting the one who was tied to the mansion aside, the remaining three were allowed to take the first move without exception. And so, as a result, Dudley and Grace died.

Roswaal had to pay a very big price for Ram and Rem to obtain their retribution.

That’s exactly why she had doubts. —Why was he doing this?

Ram: “Obviously, you knew about the dangers of luring the witch cult. So, why did you do so much to help us with our retribution? You even lost two close friends. Why did you figure that it’d be worth it to do everything you can for Rem and me? Why…”

Roswaal: “—It’s all…for my goal. It’s for the goal that I have been and always will be living for.”

He opens his closed eye, and shoots right through Ram, who pressed him for an answer, with his heterochromatic eyes. The power of the emotion in his voice overwhelms Ram.

The power, deepness, and the amount of his passion overwhelms her—and at the same time, she felt jealous.

Her heart burns with the desire to find out what the man before her eyes saw, what he was thinking, and what was his wish.

Roswaal: “If it’s for that, I’ll sacrifice close friends. If it’s for that, I will use any likeable person. If it’s for that, I’d be glad to involve myself in any kind of cruelty and heresy.”

Sacrifice, use, cruelty, heresy—Ram understood his intentions without turning away as he made his declaration.

Roswaal was saying that Ram and Rem were necessary for his goal. And so, if necessary, he’d cruelly use them as sacrifices and for convenience in the process.

Ram: “…”

Silence falls heavily in between the two of them.

It was perhaps the first time Roswaal said his true thoughts out loud. However, revealing them in this situation could also be part of his scheme to use Ram.

Roswaal: “…”

Roswaal is a man who continued to lie. He hides his true thoughts and true character under clown makeup and tries to hide everything by being silly and behaving eccentrically.

So, Ram could only do one thing about him.

Ram: “…”

Ram’s breathing and the bold sound of water afterwards were what broke the silence. The sound of water was actually the glass of alcohol; when Ram grabbed it from the top of the desk, she poured it on Roswaal’s face.

Roswaal takes the reckless action without hesitation, showing no intentions of avoiding it, and he shakes his head.

Roswaal: “—Is this your way of bidding farewell?”

She poured alcohol on him while they were having a conversation.

It was natural for him to not come up with any other explanation.

Still, Ram shook her head when he said that.

Ram: “No. —I just wanted to hear your true thoughts without your make-up on.”

Ram steps on Roswaal’s lap for a moment, and she wipes his face wet with alcohol by using a handkerchief. Then, the white clown make-up comes off, and his true face appeared.

Ram was face to face with him, and as she squinted, she said,

Ram: “With your face like that, without any make-up, say what you said before.”

Roswaal: “…”

Ram: “Don’t hide anything. Nothing. And say it. Say it. —Say it now.”

Ram holds onto Roswaal’s face with her hands, and she didn’t look away. Although, Roswaal wasn’t even fighting back. He closes his eyes, opens them, and says,

Roswaal: “I…I will use you guys for my goal. I need you guys for it. I won’t stop, no matter what type of sacrifices I have to make along the way. Even if I feel sad about Dudley and Grace, I won’t regret. —Even if I have to sacrifice you guys in the future.”

He looks at her in the eye, and says it all. His true thoughts collide with his true face and true feelings, and Ram’s heart leaped.

Right now, she was being reflected in this person’s eyes. She saw herself that was delighted, so delighted by this.

Thus—

Ram: “—Fine. I will do anything to help you with your goal.”

Roswaal: “…I did feel like there was a 9/10 chance of breakdown, though.”

Ram: “I’m not someone who can be easily predicted. Besides, we have a contract.”

Being close enough to feel Roswaal’s breath, Ram continues while their faces touched.

Ram: “The Onis’ retribution and revenge on the four enemies—I put my pride and soul on the line and swore to do everything I can for you so that all that could be accomplished.”

Roswaal: “It was a verbal promise.”

Ram: “Didn’t you just make it a verbal promise because you knew I wouldn’t break it?”

Roswaal was silent when Ram asked, and that was his answer.

And, these were her thoughts now, “Even if there wasn’t a verbal promise, I will”—

Ram: “—After tonight, from now on, I will still swear my loyalty to Roswaal-sama. You followed the contract, and proved that there’s Oni pride flowing throughout our kinds souls and my body.”

Roswaal: “…”

Ram: “I will give everything I have for you. I will devote myself to you. I’m yours.”

Ram takes an oath, made an agreement that said she’d even offer her soul, and gently brings her lips near Roswaal’s. Like that, their lips overlap sweetly—

Roswaal: “—Why are you taking advantage ooooof all the confusion? You’re 10 years too early for this.”

Ram: “Doh”

However, the hand he put in between their faces interrupted it.

Having her kiss denied, Ram frowns unhappily. That makes Roswaal smile wryly as he said, Roswaal: “I will accept your loyalty gratefully. But your affection is a different matter. As for that…let’s just say you’re 400 years too eeeaaarly.”

Ram: “…That’s a pretty long wait. Okay. I’ll back off for now.”

It sounded like a joke. However, Ram felt like there was a very large wall that he’d never take down. It was probably something meaningful to Roswaal, and it wouldn’t budge.

That’s why she’d back off. Forcing it would be pointless. Plus, she still had time.

Ram: “Just please don’t forget, Roswaal-sama.”

Roswaal: “About what?”

Ram: “Those who rely on swords fall to swords. Those who rely on witches fall to witches. Those who devote themselves to fire fall to fire.”

They were words woven together almost like a song, and it was the curse casted at the end of retribution.

However, this time, in a completely different situation, Ram put the curse on a man.

Ram: “And so, those who ask of Onis will fall to Onis, and shall be destroyed by what they relied on.”

Roswaal: “…So, you’re going to destroy me?”

Ram: “Yes, that’s right.”

Hearing Roswaal say those words with one eye closed, Ram got off his lap and nodded. And then, she steps back lightly, pinches her skirt, and while showing a perfect curtsy she said,

Ram: “Your desires, your wishes, your feelings—I will destroy all of it. While helping you out with that which means everything to you, I will take you away.”

Roswaal: "…"

Ram: "Please look forward to it."

Ram says that, and she winks in a charming, inappropriate way for her age.

After Roswaal made a dumbfounded look for a moment at that behavior, he laughed, unable to hold it in any longer.

He laughed, laughed, and laughed. Then, after that, he nodded.

Roswaal: "Very well. —Then let's see whether or not your loyalty and affection will be related to my destruction."

Then, Roswaal smiled with delight from the bottom of his heart with his face clean of clown makeup.

3

It was about one whole year after that fiery night when they came to their home.

Rem: "There's nothing left anymore."

Ram: "That's just how it is. Everything burned, and nobody lives here anymore. …Everyone's remains being buried by Roswaal is its saving grace."

Rem and Ram look around the place that once was a plaza, and they share their thoughts.

Not even the ruins of the houses that were burned and destroyed were left. The soil became a burnt field, and there were weeds starting to slightly grow. The fields were completely desolate, and the mountain road was impossible to recognize now. One could no longer tell that there was a village here before, ruled by verdant mountains. Perhaps it was too late and cruel to feel sad about it.

Rem: "Where was the cenotaph?"

Ram: "According to Roswaal-sama, it's where you can get a view of the whole village. So it's probably where the chief's residence was."

Rem and Ram were the only ones here. Roswaal declined coming with them this far, and he was waiting for them to return inside the dragon carriage stopped on the verdant mountains. He was spoiling them with kindness, but they couldn't make him wait for too long. They had to be quick and walk fast, even if they had to push themselves.

Ram quickly goes up the hill, appearing to be in agreement with Rem. However, it looked like Ram, a good walker, was getting tired from the journey. So,

Rem: "Nee-sama, let's hold hands."

Ram: "Well, since you want to, I guess it can't be helped."

Rem: "Yes, I want to. It's been such a long time since I've walked through the village with Nee-sama."

They go towards the cenotaph that should be on the hill while holding hands as they walked side by side.

A year ago when they were at the village, Rem would always walk behind Ram. "Things have changed quite a bit in just one year considering how it had been rare to even walk side by side", is what she thinks.

Her 7 year old consciousness that couldn't change at the village and the way she lived changed so much in this past year, and here she was.

Rem: "…"

She felt a little sad about not being able to show how she was now to her mother, father, and her kind at the village.

That being said, if the tragedy at the village never happened, Rem would surely still just be hiding behind Ram and cowering. That's why it was complicated.

She couldn't show anyone at the village how she'd changed. How she was now living the desired life she could be proud of.

Ram: “—Rem, that must be it. It stands out, like Roswaal-sama.”

Rem: “…Ah”

Rem’s thoughts were suddenly interrupted, and she looks at the strange stone monument in the direction Ram pointed at. Built at a place so high where the chief’s residence once stood was a white cenotaph.

—It was a very large mass of crystal stone, and it was bigger than both Rem and Ram combined.

Ram: “Mana exists in the crystal stone. There might be souls that attract mana so that spirits and lesser spirits can materialize by using it. …It’s an idea you’d expect of Roswaal-sama.”

Standing in front of the cenotaph, Ram admires Roswaal’s arrangement. Rem also quietly admired Roswaal at this place ignored by the world.

She couldn’t thank Roswaal enough for achieving retribution and giving her a way to live. Could she even return the favor by doing her very best as a maid?

Ram: “Rem, let’s let them know. —Hand me the alcohol.”

Rem: “Yes, Nee-sama.”

While still feeling deep emotions lingering inside, Rem took out a sake bottle from the hand luggage as instructed by Ram. They combined their pay and chose the most valuable alcohol to Roswaal.

Ram takes it, removes the cork without hesitation, and pours alcohol on the cenotaph as an offering.

—Oni funerals were kind of inappropriate, but no adults were there to criticize them.

That’s why they brought what was the most important gift for a funeral, used to put souls to rest.

Ram: “Retribution has been achieved. The regret of that night, the anger of that night, and the grief of that night—our kind’s sorrow has been taken care of by Rem and me.”

One in a basement, one at the capital, one with flames, and the last one with the help of their master.

Not a single one remained, and retribution was achieved. Now, their kind’s souls wouldn’t wander.

Ram: “Unfortunately, the reincarnation of an Oni God and the return of the Onis were reduced to ashes. But, the pride and blood will stay alive. —Farewell, everyone.”

Ram pours just half of the alcohol onto the cenotaph as she bid her farewell and put them to rest.

And then, Ram gave the remaining alcohol to Rem, and she leaned against the stone monument. Her sister moving away in silence was her being thoughtful. It was her being considerate of the fact that Rem alone would be the next to repose their souls and take an oath.

So, Rem quietly tilted the sake bottle she accepted, and she poured it on the stone monument.

Rem: “…”

Ram spoke the words to put their souls to rest. Thus, Rem had to tell them about her determination and bid them farewell.

The unbroken promise Rem she’d make to the sleeping souls of her kind, her father, and her mother.

That was—

Rem: “Mother, father, everyone, please don’t worry. Nee-sama…is fine.”

With her best smile, Rem mentions the thing her kind were probably worried about the most.

They were people who always pinned their hopes on Ram, believed in Ram, and worried about Ram. So, there was only one thing for Rem to give and promise them.

Rem: "—Nee-sama…I will do everything Nee-sama should have done."

Rem proudly promised her kind's souls that this truly was the meaning of her life.

It was a smile like a blooming flower. It was the sweet, lovely smile that only Ram had seen at the village, and she never showed it to her kind when they were alive.

Ram: "Are you finished?"

Rem: "Yes. Nee-sama, thank you very much."

Rem, who packed up and left the cenotaph, meets with Ram. Once Rem nodded at that question without any hesitation, she took her sister's free hand and started walking.

They were headed down the hill, out of their town, out of the mountain road, to the imperial carriage where their master was waiting.

Rem: "I want to see Frederica-sama and Clind-sama as soon as possible since they'll be at the Miload residence today."

Ram: "…I get depressed when I think about seeing those two. Frederica would probably ask me a lot of questions because of Garf."

Rem: "Nee-sama and Garf are good friends, after all. But please don't leave me all alone."

Ram: "I won't. Because Rem is the cutest, most precious little sister in the whole world."

As they held hands, she feels her sister's deep affection coming across her palm, and not one of those words was a lie.

While feeling that unexpected love, Rem applauded her sincerely.

—The substitute of such an adored sister. The substitute of such a wonderful sister.

—For that, to be that, so that she was allowed to be that, she’d live diligently from now on.

Without even her inseparable sister being aware of that oath, Rem just smiled sweetly and said,

Rem: “Yes. Nee-sama is the best sister in the whole world for me, too.”

END

Camp Formation Stories

Chapter 1:
The Valkyrie, Blue, The Sword Demon, and—
(LQ AI Translation)

1

—Felix Argyle’s earliest memory lay within a darkness painted over by nothingness.

Felix: “…”

That darkness was not a figurative expression. It was, quite simply, a statement of fact.

Shut off from the outside world, in a cold, dark room into which no change ever came—spending years there, doing nothing, being made to do nothing; if that was not to be called “nothingness,” then what was?

Lying on a bed soaked through with his own body odor, his ears were shredded by the ringing of a world without sound. That was young Felix’s everyday life, and it was the entirety of his world.

Felix: “…”

How, since when, for what purpose—Felix remembered none of it. He had spent such a long, long stretch of time there that his proper capacity for thought had already been lost.

Someone, something, connections, relationships—he felt as though there had been them, as though there had not.

Even supposing that there had been, resignation turned into compromise, compromise gave birth to apathy, and thought died. There was nothing. There was nothing at all. That was “nothingness.” That was “darkness.”

Felix: “…”

Sprawled on his bed, he was a pitiful prisoner who could do nothing but wait for time to pass.

The only times the boy moved of his own accord were when he rolled over to ease the pain of bedsores, when he relieved himself in the corner of the room, and when he crawled to partake of his meals three times a day.

The meals were pushed in on a metal tray from beneath the tightly shut door of the room. Relying on the faint light that came in only at those times, he crawled across the floor and shoved his nose into the dishes. No utensils for eating were provided. That was likely to prevent self-harm or suicide. Instead, Felix was forced to eat with his hands or like a dog.

If he devoured the food in a beastlike way, dirtying his face in his wretchedness, he would push the dishes back and the meal was over. Just like that, he would shuffle back to the bed and the time spent glaring up at the unseen ceiling would begin again.

—There was no meaning to living. However, because there was no reason he ought to die, he did not die either.

He had been deprived even of the ability to mourn his meaningless life, and continued living on in inertia.

Like this, until he naturally decayed away, he would be a prisoner for eternity, his soul bound to its jail.

That was what Felix Argyle's life was.

His circumstances did not change, it did not end, and he did not even wish for there to be change.

He continued to soak in nothingness and darkness until he could no longer tell morning from night, days from months, or months from years.

Felix Argyle's—

Felix: "…"

That strange sensation suddenly toyed with Felix, whether it was dream or reality.

The boundary between sleep and waking was blurred, and his consciousness was wandering along some vague border. Even so, his ears, sensitive to changes in the air, trembled, demanding diligence from his body in spite of his spirit's apathy. He felt the air ripple.

His mind could not muster the slightest interest in the cause. Only—

Felix: "…"

On a whim, he opened his mouth and tried to let out a voice.

He did not know whether any sound actually came out. Perhaps his ears were dead, or his throat was dead. Or perhaps, without him noticing, he himself had already died.

Felix: "…"

Immediately after that foolish thought, which was not even enough to raise a self-mocking smile, the air rippled once more.

It had not been his imagination. And Felix was not the cause. Perhaps insects had begun to swarm in the room. With his own unclean self, the leftovers of the meals he had scattered while eating, and the uncleaned excrement in the corner of the room, it was the perfect environment for insects to breed and flit about.

Even if he felt nothing, sharing a room with insects did not sit well with him. Would it be an affront to the insects, for someone beneath them to feel that way about them—

Felix: "…"

Again, he heard something.

He felt as though he heard it. As though something were disturbing the air of the room, the darkness, the "nothingness."

It came from beyond the door, that absolute barrier for Felix—

???: “I shall break the door. You will not mind, will you?”

Felix: “…”

???: “I shall take your lack of response as assent.”

No sooner had the unfamiliar voice struck his eardrums than, with a violent crash, the door was kicked in. The impact blew the hinges apart, and the dishes that had been placed beside the door went flying. At the sudden noise and violence, Felix’s eyes flew wide.

—Brilliant light cut through the nothingness and darkness, and the absolute barrier lay ridiculously collapsed upon the floor.

Felix: “…”

In the light streaming in through the broken entrance, even the dust drifting in the room danced in a fantastical way. As he narrowed his eyes against the brightness, a small silhouette standing against the backlight slowly slipped into his field of vision.

???: “Is Felix Argyle, eldest son of the Argyle family, here?”

In the voice that rang out, he sensed a certain taut severity of emotion.

For, listening closely, that voice belonged to a young child. They were deliberately adorning their naturally high, age-appropriate voice with dignity, forcing into its tone a strength befitting someone who would command the scene.

However, it was not something strained and affected.

There was nothing forced about that voice. The heart of the one who owned it had simply grown faster than their body.

Felix: “…”

Wordless, Felix stared at the other from atop the bed. The figure who had been peering into the gloom finally noticed Felix once their eyes had adjusted to the darkness.

Then, a small smile rose to their lips, and they walked towards him.

???: “I have found you. —Now is the time for you to be freed from this unjust time.”

Saying so, they took Felix’s filthy hand in theirs without the slightest hesitation.

2

Crusch: “—Ferris, can you hear me?”

Ferris: “Nyah?!”

Pulled back to reality by that pleasant voice, the consciousness that had been on the verge of a nap returned to wakefulness.

Realizing he had fallen asleep at some point, Ferris hurriedly lifted his face, and at once noticed the beautiful visage peering at him from directly in front, making him flush before he could stop himself.

Ferris: “Ah, u-uh, Crusch-sama… did you see my sleeping face?”

Crusch: “It was only a matter of a few seconds. Besides, it was an adorable sleeping face. There is no need to be bashful.”

Ferris: “Uu— even so, it’s embarrassing, since I let my guard down∼.”

Smiling at Ferris, who was jutting out his lips in a sulky face, was the woman who was his liege for life—Crusch Karsten.

She had glossy green hair and a dignified bearing like a sharpened sword. Her long, narrow amber eyes were beautiful, and she was a woman whose looks embodied the nobility of her soul.

Every time he saw her he fell for her all over again, and no matter how long he looked, he could do nothing but gaze at her in admiration.

Crusch: “Even so, Ferris dozing off is unusual.”

As Ferris gazed raptly at his master's figure, Crusch folded her arms and knit her brows at him. However, her attitude was not so much one of reproaching him for napping as it was weighted more toward concern.

In fact, Crusch looked down at Ferris, who was sitting in a chair, and lowered the tone of her voice.

Crusch: "After all, you have been working too much recently. I know, of course, that it is for my sake."

Ferris: "Th-There's no way Ferri-chan's overworking, meow! Ferri-chan's full of pep and…"

Crusch: "Even though you carelessly nodded off in the waiting room while I was attending the council?"

Ferris: "Ugh…"

At Crusch's one-eyed pursuit, Ferris felt keenly how unconvincing he sounded and let his shoulders droop. The two of them were having this exchange in a waiting room inside the Royal Castle of Lugunica.

In conjunction with the convening of the Upper Council, each attendee had been given one room. Crusch, who had few attendants to accompany her, had left Ferris, her first knight, in the waiting room and gone to attend the council.

Ferris had been napping during that time while Crusch was absent. Naturally, the Ferris of usual would never have considered dozing off, but—

Crusch: "These days, you have many duties as the 'Blue' magic user. And that too is for the Royal Selection, is it not."

Ferris: "That's not it! …Well, Ferri-chan can't exactly deny it. Ferri-chan's decided that everything, everything he does is all for Crusch-sama's sake, after all."

Told the plain truth and resigning himself, Ferris touched the white ribbon that adorned his flaxen hair.

—The Royal Selection; that was the ritual in which contenders vied for the vacant throne of the Kingdom of Lugunica and the next king was chosen. Crusch was one of the five Royal Candidates participating in that Royal Selection, and she herself strongly desired to ascend the throne. Therefore, Ferris had resolved in his heart to help her with all his might.

Even the way he, Felix Argyle the “Blue,” the foremost healing magic user in the kingdom, had continually built up favors with powerful people involved in national politics, was all from a single-minded desire to be of help in that.

However—

Crusch: “If you ruin your health over it, that defeats the whole purpose. You understand, do you not?”

Ferris: “…Yeees. Ferri-chan’ll work hard in moderation, ‘kay.”

If he overdid things and ended up making Crusch worry, that would be putting the cart before the horse.

He wanted Crusch to be free of all cares and able to focus on the Royal Selection. As Ferris drooped in dejection at his own inadequacy like that—

Crusch: “I am relying on you, Ferris. —I will be together with you. His Highness desires that as well.”

Ferris: “Ah…”

Touching his drooping cat ears, Crusch gently stroked his cheek and nape. From the ticklish feeling of her fingertips and the ring of resolve in her words, Ferris let out a heated breath.

His Highness—that was the greatest reason why Crusch and Ferris were facing the Royal Selection.

The smiling face of that youth, unfaded in their minds—just thinking of it made his willpower well up without limit.

Ferris: “Mufuu— leave it to me, Crusch-sama. Ferri-chan will keep staying right by your side from here on out!”

Crusch: “That is good. That is just how my Ferris should be.”

As Ferris pricked up his cat ears and puffed out his thin chest, Crusch too gave a satisfied nod. The two of them laughed together as they were, and then Ferris tilted his head slightly.

Ferris: “So, um, how did the talks go? Today’s summons was kind of sudden, and… it has to do with the Royal Selection, right?”

Crusch: “Ah. This is still a confidential matter, but another candidate besides me has been found. It makes her the second of the five priestesses inscribed on the Dragon History Stone.”

Ferris: “…! So that means she’s a rival to Crusch-sama, right.”

At this surprisingly important information, Ferris narrowed his yellow eyes to slits.

What was required to participate in the Royal Selection was a qualification different from lineage or blood. It was the aptitude as a dragon priestess capable of maintaining the covenant with the dragon, the thing held in highest regard in the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica—a role that the royal family had originally borne.

It had been half a month since the entire royal family had died of illness—and during that time, the only one recognized as bearing the priestess’s qualification had been Crusch. There had even been expectations that perhaps, just like that, the throne would be hers.

Ferris: “So it’s just as the Dragon History Stone’s prophecy said, huh. It wasn’t going to be that easy. …So, do you know what kind of person this second candidate is?”

Crusch: “According to the report, it is said to be the wife of Baron Leip Barielle. However, Lord Barielle also served as the one responsible for managing the Dragon History Stone. For his wife to be a candidate is a little suspicious.”

Ferris: “Even with Crusch-sama’s eyes on him, you could not find any slip-ups?”

Crusch: “My Divine Protection of Wind Reading is not all-powerful. Particularly when it comes to opponents adept at hiding their true feelings.”

Shaking her head to say there was no conclusive proof for their suspicion, Crusch’s voice still carried a strong wariness. It was evidence that this man called Leip was not someone straightforward. Ferris also carved that into his mind.

Naturally, their real political opponent ought to be Leip’s consort, the one with the priestess’s qualification, but it was the husband’s role to support his wife. In practice, the troublesome enemy would no doubt be that man.

Ferris: “Leip Barielle… it’s not a name Ferri-chan remembers hearing, but Ferri-chan’ll look into it as much as he can, okay.”

Crusch: “Do not overdo it. Before long, there will surely be a chance for the candidates to meet face to face. I myself have no experience of exchanging words directly with Lord Barielle, but his character should be discerned at that time.”

Ferris: “Okaaay, understood. …In that case, what about today?”

Crusch: “If there is nothing else, I would like to return to the estate once. There is much I must also discuss with Father.”

Crusch had inherited the ducal house at a young age, but the previous head, Meckart Karsten, was still alive. Meckart, Crusch’s birth father, now enjoyed a retired life at the main house in Karsten territory. —Though saying “enjoyed” like that hardly meant he could be free from politics; such were the ties that bound nobles.

At any rate, Ferris had no objections to Crusch’s plan to return to the estate. Lining up beside her as he left the waiting room, he hummed a tune under his breath as he accompanied her out of the castle.

Ferris: “…”

On the way, while receiving salutes from the guards they passed, Ferris’s ears twitched at the state of things within the castle.

Right now, in the Royal Castle of Lugunica, many indispensable personnel for the kingdom were coming and going, such as upper-class nobles including Crusch and the leading figures of the Council of Wise Men, who effectively ran national politics. Accordingly, the patrolling guards' morale was high, and their training level was surely at an unprecedented standard.

However, even so, the sense of wrongness that something which ought to be in the royal castle was missing could not be dispelled.

—There was no figure of the royal family, who ought to occupy the main seat, within the castle.

That was the most obvious sense of wrongness expressing the kingdom's current state, an absence that ought never to have been.

Ferris in particular was not only a Royal Guard knight, but also the foremost healing magic user in the kingdom. He had many chances to go up to the castle, and that might be why he felt that loneliness all the more keenly.

Ferris: "…"

With his chest aching from sentimentality, Ferris wanted to leave this place as soon as possible. So he deliberately made his humming all the more carefree, walking beside Crusch while hiding his true feelings.

Whether she knew Ferris's inner state or not, Crusch said nothing. She simply went on walking, her dignified profile facing straight ahead, just the way he liked her to be.

It was as the two of them headed for the castle's main gate and came onto a covered passageway.

Man: "—Then that is not what we agreed upon, Bordeaux!"

At the sudden angry shout, Ferris involuntarily held his breath. Beside him, Crusch likewise came to a halt, turning her head to seek the direction the voice had come from.

The source was immediately clear. The shout had come from directly below the passageway—from the inner courtyard garden of the castle, which could be overlooked if one leaned out over the railing. The garden boasted a flowerbed where seasonal flowers bloomed and was known as one of the few places of rest within the royal castle.

However, that angry exchange was rudely shattering the garden's atmosphere.

Below their eyes, in the garden, two figures were exchanging words, both tall men. One had his back turned towards Ferris and the others, but the face of the person facing that back was clearly visible.

A large elderly man with a bald head and a stern face—Bordeaux Zergev. To Ferris he was an acquaintance, and he was one of the kingdom's bigwigs as a member of the Council of Wise Men.

The Council of Wise Men upheld the kingdom in the absence of a king, and Bordeaux was known among them as a central figure who drove discussions forward with fierce opinions and a strong arm. If Sir Miklotov McMahon, the representative of the Council, was the leading moderate, then Bordeaux was the leading hardliner.

For Ferris, however, Bordeaux was someone he had contact with outside of the Council as well. He knew the man's character as more than rumors. That was precisely why he was surprised now.

Because in Bordeaux's face as he argued with someone, he could glimpse a weakness uncharacteristic of him.

Ferris: "…Bordeaux-sama, that's a pretty unlike-you look on your face, y'know."

Crusch: "It is also unlike Lord Bordeaux to be arguing in such a conspicuous place."

Voicing a similar impression to Ferris, Crusch folded her arms, wondering what to do.

If this were a mere quarrel, there was no need for outsiders to step in and stir things up. However, even if the argument itself were trivial, the timing and place right now were bad.

There was no way Bordeaux was so oblivious he would not realize at least that much, but—

Crusch: "…"

Ferris: "Crusch-sama?"

Suddenly sensing Crusch catch her breath, Ferris felt puzzled.

Her gaze was fixed on the person standing before Bordeaux, on that back, as if to say she could not take her eyes off him.

—It was a person draped in filthy rags.

The "rags" were in fact a dark navy mantle, wrinkled, frayed, and noticeably dirty. The figure wearing those rags had white hair, and even in his shouted voice there was a rasp that suggested age. However, from his upright spine and sturdy shoulders, visible even from behind, there was not the slightest impression of frailty.

At the same time, he noticed the abnormal level of sword aura surrounding that elderly man.

Ferris: "Wh…"

As a warrior, Ferris's talent was lamentably poor. He had no strength for swinging a sword, and even if he honed his technique he could not reach even the second rate. He had consoled himself countless times that healing magic was his true path.

Yet even Ferris, who was third-rate or worse as a warrior, could tell how overwhelming that sword prowess was—and it was a presence that made it no wonder even Crusch, a first-rate swordswoman herself, would be involuntarily captivated.

—Just who in the world was that man?

Bordeaux: "I do pity you. But the timing now is bad. Far too bad. I sincerely apologize for going back on my word, but this much, at least, I must ask you to understand."

Man: “Understand…? You tell me to understand? This—this tyranny?”

While the two of them above were steeped in doubt, Bordeaux and the man resumed their conversation. However, the words Bordeaux spoke only aroused the man’s resentment, the gap between them only widening further.

Man: “How could I possibly accept that with such words! Why have you had this sudden change of heart? I should have exhausted words so many times over these fourteen years…!”

Bordeaux: “…You are not at fault. It is a matter of timing, and timing alone. I am not telling you to give up. I merely want you to stand down this time. I cannot say any more with my own mouth right now. Forgive me.”

Man: “Ridiculous…!”

To the man who continued to press him, Bordeaux’s words were hollow and halting.

The reason Bordeaux’s tongue was so heavy was probably his position as a member of the Council of Wise Men. With the kingdom in a crisis of life or death, he could not be allowed any careless remarks.

However, that great responsibility was the reason some kind of promise between Bordeaux and the man was about to be broken. —That much, even outsiders like Ferris and Crusch could tell.

Man: “I have heard as well about the deterioration of relations with the Vollachian Empire. If that is what is making you hesitate to send troops, then even just dispatching an emissary to that country…”

Bordeaux: “No, that is not it. It is true I do not wish to provoke the Empire, but that is not the only reason. I will make another opportunity. For today, back down with that.”

Man: “That will be too late! I should have already told you. By next month, there will be a conclusion. That ought to give us solid proof!

At least, look at this and consider it—”

Clinging desperately to Bordeaux, who stubbornly refused, the man pulled a bundle of papers from his breast and thrust it towards the Bordeaux who was trying to end the discussion.

The thick stack of papers was faded and stained with finger marks —and in the fingers gripping those sheets, you could glimpse a fragment of the man’s feelings.

It was clear at a glance that for him, it was the slender thread he was clinging to with his life.

However—

Bordeaux: “—Enough!”

Bordeaux struck away the bundle of papers thrust up before his chest with a rough sweep of his arm.

Perhaps that reaction had been unexpected for the man, or perhaps Bordeaux himself had unconsciously put more strength into it than he meant to; most likely, it was the result of both.

The swept-away bundle left the man’s fingers, and the documents scattered across the garden.

The wind blowing through the castle was not strong, but even so, the sheets rose into the air and scattered into the flowerbed like white petals.

For an instant, Ferris saw regret flit through Bordeaux’s eyes.

The reaction even more dramatic than that swelled explosively through the garden just after.

Man: “—Bordeaux!”

Bordeaux: “Ghh…”

The man, shouting sharply, had seized Bordeaux by the chest and pinned him against the wall.

Bordeaux groaned as his back struck the wall, his feet slightly off the ground. To lift that massive frame even while pushing him against the wall, the strength in the man's arms was no ordinary thing.

Ferris: "Ah! Crusch-sama?!"

Overwhelmed by that sword aura, Ferris's reaction was delayed, but beside him Crusch moved decisively. Without hesitation, she vaulted over the railing and dropped straight down into the garden below.

The height from the passageway to the garden was about five meters. For Crusch, it was a height of no consequence, but—

Ferris: "Ferri-chan's still gonna worry anyway…!"

He hurriedly leaned over, and breathed a sigh of relief at the sight of Crusch landing in the garden.

At once, Crusch drew the treasured sword at her waist and leveled its point at the back of the man pinning Bordeaux to the wall.

Crusch: "This disorderly conduct in the royal castle ends here. I advise you to surrender without resisting."

Crusch declared bravely, but she could not entirely hide the tension at the man's dense sword aura. Sensing his mistress's sense of crisis, Ferris set off at a run to hurry to the garden.

Ferris: "Geez, geez, geez, Crusch-sama's always doing such reckless stuff… You two over there! Come with me!"

Guard: "Huh? Sir Ferris, what in the—"

Ferris: "Just do it! Crusch-sama and Bordeaux-sama are in danger!"

On the way, Ferris unceremoniously dragged along some patrolling guards, then flung open the great doors leading to the garden. Welcomed by the smell of flowers, he saw the continuation of the scene from before playing out right before his eyes. Crusch, still pointing her sword at the unmoving man's back, spoke.

Crusch: “It is an assault upon a member of the Council of Wise Men within the castle. I cannot overlook it. —I also have personal attachment to this place. Therefore, my sword shall show no mercy.”

Ferris: “Crusch-sama…”

Struck in the chest by the feelings Crusch put into her words, Ferris stopped in his tracks. He knew all too painfully whose memories Crusch was painting in her mind now.

Apart from the wounds of that master and servant, the guards Ferris had called, realizing the situation, pointed their weapons at the man just like Crusch and encircled him.

It seemed that at any moment sparks might fly and the situation might develop into a swordfight, but—

Man: “—My apologies.”

Offering an apology, the man suddenly released Bordeaux. Bordeaux collapsed, his back still against the wall, clutching his throat and coughing painfully.

Looking down at him, the man let the strength leave his shoulders and turned around. At that movement, the guards openly took up cautious stances, and Ferris too carefully observed the man’s face head-on for the first time.

He was an elderly man with strongly chiseled features and a somewhat unkempt beard. Together with his ragged outer garment, he lacked any sense of cleanliness, but his vivid blue eyes glittered with undiminished intimidation.

However, before Ferris and the others, who were on guard, the man spread his arms as if to show he would not resist.

Man: “I have nothing on me. I have no intention of resisting. I will quietly comply.”

Guards: “…”

The guards were bewildered by those words, but when Crusch sheathed her sword with a sound, they immediately moved to secure the man's sides and restrain him.

According to custom, the man would be taken as he was to the guards' station and interrogated there. However—

Bordeaux: "…Wai—t. There is no need to make a fuss. Release him."

Bordeaux, down on one knee, voiced his objection to the man's restraint. However, the one who shook his head at those words was none other than the man himself.

Man: "Lord Bordeaux. I have no right to say this, but that will not set a proper example. Are you commanding the soldiers charged with protecting the royal castle to overlook a suspicious person?"

Bordeaux: "…Then confine him in the Prison Tower for one night. There is no need to question him. You may release him tomorrow morning."

Chastised by the man himself, Bordeaux amended his instructions with a bitter expression. In response, the guards started walking with the man toward the exit of the garden.

It was at the very moment the man being led away and Crusch passed by each other.

Man: "My thanks."

Those words, spoken in a single breath, did not reach anyone but Crusch and Ferris, whose hearing was keen. Without having time to confirm the true meaning behind that gratitude, the man was led out of the garden. Seeing him off, Ferris finally let the tension leave him in a sigh.

Ferris: "Crusch-samaaa, please don't make Ferri-chan worry so meow-ch. It shaved years off Ferri-chan's life, y'know."

Crusch: "My apologies. Your quick thinking saved us. As expected of Ferris."

Ferris: “G-Geez, r-really… Y-You can’t think Ferri-chan’s gonna let you get away with it just by saying stuff like that, ‘kay!”

Blushing, Ferris let himself be mollified by Crusch’s words. Then he turned toward Bordeaux, one of the parties involved.

Ferris: “By the way, Bordeaux-sama, you… whoops.”

When he looked back, he saw Bordeaux had stepped into the flowerbed and was picking up the scattered sheets one by one, not minding the dirt on his thighs and clothes and taking care not to tread on the flowers.

Crusch: “I shall help.”

Ferris: “Okaaay.”

At Crusch’s brief words, Ferris joined in without objection. The three of them gathered up the scattered documents, and once Bordeaux bound them together at the end, the collection was finished. Taking the last sheet and bundling the stack, Bordeaux let out a deep, heavy sigh.

Bordeaux: “My thanks, Lady Karsten. I have shown you both an unseemly side of myself.”

Crusch: “It is rare to see such meekness from Lord Bordeaux. That alone made it worth being here. So then, would you mind if I asked about the details of the matter?”

Bordeaux: “…”

In response to Crusch’s question, Bordeaux, the bundle of papers tucked under his arm, remained silent. However, there was a strong tone of refusal in that silence, and Crusch quietly backed off with a “Very well.”

If he did not wish to be asked, she would not press him. That was Crusch’s decision.

However—

Ferris: “—Well then, Ferri-chan will escort Bordeaux-sama back to his room, ‘kay. It’d be real trouble if you’d gotten hurt somewhere just now.”

Bordeaux: “No, I am quite…”

Ferris: “Now, now, don’t say that. Look, if anything were to happen to Bordeaux-sama, it’d end up meaning the responsibility lies with that person from before, wouldn’t it, hmm?”

At Ferris sidling up to him in such a transparently blatant way, Bordeaux gave up on any further protests. Catching the old man’s attitude, Ferris glanced over, and Crusch gave a deep nod of “Well done.”

—That there was one sheet of paper “accidentally” left undelivered tucked away in Crusch’s breast. Ferris, who had known her for many years, had seen through that with loyal affection.

3

Ferris: “It isn’t bad enough to leave a bruise, but I’ll go ahead and heal the blow to your back, ’kay. It might feel a little warm and itchy, meow, so ple-ease bear with it.”

Touching the scrawny old man’s back, Ferris cast healing magic on the injury just as he had diagnosed.

It was not a wound serious enough to warrant special caution. In the hands of Ferris, the finest healing magic user in the kingdom, treatment of this level was a matter of only a dozen or so seconds. In fact, the healing was finished almost at once, and Bordeaux, whose shoulder he tapped to signal it was over, let out a heavy breath.

Bordeaux: “I believe I told you. There is no need to trouble the ‘Blue’ over something of this degree.”

Ferris: “Maybe so, but it’s fine, meow, isn’t it. These last few months have been all hectic, and Bordeaux-sama’s regular checkups have been all spaced out, after all. I’m just doing it on the side, juuust on the side.”

As Bordeaux put his coat back on, Ferris, lips jutting out, looked around the room.

After leaving the garden, the two had moved to Bordeaux's office inside the castle. It was a luxurious room prepared for a member of the Council of Wise Men, but contrary to the room's stately air, one could feel no particular care given to its furnishings.

It could be said it was a very Bordeaux-like room, belonging to someone uninterested in noble authority and pretension.

Bordeaux: "Even if you stare at it all you like, there is nothing particularly new to see."

Ferris: "Oh, not at all. I was just thinking how it's such a totally dull, barren room every time I look at it."

Bordeaux: "You are a mage who never lets his tongue rest. …You really do resemble Master Fabless."

Ferris: "That is a super insulting assessment, y'know."

At Bordeaux's sour-faced counter, Ferris also jutted out his lips, making plain how dishonorable he found it.

Bordeaux had named the person who had first taught Ferris healing magic. His skill warranted respect, but as for his character there had been a few issues. Since he had been Ferris's master, there were many things Ferris had inherited from him—his connection with Bordeaux being one of them.

Ferris: "I know you're busy, but you've gotta keep up with your regular checkups, okay. If anything happened to Bordeaux-sama, the whole country would be thrown into chaos, 'cause, meow."

Some of the leading figures in the Council of Wise Men had entrusted Ferris with something like the role of their personal physician. Bordeaux was one of them, and they had an agreement that he would undergo a checkup at least once a month.

However, for these last few months—ever since the royal family's illness had come to light—even that had tended to fall by the wayside.

Ferris: “You only just had a serious illness last year, meow. You’ve gotten all skinny and everything, so you really gotta take better care of your body…”

Bordeaux: “No matter how much I spare thought for my own body, if I cannot deal with the issues eating away at the kingdom, it is meaningless. And even so, there were illnesses that could not be healed, were there not.”

Ferris: “…”

In response to Ferris’s concern as a magic user, Bordeaux turned his face away and replied in an irritated tone. At the end of that statement, in the intent contained there, Ferris caught his breath.

It was the illness that had claimed the lives of the king’s bloodline—an unknown affliction beyond even Ferris’s power to heal.

Ferris: “U-… hic…”

Bordeaux: “Hm… Forgive me. I went too far just now, Argyle…”

Though Bordeaux apologized, realizing he had been taking his frustration out on Ferris, Ferris was already covering his face and letting sobs slip out. Just like that, he sank down limply on the spot,

Ferris: “B-Because… I tried my best too… Saying it like that is… i-is just mean…”

Bordeaux: “Argyle, forgive me, that was a slip of the tongue. You are not at fault. I withdraw what I said just now.”

Ferris: “D-Do you really, truly feel bad about it…?”

As big teardrops spilled down his cheeks, Ferris haltingly spun his words toward Bordeaux. At that tearful voice, the old man gave a big nod and, with an “Ah.”, admitted his fault.

Bordeaux: “Of course. That slip of the tongue was entirely my fault. I admit it.”

Ferris: “Then, meow, I’ll forgive you. Ferri-chan is very magnanimous, after all.”

Bordeaux: “—?!”

Bordeaux was taken aback when, the moment his apology was accepted, Ferris stood up with a completely refreshed expression. Shooting him a sidelong glance as he wiped his tears away with his sleeve, Ferris let out a long, deep sigh and said,

Ferris: “Honestly, Bordeaux-sama, are you sure you really are one of the Council of Wise Men, meow? If you can’t even see through a bit of fake crying, it seems like some girl could trick you real easy…”

Bordeaux: “…And yet your tears themselves were real, were they not.”

Ferris: “I’m a water magic user, y’know. I can fiddle with the insides of my own body however I like.”

Manipulating his tear ducts and putting on a display of loud sobbing was child’s play for him.

And besides, it was not the first time Bordeaux’s remark—that he had failed to save the royal family and was incompetent as a healing magic user—had been thrown at him. He had been subjected to plenty of similar whispers, and it was only natural people would say that.

—More than anyone, it was Ferris himself who had cursed and blamed his own powerlessness.

Since that day, he had no desire even to count how many nights he had spent cursing himself.

Ferris: “But since we’ve gone to the trouble, I’ll go ahead and accept Bordeaux-sama’s apology. It’s a rare thing, after all～?”

However, Ferris did not let even the slightest flicker of that regretful flame scorching his heart show on the outside. Letting himself be bound by the past was something he allowed only on nights when he was alone.

All the rest of his time had to be spent for the future, for Crusch, the one and only person Ferris had.

Therefore—

Ferris: “So then—there’s something Ferri-chan’d like to ask that Bordeaux-sama who just apologized, but that old man you were arguing with earlier, what sort of relationship do you have with him?”

Bordeaux: “…And what do you intend to do, knowing that.”

Ferris: “It’s not some vulgar, nosy curiosity, meow. Ferri-chan just wants to be of use to Crusch-sama, that’s all.”

It was obvious at a glance that Crusch had taken an interest in that raggedly clad man. Ferris, too, could not help being intrigued, but taking his mistress’s wishes into account came first.

Bordeaux fell silent at Ferris’s answer and spent a moment deep in thought. At length, as though giving in under the weight of Ferris’s gaze, he let out a breath and said,

Bordeaux: “He is a friend I have known for a long time. No, I should call him a comrade in arms. …Or perhaps, from his point of view, it would be more accurate to say he was a comrade in arms.”

Ferris: “Past tense… Ferri-chan thinks you should do something about your friends before you lose them, y’know?”

Bordeaux: “That stings. …But I have no face to show him. I chose to put loyalty above gratitude. And I do not think I was wrong to do so.”

Ferris: “…What a clumsy answer.”

At the old man’s answer, forced out in a low voice, Ferris averted his eyes and muttered.

From that reply, he more or less grasped the circumstances behind the earlier exchange. Bordeaux had turned away a friend’s request, saying there were circumstances. And in the background of that lack of explanation—

Ferris: “—Outwardly, the extinction of the royal family is still being kept a secret, after all, isn’t it.”

Bordeaux: “I am well aware it is not something we can keep hidden for long. Even so, we must conceal it for as long as we possibly can. Faced with a sudden tragedy, the kingdom is far too unprepared and fragile.”

Ferris: “…The covenant has been severed too, and we have no idea how the dragon will act.”

With a heavy nod, Bordeaux failed to notice the slight sharpness in Ferris’s words. The royal family’s death by illness—in other words, the circumstances surrounding the Royal Selection—were at present information kept from all but those connected to the castle and a handful of powerful figures.

Of course, it was difficult to control information completely, and it was only a matter of time before it spread among the common people as more than mere rumor.

Bordeaux: “We need at least a month to pull ourselves together. Any sources of instability that could interfere with that must be cut away. Even if they are long-standing acquaintances.”

Ferris was so exasperated by Bordeaux’s ever more awkward way of doing things that he was at a loss for words. Still, though he might grumble at his methods, he did not dislike that unbending conviction that would not bend his pride when it came to sticking to his principles.

That clumsy way of being reminded him of the two people Ferris liked best.

Bordeaux: “Argyle, let me give you at least this warning… Do not let Lady Karsten get too deeply involved.”

Ferris: “Too deeply… involved?”

At Bordeaux’s words, breaking the silence, Ferris tilted his small head, a question mark on his face.

Bordeaux: “Lady Karsten holds the position of a Royal Candidate in the Royal Selection. But at the same time, I know her character quite well. Lady Karsten is very compassionate.”

Ferris: “That’s exactly the most wonderful thing about Crusch-sama.”

Bordeaux: “However, that may not always work in our favor. Hence my warning. Do not get too deeply involved with that man.”

Ferris: “…You don’t want your friend to be saved?”

Bordeaux: “Don’t be absurd. His wish is my dearest desire as well. But if you place it on the scales against the kingdom, there is no need to even discuss which way they will tip. That is all… that is all there is to it.”

Deepening the wrinkles on his aged face, Bordeaux said only that with a bitter expression.

And then, turning his back to them, the old man silently urged Ferris to leave. Bowing to that back, Ferris left only a sigh behind as he headed for the door. Just then—

Bordeaux: “Argyle, the situation of the Royal Selection is changing. You have heard about the second candidate, yes?”

Ferris: “A little bit, kind of sorta. Are you going to give us some kind of special favor or something?”

Bordeaux: “I am curious about the candidate herself as well, but it is her husband, Leip Barielle, you should watch out for. He is ambitious. A genuine one whose nature has not changed even after decades.”

After making that loaded remark, Bordeaux turned his gaze toward his desk and left it at that. Spread out upon it was the bundle of papers from earlier, and the expression on the old man’s face was a complex one.

There would be no further conversation to be had. Ferris decided to take that final piece of advice as his way of showing gratitude.

Ferris: “Please take care of your health, ’kay. For your own sake and for your family’s too.”

Leaving only those words behind and not waiting for a reply, Ferris left Bordeaux’s office. After that, without lingering attachment, he quickly departed the royal castle and hurried toward the Karsten family’s secondary residence in the noble district of the capital.

Crusch, whom he had parted from in the garden, should already have returned to the estate ahead of him.

Though he had not reached the heart of the matter, he had gotten fragmentary information out of Bordeaux. For the time being, he intended to report only that much and, if possible, put a lid on any further interest in that man.

It was not only Bordeaux who wanted Crusch to be able to focus on the Royal Selection.

Crusch: “—You’re back, Ferris.”

A voice from above greeted Ferris as he hurried back to the estate.

When he looked up, the one who welcomed him was Crusch, looking down at the front garden from the terrace. It was no coincidence; she had been waiting for him. Ferris narrowed his eyes at that smile of Crusch’s.

He was truly glad for the welcome, but there was something in that smile that gave him a slightly bad feeling.

And before Ferris could say anything about that premonition—

Crusch: “—I know you have only just returned, but we are going to the Prison Tower. There are things I wish to ask that man from before.”

Still holding the documents—the sheet she had picked up in the garden—in her hand, Crusch spoke to Ferris. In the emotion packed into her voice, he sensed the unwavering will there, and—

Ferris: “Yes. Ferri-chan will follow you anywhere.”

Ferris crushed the old man’s warning in his heart, deciding it had been in vain.

4

Crusch: “I did feel bad about it, but I went ahead and looked through your documents. Only a portion of them, however.”

Looking down at the other beyond the iron bars, Crusch declared that boldly, her arms still folded.

Man: “…”

Meanwhile, at those words, the other party fell into silence, sitting formally on his knees on the cold stone floor with his eyes closed. Having folded his ragged coat beside him, the body clad in nothing but his undershirt was trained to be as hard as steel.

However, his cheeks with bones about to show, his unshaven beard, and the white hair that had lost its luster gave him an inescapable air of uncleanness and ill health.

More than anything, the attitude of ignoring Crusch when she addressed him got on Ferris’s nerves.

Ferris: “Hellooo, can you hear us a bit here, meow? Don’t you think ignoring people like this is, like, waaay too rude, meow?”

Man: “…”

Ferris: “Hey! What is your problem, seriously! Do you not get what position you’re in, meow?!”

Crusch: “Ferris, wait a moment.”

Reining in the flustered Ferris, Crusch let out a breath at the old man who persisted in his silence. Then she stepped in front of the now-quiet Ferris and moved closer to the iron bars.

Crusch: “Allow me to apologize for my knight’s discourtesy. And also for my own rudeness in not giving my name at the outset.”

As she said so, she placed a hand against her chest and offered her apology. At that conduct of Crusch’s, even the cold, dusty air of the underground seemed to shrink back. The dominating aura that radiated from her was truly something inborn, and even the old man at last opened one eye to look up at Crusch.

Meeting that gaze with a nod, Crusch kept her back straight and went on.

Crusch: “I am Crusch Karsten, head of the ducal house of Karsten. I was present for the matter in the garden earlier with Lord Bordeaux Zergev. I have come to return what you dropped at that time.”

Man: “Karsten… the duke…?”

Hearing Crusch’s introduction, the old man opened his other closed eye as well. Understanding and acceptance flickered in those blue eyes, but were soon painted over by doubt.

Man: “I recall that the head of House Karsten was Lord Meckart.”

Crusch: “Indeed. Meckart Karsten is my father. Three years ago he ceded the headship of the house, and I am now the one invested as Duke Karsten. …It seems you are familiar with the kingdom’s affairs, but there appears to be a gap of a few years. I take it that is also where the cause of your quarrel lies.”

Man: “Has the kingdom’s bureaucracy become so short of hands that Her Grace the duchess herself must take part in an interrogation?”

Crusch: “You are harsh. In truth, I have no intention of prying into the dispute between you and Lord Bordeaux. That just now was nothing more than a pretext. It was simply the most convenient excuse for obtaining an audience with you.”

When Crusch shrugged at the old man’s sarcasm, his eyes narrowed slightly as well. Feeling a chill from their exchange, Ferris couldn’t help hugging his shoulders and letting out a sigh.

Right now, Ferris and the others were in a stone tower adjoining the royal castle—a facility for confining criminals known as the Prison Tower. That said, it had fulfilled that role only in the past; at present, the task of imprisoning dangerous criminals had been transferred to another location outside the capital.

For that reason, these days the Prison Tower was nothing more than an ordinary stone tower, with only a little work left for its underground cells. Even that consisted merely of serving as a place for minor offenders to spend a single night as punishment.

Crusch: “Even so, the drafts here are rather hard to bear. This is not a place I would care to linger.”

Man: “In that case, might I suggest you come to the point, so as not to take too long. Surely you have not come in person in order to pass judgment upon my discourtesy toward Lord Bordeaux?”

Crusch: “Of course not. Besides, Lord Bordeaux himself does not wish that. He insisted that the fault lay with him. You will likely be released yourself come tomorrow morning. …Naturally, if you were to behave the same way again, even Lord Bordeaux would no longer be able to shield you.”

Man: “…I shall not commit such folly again. What happened earlier was due to my own immaturity. Being thrown into a cold underground cell for the first time in a while will rather help cool my head.”

The old man’s tone contained something like a smile, but it was not a bright one; it was thick with self-mockery. The feeling behind his words was anger not at Bordeaux but at himself—in other words, self-directed wrath.

—Anger. It was anger.

What lay rooted at the bottom of this old man, what drove him with a heat that seemed it might scorch him, was a seething rage. Even as he maintained such composure and embodied, to Ferris’s eyes, a presence like a honed sword, within him there swirled a heat fierce enough to melt steel.

At that moment, regret welled up in Ferris's chest. He should have done as Bordeaux had said. If he truly wanted Crusch to think only of winning the Royal Selection, he ought never to have let this old man before him and Crusch come face to face.

And that regret of Ferris's lost any chance of being stopped completely with the next single word.

Crusch: "—The White Whale."

Man: "…"

At the very instant he caught that murmur, an emotion that surpassed his self-directed anger flashed through the old man's eyes.

It vanished in an instant without leaving a trace, but it could not escape the eyes of Crusch and Ferris, who had been expecting a reaction. With that certainty, Ferris too let out a breath.

There was no stopping it now. In fact, Crusch drew a single sheet of paper from her bosom and held it up beyond the iron bars for the old man, its rightful owner, to see.

Crusch: "As I said at the start. I did feel bad about it, but I went ahead and looked through your documents. Lord Bordeaux has recovered most of them, and the only one in my possession is this single overlooked sheet."

Man: "…He has always been somewhat lacking in attention to such details. I and others pointed out to him many times that he neglected what was at his feet. In the end, he still has not corrected that, has he."

Crusch: "That too is part of Lord Bordeaux's character. It is hard even to imagine a flawless Lord Zergev."

Man: "Indeed."

For the first time, a shared smile was born between Crusch and the old man.

One might say it was a sense of solidarity sparked by a bald old man, which made it sound rather less impressive, but after they had their brief laugh, Crusch once more ran a finger over the surface of the paper.

The text written there was something Ferris had been told about before they came to the Prison Tower, and it was astonishing in its contents.

For the simple reason that—

Crusch: "—It is data on the White Whale's distribution. I have only this one sheet on hand, but even this alone is extremely intriguing. If it is factual, it can be called a tremendous discovery."

Man: "…"

Crusch: "These are reports of the White Whale's appearances all over the world for the past ten-odd years. Not only in Lugunica, but in Gusteko, Vollachia, Kararagi… You have done well to investigate so much. From this one sheet I cannot tell, but I can imagine the data touches not only on dates of appearance, but also on the 'mist' and the resulting damage."

The old man remained silent and gave no reply.

Only, at the feeling of the air growing colder, a shiver ran down Ferris's spine. Facing the old man across the iron bars, he somehow had the illusion that a blade was being held to his back.

It was an instinctive alarm of danger brought on by the tremendous sword aura the old man before him was clad in.

Man: "…"

Yet in contrast to the old man's presence, the heat in Crusch's eyes and voice only grew. It came from an expectation and excitement she could not contain, something she rarely ever showed.

It was no wonder Crusch reacted as she did. Who could fail to be astonished, to grow heated upon seeing this?

The White Whale—that was the name of the evil witchbeast that had swum through the skies of the world for the last four hundred years. Its depredations had continued to spread across national borders, and its true nature was still not fully revealed, making it a byword for terror.

For the sake of destroying it, the kingdom had once in the past assembled a large-scale subjugation force—only to suffer a historic, crushing defeat. The kingdom had been driven into utter rout by a single witchbeast.

The wounds inflicted then had yet to close and still bled on. Everyone in the kingdom—everyone who knew of the White Whale—harbored anger in their hearts toward its existence.

Crusch: “However, you did not let that anger remain mere anger. You turned your obsession into fruit and gathered this much information. If a pattern can be found in the appearances of the ‘mist’ witchbeast that was said to be omnipresent and elusive, just how many people might be saved?”

It swam freely through the vast sky, its form appearing and disappearing together with the “mist.” Thus travelers, peddlers, and the many people who took to the highways were constantly exposed to its threat. —No, the White Whale’s menace chose neither person nor place, but had rained down equally upon the entire world.

However, if the usefulness of this data were proven, much of that harm could be prevented before it occurred.

Crusch: “The number of people who fall prey to the White Whale’s fangs would surely be drastically reduced. What you have done is worthy of that. You should be proud. Through your deeds, you have saved many lives.”

Man: “…”

Crusch: “You look as though you would say, ‘And what of it.’”

Man: “…”

Since the moment they had begun speaking of the contents of the documents, the old man’s face had only grown colder, and now his cheeks stiffened.

Color returned to his blue eyes and his parched lips, and the old man’s awareness focused solely on Crusch. Those eyes were asking what she intended to say.

Crusch: “I understand your intent. Over a long time, you have worn down your very soul in pursuing that witchbeast. The fruit of all that effort cannot possibly be merely to flee from the White Whale’s threat.”

Man: “…Then what, pray tell, do you think it is?”

Crusch: “It is obvious. Your aim is the White Whale’s subjugation—that alone.”

Ferris: “Crusch-sama—!”

At his mistress’s firm declaration of the old man’s goal, Ferris’s voice cracked as he called out to her. Grasping her sleeve and knowing full well it was rude to interject, he appealed to Crusch.

Ferris: “Y-You can’t, no! You must not go any further into this! Right now your own safety has to come first!”

Crusch: “I know that you are thinking of me. However—”

Ferris: “His Highness—!”

Cutting her off, Ferris had spoken those words without meaning to.

The moment she heard that word, a pained emotion flitted through Crusch’s amber eyes. It was tied to a wound that would not heal for her and for Ferris himself. Even so, he did not hesitate to use it.

Ferris: “His Highness had a future he wished for. If you start hesitating here, Crusch-sama, what will become of that? What happens to the dream he saw, to the rest of that dream?!”

Crusch: “Ferris…”

Ferris: “Scold me. Revile me. You can be angry, hit me, even hate me. Please, do not forgive me for using His Highness's—His Highness Fourier's—name like this. But I beg you."

Clinging with his fingers, tears pooling in his eyes and his thin lips trembling, Ferris pleaded.

Ferris: "For now, just for now… please put your own position first."

The existence, the wish, the gaze of the old man before them were a deadly poison to Crusch as she was now. An infectious fever. And yet Ferris's kind-hearted liege did not fear contracting that fever.

She would surely choose to suffer from the same fever herself, to struggle and overcome it.

Ferris, as her first knight and as the "Blue" healing magic user, could not allow that.

Ferris: "That's enough talking. It's rude of us to just cut things off when we were the ones who came here, but we're done."

Turning back, Ferris stated this clearly to the old man sitting in seiza inside the cell. The old man's expression did not change at those words. Crusch too remained silent, closing her eyes in frustration, and—

Crusch: "…It is rare for Ferris to go so far as to oppose me. My apologies, sir swordsman."

Man: "—Wilhelm Trias."

Crusch: "Hm…"

Wilhelm: "I must apologize for the rudeness of giving my name so late. My name is Wilhelm Trias. I, in turn, have shown nothing but discourtesy toward Your Grace. Once more, I beg your pardon."

At the old man—Wilhelm's—introduction, Crusch fell into thought for just a moment. But before his mistress could change her mind, Ferris pressed against Crusch's slender back.

Ferris: "Crusch-sama, that is enough talking. Let's go back to the estate. You’re very busy, after all.”

Crusch: “Very well. Then, Sir Wilhelm. …May you remain in good health.”

Wilhelm: “As I am a prisoner in a cell, I hesitate to nod to that.”

Being forcibly led away by Ferris, Crusch heard Wilhelm answer her parting words with something like a wry remark. With that, Ferris and the others left the depths of the Prison Tower behind.

Only, just before they emerged from underground, Ferris glanced back toward Wilhelm for a brief moment.

The old man had already lost all interest in them and sat in seiza, quietly lost in thought.

Alone in the dim, cold prison, left behind without being able to draw any closer to his goal.

—At that sight, Ferris’s chest creaked as though being savagely clawed at.

5

Ferris: “—I truly apologize for all the many discourtesies back at the Prison Tower.”

It was the very first thing he said after they had returned to the estate, finished dinner, and taken their seats for their customary evening drinks on the terrace.

With his cat ears drooping meekly and his eyes lowered as he apologized, Ferris made Crusch, who sat facing him, open her eyes wide. Her clothing was not her usual male attire, but a thin, black-based nightgown.

That feminine side of Crusch, usually hidden away, was bared without reserve only in front of Ferris, and that fact was a source of pride for him.

At the moment, though, he had no leisure to bask in that pride and was instead shrinking in on himself in self-reflection.

Crusch: “So you were worrying about that, if your silence all through dinner is anything to go by. You really are a hopeless one.”

Ferris: “Yes, Ferri-chan is hopeless. An unwanted child. Are you going to throw me away…?”

Crusch: “Me, throw you away? Impossible. If I were to discard you, I would cast aside my life first.”

Out on the evening-cool terrace, Crusch tilted her wineglass as the night wind blew against her. Each time her white throat bounced as it swallowed the liquor, Ferris, entranced by the sight, let out a sigh once more at his mistress’s magnanimity.

Crusch’s partiality toward Wilhelm had been obvious. But Ferris had forcibly shut that down, and at that with a taboo—by using Fourier’s name.

Fourier Lugunica, fourth prince of the Kingdom of Lugunica, had been a precious friend—and more than that—to both Crusch and Ferris.

Reckless, blunt, and friendly, Ferris had loved him dearly.

Even after the day came when Fourier and Crusch would be joined, he wanted to remain by their side as their attendant. That was the dream Ferris had held, and it was snatched away in an instant by an illness beyond even the power of the “Blue.” With the death of the royal family, Fourier’s life also came to its end, and the future he had envisioned for the kingdom now resided within Crusch.

The Royal Selection was the stage upon which Crusch would grant the wish entrusted to her by Fourier.

That was why—

Crusch: “If we put His Highness’s wishes first, we have no room to wander from the path. —You are in the right.”

Ferris: “…But being in the right does not mean I can say whatever I please. I am reflecting on that part of it.”

Crusch: “You are earnest.”

Ferris: “Because I love you. Both you, Crusch-sama… and His Highness Fourier.”

He loved them. He had loved the two of them. He still loved the time he had been able to spend with them both.

Therefore, if there were anything that would get in the way of that, he would oppose it before anyone else. Doing so was Ferris’s desire and his duty in a world where Fourier Lugunica no longer existed.

Ferris: “…So then, what are your plans starting tomorrow? Will you be going to the estate in your domain, to see Lord Meckart?”

Crusch: “I had intended to, but that is no longer possible. Baron Leip Barielle has contacted me privately. He says he will be summoning his wife—the second candidate—to the capital within the next few days and wishes to arrange a meeting. His speed is greater than I expected.”

Ferris: “So that means he’s not planning on hiding the plotting he’s been up to, huh?”

Crusch: “It would be premature to assume schemes. That said, we cannot simply strip away a qualification once recognized. In that sense, it may be that there is no longer any need to conceal it.”

There was also the possibility of Leip Barielle’s underhanded maneuvering, something Bordeaux had warned them about.

Ferris, who had wanted, if possible, to leave the capital for a while, ground his molars at seeing that plan fall through. While Ferris did that at her side, Crusch, glass in hand, was drinking faster than usual today.

Their evening drinks were a daily ritual, and Crusch’s capacity for alcohol was above average—yet it was rare for her to drink enough to become drunk, and her pace tonight was clearly faster than normal.

Ferris: “Crusch-sama, you’re asking for refills awfully fast, y’know. If you don’t let Ferri-chan pour for you too, meow…”

Crusch: “…I had not noticed. Please.”

Having her unconscious drinking pointed out, Crusch widened her eyes and pushed her glass over to him. Ferris poured into it an amber liquid the same color as Crusch’s eyes.

Ferris: “You might just be tired. Maybe you should call it a night with this one last drink.”

Crusch: “If you say so, I shall. It is true there is much on my mind today.”

Nodding, Crusch took the glass he handed her and drained it in one go. Then she set the empty glass back on the silver tray and stood up without a movement that showed any sign of intoxication.

Crusch: “I will leave the tidying up to you. I am going back to my room. You too should rest well tonight.”

Ferris: “Okaaay. You too, Crusch-sama—sweet dreams.”

Leaving behind a gallant smile, Crusch briskly departed the terrace. Seeing her off, Ferris licked down the contents of his own glass, then took the tray in hand and left the terrace as well.

His destination was Crusch’s office—the glasses and ice he left to the servants, but the bottle of alcohol that diminished little by little with their evening drinks was kept on a shelf in that room. As night was beginning to deepen, the office without its mistress was dim, and Ferris relied solely on the moonlight as he returned the bottle to the shelf.

Then, just before he left the room, he happened to notice a sheet of paper lying on the ebony desk.

Ferris: “This is… that old man’s…”

What lay on the desk was one of the documents they had failed to return to Wilhelm at the Prison Tower. As if it were an embodiment of Crusch's lingering regrets, it sat neatly folded at the corner of the desk.

Would Crusch regret not being able to be involved with him every time she saw this?

Ferris: "—Tch, honestly, something like this…"

The moment that thought came to mind, a feeling he could not put into words welled up, and Ferris impulsively picked up the sheet.

He grabbed it by the edge, intending in one stroke to tear it to pieces—yet his fingers did not move. The sheet was faded and crumpled, stained with blood and finger marks, with the weight of the years etched into it.

Ferris: "…"

His strength leaving his hand, Ferris gave up on tearing it apart. He had given up, but it was also true that he felt he could not simply leave it here.

He looked out the window. In the sky where a half-eaten moon floated, directly beneath it stood the Royal Castle of Lugunica.

—The time of night had not yet quite grown late enough to be called deep.

6

The cold air in the Prison Tower felt no different by day than after sunset.

Descending the stairs that led underground, his footsteps sounding upon the hard floor, Ferris entertained that thought.

Today's second visit to the Prison Tower was also the second of his life. Politely declining the offer of an escort from the guards at the entrance, Ferris once more, after only a few hours, stood before those iron bars.

Ferris: "…Ferri-chan's kinda surprised. Don't tell me you've been sitting like that the whole time?”

Wilhelm: “…”

Hands on his hips and eyes round, Ferris stared straight ahead—on the other side of the iron grating, Wilhelm, whom he had met again, greeted him in exactly the same posture as when they had parted.

In other words, he was still sitting formally on his knees on the cold, hard floor, eyes closed.

Ferris: “What’s that supposed to be, meow? Like you’re showing off how much you’re reflecting or regretting or whatever? Ferri-chan really hates that kinda thing. Feelings aren’t something that simple.”

Wilhelm: “I would say it does not matter to me what you think of me… but this is unexpected. I did not think you would return.”

Ferris: “If Ferri-chan didn’t have business, he wouldn’t have come. And that business is going to be finished right away. Yup.”

As Wilhelm opened his closed eyelids and looked up at him, Ferris stuck out his tongue. Then he drew from his breast the documents he had taken from the office and let them slip neatly through the gap in the bars into the cell.

He had felt guilty about tearing them up or throwing them away. So he was returning them to their owner. With this, there would no longer be any connection.

Ferris: “Crusch-sama is a very kind person. So please, do not lead her astray.”

Wilhelm: “…I must at least thank you for returning my documents. And I extend the same gratitude to your master, Duchess Karsten.”

Drawing the documents that had fallen beside him closer, Wilhelm spoke weightily, then inclined his head. That earnest attitude made Ferris’s breath catch, and when he finally let that held breath out—

Ferris: “This is, um, some advice from a meddling busybody, but… I think revenge is going to be hard, y’know?”

Wilhelm: “…What?”

Ferris: “That talk with Lord Bordeaux… or maybe it was more of a shouting match? Anyway, Ferri-chan heard a little bit of what you two were saying in the garden.”

He really should have left without saying anything, and Ferris was disgusted with himself for keeping the conversation going. But regardless of how he felt, Wilhelm’s attention was completely fixed on the substance of what he was saying.

Under the pressure of that gaze, Ferris tried to explain, carefully choosing his words so as not to touch on the Royal Selection or the details of the conversation with Bordeaux.

Ferris: “You said something about sending an emissary to the Vollachian Empire, right? That’s absolutely impossible right now. Absolutely.”

Wilhelm: “You also say the timing is bad…?”

Ferris: “Mm. That’s right. Ferri-chan gets that you wanna confirm the pattern you figured out from the data, but…”

Wilhelm: “Yet without proof, the troops cannot be moved. That is Bordeaux’s position.”

Ferris: “…!”

Struck suddenly by that sharp voice, Ferris’s narrow shoulders jumped.

Looking, he saw that the light in Wilhelm’s eyes, which had been calm until now, had turned dangerous. Pinned in place by a gaze that seemed not just to pierce but to cut him down, Ferris gave a small, choked gasp on the spot.

Facing Ferris, Wilhelm crushed the documents in his hand and rose to his feet.

Wilhelm: “I have pursued it for fourteen years and only now reached this conclusion. If its appearance is confirmed in the Empire this time, then next it will appear within Lugunica in half a year. I am but one step away from certain proof of that…!”

Ferris: “Lord Bordeaux… cannot send an emissary…”

Wilhelm: “Why? Why break your promise now, after all this time? We both hated the White Whale so intensely. We were both enraged at what it had taken from us. You too… have you forgotten Teresia, Bordeaux?”

Strength filled the low, angry voice as Wilhelm gripped the iron bars and bit down hard on his lips. Blood dripped from the corner of the old man’s mouth, and with a creaking sound the iron grating bent out of shape.

It was the same as what Ferris had felt several hours earlier—the raging, unquenchable flames of anger burning within Wilhelm. It was fury at Bordeaux for breaking his promise, fury at the hated nemesis that was the White Whale, and, more than any of that, an inexhaustible passion directed at himself for his own lack of strength.

Wilhelm: “…There is no time. If I let this chance slip by, it will be years again before I can face it once more in Lugunica. By then, I will have withered. Even now, every second that passes dulls my sword. This body continues to rust and grow brittle. I have no time left. Before we reach the point where it cannot be undone.”

Ferris: “…”

It was—it was a scream.

He was not raising his voice. He was not wailing in tears. Yet those words, which ground down the old man’s soul and were spat out with each breath at the cost of his life, were unmistakably his scream.

And a scream that shaves away the soul always carves wounds of equal measure into the hearts of those who hear it.

Ferris: "…Ah."

His heart clawed at by that scream, Ferris realized it at the same time. He understood. The name Teresia that Wilhelm had spoken rang a bell. No—more precisely, only when that sound, Teresia, and Wilhelm's name came together did his memory ignite.

Teresia van Astrea—hers was a name tied to the Divine Protection of the Sword Saint, the mightiest guardian inherited in the Kingdom of Lugunica.

She was the one who had brought to an end the royal civil war, the "Demi-Human War," that had engulfed the kingdom as a whole, and the records said that her life had finally been lost in the great subjugation fourteen years ago.

And the name of Teresia's husband was, in a certain sense, even more famous than that of she who was the Sword Saint herself—

Ferris: "—The 'Sword Demon,' Wilhelm van Astrea."

That was the name of the man who had built legend upon legend.

The meetings of blades between the Sword Saint and the Sword Demon that had so captivated people were sung of and passed down. The demon who loved and wed the woman loved by the sword. The demon who lived by the sword, who loved the woman loved by the sword.

—He was a man who had embodied a love that Felix Argyle could never attain.

Ferris: "Wh-What… Trias. Wilhelm Trias… Using a fake name like that!"

Wilhelm: "…It is not a false name. From the moment I abandoned the role that had been given to me and left my house behind, neither the Astrea family name nor the van sword name have been mine. Therefore, I merely bear now the name of a ruined noble house that disappeared on the fringes of the kingdom decades ago."

Ferris: "That's just hair-splitting…!"

Ferris started to snap at him emotionally, then immediately held himself back.

Whatever one might say about Wilhelm's insistence, thanks to it Crusch had not realized who he really was. If she were to learn that this Wilhelm was the Sword Demon—

Ferris: "…No, that does not matter."

To change one's attitude based on who the other person was would itself be an insult to Crusch Karsten.

Ferris's lifelong liege was not someone who would hesitate to extend her hand over something like that. Which was why, if everyone was going to cling to her limbs and beg for her mercy—

Ferris: "So that Crusch-sama does not drown herself, Ferri-chan's the one who'll do something about it."

At Ferris's murmur, filled with resolve, Wilhelm furrowed his brows in puzzlement. In response, Ferris took a big step back, putting distance between himself and the iron bars.

That space he opened up was also Ferris's way of making his attitude toward Wilhelm clear.

Ferris: "Ferri-chan's not saying anything more. There are things Ferri-chan can't say, too. It's the same as with Lord Bordeaux."

Wilhelm: "All I hear is that the timing is bad. What is it that you are all hiding?"

Ferris: "…"

He had no intention of telling him. The extinction of the royal family and the death of the king would, before long, become known among the common folk. Even so, as information they wished to keep hidden for at least a month, Wilhelm would learn the truth only then.

Once he knew, the Sword Demon would know as well—the reality that his dearest wish could absolutely never be granted.

Ferris: “Good-bye.”

Leaving those words behind unilaterally, Ferris left the underground as he touched the ribbon that adorned his hair. All the while he could feel Wilhelm’s gaze stabbing into his slender back.

He kept reminding himself in his heart that there was no hand to be extended to the aged Sword Demon left behind in the darkness.

7

Several days had passed since that night at the Prison Tower.

Since then, nothing about Wilhelm had passed Crusch’s lips. Ferris, too, was not foolish enough to dig back up a topic he himself had buried.

Crusch said nothing even about the disappearance of the documents which should have been brought back and left on her desk, and Wilhelm’s very existence came to be treated as a taboo between the two of them, handled by unspoken agreement.

Ferris: “…”

That was fine, Ferris kept on ignoring the strange twinge lurking in the depths of his heart. To make it through the Royal Selection, Crusch ought to focus solely on what lay before her. That opinion of his would never change. Therefore, Ferris would also devote his strength to that end.

And so, with a feeling as if he were running away from something, time passed, and that day came.

—When he first came face-to-face with that woman, what Ferris felt was a bottomless chill.

Priscilla: “What is this, you. You have brought along a most peculiar attendant. It is a taste quite suited to mine own preferences, is it not.”

So saying with obvious delight, the one who smiled like a beautiful, poisonous flower was a woman with orange hair.

She possessed a peerless beauty that set the hearts of all who saw her in turmoil, and crimson eyes like flames that would burn everything to ash. Her body, with its voluptuous curves that seemed the very pinnacle of womanhood, was wrapped in a luxurious dress the color of blood.

If that were all, she could have been dismissed as simply a peerless beauty.

But the presence that clung to her appealed to his instincts that it was impossible to regard her as a mere human being. It was the sense of mortal peril, the suffocating pressure of standing before an absolute, overwhelming power—

Crusch: “I do not understand your tastes, but I shall accept that as a straightforward compliment.”

As Ferris was on the verge of being overwhelmed by the woman’s aura, Crusch stepped half a pace forward to stand as if to shield him. Keeping that stance, she narrowed her amber eyes at the woman and said,

Crusch: “And you are?”

Priscilla: “Indeed. In deference to that delightful taste of yours and the mettle to stand before me, I shall give you my name.”

With her smile deepening at the question, the woman drew a fan from her bosom and snapped it open with a sharp sound. Then, hiding her lips behind the spread fan, she continued,

Priscilla: “I am Priscilla. Priscilla… hm, what was it now.”

Schult: “Barielle! It is Barielle, Lady Priscilla!”

Priscilla: “Oh, that was it. I am Priscilla Barielle. The next monarch of this kingdom.”

Ferris was left dumbfounded by the bearing of the woman—Priscilla—as she declared that without the slightest hesitation.

Of course he knew the circumstances and understood that she was a political rival, but he had not expected to be hit head-on with words that were practically a declaration of war, so bluntly and so openly.

Priscilla: “What a stupefied face, half-beast… no, not even half-beast. What are you, merely a throwback?”

Ferris: “—?! How did you know that?”

Priscilla: “One can see it at a glance. One can smell it and know. If I were to lick you besides, it would be all the more certain. I shall not, however.”

With just a sidelong glance at Ferris, Priscilla had seen through the truth of his lineage, and the fact sent a chill down his spine. He had no idea whether the words that followed were true or not, but his wariness spiked higher than ever before.

Likewise, at his side Crusch was also heightening her guard toward Priscilla. Naturally, a harsh atmosphere began to spread between the two candidates—

Leip: “That is enough! Do not provoke your counterpart at every turn in a simple meeting, Priscilla!”

Crusch: “…Lord Leip.”

A husky voice barked at Priscilla, and the glaring contest was swiftly brought to an end.

The one who had raised his voice and wedged himself between the two was an elderly man. His hair was white, and his skin was mapped with countless wrinkles that time could not hide. His age should have been approaching his seventies, the sort of age when, in this kingdom, it would be only natural to have retired into seclusion.

However, the vitality in his glittering eyes and the straight line of his spine robbed him of any sense of age or frailty, and his body brimmed with a vigor that did not match his years.

Leip: “Duchess Karsten, my wife has been terribly discourteous. I humbly beg your pardon.”

The man who bowed his head as he said this was none other than Baron Leip Barielle himself, husband to Priscilla, the second candidate, and the very man whom both Crusch and Bordeaux had named as one to be wary of.

Ferris, too, up until actually meeting Priscilla like this, had been firmly convinced that, in the Royal Selection, the rival they would be clashing against would be Leip—

Leip: “Priscilla, are you listening? You must also offer an apology to the duchess…”

Priscilla: “An apology? For what reason must I apologize. The one who ought to apologize is not I, but you. Every time I hear your raspy voice, my spirits sink. Your taste in perfume is also poor. My nose feels as though it shall bend.”

Leip: “Nn, gh, gh… y-you…!”

Seeing Leip’s face flush red and his teeth grind together, Ferris felt a deep, genuine sympathy for him.

Leip had absolutely no control over his own wife, who was also the second candidate. In fact, everyone here other than Leip himself had to realize it.

—That there was a cruel gulf in class between Priscilla and Leip.

Crusch: “Lord Leip, there is no need for an apology. Rather, I am grateful that you took the trouble to come today.”

Ferris: “That is right, meow. Priscilla-sama does not strike Ferri-chan as someone who likes goin’ out in purr-son, after all, meow.”

In the drawing room of the Karsten estate, as Crusch offered them the sofa opposite, Ferris chimed in. That remark, however, was also a bit of payback for the intimidation from earlier, and a little on the sharp side.

For a moment Crusch’s reproving gaze stabbed into his profile, but

Ferris kept a composed expression as he watched to see how their guest would react. In response, Priscilla snorted, “Hmph,” and said,

Priscilla: “A cheap provocation. Even if you had not said it, today is merely a passing whim. After all, the old bone’s manor here in the capital is in such dreadful shape. There is no way I could invite people into it as my residence. I have gathered craftsmen and am in the midst of having it rebuilt at once… that is all there is to it.”

Schult: “Yes! Once it is finished, it is certain to be all golden and glittering! The drawing of the new manor that Lady Priscilla made, I am very fond of it indeed!”

The one chattering away at her side as Priscilla sank deeply into the sofa was a young boy. With pink hair and a lovable face, he looked to be around ten years of age, but his outfit was that of a well-tailored butler’s uniform. He seemed to be the boy Priscilla kept by her as a page.

His behavior was charming enough, but—

Priscilla: “Enough, Schult. Do not cut into the conversation of adults. Also, you are forbidden to speak of what shall become of the manor. It would lessen the pleasure of surprising others.”

Schult: “I-I am very sorry… I shall be quiet, I shall be very quiet…”

At Priscilla’s rebuke, the boy immediately drooped with a crestfallen look. Leip, veins standing out on his forehead, silently tolerated the hectic exchange between the two of them.

It was a reminder that the initiative in this place lay solely with the two who were the leading actors in the Royal Selection. And those two, facing each other, were—

Priscilla: “Hm. Not bad.”

Crusch: “…”

Priscilla: “You should be proud. It is a rare thing, is it not? For me to thus find worth in another.”

Narrowing her crimson eyes, Priscilla declared this to Crusch with evident amusement. Crusch likewise did not let her composed posture waver, and met Priscilla's gaze head-on.

Just like that, Crusch's and Priscilla's gazes tangled with one another, until at last—

Priscilla: "Very well, I shall remember you. Duchess Karsten… no, Crusch Karsten. I had assumed this to be a boring sideshow, a trivial matter… but it may prove more entertaining than I thought."

Crusch: "This is a matter of great import that shall decide the fate of the kingdom. To call it a sideshow is something I cannot overlook."

Priscilla: "Even if you cannot overlook it, I shall cast the words aside as I please. In any case, each candidate has their own resolve in facing the Royal Selection… for me, it is entertainment. For you as well, at this rate, it shall become so."

Crusch: "What?"

At Crusch, who frowned at her frivolous reply, Priscilla spoke with a meaningful tone. When Crusch looked at her suspiciously over the remark, Priscilla gave an exasperated, "You have not noticed?" and continued,

Priscilla: "Your way of being is, whether or not it is to my taste, passable enough to behold. Yet you have some lingering regret before the main event. That shall drag at your feet and in time lead to something fatal. The fate of the kingdom you speak of is not so light that you can shoulder it while dragging such baggage behind you, is it?"

Crusch: "…"

Priscilla: "The throwback at your side is the same. The two of you stand before me together, incomplete. That does not allow my interest to fully take hold. Therefore, you had best wash away your lingering attachments."

Snapping her fan shut with a sharp sound, Priscilla pointed its tip alternately at Ferris and Crusch. She was saying whatever she pleased. Yet they did not feel like arguing back, because within Priscilla's theatrical turn of phrase there were facts that struck too close to home to ignore.

Priscilla: "There was more to gain here than I expected. For a suggestion from that old bone, it was enjoyable, I shall say as much."

Leaving those words to the speechless Crusch and Ferris, Priscilla rose languidly to her feet. Her bearing declared that the conversation was over, and yet no one in the room had any means to stop her.

Only Crusch, hesitating over something, nevertheless stood up and called after her back.

Crusch: "Priscilla Barielle. I too gained something from this meeting with you. You have my thanks."

Priscilla: "I have no need of it. All that I do leads only to my own future. —Everything in this world is made for my convenience. Therefore, all things are blessings for my sake."

Waving her fan with a flutter, Priscilla maintained her haughty arrogance to the very end as she left the room. As she departed, she reached out to pat the head of the flustered boy hurrying after her and murmured,

Priscilla: "Even so, the boldness to choose that one as your first knight is amusing. I find myself wanting to keep more eccentric fellows at my own side as well. I shall have to make arrangements in that regard."

Muttering things like that, she truly did cut a figure of someone who walked her own path.

Leip: "Duchess Karsten, once more I must apologize for my wife's discourtesy. Before the Royal Selection begins in earnest, I intend to make her understand the gravity of the matter."

Crusch: "I shall also repeat myself, but there is no need for an apology. —We have also learned that there is no lack in our opponent.”

As Priscilla left, Leip bowed his head in her stead, but Crusch shook hers. Leip pulled a bitter face at her answer, but Ferris nodded, approving his mistress’s judgment.

For better or worse, Priscilla’s presence was exceptional.

That could only be because she possessed, together with unshakable confidence, the substance to back up her intense words and deeds. For only the second candidate to appear and already such a formidable enemy had presented herself. And above all—

Crusch: “If I enter the Royal Selection while harboring lingering regrets, I shall find myself defeated without any means to fight back.”

Ferris: “Crusch-sama…”

It was a rare, faint laugh from Crusch, tinged with self-mockery.

Seeing her profile, Ferris could tell as if holding it in his hand what lay within her heart. Sensing the shift in mood flowing between master and retainer, Leip let out a sigh and said,

Leip: “In any case, it is best that we face the Royal Selection without regrets. —For the future of the kingdom as well.”

Leaving only those words behind, the man known as a sly operator also bowed once and took his leave.

With the room left to just the two of them, Ferris hugged one of his own arms and turned back to Crusch. Feeling his gaze, Crusch raised her face and said,

Crusch: “For the future of the kingdom, hm. To hear that said by Lord Leip is an irony indeed.”

Ferris: “Maybe so, meow. Even though he does not give the kingdom a single thought, really.”

Crusch: “I would not go that far. —Merely that it is surely not to the same extent as I.”

Crusch answered thus with her eyes closed to Ferris’s half-jesting remark.

The future of the kingdom—its very ring held deep meaning for her. The more strongly she focused on it, the more she felt as if she might forget the existence of things that must not be neglected.

He had known it from the very beginning.

Just what kind of person Crusch Karsten was—the final liege to whom Felix Argyle devoted his loyal love, the one and only master in this world he could so name.

Crusch: “Ferris, that man… can you find the whereabouts of Wilhelm van Astrea?”

Ferris: “…So you had realized.”

Crusch: “Even so, I am one who has devoted much of my time to the sword. I could not help but notice the name of the Sword Demon. Moreover, there was a time when I yearned for the Sword Demon Love Song. All the more so.”

After exchanging words in the Prison Tower, Crusch had probably realized from that point that the man burning with obsession toward the White Whale was the Sword Demon.

Ferris’s maneuvers to keep her from noticing had, in truth, been nothing but spinning his wheels. In the end, the state most fitting for Crusch was for her to be as she herself wished to be. He must have understood that unconsciously all along.

Ferris: “No worries. Ferri-chan’s been trackin’ his movements ever since he left the Prison Tower.”

8

With everyone else cleared out of the Karsten manor’s drawing room, the meeting quietly came to pass.

Wilhelm: "—I am deeply honored to have been invited on this occasion."

The one who said that and dropped to one knee on the floor, wrapped in a fierce sword aura, was the old swordsman—Wilhelm. The way he pressed his clenched fist to the floor and bowed his head was a display of respect comparable to a knight's most formal salute.

Facing the Sword Demon's posture head-on, Crusch met him with clear, piercing amber eyes. It was a reunion long in the making, but in her first words, she let none of that feeling show.

Crusch: "It's been since that one brief glance. Have you been well?"

Wilhelm: "Yes. And seeing that Duchess Karsten is also unchanged is most reassuring."

After trading the customary pleasantries, the two exchanged looks.

In Crusch's gaze, brimming with spirit, the eyes that met it—Wilhelm's—held a burning passion. Seeing the strength in them, Ferris, standing by Crusch's side, couldn't help but be impressed.

Ever since that incident a few days prior, Wilhelm's efforts should have borne no fruit and been nothing but one swing and a miss after another.

Ferris's investigations had already revealed that Wilhelm had gone around seeking contact with influential people besides Bordeaux, only to have all of those petitions soundly rejected. And yet the Wilhelm before them betrayed no sign of exhaustion on his face, nor had his willpower waned.

More than anything, the passion dwelling in those eyes made Ferris feel a budding sense of expectation.

If the pretext for summoning the Sword Demon to this place had made him see possibility…

Crusch: "There's no need to drag things out with a long preamble before we get to the point. It doesn't seem either of us intends to make small talk.”

Wilhelm: “Your knight there informed me that you would be speaking the truth today. If possible, I would like to move on to the main subject without delay.”

Wilhelm flicked a glance toward Ferris.

The faint note of reproach in that gaze was likely his grudge over the fact that, when Ferris had gone to fetch him at the cheap inn, Ferris had concealed the circumstances from him right up to the end. Ferris understood his impatience. Even so, the initiative in this discussion had to belong to Crusch.

Ferris: “So that’s why Ferri-chan swallowed his tears and just left you hanging in suspense, meow.”

Crusch: “You heard him. Forgive it. Ferris never truly wished to keep silent.”

Wilhelm: “…”

Crusch, bearing the Divine Protection of Wind Reading, stepped in to defend Ferris, who today was dressed not in his Royal Guard uniform but in a short skirt.

At her words, Wilhelm knit his brows, but perhaps because the Sword Demon disliked letting the topic stray from the main issue, he did not pursue it.

Wilhelm: “Then I may expect that Duchess Karsten will not put off the matter any further?”

Crusch: “Of course.”

Crusch gave a heavy nod, narrowing her amber eyes at Wilhelm, who drew in a small breath.

Crusch: “The truth you seek is the reason your every proposal to subjugate the White Whale has been utterly dismissed, is it not? In other words, the cause of Lord Bordeaux’s breaking his promise.”

Wilhelm: “Yes. I believe you are already aware, but since that time, no matter to whom I bring the matter, their responses have all been poor. Everyone presses their lips shut and stubbornly refuses to speak the truth. I would very much like to hear just what it is that has made your tongues so heavy.”

Faced with Crusch, who showed no sign of trying to dodge the question, Wilhelm’s words became all the sharper. In response, Crusch closed her eyes once, then went on.

Crusch: “Once you hear it, there will be no going back. Even so, will you still seek an answer?”

Wilhelm: “—If this is an obstacle barring the road that leads to my wife’s killer, then I must step over it.”

That resolve was like tempered steel—bent for nothing.

At Wilhelm’s answer, Crusch exhaled slowly and deeply. To Ferris, it felt less like a sigh and more akin to relief and admiration.

It was an answer she had already anticipated—an answer she had been hoping for.

At that declaration from the Sword Demon, Crusch’s profile cast away its last trace of hesitation and had already reached a decision.

Crusch: “—His Majesty Randohal has passed away.”

Wilhelm: “—?!”

At that one statement of fact, Wilhelm’s eyes flew wide. Little by little, understanding flooded into his gaze. Yet his shock did not end there.

Crusch: “Not only that—the bloodline of all those related to the royal family has vanished from this world. The blood of the House of Lugunica, which had sat at the peak of this kingdom ever since its founding, here and now has been cut off.”

Wilhelm: “Nonsense! Something like that could never happen!!”

Still on one knee, Wilhelm lifted his face and bared his teeth as he roared.

Confronted with so preposterous a reality, the Sword Demon flew into a rage. It was only natural that he react so fiercely to the word “extinction” being spoken about the royal line. Because—

Wilhelm: “As one who once led the Royal Guard, this is not something I can simply let pass.”

Ferris: “…”

Crusch: “And yet, it is the truth. His Majesty lay bedridden, and the illness ravaged the royal blood itself. Not even the kingdom’s finest healing arts user could reach it.”

Crusch’s voice weakened just a little as she cast her eyes down. That was out of consideration for Ferris. To speak objectively of their failure to save the royal family—to save Fourier—made her hesitate.

However, in Wilhelm’s current state, he had no room to notice the two of them wavering.

Wilhelm: “Th-The royal family is… gone…? That… that can’t…”

He shook his head feebly from side to side, his composure torn to shreds, and Wilhelm’s posture collapsed. He hastily planted his hands on the floor to support his body, but the Sword Demon’s expression was frozen in a blend of shock and grief.

For a former Captain of the Royal Guard, the blow of hearing that the royal house to which he had once devoted his sword had been wiped out was immense. And at the same time, he must have clearly understood.

The reason behind Bordeaux’s abrupt change of heart, and why everyone without exception had rejected his pleas.

Wilhelm: “Ridiculous…”

He had been told again and again that the timing was bad, and

Wilhelm had surely tried to imagine the circumstances in his own way. But even so, not even he could have foreseen things coming to this.

The situation had raced far beyond anything the Sword Demon had imagined, straight into the worst-possible outcome. The king's death, followed by the deaths of the royal blood in turn—this was a calamity that concerned the very survival of the kingdom. Compared to that, the matter of the White Whale was trivial enough to be dismissed as a mere trifle.

Ferris watched Wilhelm as he grasped that truth and writhed in the face of such senseless reality.

He pressed his fist into the floor, the corner of his tightly bitten mouth beading with blood. Eyes squeezed shut in bitter frustration, the Sword Demon just silently trembled, unable to vent his rage.

To Ferris, his figure looked small, fragile, and unbearably pitiful.

There was no way anyone could see in that dim, shadowed soul the "Sword Demon" sung of in the glorious verses of the "Sword Demon Love Song."

—and Ferris's master would never, ever permit him to exist in such a soul-eclipsed state.

Crusch: "All you can do is quiver in remorse and self-loathing? Is that how the Sword Demon, whose name is known in song, chooses to dig in his heels?"

Wilhelm: "…Wh-What are…"

Crusch: "Listen. Your circumstances have not changed. All that has happened is that the 'mist' concealing your road has cleared, and the true nature of what was blocking your path has been laid bare. What did you feel when you saw that truth? Was it not you who roared that you would step over whatever you must to reach your wife's killer?"

Wilhelm: "I've no reason to endure such humiliation. You… what could you possibly understand?!"

Crusch: "I don't understand a thing. I don't even feel like making the effort to. Of course I don't. When someone I once admired as a predecessor in the way of the sword stops in place, shackled by resignation, what could that stir in me besides disappointment?"

At Crusch's words, fury colored Wilhelm's eyes. Yet the blaze was weak.

It was a flame with nowhere to go, flickering only faintly. It was still just a spark—nowhere near the heat and noble radiance Crusch demanded of him.

Crusch: "I told you already, Wilhelm. I warned you there would be no going back once you heard this. But that was not to give you an excuse to stand still. Not to drown you in helplessness."

Wilhelm: "Then for what? Why do you seek to drag me down?"

Even as she pressed on without mercy, the Sword Demon's eyes still held a burning rage. Meeting that gaze, which verged on hatred, Crusch raised a finger and thrust it straight at him.

Crusch: "Let's set one thing straight. Don't get the wrong idea, Wilhelm. I am the one who has been asking the questions. Your role is to answer. From the very beginning, I have done nothing but hurl the same question at you. When we crossed paths in the Prison Tower, and again now, in the moment I revealed the truth—I have been asking you the very same thing."

Wilhelm: "…"

Crusch: "Wilhelm Trias. —Are you truly content to stay like this?"

In that instant, Ferris, watching at her side, felt his whole body shudder.

Wilhelm too fixed his blue eyes wide on Crusch's stance. Neither of them could look away from her. Accepting those gazes, the beautiful noblewoman gave a firm nod.

Crusch: "Standing in your way is a crisis that threatens the kingdom's very existence. Faced with this unprecedented danger, there is no one in Lugunica who will lend their hand to your aim. Those who know the circumstances will not aid you. Those who do not know cannot possibly marshal the forces you need."

Wilhelm: "And you… what is it you intend to say to me?!"

Crusch: "The question continues, Wilhelm. I will keep asking it. I will keep demanding your answer. I have no words to give you besides what I have already asked."

Wilhelm: "…"

Wilhelm shut his mouth, his gaze sharpening as if to peer into Crusch's heart.

But not even the Sword Demon's eyes could cut their way into Crusch's heart. No matter how many people Wilhelm had crossed blades or words with, that meant nothing here.

Crusch was far larger than any person the Sword Demon had ever known. And the will that filled that vast vessel was the very same resolve bequeathed to her and Ferris alone by the Lion King.

Thus, Crusch Karsten went on questioning.

Crusch: "Wilhelm. At this rate, your path will soon vanish altogether. The vengeance you have pursued against that 'mist'-wreathed Witchbeast will evaporate like morning dew, and only the stain upon your twilight years will remain—just as your wife's honor has been dragged through the mud."

Wilhelm: "…And you would grant me a chance to swing my sword?"

Crusch: "I will say it again. Wilhelm, I do nothing but ask. The answer is yours alone to give."

Wilhelm: "…"

With Ferris at her side and the Lion King's will still burning in her heart, Crusch piled words atop that declaration. At them, the Sword Demon closed his eyes, drew a breath, and placed a hand over his chest.

Straightening his back, he readjusted his one-knee bow into the most formal of salutes. Then his eyes opened once more. The blue flames blazing in the Sword Demon’s gaze made Ferris’s spine tremble.

And then—

Wilhelm: “—Lend me your strength, so that I may cut down the White Whale and avenge my wife’s regret.”

Crusch: “Why ask that of me? I too am one of the nobles supporting this kingdom. My position is no different from that of the lords who rejected your plea or of Lord Bordeaux. Why seek it from me?”

Wilhelm: “Because, Duchess Karsten—because you are the same as I am.”

Answering her question in a low voice, Wilhelm continued, the blaze still in his eyes.

Wilhelm: “Duchess Karsten. Can you truly forgive that Witchbeast—the White Whale?”

Crusch: “—I cannot. I absolutely cannot. A creature so base, deeds so cruel, an outrage so monstrous, such mercilessness—who could possibly forgive it without a second thought? But.”

Breaking off, Crusch stared straight into Wilhelm.

Crusch: “What I can least forgive is that its very existence has stained the way so many people live. Their way of being is dimmed, their souls clouded… That, I cannot abide. Thus, Wilhelm, I also cannot abide the way you are now.”

Wilhelm: “…A most shameful figure I cut, then.”

Crusch: “Ah, shameful indeed. Hard to even look at. You don’t get many chances in life to taste such humiliation. Which is why the Witchbeast that caused it is no less unforgivable.”

Wilhelm: "…"

Declaring that, Crusch sharpened her gaze. Within her as well, anger was smoldering.

No doubt that anger had been there ever since before this meeting began—since the moment in the Prison Tower when she first laid eyes on Wilhelm. Since the moment she felt frustration at the sight of a Sword Demon who made rage his fuel, yet could do nothing with it.

Wilhelm: "And how, then, am I to let that anger go, Duchess Karsten?"

Crusch: "The answer is obvious. —When I see you as you truly should be, in a form your soul need not be ashamed of. The gallant figure of the Sword Demon, Wilhelm van Astrea. Nothing else is what I desire."

Wilhelm: "The name of the Sword Demon, the name Astrea—those are things I cast aside long ago. Until the very moment I cleave the White Whale apart, the names I abandoned will not return to me."

Crusch: "Then let me be the one to raise the victory cry. That will be the moment the 'Sword Demon' is reborn."

Wilhelm: "…Yes, my lady."

At Crusch's words, Wilhelm bowed his head deeply in solemn assent.

When she drew her chin back at that, her gaze slid to the side. Standing where she looked was Ferris, who had silently watched the exchange up to this point.

Receiving Crusch's look, Ferris went down on one knee before her with due reverence. Then, from his slender arms, he slowly presented the treasured sword he had been holding to his master.

Crusch: "Take it."

Crusch accepted the treasured blade from Ferris and, just like that, passed it on to the Wilhelm before her. The Sword Demon took it as naturally as breathing and drew the blade in one smooth motion.

The beautiful gleam of steel spun in his hand, and then Wilhelm offered the sword back to his liege.

Wilhelm: "…"

Crusch took it, and laid the edge of the treasured sword's blade lightly on Wilhelm's left shoulder as he knelt. She then moved it to rest on his other shoulder in the same way.

It was a sacred rite from antiquity, appointing him to the role of knight and formally binding master and vassal.

Crusch: "There is only one thing I ask of you. Never let that be sullied, Wilhelm."

Wilhelm: "My loyalty to you, in this sword. My debt to you, in this body. My vow to you, upon this soul."

Crusch: "—Ah, that will do nicely."

Accepting his words of oath, Crusch drew the sword back and held it at the ready in front of her.

Then once more she held the sword out toward Wilhelm. He took it, sheathed the bare blade, and lifted it high with reverent hands.

Crusch: "You keep that. A swordsman without at least one sword at his hip cuts a poor figure."

Wilhelm: "However…"

Crusch: "If I'm being greedy, it's simply because I want to see it. To see you standing there with a sword at your side."

At Crusch's wish, Wilhelm closed his eyes once, then rose to his feet.

The tall old swordsman bowed, fastened the gifted treasured sword at his waist, and stood with his back straight.

—Just that much was enough to make it plain, at a glance, that the Sword Demon's soul had regained its radiance.

Crusch: "What remains is…"

Ferris: "How we tie the Royal Selection together with the White Whale issue… right, meow? We also need to find some way to verify whether the White Whale data is actually accurate."

As Crusch muttered this with her arms folded, Ferris at last seized the chance to step into the conversation. Twitching his flax-colored cat ears, he kept the emotions stirred up by all that had happened tucked away in his chest.

Ferris: "I do think the compromise is that subjugating the White Whale will also earn Crusch-sama points in the Royal Selection… but even so, it's a huge job."

Wilhelm: "I would like to hear a more detailed explanation. This Royal Selection?"

Ferris: "Yup yup, I get it, I get it. You're not gonna understand a thing unless Ferri-chan starts explaining from there, meow. But before I get into all that, Ferri-chan has something important to say."

Behind the scenes reasons aside, Wilhelm knew nothing of the surface level circumstances. Ferris would have to explain the Royal Selection system to him—

But before that, there was one thing he absolutely had to make clear.

It was true that Wilhelm had received a sword and sworn himself as Crusch's retainer.

However—

Ferris: "But Crusch-sama's first knight is me. That's the one thing I'm never, ever giving up."

Even if he couldn't swing a sword properly, even if he never measured up as a knight in terms of martial skill, when it came to how much he loved Crusch, he would never lose—to anyone, save for one single exception.

Felix Argyle was, beyond all doubt, Crusch Karsten's first knight.

Ferris: "So don't you go getting the wrong idea, Wil-ji."

Wilhelm: "Wil… ji…?"

Ferris: "You're an old man named Wilhelm, so you're Wil-ji. And just so you know, I'm never calling you anything scary like 'Sword Demon,' so you better carve that into that thick skull of yours, okay?"

Pointing a finger right at him as he laid this down, Ferris left Wilhelm completely nonplussed. Seeing the Sword Demon show that expression for the first time, Crusch allowed herself a faint smile.

Crusch: "Indeed. My first knight is Ferris. That will not change, no matter what happens."

Wilhelm: "I have no objection to his position. Still, I cannot deny I feel some hesitation at calling a slender young lady with no proper training a knight."

Ferris: "Ugh, seriously, do I have to start explaining things all the way from there, meow?"

Wilhelm passed judgment in a manner befitting Ferris's behavior and appearance. At that, Ferris covered his face with his hand, while Wilhelm furrowed his brow deeply, baffled as to what was so funny.

Watching her two retainers like that, Crusch's smile only grew deeper.

Crusch: "It is strange, isn't it. Even though the path to the throne has such a gigantic Witchbeast looming across it."

As if even she found the feelings in her own chest a mystery, Crusch shut one eye. Then she murmured, barely loud enough for anyone but herself to hear.

Crusch: "—I don't feel like I could possibly lose, Your Highness Fourier."

9

Crusch: "—I don't feel like I could possibly lose, Your Highness Fourier."

Crusch's whispered words reached the eardrums of Ferris, who bore demi-human blood, in quiet fashion. Playing the fool as he dealt with Wilhelm, Ferris nearly burst into tears at that voice.

With the imminent Royal Selection right before them, Crusch had taken upon herself a burden she did not need to bear.

—Wilhelm's wish had nothing whatsoever to do with the great work of Crusch ascending to the throne.

Ferris: "Even so…"

It was precisely because she could not bring herself to abandon the Sword Demon's obsession that Crusch could truly be Crusch.

For Crusch Karsten, whom Ferris loved and whom Fourier had loved, there was no option of abandoning others. That was why Ferris would support her even for the share of the departed Fourier.

Ferris: "…"

Without realizing it, Ferris's hand had reached up to touch the white ribbon that adorned his hair.

That ribbon had been the first gift Ferris received from Crusch after being led out of the "Darkness." Besides being given the world of light and a way to use his life, it was the first present he had ever been given.

With a white ribbon identical to that one—a gift from Ferris—Crusch tied up her own hair. What he had been given and what he had given, everything about Ferris was connected to Crusch. Ferris's very existence, every last thing, was together with Crusch.

And so, from here on, no matter what might happen, Felix Argyle would—

Crusch: "—Ferris."

Ferris: "Yes, Crusch-sama."

Crusch: "I trouble you greatly. But I am counting on you."

Their eyes met, and within her gallant expression Crusch infused affection as she smiled at Ferris. That alone was enough for Ferris, swept about by the whirl of his emotions, to make a vow.

Ferris: "Leave it to me. —Until this soul burns itself out, I will remain at your side, Crusch-sama."

Chapter 2:
The Bloody Bride and her Amusing Servants
(LQ AI Translation)

1

Death was already looming right before his eyes.

???: "…"

His unmoving arms and legs were flung out on the ground, and with dried lips he repeated faint breaths.

He felt grains of sand upon his tongue, but not a single drop of saliva was secreted, and he could taste nothing. His body, its vitality completely dried up, was in a state of approaching death, and it was only a matter of time before he breathed his last.

Unconscious breathing that merely kept his life connected. When that ceased, his life would surely end as well.

???: "…"

Nothing rose to the surface in the mind that was on the verge of death. That was what was sad.

His body would not move, and the time he had left was very short. Even so, the head that was supposed to think had died. Nothing came to mind. Nothing could be remembered. Nothing could be thought.

His emotions had died before his body. And once his emotions died, death came to his spirit as well. Thus he became unable to think that he wanted to live, or that he wanted to die.

There had surely been a time when he had struggled desperately, wanting to live properly, not wanting to die.

Yet now, with the very end before his eyes, this body had no strength or will left to resist. Just like this, surely, with nothing at all, he would die—

Woman: “Hmph. What a wretched and ludicrous sight.”

The voice that suddenly reached him possessed a strength that trampled upon the emptiness of such a dead person.

His consciousness quivered faintly at the voice that was hurled down from overhead. However, the energy to raise his face, the spare strength to let out a voice, and the emotions that would stir up any sort of response, all of it had died.

Woman: “To think that I go out on a whim for a little trip, only for something so unpleasant to occur. Now then, what am I to do about it.”

???: “…”

Woman: “The sin of having offended my mood is a grave one. Even if you are but a child, I shall show no leniency for the weight of that sin.”

To a being that ought to have been dead, the voice kept on striking words down one after another.

He did not think of it as troublesome, nor as noisy, nor anything of the sort. His dead emotions did not allow him to think such things. He simply found it strange.

Why did this voice fixate upon someone who was about to die, or perhaps already dead? Because, at the very end of his life, he had come to want, no matter what, to know that—

???: “…”

Slowly, heavily, he pried open eyelids that were stiff as if glued shut, and looked the world straight in the face.

Eyes that had grown used to the darkness took an awfully long time to bring the world into focus. Then, when the blurred field of view finally settled with the passage of time, “it” was standing there.

Red, red, bright red, scarlet, deep crimson, like flames, a woman was there—

Woman: “What is with those eyes. They are the same blazing crimson as mine, are they not.”

For that alone, her bad mood until then and her good mood switched places in an instant. And with just a single word, the bright red woman continued.

Woman: “I am pleased.”

Both the body that was supposed to die, and the spirit that had been dead, were scooped up by the woman with the red eyes.

—The name Schult was the second thing, after his life, that the child received from the woman.

2

???: “—Fwaaah.”

Along with a yawn, the boy opened his crimson eyes, framed by long eyelashes.

It was still early in the morning. Through the gap in the curtains, the morning sun shone in; feeling its presence, the boy slowly pushed himself up in bed and lightly shook his pink-haired head.

He was a boy with a childish appearance. His age, he believed, should be eleven this year. His own grasp of that was somewhat vague, but what made it vague even to others was likely the fact that, compared to an average eleven-year-old, his body was quite small and delicate.

Perhaps as a consequence of never having lived in an environment suitable for a child, the growth of the boy’s body lagged far behind that of ordinary children. That said, he himself did not mind it.

For, precisely because he was like this, there was a blessedly important role waiting for him—.

???: “—So, you have finally awoken. To awaken later than I do, you lack the awareness befitting an attendant.”

???: “…Ah.”

The voice of a goddess brushed against the eardrums of the sleepily blinking boy. To call her a goddess was no exaggeration. At the very least, to the boy, the owner of that voice was without a doubt a goddess.

That the being who had given him life and a name was called a goddess, the boy only now, having come here, came to know for the first time.

And so, the boy—Schult—wriggled out from the bed, stepped before his own goddess, and knelt down right in front of her.

The goddess, clad in thin red nightclothes, sat in a chair with her long legs crossed, looking down, cheek propped on her hand, at the child kneeling at her feet.

Under that crimson gaze, Schult let a smile suffused with respect bloom upon his adorable face,

Schult: “Good morning, Priscilla-sama.”

Priscilla: “Early, is a description to which I must raise some objection, but very well. In deference to your adorableness, I shall forgive you.”

Schult: “Yes. Thank you very much.”

The goddess—or rather, Priscilla—narrowed the eyes of her unnaturally perfect beauty and gave the slightest nod at Schult’s greeting. Bowing his head at that attitude, Schult expressed his gratitude for her kindness.

Many of the turns of phrase Priscilla used were difficult for the uneducated Schult, but in every corner of her speech, mercy and forbearance overflowed. From the bottom of his heart, a sense of loyalty welled up in him to devote himself to her again today.

This was the Barielle Manor, Priscilla's bedchamber. The bed in which Schult had awoken was hers, and on most nights, Schult shared Priscilla's sleeping quarters with her.

The reason for that was—

Priscilla: "—Given the season, the nights are chill. Schult is just the right warmth to hold while I sleep. On that one point alone, I shall praise you."

Schult: "I am honored to be of use! I am very happy!"

Priscilla: "Do not make such a racket from morning. You are noisy."

Schult: "Yes! I will be careful!"

As Schult stood up and answered with all the volume he could muster, Priscilla had already lost interest. She lowered her gaze to the book resting on her knees and immersed herself in her daily reading.

Though free-spirited yet clever, Priscilla imposed a very regular routine upon herself.

She went to bed early at night and rose early in the morning. From early dawn until breakfast, she lost herself in reading, spending that time accumulating all manner of knowledge and stories.

Schult: "Priscilla-sama is far too amazing…"

Shallow in learning and still with so much yet to study in the manor, Schult could not hide his astonishment that the all-knowing, sage-like Priscilla still had not lost her desire to better herself.

However, thinking of the pinnacle Priscilla aimed for, perhaps that was only natural.

Schult: "I will work hard so that I can be of even a little help to such a Priscilla-sama."

Making that vow, Schult gave Priscilla a bow and headed for the door of the room. He had to return to his own room to change, then join the servants and apply himself to the manor's work.

Priscilla: "Schult."

As Schult was about to leave in such a manner, Priscilla called out to him.

Schult: "Y-Yes! Priscilla-sama, what is it? T-Tea… is it tea, perhaps?!"

Priscilla: "I acknowledge the thought, but I require no tea. You do remember what is to happen today, do you not?"

Schult: "Today, you say…?"

Tilting his head at Priscilla's question, Schult furrowed his well-shaped brows. Mustering all his memories at his master's words, he pondered what exactly made today special—

Schult: "—! It is Priscilla-sama's choosing of a Knight!"

Priscilla: "The servants are already pressed with preparations for that. You, at the very least, shall make yourself useful as well."

Schult: "Understood!"

Recalling that important duty and receiving Priscilla's encouragement, Schult energetically dashed out of the room. Then, hurrying to his own quarters, he slipped his arms into the small butler's uniform tailored just for him.

It may have felt a bit like he was trying to act grown-up, but the uniform on the handsome boy held a forbidden sort of charm.

Schult: "Good morning! I look forward to working with you again today!"

When Schult, in his uniform, dashed into the entrance hall, the manor's servants had already gathered there, about to begin their daily morning assembly.

The Barielle Manor was a large estate. With more than thirty servants, it had been quite the struggle at first for Schult to memorize all those adults' faces and names.

However, two months had already passed since Priscilla had taken him in, and by now he matched all of their faces to their names. They too had at first been bewildered by such an excessively young coworker, but now they treated him warmly enough that they could exchange smiles and words.

Thus, when Schult arrived at the morning assembly, normally a chorus of greetings would come back to him—

Schult: "Huh…?"

Yet no reply came to Schult from the servants standing with their backs straight. He felt a brief moment of doubt at his silent coworkers, but the reason soon became clear.

Leip: "—For the newest face to be the last to report for duty, you live quite the comfortable life, do you not."

Schult: "Ah… Master-sama…"

Before the lined-up servants, Schult shrank before the figure who snorted unhappily through his nose.

It was an elderly man with white hair, clad in black formalwear. His gaze was sharp, his expression brimming with a vigor ill-suited to his age, and in those eyes and in his voice there was not the slightest trace of leniency toward others.

Leip Barielle—the master of this manor, the Barielle household, and a noble of the Kingdom who was also Priscilla's husband. Rightly, he was a person whom Schult ought to revere as his lord.

Under Leip's sword-like gaze, Schult involuntarily caught in his throat. At the child's reaction, Leip's features twisted with irritation for a moment,

Leip: "Very well. I have no time to be preoccupied with trifles."

Abruptly losing interest in Schult, Leip turned to face the servants.

In that time, Schult also hurriedly slipped into line and listened to Leip's words as the man cleared his throat.

Leip: "You lot are doubtless aware of it, but Priscilla's bad habit of self-indulgent whims has shown itself again. Because of that, this house must devote effort to a needless event. —A most displeasing matter."

Servants: "…"

Leip: "Unlike usual, people of uncertain standing shall be coming and going. All of you are to bear that firmly in mind. To any trash who fails to recognize this place as Baron Barielle's manor, give treatment befitting them. Understood?"

High-handedly issuing his orders, Leip demanded affirmation from the servants. When they responded to his will with silence, he clicked his tongue and left the entrance hall, his footsteps ringing out.

Only once Leip's presence had completely receded did the atmosphere in the place finally slacken.

Maid: "That was unfortunate, was it not, Schult?"

Schult: "Ah, no, it is all right. Master-sama's words are true. It was because I was no good, no good at all, talking with Priscilla-sama and ending up as the last one here."

The maid of about prime age standing beside him tried to console Schult for having been glared at by Leip. But Schult shook his head with a smile, declining her comfort.

Leip's manner of speech was harsh, but that it was something to reflect on was the truth. He did not wish to set that aside, and for now he had to focus on his work.

Schult: "Just as Master-sama said, today will surely be terribly busy! I will help with anything, so everyone, let us all do our best!"

As Schult clenched his fist tightly and declared that, the servants exchanged glances. Then they smiled and lightly raised their hands in tune with their young coworker.

Surrounded by such kind people, Schult's hectic day truly began in earnest.

3

Priscilla: "—Truly, what a gathering of fools who know not their own station."

Hiding her lips behind a luxurious fan, Priscilla laughed provocatively as she gazed down at the scene below.

Her orange hair was gathered up with a jeweled barrette, her body wrapped in a blood-colored dress, her stance completed by an outfit that all the more impressed upon the eye her brutally beautiful features.

At the sight of Priscilla standing there, the sturdy men lined up in the garden raised their voices in rapturous cheers.

What filled the wide garden of the Barielle Manor was the frenzy of ferocious ruffians. The cause of that madness lay not only in their thick, booming voices, but also in the clash of the fighting spirit each of them exuded.

Behind those rough men, all the ornaments that usually decorated the garden's scenery had been removed, and in their place, a circular stone stage had been specially erected, stone slabs laid over the lawn.

For a stage, it lacked glamour, but the performers who would step upon it were who they were. To ask for more would be boorish.

Priscilla: "If it lack flowers, then enthrall me not with elegance, but with madness. Spill blood, burst flesh, let blades dance. Whosoever can amuse me upon that stage shall be granted the right to stand at my side."

Men: "…"

Priscilla's declaration was, in truth, the very wish and reward of the warriors gathered here.

—The Barielle Baron's manor, and the martial tournament to select a Knight.

The Knight who would serve Priscilla Barielle, wife of Baron Leip Barielle, was to be chosen by the results of this tournament. That was the purpose for which this event had been held.

For the warriors of the wilds, it was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity beyond all expectation—everyone present had come here from the outset seeking that honor.

However, the instant they laid eyes on Priscilla, such ambitions were blown from their minds. Before status or fame, the violent beauty of the woman they looked up to above them blew their heads clean away.

Her sensuality, almost fragrant to the eye, the bewitching demonlike face that seized their gaze and would not release it, the intense stare that turned their awareness to molten sludge—captivated by all of that, the frenzy of the men only burned hotter.

Watching the whirling enthusiasm, Priscilla once more covered her mouth with her fan and nodded.

Priscilla: "Strive as best you can, dullards. May the days in which you shaved your flesh and polished your souls prove worthy in my eyes."

She did not even attempt to conceal her haughty, overbearing demeanor as she loftily cast her words down upon them.

Yet instead of feeling anger at her vicious phrasing, the men made it the trigger to rouse themselves even further, their eagerness for the martial spectacle about to begin flaring up.

—All to seize, from one another, the right to serve at the side of that beautiful woman clad in a blood-red dress.

Schult: "As expected, Priscilla-sama's greeting was splendid."

Hearing Priscilla address the participants from the terrace and declare the tournament open, Schult was deeply impressed.

If possible, he would have liked to hear that greeting from directly at Priscilla's side, but that wish had not been granted. Schult, too, just like the other servants, was so busy he was running all over the manor.

With the holding of the tournament, the Barielle Manor, which served as the venue, was in an uproar with preparations. That busyness had reached its peak today, the very day of the event.

The servants were dashing about every corner of the house, and Schult was no exception. After all, it was exceedingly rare for so many outsiders to be allowed onto the grounds. Naturally, to guard against anyone harboring ill intent, the manor was under strict guard by Leip's private soldiers.

Schult: "Thank you for your hard work! I have brought you some refreshments!"

Schult's job was to deliver food and drink to those soldiers in charge of guarding the manor.

He truly wanted to be of more use, but there were not many tasks that could be entrusted to Schult, a child and a newcomer. For now, it was vital that he devote himself earnestly to the work he had been given.

Schult: "The red-prepared armor is so very cool…"

The soldier accepting the drink gave off a sense of a wry smile at Schult's muttered words.

Leip's private soldiers, clad in matching armor, had all of their breastplates painted a uniform, deep crimson. Red was Priscilla's color, and it was Schult's most favorite color in all the world. It was said that unifying the armor's color to red had been Priscilla's order, and it was truly cool. As expected of Priscilla-sama.

Schult: "But Priscilla-sama will not choose her Knight from among the soldiers, will she."

Carrying a tray loaded with empty dishes, Schult voiced that question.

Leip hated people who were useless, people who were incompetent. Therefore, every soldier belonging to his private force ought to be someone of assured family and assured skill.

In that case, Schult felt that choosing a Knight from among them would be the reasonable course.

Schult: “No, no, there is no doubt that Priscilla-sama has some truly amazing plan.”

Shaking off the doubt that had flickered through his mind for a moment, Schult reflected upon the fact that he had just now doubted his master.

Unlike Schult, wise Priscilla was sure to have some profound design.

Previously, when he had been taken along to the royal capital, he had met a person—a Royal Candidate, a woman who was to become Priscilla’s enemy—and she had also had a Knight with her, but that Knight had not looked particularly strong either.

The conditions required of a Knight, that was some “something” Schult could not even imagine.

Schult: “Besides, there is also… ah.”

Rough Man: “Huh?”

Lost in thought, he had neglected to look ahead.

He bumped into a large back directly in front of him, and Schult fell on his backside on the spot. At the same time, the tray he had been carrying dropped to the ground, and with a shrill crash the dishes shattered to pieces.

From the corner of the garden, the gazes of the rough men participating in the tournament all converged upon him. Schult’s cheeks went stiff under that pressure, and he fell into confusion for a brief moment.

Rough Man: “Hah? What is a brat doing in a place like this?”

In his frozen state, Schult heard the man before his eyes click his tongue.

The man had dusky skin and a muscular body covered in scars. His left eye was concealed beneath an eyepatch, and, looking down at Schult, still sitting on the grass where he had fallen, he said,

Rough Man: “That getup… you one of the manor’s servants? Ha, this is rich. If even a little brat like you is being used, sounds like the story about the Baron’s wife being all soft-hearted is true.”

Schult: “Ah, um…”

Rough Man: “Do not get so scared, squirt. If the house dog makes a mess in front of the guests, it is the master’s discipline that gets called into question. Hurry up and stand, and then clean up those broken dishes.”

Crouching down, the eyepatched man grabbed Schult’s small head in his palm. Schult, his face stiff as the man brought his own face close and breathed his foul breath upon him, managed a nod.

Just as the man had pointed out, Schult’s blunder might stain the servants’ reputation—that is to say, it might turn into ill repute for Priscilla, the mistress of the manor. That was something he wanted to avoid.

While exposed to the eyepatched man’s mockery and to the enjoyment showered upon him from those around, Schult rose on trembling knees and tried to apologize to him—

Rough Man: “Oops, my hand slipped.”

Schult: “…”

The moment he lifted his face, his forehead was pushed, and Schult fell on his backside once more. With that momentum, he toppled over backward. He stared dizzily, wondering what had just happened. A burst of laughter rose all around.

Schult: “Eh? Eh?”

Rough Man: “Gah-ha-ha-ha! My bad, my bad. Just forget it, yeah? If we end up working in the same place, it is a hassle if we start off hating each other, right?”

As the eyepatched man dusted off his knees and stood, laughing heartily, Schult’s eyes flew wide.

He understood then that he had been pushed, and immediately afterward he lowered his head in humiliation. He had been made fun of. That was what stung. It was not that he himself had been mocked. This was an insult to Priscilla.

It was an uncalled-for insult toward Priscilla, who had taken Schult into her service.

Schult: “I-I…”

His eyes brimming with tears of frustration, Schult came to understand the vague feelings he had been carrying in his heart.

Schult had been dissatisfied that no Knight was to be chosen from the red-prepared private soldiers. That was not because he questioned Priscilla’s judgment, but because the attitude of the rough men gathered here was far too lacking in respect toward Priscilla.

No matter how strong any one of them might be, Schult did not want to entrust Priscilla to any of them.

Even if Priscilla’s judgment was correct, for the first time, from the bottom of his heart, Schult thought that he disliked it.

And then—

???: “—So what, exactly, was supposed to be so funny about that just now? I totally do not get it.”

Rough Man: “Huh?”

A muffled voice cut in, and the eyepatched man wiped the smile from his face and turned to the side. Drawn along, teary-eyed Schult also looked that way, and for an instant, he entirely forgot his humiliation.

The appearance of the person standing there was so shocking that it left him unintentionally dumbstruck.

???: “Knocking a little kid over and then busting a gut over it is not exactly something pleasant to watch, you know. If you are going to fish for laughs, the least you could do is make yourself the butt of the joke.”

Objecting to the eyepatched man’s conduct, the newcomer idly toyed with the joints of the helmet that covered his head. The way he walked over at an easy pace, taken on its own, was not all that distinctive.

This was a place where martial skills would be tested. Many of those present wore appropriate equipment, and men in full plate were not uncommon.

However, the only proper-looking piece on him was the helmet that covered his head. From the neck down he wore the garb of a bandit and straw sandals on his feet; it was, without question, an appearance that could only be called bizarre.

Rough Man: “You… what do you think you are doing?”

To the man in the black helm, the eyepatched man threw an openly displeased question. The black-helmeted man, in turn, shook his head, going, “Nah, nah, nah,” and said,

Black Helm: “What I am “doing” is lodging a complaint, obviously. I just thought your tastes were trash. I am telling you this for your own good, so cut it out already. You said it yourself, did you not? We might end up working together as buddies here? If someone squeezes a rag out into your tea or something, do not come crying to me.”

Rough Man: “That is not what I meant, idiot. I am asking what you came here for.”

Black Helm: “What I came for? Pretty sure just about everyone here has the same goal, yeah?”

Rough Man: “With that arm of yours, huh.”

At the black helm’s surprisingly talkative reply, the eyepatched man jerked his chin in that direction as he spoke.

What his words indicated was obvious.

Clear to anyone’s eyes, the difference between the black helm and the others—setting aside his outlandish attire, there was another feature: his left arm was gone from the shoulder.

The man in the black helm was one-armed—and in martial arts, that was a tremendous disadvantage.

Rough Man: “Do not go shoving your way into a fight you have no chance of winning from the start, half-baked fool.”

Black Helm: “You put it that way, and I feel kinda weak myself. But as long as a guy is alive, he is free to hope he might have a one chance in a million shot, right?”

Rough Man: “Then you had better not complain if you lose that freedom right here. One of the conditions for taking part today was that you would have no problem if an “accident” happened.”

As the black helm shrugged, the eyepatched man answered, a dangerous edge mixing into his gradually lowering voice. The fighting spirit leaking from his entire body made Schult, standing so close by, shiver.

In today’s tournament, the participants were each allowed to use their own chosen weapon—in other words, even weapons with live blades. To put it bluntly, it was an event with death as a built-in premise.

In fact, Schult had overheard that there had already been deaths on the stage. By Priscilla’s strict command, he was forbidden from approaching the stone stage, so he had been spared the chance to witness it directly.

Rough Man: “It is a single-elimination spectacle before the Madam… If you are confident in your arm, you are bound to run into me somewhere.”

Black Helm: “Yeah, that much makes sense. I get the idea.”

Rough Man: “If you understand that and still will not back down, that just means you are a big moron who does not care about his life. …Not that I am likely to forget, but I will remember you, black helm. I shall make you regret having such a stupid dream.”

Black Helm: “For real? I have your face burned into my memory too, on account of your skin being darker than anyone else I have seen so far. Sounds like we got ourselves a real mutual thing going on here, huh.”

Maintaining his flippant tone to the end, the black helm made the eyepatched man snort irritably. Then the latter left the scene of the commotion without so much as a glance at Schult. A few of the men nearby went along with him, so it seemed he was taking part in the tournament as part of a small group.

Perhaps those companions had been the ones laughing when Schult had fallen on his backside earlier as well.

Black Helm: “Hey there, missy, rough one for you, huh. Can you stand?”

Just as Schult was thinking that, he blinked at the hand suddenly held out before his face.

Looking up, he saw that the one standing in front of him was the very same black helm. Looking back and forth between the helmet and the hand, Schult hurriedly sprang to his feet and bowed his head over and over.

Schult: “I-I have caused you trouble! Thank you very much!”

Black Helm: “No big deal, but honestly, getting my hand ignored stung more than anything. I do get that this look of mine is not exactly a hit with the ladies, though…”

Schult offered his thanks, but the black helm let out a sigh that sounded somewhat dejected. Many of the words he used were ones Schult did not understand, but there was one thing he realized.

Schult: “Um, I am not a girl. I am properly a boy.”

Black Helm: “Huh?! For real?! You are not some cute girl being made to dress up like a boy for reasons and stuff? With a face that cute?!”

When Schult corrected his misunderstanding, the black helm was far more shocked than he had been during his exchange with the eyepatched man.

Then, with the eyes hidden under his helmet, he looked Schult over intently. The gaze tickled.

Black Helm: “This twist, man, what a turn of events, I cannot even hide how rattled I am. If that is the case, I did not have to stick my neck out and get glared at by that scary guy to help you, huh.”

Schult: “Eh?! You would decide whether to help me based on whether I am a boy or a girl?!”

Black Helm: “Wah-ha-ha, it was a joke, joke. At that age, missy—nah, squirt—it does not really matter if you are a boy or a girl anyway. Well, if you had been a girl, there is a bit of a romantic dream in the idea that this would come back around ten years from now and some beauty would show up to confess her love because I helped her here.”

Schult: “I see, this romantic… is it.”

Priscilla’s remarks were hard to understand, but the black helm’s remarks were also quite difficult for Schult.

As Schult tilted his head at these unfamiliar words, he felt the man inside the helmet give a little laugh. Then, with his right hand, he roughly scrubbed Schult’s pink head.

Black Helm: “Anyway, watch yourself. Not everyone is like that guy, but it is also a hard fact that there are not exactly few like him either. It has always bugged me, why is it that folks in the mercenary trade end up all getting that same crude vibe? A refined gentleman like me really sticks out.”

Schult: “Pff! That is very funny. I am impressed!”

Black Helm: “Getting laughed at by that line is honestly not quite the reaction I was going for here!”

Taking the black helm’s jest as meant to ease his anxiety, Schult laughed. Seeing that, the black helm, satisfied, took his hand away and once more touched the joints of his helmet with that same hand.

The clacking of metal sounded; perhaps that was just a little habit of his.

Black Helm: “Well then, from now on make sure you look where you are going when you work. What happened just now was one of the better outcomes. If the next person you bump into is a real dangerous type, a good-natured old guy like me might not be able to step in to save you.”

Schult: “Y-Yes. Thank you very much for your warning.”

Black Helm: “Hey, do not worry about it. If you wanna think of this as a debt, just tell your master that the flashy-looking guy was a real nice old man, and give me a little boost in her eyes.”

Turning his back and waving his hand lightly, the black helm walked off. Watching that retreating figure, Schult noticed for the first time that at the man’s waist, there was a thick-bladed sword thrust through at his side.

That sword, wielded one-handed, was no doubt the black helm’s way of fighting. Even so, just as the eyepatched man had judged, Schult could not help but wonder how well he could really fare with only one arm.

As he watched the black helm’s back grow distant, Schult tightly gripped the hem of his uniform.

Schult: “If possible, I would like to speak with him again… so I wish for him not to die.”

He whispered that faint hope, for he had not looked very strong at all.

4

Leip: “Priscilla! Do not make me say it again! Your showing yourself before that rabble is far too stimulating! Behave yourself and wait in your room for the results!!”

That bellow seemed loud enough to smash through the door, rush down the corridor, and echo throughout the entire manor.

At the very least, Schult shrank back under that illusion. After all, the door the voice had just pierced was the very one he had been about to open. No one could blame the boy for instinctively yanking his hand back.

It was a voice he recognized. Or rather, there was only one person in this manor who both had that temper and possessed the right to raise such a roar—Leip Barielle.

And in answer to that roar came a beautiful voice with an edge as cold and sharp as a blade.

Priscilla: “This is an event I opened for mine own sake. If I do not witness it with mine own eyes, where is the passion of those common dolts to be directed? Even boorishness has its limits, old bones. Do not persist in spoiling my mood at every turn.”

Leip: “Old bones, you say…! Y-You… what do you… take me for…?!”

Priscilla: “Are you not the husband who used gold and ambition in excess to make me yours? Do not blow such trivial matters out of proportion. Do not forget that it is you yourself who are inconvenienced should you anger me. Although, to see ambition that has waited too long for its ripening rot and fall… that might be a diversion in its own right.”

Leip: “Gh… nghhh…!”

Even through the door, Schult could picture Leip with veins bulging on his forehead, grinding his teeth. The one mercilessly showering such words upon him was, in all likelihood, Priscilla with a look of boredom on her face.

Leip grew angry at Priscilla’s conduct, and she crushed his protests in return. That was an exchange that had repeated itself many times in the Barielle Manor over these past few months.

Leip: “To begin with! I was opposed to this! You have not the slightest understanding of how important the choosing of a Knight is! Lineage! Status! The Knight’s character is directly tied to the evaluation of the master’s caliber! And yet you would, of all things, choose such an important First Knight through this kind of farce as if it were nothing more than a game…!”

Priscilla: “I shall do exactly as I desire. That I overlook your schemes such as this is also by my whim. The fruition of your rigid, stubborn obsession shall depend on how well it can avoid offending my mood… Weigh each and every word and action carefully. Is that understood, old bones.”

Leip: “…”

Treated so offhandedly, Leip’s indignation at last hit its limit. Rough footsteps, as if he were kicking at the floor, rushed toward the door, and Schult turned pale and sprang backward. The next instant, the door was flung open violently.

Fortunately, he was not struck by the door as it swung open, but that was no salvation for Schult. Leip, finding him standing there in the corridor, clicked his tongue in disgust.

Leip: “Filthy little rat… If you have time to eavesdrop, put it to some use!”

Schult: “Y-Yes…!”

Made the target of Leip's venting, Schult bowed his head as if to endure a storm. Leip's barbed remarks were usually long from here on. However, this time that one line did not continue.

For a while, the old man opened and closed his mouth, let out a breath as if his words had deserted him, then shoved past Schult's shoulder and left the room. Stumbling, Schult leaned against the wall, and only after Leip's figure had disappeared from sight did he stroke his chest in relief.

Then, timidly, he peered into Priscilla's room. And there—

Priscilla: "Schult, is it. Come here. Show that face to me."

Schult: "Y-Yes, ma'am!"

Priscilla beckoned Schult, who had poked his face in, her expression listless. It was a look she rarely showed, and Schult blinked, then hurriedly ran to her feet.

Flustered, Schult thought that he wished he could be of some help. That face of his was gently taken between two white hands.

Schult: "Mugyu."

Priscilla: "Mm, how lovely. I was just now sitting face-to-face with a hideous visage, after all. My eyes have been sullied. Therefore, I shall wash them clean with your face. Remain just like that for a while."

Schult: "Uuu…"

Stared at from so close their breaths could touch, Schult's face flushed red.

The beauty so near at hand only deepened his embarrassment, and if he could, he would have liked to look away. However, the reason Priscilla favored Schult lay in those eyes of his. Priscilla's own twin orbs burned like fire, and Schult's twin orbs were of that same color—that, above all else, was the reason Priscilla had saved him.

Because he understood that, Schult could not avert his gaze from Priscilla. Even if he felt embarrassed, all he could do was let her do as she pleased.

Schult: “P-Priscilla-sama… may I… ask you something, if I may?”

Priscilla: “What is it. Speak.”

If he only waited silently, he felt as though he might suffocate. At Schult’s desperate question, Priscilla, still gazing into his eyes with single-minded intensity, nodded magnanimously.

Receiving that, Schult recalled the little commotion that had taken place in the garden earlier—

Schult: “Is there… anyone who seems likely to become your Knight, Priscilla-sama?”

Priscilla: “—Hmph.”

At his question, Priscilla narrowed her eyes, and suddenly Schult’s face was released.

Startled by the abruptness of it, Schult watched as Priscilla turned toward the large window that led outside—the one that connected to the terrace—and closed her eyes, listening to the frenzy drifting in from outside.

That closed expression did not clear. It was the same listless look she had worn at the beginning.

Priscilla: “Common rabble have gathered and gathered again, have they not. In numbers, they have exceeded my expectations, but in quality, they fall within the bounds of what I foresaw. A most uninteresting outcome.”

Soldiers loudly proclaiming that they were the ones for the job, clashing as they sought the seat of Priscilla’s Knight.

For those who had nothing to do with the status of a Knight, it was an honor to drool over. And unofficial though it might be, one who became Priscilla’s Knight would not remain merely the Knight of a baron’s wife.

For Priscilla was a participant in the Royal Selection that would decide the next king of the Kingdom of Lugunica. One who became Priscilla's First Knight would be granted a position of commensurate importance.

Thus, that she would set stringent conditions on the choosing of her Knight was only natural—

Schult: "Is there… no one strong, for you to choose, Priscilla-sama?"

Priscilla: "I do not cling to notions of strength and weakness. I have no interest in such things."

Schult: "Then, do you wish to take someone wise as your Knight, Priscilla-sama?"

Priscilla: "The presence or absence of wit is equally irrelevant. Before me, even a sage is but a simpleton."

Disappointment at the failure of her expectations dwelled in her eyes; contrary to the roar of the men outside, her heat was cooling. There was not the slightest sign that she was enjoying herself as entertainment; her gaze was more like that of someone watching a turf war in a livestock pen.

Priscilla: "At this rate, the choosing of a Knight shall be entirely impossible."

Schult: "Th-That… I believe… would be dangerous…"

Worried by Priscilla's languid murmur, Schult's voice trembled.

He understood how she felt, saying that she could not choose a Knight. He understood, but after holding such an extravagant event, if it all ended in a dud, the wrath of the participants would be easy to imagine. In that case, a clash between the participants and the private soldiers, and a catastrophe with blood raining down, was not out of the question.

Hearing Schult's words as his face went pale at the thought, Priscilla smiled thinly. At that sadistic smile, Schult shivered as if his spine had been licked by a tongue.

Priscilla: “I see. You raise an objection to my conclusion. In that case, Schult. You must already have some candidate here whom you believe suited to be my Knight, do you not?”

Schult: “Eh…!”

Priscilla: “Are you telling me to compromise without offering any alternative? I shall say this now: I shall forgive most insolence on account of your youth and your eyes… but insolence piled upon insolence shall not fit within my tolerance.”

Priscilla drew a folded fan from between the valley of her breasts and slapped it against her palm. The dry sound, though Schult had never actually been punished by Priscilla, carried the feel of a gesture that foreshadowed it.

Schult: “…”

Swallowing, Schult desperately racked his brain.

It was not because he was afraid of being punished by Priscilla. Naturally, that fear was there. But even more than that, what drove Schult was his endless loyalty to Priscilla.

Right now, Priscilla was asking for his opinion. If he could not answer that expectation, he would not be repaying the debt of having been taken in. That was what Schult found truly terrifying.

He thought, with all his might. What a Knight needed was neither strength nor wisdom.

Originally, Priscilla had come up with this idea of choosing a Knight because of a meeting in the royal capital with another female Royal Candidate. It was the “something” she had seen in that cat-eared Knight that was important.

Comparing that to Priscilla’s usual words and actions, Schult had a flash of insight.

And then, following that flash, he blurted it out.

Schult: “I-If it is a strange person, there was one!”

Priscilla: “…What?”

Schult: “There was a strange person in the garden! He should be one of the participants! I did not understand what he was saying at all, and also, he was really, really strange!”

Accompanying his words with gestures, Schult described the eccentric he had met in the garden—the man in the black helm.

Come to think of it, the black helm had told him to talk to Priscilla about him as well. He did not seem strong, and his cleverness was unknown, but there was no doubt that his personality had been impossible to pin down.

And, strange as he was, Schult had not disliked that black-helmeted man.

Schult: “I am sure that, if you saw that strange person, you would also think he is interesting, Priscilla-sama! So it is still too soon to give up, I believe!”

Priscilla: “…”

Breathing hotly as he finished, Schult fell silent, and Priscilla did as well. She pressed the tip of her folded fan against her own white chin and closed her eyes, just as she had earlier.

However, what came next was different from before.

Priscilla: “Ku, fufu.”

Schult: “Priscilla-sama…?”

Priscilla: “Hahaha! Of all things, you say there was an eccentric? I ask whether you have a candidate for my Knight, and you cry that you have an eccentric to offer me…”

Unable to hold it in, Priscilla laughed. Laughing, she placed the fan against the back of Schult’s neck, then twisted her wrist and drew the boy’s body toward her.

She caught the stumbling Schult against her chest, and looking down at the face so close before her, she said,

Priscilla: “Schult. —You are beginning to understand me, are you not. I shall praise you.”

Schult: “Th-Thank you very much…”

Priscilla: “Yet an eccentric… an eccentric, hm. To recommend an eccentric as my Knight… No, that is not it. The mistake lay from the start in using such a grandiose phrase as “choosing a Knight”.”

Holding Schult pressed to her chest, Priscilla nodded as if she had come to some realization. Looking up at her from within that warmth, Schult’s face burned red from the breathless closeness and embarrassment.

In any case, it seemed Priscilla’s mood had brightened, if only a little. Schult felt a faint pride at having contributed to that.

—The strange change in the garden occurred at that very moment.

Schult: “I-It has suddenly become quiet…?”

Blinking at the change, Schult saw Priscilla silently turn her gaze toward the terrace.

The change—that was that the fervor coming from the garden had suddenly fallen silent. The clashing of blades and shouts that had continued without pause from the stone stage were cut off in an instant.

It was not complete silence, however. What could be heard faintly was the confusion that a great many people had all embraced at the same time.

Seemingly intrigued by the change, Priscilla quickly made for the terrace. Schult hurried after her, following her back out into the cool breeze. He grabbed onto the railing and peered down.

There lay the cause that had brought silence to the stone stage.

Black Helm: “—Hey now, hey, getting totally turned off like that seriously bums me out, y'know? Who? Me."

Standing in the middle of the round stone stage, the one who declared that was the one-armed figure in the black helm.

A man whose features you could not forget once you saw them, his frivolous attitude, the unmistakable eccentric who had just been spoken of.

Those seeing him for the first time could not hide their surprise and bewilderment at his bizarre appearance. And for those who could, that one arm and that outlandish outfit looked like nothing but an insult.

Warrior: "…"

Facing the black helm head-on was a giant in full plate armor, with a longsword on his shoulder. Like the black helm, his face was hidden by his helmet, but from the neck down he was thoroughly protected by metal armor. In the way he leveled his longsword and in the fighting spirit leaking from him, Schult could feel his fierce anger toward the black helm.

Contrary to the surrounding confusion, the opponent clearly felt insulted by the black helm's manner.

Schult: "P-Priscilla-sama…"

Schult himself did not know why he had called upon Priscilla here. He simply unconsciously thought that the fight ought to be stopped.

Against that giant, he could not picture any future in which the black helm won. Yet that very black helm was Schult's trump card, the one who might break through Priscilla's boredom.

If he was lost here, and Priscilla's eyes clouded over once more, that was what Schult feared.

But ignoring Schult's anxiety, Priscilla ran her tongue over her lips. Her pink tongue traced sensuously along her crimson lips, and her white throat swallowed.

And then—

Priscilla: “—Interesting.”

He heard her murmur that single word.

Warrior: “I dedicate the outcome of this battle to Lady Priscilla Barielle!”

In that instant, the giant, noticing Priscilla standing on the terrace, raised his longsword as if in offering and shouted. As his declaration spread, the participants also noticed Priscilla, and once more heat swept through the garden in a roar.

Everyone present loudly wished for the exit of the oddball who had stepped onto the stage without knowing his place.

Exposed to that, the black helm cracked his neck.

Black Helm: “Whoa there, getting all fired up now, are we. And on top of that, the odds are a hundred to zero, huh? Nah.”

His muttered complaint was swallowed up by the cheers. However, the black helm paid no mind to the enmity of the crowd and simply looked up at the two silhouettes upon the terrace above his head.

Priscilla & Schult: “…”

He received the gazes of the red woman and the red-eyed boy, both directed at him, and—

Black Helm: “At the very least, it ain’t like the odds are zero. —Well then, guess I had better give it my best shot.”

Drawing the sword thrust behind his waist, the black helm strode forward at an unhurried pace.

As he closed the distance at his leisure with the giant who was once more bringing his longsword to bear, the battle began an instant later.

5

—To Schult, an amateur, the black-helmeted man’s fighting looked extremely strange.

Schult: “W-W-Wahh.”

Covering his face with his palms and peeking through the gaps between his fingers, Schult was looking down at the stone stage.

The fact that little cries, almost like screams, kept slipping from Schult’s mouth from time to time was proof of just how shaken he was by the battle. After all, in the fight unfolding on the stone stage between the black helm and the giant, anyone could see that the one in black was at a disadvantage—there was nothing to call it but dangerous to watch.

Al: “—Dah?! That was close! Hey, you are taking this way too seriously!”

Letting out such lines, the black helm kept desperately dodging the sword strikes the giant sent his way.

Sometimes he leaped back, sometimes he rolled, sometimes he crawled across the ground at incredible speed—evade, evade, evade. It was an exceedingly precarious, completely unrefined spectacle, one that made one’s heart pound painfully.

Up until now, Schult had not once—indeed, not once in all his life since he was born—seen a real fight with his own eyes. To him, it was one overwhelmingly shocking scene after another.

Schult: “…”

There was not the slightest trace of restraint in the slashes the giant loosed. In other words, if they hit, they were blows that would without fail take a life. And the black helm was slipping past them by the barest skin of his neck.

At any time, even at this very instant, it would not have been strange for the black helm’s head to go flying.

Schult: “Ah! Doing that again… hyaah!”

Priscilla: “It seems you are enjoying yourself, Schult.”

Schult: “I-I am not enjoying this at all…! That man in the helm is far too in danger!”

At the sight of yet another exchange missed by a hair’s breadth, Schult let out a scream, and Priscilla addressed him. Unable to take his eyes off the battlefield, Schult only shook his head at her, but hearing that, Priscilla murmured, “As I thought.”

Schult: “Priscilla-sama, has something happened?”

Priscilla: “It is nothing. I was merely impressed that your eyes are not only beautiful. —He is indeed, just as you described him, perfectly adequate as a clown.”

Schult: “U-Um…”

Priscilla: “He understands how to rouse the crowd. In all likelihood, he has long made such things his trade. And that helm is an imitation of the Sword Slave King’s… Given that, I can imagine well enough what his background is.”

Leaving a bewildered Schult behind, Priscilla quietly stacked up her own conclusions inside herself. Schult had been staring, entranced, at her profile, but at a great roar of voices he hastily turned his gaze back.

Surely the black helm had—but what spread out before him was the exact opposite of what he had imagined.

Black Helm: “—So yeah, that makes it my win. Sorry, but save dedicating your victory for another time.”

Warrior: “N-No way…”

In the center of the stone stage, the giant lay fallen on his back.

Blood was flowing from his right leg, and with his helm stripped off, the giant had the blade of a sword pressed against his exposed neck, his movements completely sealed.

The match had not been decided by death, but the outcome was clear to anyone's eyes.

Black Helm: "All right, all right, everyone, quit spacing out. I get that some of you might have complicated feelings about me ending up taking the win here, but having a big heart is important for being a Knight too, yeah?"

Looking around at the spectators fallen silent at the conclusion, the black helm sheathed his sword and spoke with a shrug.

Those who had been struck dumb by the unexpected result were stunned by what felt like a provocative remark from the black helm, and in the next moment, their anger swelled.

Driven by a fierce emotion, some even went so far as to put a foot up onto the stone stage.

And that—

Rough Man: "—Do not get carried away, you fucking helm."

Black Helm: "Ah, it is you. I remember, I remember. You stand out for that dark skin and that nice big sty on your eye."

Pointing with his free hand around his own left eye, the black helm answered in a joking tone.

His opponent was the eyepatched man who had been glaring at him over Schult earlier. Perhaps he and the giant who had just been defeated were comrades, for he shielded the injured man behind him as he faced the black helm.

Rough Man: "You really stirred things up, huh. Damn acrobat, screwing around."

Black Helm: "The rules… well, the regulations, anyway, would not picking a fight with me here be against those? I do not see this as that sweet a situation that it would be worth getting yourself disqualified."

Rough Man: "In the end, the victor is going to beat everyone in some form or another. If I kill you here and now, how much trouble do you think that causes?”

Black Helm: “Put like that, I kind of feel you might be right though…”

Fiddling with the joints of his helm with his fingers, the black helm shook his head with a displeased air at the eyepatched man’s killing intent.

However, not only the eyepatched man, the mood of those around them as well was flowing in the direction of wishing for a showdown between the two. The hostility toward the black helm from the people nearby had yet to fade. If anything, thanks to what he had said just moments ago, a darker heat might well have grown.

Perhaps judging that he would not be able to slip away from that atmosphere, the black helm let out a sigh.

Black Helm: “Guess I got no choice. Just do not hold a grudge if I cannot live up to your expectations…”

Priscilla: “—No. There is no need.”

Black Helm: “Huh?”

A vivid voice cut off the black helm just as he was resigning himself. At the sound, the eyepatched man raised his voice reflexively, and, realizing who had spoken, stiffened.

Priscilla: “Twice I shall allow you to hear it. That there is no need. However, a third time shall not be forgiven.”

Fluttering her open fan, Priscilla, having intervened, cast her words down upon the battlefield below. In response, the fervor that had been on the verge of boiling over subsided in an instant.

At that momentary change, Schult, though surprised, also felt relieved, and in his heart he praised her as expected of Priscilla. Now the black helm would not be hurt, and things could smoothly return to the original progress—

Priscilla: “—With this, I shall draw the curtain on the audience match. You there, clown. I have chosen you.”

Black Helm: “…Huh? Me?”

Rough Man: “Wh—at?!”

At her words, the black helm, toward whom Priscilla was pointing the tip of her fan, pointed in surprise at himself. A heartbeat behind the movement of those two, it was the men in the garden who raised their voices in shock.

The eyepatched man in particular was greatly taken aback; he turned to look up at Priscilla above his head.

Rough Man: “W-Wait, Lady Barielle! No matter how you look at it, that guy is just—”

Priscilla: “…Lady Barielle? Ah, you mean mine own self. I doubt I shall ever grow used to that name, no matter how much time passes. At any rate, I care not. My decision shall not change. This is the end.”

Rough Man: “Th-This is insane…!”

Faced with Priscilla’s attitude, which gave him nowhere to latch on, the eyepatched man was struck dumb.

Behind him, the black helm, deciding that now that everyone’s attention was elsewhere was his chance, quietly leaped down from the stone stage. Slipping through the enclosure as he was, he snuck away from the center of the commotion.

Rough Man: “—! Get back here! Th-This ridiculous nonsense… What is the Baron, what is Baron Barielle doing about this!”

Only after a delay did the eyepatched man notice the black helm’s escape, and he raised his voice, seeking where the responsibility lay.

Similar cries rose from other participants as well. In a single instant, the direction of their anger shifted away from the black helm and toward the Barielle baronial house, who had held the tournament only to overturn it and turn it into a farce.

Their dissatisfaction exploded, and it seemed it could not be settled without blood being spilled.

That was what it seemed—

Leip: "—Did you not hear what my wife said? It is over. I must ask that you take your leave."

The one who declared that so imposingly, a strange short cylinder grasped in his hand, was Leip.

Behind Leip, who had appeared in the garden, there was a line of armed soldiers in red-prepared armor. At a single order, they were ready to move into an attack. With that one move, they had preempted the ruffians who were on the verge of turning into a mob.

And as warriors, they understood that that one move was a fatal one that could not be bridged.

Thus they could not move, stripped of any choice but to stand and listen as a one-sided demand for surrender was read out to them.

Leip: "On this occasion, I extend my thanks for your attendance at my house's event. For our part, as my wife's request has been fulfilled, we have no complaints. I ask that you take your leave without delay."

Men: "…"

It could hardly be called courteous. By that point, it was nothing more than a simple order.

Under Leip Barielle's overbearing proclamation, the men, eyepatched one included, could not talk back. And so, for some time, there followed a stretch in which no one could say anything at all.

—The tournament thus ended, leaving a terrible feeling of being unfulfilled in the majority.

6

Leip: “Priscilla! What are you truly thinking?! We were but one step away from this turning into a full-scale riot! Do you mean to bring ruin upon the Barielle family?!”

Priscilla: “I have no interest whatsoever in what becomes of this house. Do not indulge in such repulsive imaginings, old bones.”

Once the rough men had been driven from the grounds and the manor had at last been able to take a breath, the customary, entirely one-sided quarrel between husband and wife broke out within.

Face reddened with fury, Leip raised his voice so much that the veins on his brow looked as though they might burst. From his point of view, the event had begun against his wishes and ended against his wishes. He could not possibly remain calm after having been led around by the nose by Priscilla from beginning to end. On top of that—

Leip: “—Even had it been a foolish event, I could have forgiven it if there had been some harvest. But! On top of nearly inciting a riot on a mere whim of yours, the one you left at the end was, of all things, that man?! Do you have any idea just how heavy a responsibility you bear?!”

Priscilla: “You are the one who, how many times will you repeat yourself before you are satisfied? I shall do exactly as I desire. And all of it is correct. That is the will of heaven, and it is my path of conquest.”

Leip: “Enough! Cease this! I am sick of your twisted logic! You are not in your right mind!”

Priscilla: “Do not force upon me such pointless debates over sanity or madness. To begin with, who is to guarantee your sanity. Do not line up such tedious words and disturb my good mood.”

With his hand to his brow and his head hanging, Leip looked somewhat older. By contrast, utterly unconcerned with him, Priscilla paced about the room in high spirits—yes, in very high spirits.

She had been repeatedly opening and closing her fan for some time now, and her cheeks were faintly flushed with heat. Unconsciously, even to herself, a sensual allure overflowed from that figure, enough that even an old man who had long forgotten what it was to be a man would feel a thirst awaken.

Leip was no exception. However, the old man bit down on his own change and protected himself by smothering it under his anger.

The tournament had ended halfway, and the dissatisfied participants had been dismissed in a manner that was little better than being driven out. Within the manor, the cleanup of the affair was still ongoing. And the fruit gained on this day by going so far was—

Schult: "—Priscilla-sama, Master-sama, is this a good time? I have brought him."

As the foul atmosphere in the room stagnated, the sound of a knock from outside cut in between the couple. At once, as if she had been waiting for this, Priscilla's twin eyes sparkled,

Priscilla: "Mm, I permit it. Enter."

Leip: "Gh…"

At both Priscilla answering before him, and at the servant calling to Priscilla before him, Leip twisted his lips in humiliation.

In the meantime the door opened, and Schult entered with a tense expression on his face. Following behind him,

Black Helm: "Man, getting called in by big shots like this… for a small-gutted guy like me, it does not exactly feel like I am still alive. And since you really went and sent all the other guys packing, I guess you are not joking around here, huh."

Clicking the joints of his helm together, the one-armed black-helmeted man muttered that with a wry tone.

Taking a casual look around the room, the black helm shrugged toward Priscilla, who was standing at its center. At that insolent attitude, Priscilla said nothing, merely folding her fan and pressing it to her lips.

The gaze within the helm and Priscilla's crimson gaze tangled together, and at length the black helm let out a breath and said,

Black Helm: "It is an honor to have been invited… So, should I, like, kneel down or something?"

Priscilla: "It matters not. There is no meaning in empty, merely formal behavior like that of the rabble. What you ought to show me is where your value lies. Otherwise, there was no point in my having summoned you."

Black Helm: "You are one scary woman. …Sure hope I did not pick the wrong place to latch onto here."

Leip: "You cur! What is that manner of speaking toward my wife!!"

Though it was hard to believe they had only just met from the way the two were speaking, it was Leip, watching from the side, whose patience ran out first. The old man strode briskly up to the black helm, spitting as he railed at his insolent manner.

Leip: "Your impudent words and conduct! And on top of that, even when summoned here, you still keep your face hidden—what is the meaning of this! A braggart thug like you, I ought to cut you down here and now for your discourtesy…"

Priscilla: "Old bones."

Leip: "What is it! I am speaking at the moment—"

Priscilla: "You are noisy."

With that word, Priscilla's blow was unleashed; her closed fan struck Leip on the back of the head in a single blow, and the old man, whose face had been flushed red, crumpled to the floor without a sound.

Having felled her husband with a blow, even the black helm could only stare in amazement at such outrageous behavior.

Priscilla: “Schult, take him out. Roll him out into the corridor, then come back.”

Schult: “A-At the very least, I shall inform the others first, before I do so. Heave-ho, heave-ho…”

At words hardly befitting a married couple, Schult took hold of the fallen Leip’s feet and answered. Then the boy, straining with all his might, dragged the large old man out of the room.

As the door closed with a sound, only Priscilla and the black-helmeted man were left inside.

Priscilla: “Well then, at last the nuisances are gone and I can breathe easily.”

Black Helm: “…It might not be my place to say this, but is that not a little too eccentric? And being suddenly alone with some guy looking this shady, that is quite a bold move too.”

Priscilla: “Do you imagine that you could do anything to me? Do not be so conceited, commoner. The only one who can do anything to me is myself. No other being can do this or that with me.”

Priscilla thrust out her chest in complete confidence. Seeing her ample bosom sway as though it might burst free, the black helm shook his head with a “good grief” and let out a breath.

Black Helm: “Man, I am beat. This is a tougher customer than I imagined. In that case, just what am I supposed to show you so that I can measure up to your standards, Princess?”

Priscilla: “Let me see. —Show me that you can survive.”

A sultry smile bloomed upon her lips, and in the next instant Priscilla’s figure spun at high speed.

She snapped open the fan in her hand and let it swim through the air to block the black helm's field of view. The move was so sudden that the black helm knocked the fan away with his right hand. However, by that time Priscilla had already slipped around to his flank, and with an outstretched hand she drew from his waist his weapon, the broad-bladed sword.

Priscilla: "Fff—"

With a short breath, the naked blade flashed. Riding the force of her spin, the edge swept horizontally across the black helm's neck.

—She had him, without question. It was such a brilliant cut that anyone would have been certain of it.

Black Helm: "…Now this is what they really mean by "hanging on by the skin of your neck," huh."

However, what the fully swung blade cut was only the thin strip of skin on the neck of the man who had jerked backward.

It had been a blow such that one could vividly picture his head flying and blood gushing out in great arcs. And yet, in the most literal sense, by a hair's breadth, the black helm had avoided it.

Pressing his right hand to his neck, where the skin had split slightly and a single line of blood was running, the black helm said,

Black Helm: "Cut the sudden stuff out, Princess. You are not gonna hit me with some surprise follow-up, right?"

Priscilla: "You may rest easy. With that, I have uncovered most of your tricks. Hm, you are indeed interesting."

In answer to the black helm's fearful question, Priscilla gave a faint smile and tossed the sword back to him. Seeing the naked blade spinning rapidly end over end, the black helm reached out toward the spot where it would land,

Black Helm: "Yeah, no way I am catching that!"

Only for him to pull his hand back, so that the sword sliced through the room's carpet and stuck into the floor.

Priscilla: "What is the meaning of this, dullard. This is my room. What do you intend to do about this carpet."

Black Helm: "That is not my fault! No matter how you look at it, that was you blowing yourself up, Princess!"

While protesting against Priscilla's accusation, the black helm retrieved the sword sticking from the floor. Then he picked up the fan that had also fallen to the floor, gave it a light brush, and held it out to Priscilla.

Black Helm: "By the way, how am I supposed to take what just happened? Am I allowed to think I measured up to your standards, or did you call me here to personally guillotine me for my insolence?"

Priscilla: "As long as you can amuse me to a degree that exceeds the value of this carpet, I shall keep you by my side. What you just did, your conduct in the little entertainment earlier… You have the qualifications to be kept by me as a clown."

Black Helm: "Heh heh, much obliged… Wait, a clown? Not a Knight?"

Finding this different from what he had heard, the black helm voiced his surprise. In response, Priscilla folded her arms, fan still in hand, making her chest bounce as if to show it off, and said,

Priscilla: "What is this, do you wish to become my Knight? Is the title itself so important to you?"

Black Helm: "…Ah, no, yeah. I am not really hung up on titles. Besides, a cool position like Knight is not something that suits me."

Priscilla: "Hmph."

Letting his earlier vehemence vanish at once, the black helm lowered his tone as he toyed with the joints of his helm. Narrowing her eyes at the gesture, Priscilla gave his helm a light tap with her fan.

Priscilla: “And why is it that, even when you stand before me, you still do not remove that helm? What is your intent?”

Black Helm: “Ah, I messed up a bit, and now my face is not really something I can show people. I would not want to spoil your mood, Princess, so bear with it. If you cannot trust me without seeing my face…”

Priscilla: “It is fine, I shall allow it. I have no interest in your face.”

Black Helm: “That so. That makes things easier. Still, I ought to at least give you my name.”

Skipping formalities to the utmost, Priscilla forgave the black helm’s discourtesies one after another. Letting out a breath at that way of being, the black helm placed a hand to his chest in a show of respect and said,

Al: “—Aldebaran. That is my name, Princess. I would generally like to go by Al, but I will give you the full thing properly for you. You are my master, after all.”

Priscilla: “It is not a bad sound. I shall remember it, Aldebaran. And I have a generous heart. I shall not casually refuse the request of my retainer. I shall call you Al.”

At Priscilla’s answer, Aldebaran—Al—bowed his head deeply in gratitude.

In that way, a bond of lord and vassal was formed between the two. Originally, Priscilla ought to have proceeded as she was and performed the ceremony to make Al her Knight, but—

Priscilla: “I shall keep you by my side as a jester. I have no intention whatsoever of performing any Knightly investiture.”

Al: “That suits me fine too. It would just make me feel all itchy and ticklish down my back.”

Sharing such unorthodox views, Al nodded over and over at Priscilla’s declaration.

And once the two of them were in agreement, there came a hesitant knock at the door. At the sound, Priscilla called, “You may,” and Schult timidly peeped his face in.

Schult: “I have taken Master-sama back to his room. I have heard that there is no danger to his life.”

Al: “If there was danger to his life after that, what I saw would just plain be the scene of an assassination, you know…”

Al muttered that in response to Schult’s report. But Priscilla did not spare the condition of the husband she had struck down so much as a passing thought, and instead pointed the tip of her fan at each of the two attendants lined up before her.

Priscilla: “Schult, this is Al, my jester. Al, this is Schult, my page. The two of you are both strays I have picked up, so you are to get along as well as you can.”

Al: “Calling us strays sounds pretty bad, you know. Kiddo… you think so too, Schult-chan?”

Schult: “To call me a stray you picked up… it makes me blush.”

Al: “Hopeless.”

Seeing Schult blush happily at being treated as Priscilla’s property, Al grumbled.

At the child’s attitude, Priscilla nodded. Then she covered her own mouth with her open fan and said,

Priscilla: “From here on, I shall throw myself into the struggle to sit at the pinnacle of this kingdom. It is a contest whose outcome is already clear, yet the road there shall be rough enough. Al, I charge you with clearing the way along that path of mine.”

At the revelation of the true background lying behind this tournament—the Royal Selection to choose the king—Schult gasped. It was information that was still not public, and it ought to have been the first time Al had heard of it as well.

Naturally, one would have expected Al to be appropriately shocked at how suddenly the scale of the talk had grown.

However—

Al: “Got it, Princess. Just leave it to me. I came here for that very reason.”

Without even a moment’s hesitation, Al met her words with a firm nod.

Priscilla: “Naturally. So long as you attend at my side, you are to answer that honor with deeds worthy of it. —For, including you, this world is made in the way most convenient to me.”

At Al’s reply, Priscilla likewise nodded magnanimously without the slightest sign of being shaken.

In this way, into the camp of Priscilla Barielle, participant in the Royal Selection, there was added not a Knight but rather the attendant Aldebaran, and a new relationship of lord and vassal was born.

7

Al: “You sure are in a good mood, Schult-chan.”

Schult: “Yes! I am very happy!”

Leaving Priscilla’s room, Schult’s voice bounced with joy in response to Al’s words as they walked side by side down the corridor.

Al, newly added to the camp, was currently being shown around the manor by Schult. While the other servants were busy cleaning up after the event, this was the task entrusted to him. Of course he would be eager. Besides, if anyone other than Al had been chosen by Priscilla, he would surely not have felt this light-hearted.

Schult: “I had been hoping that you would be the one chosen by Priscilla-sama, Al-sama.”

Al: “Oh, for real? Guess cranking out that “raise-the-affection-meter” event back there paid off, huh. Stepping in to help was the right call after all.”

Schult: “Ah, that you protected me does not have very much to do with it.”

Al: “It does not?!”

As Schult guided him around the facilities—the archive, the dining hall, the bath, the toilets—conversation flowed between the two.

It was true that Al had surprised him by stepping in to shield him from the eyepatched man’s malice in the garden, and Schult was grateful for that. But that and the matter of Priscilla were separate.

There was only one reason Schult had recommended Al to Priscilla—

Schult: “It was because I felt that you would treat Priscilla-sama with care, Al-sama.”

Al: “Treat her with care? Pretty sure the rest of those guys would too, y’know. She is the one paying them.”

Schult: “That is true… but they are different. The others somehow had the same look in their eyes that Master-sama does when he looks at Priscilla-sama…”

Al: “You mean they were looking at her in a lewd way? If that is it, then I probably am not an exception either. You just cannot see it because I have the helm on.”

Letting a hint of something like lust seep into his tone, Al gave a low laugh. But Schult shook his head firmly at that attitude, saying,

Schult: “You are different from Master-sama and the others, Al-sama. That “lew…d”…? I do not really understand it, but I am sure it is completely different. It is only something I somehow feel, though.”

The child’s voice, so confident at first, gradually lost its certainty. Al fell silent for a moment at that, then soon scrubbed roughly at Schult's head with his one arm.

Al: "Well, being counted on like that does not feel bad. Given the choice, I would rather be liked than hated anyway."

Schult: "Yes! Let us do our best together for Priscilla-sama!"

Still held by the head, Schult's face lit up at once. Al gave a wry smile at that adorable expression, tilting his head.

Al: "But Master-sama's way of looking at the Princess, huh. They were going at it pretty loud, but is that how that married couple always is?"

Schult: "If you mean their usual attitude, then yes, that is right. Priscilla-sama and Master-sama are always like that. I would like them to get along…"

Schult dropped his gaze, thinking that that would likely be difficult.

It went without saying that Priscilla was clever, and Leip's wits were sharp as well. Schult did not really understand it, but it seemed that when two clever people were involved, their differences in thinking often made them clash. That the two of them argued so much surely had something to do with that.

Al: "…It is better for a married couple to get along, that is for sure."

Schult: "Do you have a wife, Al-sama?"

Al: "Sadly, my circumstances have not allowed for that. I do not even have a sweetheart, never mind a wife. I am the type who wants to marry for love, so I would want to take my time dating someone. …What about your parents, Schult-chan?"

Schult: "I was abandoned, so I do not remember them very well."

Al: "Whoa, land mine."

He had almost no memory of his family. He only remembered that they had been poor. That was why he had been abandoned to reduce the number of mouths to feed, then treated like a slave by the ones who picked him up, and there too he nearly died—

Schult: “Thanks to that, I was able to meet Priscilla-sama, so I am grateful to my family.”

Al: “…That so. Well, maybe that is better than moping over it.”

With a light thump-thump, Al once more tapped Schult on the head in response. Perhaps touching people’s heads was a habit of his. Schult did not dislike it, but Priscilla might.

Schult: “Al-sama, I am sure you should not go patting Priscilla-sama so carelessly.”

Al: “I pick my targets, all right. Reading the room is kind of my specialty.”

Letting out a wry chuckle at the warning, Al fiddled with the seams of his helm and glanced off to the side. His gaze went to the corridor window—to the view of the garden that could be seen from there.

Down there, the manor’s servants were rushing right and left, hard at work repairing the garden.

They cleared away the circular stone stage, secured places to replant the garden trees, and filled in the dug-up earth—

Schult: “Everyone is very busy…”

Al: “Cleaning up after a festival is always like this. …Though the real cleanup is only just getting started.”

Schult: “—? You mean putting the trees and stone statues back, and so on?”

Al: “Nah, I mean that grudges you buy from people are a scary thing.”

When Schult asked if he meant the work to come, Al replied with those hard-to-understand words. Hearing that only deepened Schult’s confusion.

Al: “Well, guess we will just have to watch how the Princess handles things. Come on, we are going to be following her orders, so we strays she picked up ought to start getting along.”

Schult: “Getting along… I am looking forward to that. What shall we do?”

Al: “Let me see… How about I tell you a really amazing story. Every last bit of it is something that is not in your dictionary, Schult-chan.”

At that preface, Schult’s eyes began to shine, and Al continued, saying,

Al: “—Because it is a story about the world beyond the Great Waterfall, a world no one knows.”

8

—Leslie Gabbat was a first-rate mercenary who had survived countless battlefields.

He skillfully wielded a longsword, and by employing earth and wind magic he strengthened himself and turned the terrain to his advantage. His exploits on the battlefield were famous, and because he did not let his allies die, he was even called “the Benefactor.” Of course, he was not so soft-hearted as to save just anyone.

In Leslie’s view, the reason he did not let his allies die was simply because that way his odds of victory increased. He did what was necessary to raise his own chance of survival. There was no other reason.

Yet for some reason, comrades gathered around Leslie, who showed no mercy to his enemies but would extend a hand to his allies whenever they were within reach.

He bound those sorts together and staked his life as the head of the group. —That sort of position did not suit his nature.

Even so, gathering allies whose way of fighting and thinking lined up with his was in keeping with the methods he had learned to survive on the battlefield.

As he continued to fight like that, the number of comrades who had gathered before he knew it grew, and each time what he did not want to lose swelled, Leslie found himself thinking.

—I want a more stable position, an environment where I can keep these people together and look after them.

It was around the time Leslie began harboring that wish that Leip Barielle approached him.

To hold a martial tournament gathering men from outside the nobility, and there decide upon the baroness's Knight.

That was the gist of the information Leip brought him; in effect, it was the same as a recruitment from the baronial house. Knowing it was a chance to come under the banner of a noble of the kingdom, Leslie leapt at the offer.

If he showed his ability, then Leslie's band would become, fair and square, part of the Barielle family's forces. In that case, he would be able to feed his comrades more safely than now.

In fact, the tournament progressed just as Leslie had hoped. Since Leip, the host, was pulling the strings behind the scenes, it was only natural that things proceeded in a way that put them at an advantage. They steadily cut through the other participants, and if they were the last ones standing, they would be appointed Knights.

—At least, until those expectations were shattered by the red woman and that aggravating black helm.

The plan fell apart, Leslie and his men were betrayed by their backer, and they tasted humiliation.

Many others who had been there besides him could not accept that outcome. But their disappointment was nothing compared to Leslie's despair. That sensation of the ground crumbling beneath his feet was exactly what he felt.

What should have been good news to bring back turned into ill tidings instead, and his comrades' anger at knowing that their leader's face had been dragged through the mud was immense. It should originally have been Leslie's role to stop them.

The opponent was a noble of the kingdom, not someone a mere mercenary band ought to lay a hand on. Backing down and swallowing their tears would have been the correct choice. —And yet, he could not endure it.

Leslie: "We will… make that old man—Leip Barielle and Priscilla Barielle both—understand."

Leslie's anger, the anger of Leslie and his men, was something they needed to know.

He could not bear for them to think that things had ended there, that the cleanup was finished.

He gathered comrades scattered across the land, had their weapons sharpened anew, shared their anger, and waited for the time to come.

And thus, Leslie and his band swore revenge upon the Barielle family—

Beastman: "—Well now, that all? This turned into a way easier job than I thought it'd be."

To Leslie, on the verge of death, that anticlimactic voice sounded thick with disappointment.

The attack on their base had come without warning. On the eve of the day they were to carry out their plan of revenge against the Barielle family, Leslie and his men, encamped in the field, had been hit by a night raid from some unknown party.

Of course, Leslie and his men were no amateurs. They had posted lookouts, and they knew how to brace themselves against a night attack. —It was simply that their opponent was that much more skillful.

The sentries were silently taken out, and in the first surprise strike, half of their comrades were lost. Those who survived quickly regrouped, but both in individual strength and coordination, their enemy was superior; they had no means of overturning their disadvantage.

In the end, he could not even properly give the order to retreat, and Leslie, too, was wounded—

Beastman: “Dying in battle to shield your boss’s head… you got yourself some pretty fine underlings.”

Leslie: “Underlings, you say… Those guys are not… underlings.”

Beastman: “Oh? They ain’t underlings, huh. Then what are they?”

To the words of the dark shadow looming before him—the towering figure he had to look up at—Leslie shot back.

His opponent was even taller than the lanky Leslie, and nearly twice as thick in the body. Their very physical traits were fundamentally different. His whole body was covered in dark-brown fur, and his face was that of a beast—a beastman.

That Kararagi drawl, that giant adult-bodied race. There was no way someone working as a mercenary would not know the name.

Leslie: “They are… my comrades.”

Beastman: “…”

He spat up bloody phlegm and pushed himself to his feet, using his sword as a prop. His head was heavy from blood loss, but thanks to his comrades shielding him, he had yet to take a fatal wound. He could still fight.

At that sight of Leslie, the beastman before him scratched his head. Then, with a long sigh,

Beastman: “So they ain’t underlings, they’re comrades. My bad, then. The folks by my side are my family too. I can’t say I don’t get how you feel. —So go on and hate me all ya like.”

Leslie: “…This is the mercenary trade. I do not waste my hate on that. The ones I hate are the people who hired you.”

Beastman: “That so. This time, it ain’t the young Miss’s nasty scheme, anyhow. Hate ’em as much as ya please.”

Hoisting a thick machete up onto his shoulder, the beastman’s body began to overflow with killing intent. To Leslie, who had slipped through the jaws of death many times, its density was more than enough to tell him that this was the end.

Even so, Leslie’s legs did not shake. His heart did not quail. He stepped straight in.

Putting all his strength into the longsword he raised, Leslie brought down the greatest strike of his life upon his foe.

—The cleanup was finished shortly afterward.

9

The tense air in the reception room made Schult feel as if he were about to suffocate.

The Barielle estate did not receive guests all that often. And even when it did, Schult was almost never present. The reason was that the one who made use of Schult was Priscilla, whereas most visitors to the manor came for discussions with Leip.

Dealings with the outside were left to Leip, while Priscilla usually spent her time out inspecting her domain. For that Priscilla to personally receive someone at the manor was almost unheard-of.

Of course, his surprise did not end with Priscilla merely welcoming a visitor.

Woman: “Mmm, not bad at all. For someone this little, ya’ve been trained real proper, huh. Color me impressed.”

Schult: “Ah, thank you very much…”

In response to her impression of the tea he had poured, Schult answered haltingly, his cheeks stiff. Smiling at the boy was a lovely woman with pale, light-violet hair.

The woman, a guest to the Barielle estate, gently touched Schult's tense cheek with her fingertip. At the ticklish sensation, Schult's throat quivered faintly.

Woman: "No need to be so stiff, ya know. Do I really look that scary to ya?"

Schult: "N-No, that is not… the case…"

Priscilla: "Cease, vixen. Do not amuse yourself with my page."

Unable to bear watching Schult shrink back, Priscilla cut in with her voice. At his mistress's words, Schult's relief was plain to see, while the guest pursed her lips and gave Priscilla a sidelong glance.

Woman: "Now that's a hurtful way to put it. Don't tell me ya decided that just off the impression from my stole?"

Letting a dissatisfied note slip into her voice, the guest used the same finger that had been touching Schult to toy with her own neckline—specifically, the white fox fur wrapped around her neck. It was not a season of particularly low temperatures, yet to Schult she seemed oddly bundled up. Her outfit of pure white suited her delicate looks, but he could not help wondering if she was not hot.

Putting Schult's inner thoughts aside, Priscilla just snorted, looking bored, at the woman's words, and said,

Priscilla: "Hardly. I merely expressed your nature in the most direct way possible. Aware of it as you are, you wrap a fox's pelt round your own neck of your own accord, do you not? How commendable."

Woman: "You sure don't know when to quit talkin'. We're both crooked by nature, aren't we?"

Not yielding an inch before Priscilla's sharp tongue, the woman shot back in a speech colored by an unfamiliar accent. It was that very attitude which made up the second shock for Schult—not only that

Priscilla had welcomed a guest, but that there was a woman who could exchange words with her on equal footing.

The give-and-take between the two was prickly, laced with poison, and could by no means be called amicable. And yet Priscilla did not truly lose her temper—that was only because she saw commensurate value in her opponent.

Priscilla had worn that attitude once before, back in the capital—that much Schult remembered.

Woman: “Hmm. Even so, children usually take a liking to me, ya know. It makes me feel kinda lonely.”

At the guest’s murmur, her brows drooping, Schult started. Before he knew it, he had drawn away from her side and returned to stand right next to Priscilla.

Her gentle smile deepened, and in her light-blue eyes she took in both Priscilla and Schult, then said,

Woman: “Sure looks like ya love your mistress. Seems she’s got ya nicely tamed.”

Priscilla: ““Tamed”, you say? Do not make me laugh. That is a word far more suited to yourself, is it not? One who so delights in driving packs of dogs and cats is precisely the sort of beast-lover it befits.”

Woman: “Hearin’ that from the side that’s borrowin’ this beast-lover’s hands just sounds like bravado to me, ya know.”

Priscilla narrowed her eyes in displeasure, while the guest faced her with a smile still fixed in place.

Looking back and forth between the two, Schult turned his eyes toward the door as if seeking help. There stood Priscilla’s retainer, Al, leaning against the wall and looking bored. He noticed Schult’s clinging gaze and said,

Al: “What’s up, Schult-chan?”

Schult: “Ah, Al-sama, I feel extremely, extremely suffocated…”

Al: “Ahh, I get how ya feel, Schult-chan, but I don’t wanna poke at a princess who’s in a bad mood either. Right now I figure the smart move’s to keep our heads down and ride out the storm.”

Schult: “A storm…”

The dependable Al did not give him the answer he had hoped for, and Schult was at a loss.

If it had truly been a storm, he could have shut the shutters or holed up in his room to deal with it. But the heart of the matter was not wind, but the stare-down between the two women. On top of which—

Mimi: “Ooh, the wind is bad! Super bad! So Mimi votes for Old Man too!”

The last person present in the room chimed in cheerfully with Al’s words. It was a small girl clinging to the shoulder where Al’s left arm was missing, bouncing with excitement.

She had orange hair and wore a white robe, was shorter than Schult, and overflowed with energy. Cat ears sprouted from her head and a tail from her rear, marking her as a demi-human of the catfolk.

She was the companion of the visiting woman—in other words, the catfolk girl was a guest as well. Seeing the girl chattering away at the top of her lungs, the woman called out,

Woman: “Mimi, ya shouldn’t go causin’ too much trouble for other folks. Do ya work properly now, okay?”

Mimi: “Eeh, but Mimi is bo~red! The Miss won’t let Mimi go with the Commander!”

Hopping down from Al, the girl—Mimi—grabbed her own braids and tugged on them. The woman gave a wry smile at the gesture and beckoned Mimi over.

Woman: “If I let Mimi go too, I’d end up all by myself, wouldn’t I. Tivey’s makin’ preparations for the move, and Hetaro’s gotta stick with Ricardo to back him up or it gets risky.”

Mimi: “Uu, so not fair, Commander is so lucky. I bet he’s gettin’ to kill a whooole bunch of people.”

Al: “For such a cute face and voice, this little squirt says some pretty scary stuff.”

Mimi: “Uehehe, sayin’ Mimi’s cute makes Mimi all shy~. …Huh?”

Beckoned by the woman, Mimi snuggled up against her knees, looking bashful. Her words might be extreme, but taken just by appearance, it was an endearing scene. Then Mimi’s expression suddenly changed.

With a blank look on her face, Mimi glanced at her own right hand, then gave her head a big shake, making her cat ears twitch.

Mimi: “Miss, Miss, Hetaro’s bitin’ his pinky! His pinky! What was that code again?”

Woman: “That means “situation settled, no damage.” Ya gotta remember it properly, okay?”

Mimi: “Yeah yeah, that again. Next year Mimi’ll work hard! Work suuuper hard!”

Woman: “That’s right, you do that. And ya gotta give your “roger” too—bite your pinky back.”

Mimi: “Aye-aye~… chomp. Ow!”

Mimi bit her own pinky and burst into foolish laughter, for reasons Schult could not fathom. He stared wide-eyed at their exchange, but the other three showed no change in expression. Well, only Al’s expression was hidden, so in practice it was just Priscilla and the woman.

Priscilla: “Vixen.”

Woman: “Yeah yeah. I ain’t gonna fuss about ya callin’ me that anymore, but what is it?”

Priscilla: "“What”, you ask? How strange. Once the matter is settled, you have an obligation to report to your employer, do you not?"

Seated deep in her chair, head tilted, Priscilla addressed her, and the guest closed one eye. The smile that had been on her lips from the start vanished for the first time. She lifted a hand to her own cheek and said,

Woman: "Listen, don't go gettin' the wrong idea, 'kay? Those kids' employer is me, and me alone. This job was a deal between me and y'all, separate from their hire. Don't go decidin' who's above who all on your own."

Priscilla: "Hmph. If it is not only your chest that is small but your tolerance as well, then I can understand your desperation. In the end, all things in this world lie in the palm of my hand. I may take some pleasure in savoring futile flailing, but do you possess the worth to justify it?"

Woman: "So that's your way of sayin' you're turnin' down the idea of keepin' me, 'cause you're scared I'll bite the hand that feeds me?"

The deadly back-and-forth of poison against poison made Schult feel faint. He could hardly believe that Al and Mimi remained so completely unfazed.

However, the first to break off from the exchange of dangerous looks was the woman.

Woman: "Stayin' too long'll just put us both in a bad mood, so why don't we wrap this up. Just like ya guessed, this job's finished… I've taken care of the little concern on your side."

Priscilla: "It was nothing grand enough to be called a "concern". However irksome the presence of a few gnats may be, they are hardly an obstacle."

Woman: "That so? Then let's call it that. Stickin' my nose into a married couple's problems'd be the height o' poor taste, and as for keepin' up some nice, friendly relationship from here on… I reckon we can both pass on that, yeah?"

To the woman's confirmation that continuing any mutually beneficial relationship was out of the question from the outset, Priscilla responded with silence and a look. The cruelty in that gaze was answer enough to her proposal.

At that, the woman rose to her feet with a sigh and clapped her hands lightly.

Woman: "As far as I'm concerned, long as there's no hiccup with the payment, that's all I need. If this is the last time we do business and it ends here, that'd suit me just fine."

Priscilla: ""Ends here", you say. You know full well it will not be so, do you not?"

Looking up at the woman who had stood, Priscilla hid her mouth behind the fan she had somehow taken in hand. The woman, gazing down at that gesture, reached up out of habit to touch the fox fur at her throat.

Their gazes crossed, crimson and light blue intertwining. Then Priscilla wet her lips with her tongue and said,

Priscilla: ""A certain head of a Kararagi trading company journeys to a neighboring country to expand her business. There she negotiates with a convenient local lord to obtain the rights to open a storefront"… Do as you like. I shall not hinder you."

Woman: "Somethin' about that story bother ya? Ya sure make it sound like it's catchin' on somethin'."

Priscilla: "Twice, I shall allow it. I shall say, "do as you please". But a third time, I will not."

Hidden within that declaration was the cruel heat of Priscilla's will.

Should anyone defy that notice, she would show no mercy. How the woman took that proclamation, Schult could not tell, but she fell silent for a while, then—

Woman: "Haah… all right, enough. This time, I'll just chalk it up as the cost o' my lessons."

Priscilla: “Hmph. You would let go of your hard-won reward?”

Woman: “I ain’t about to leap at a pay packet only to find I’ve grabbed bad money. ’Sides, it ain’t like I’m headin’ home empty-handed. That goes for both of us, don’t it?”

With an exaggerated shrug, the woman stuck her tongue out at Priscilla.

Schult did not really understand the meaning of the exchange between the two. He only grasped that Priscilla had cornered the woman with her words in some fashion, and that the woman in turn had slipped free of Priscilla’s designs.

And that Priscilla quietly took pleasure in that fact as well.

Woman: “Mimi, we oughta be takin’ our leave. If we dawdle too long, who knows what Ricardo and the rest’ll get up to while they’re waitin’.”

Mimi: “Mmm, got it~. Then bye-bye to Old Man, and the little kid, and the big-boobed lady too! Bye-byee!”

Swinging her arm wildly as she waved, Mimi cheerfully called out her farewell. With her other hand she held the woman’s, and the two headed out of the reception room. As they went,

Woman: “Oh, right, this might be stickin’ my nose where it don’t belong, but maybe ya oughta keep a proper collar on your husband’s antics? If he kicks up trouble, that could turn into a real mess.”

Priscilla: “Be gone, vixen.”

Woman: “Yeah yeah, the princess sure is cold-hearted.”

With that, the woman left the reception room, taking Mimi with her. A servant waiting in the hall would guide them and see them off the grounds.

Once only those connected to the Barielle household remained in the room—

Al: “Man, that chick had some killer presence. I was practically fightin’ for my life tryin’ to turn into background air.”

Priscilla: “I shall commend you for not putting in unnecessary words. Speak with that woman and she would likely pry all manner of needless things out of you.”

Al: “Oh wow, that’s a surprisingly good review. Kinda rare, comin’ from ya, Princess.”

Priscilla’s evaluation of the woman who had just left surprised Schult as much as it did Al.

To Schult’s eyes, she had simply looked like someone with backbone and a gentle temperament. Of course, anyone who could stand face-to-face with Priscilla had inner strength of the highest order.

Setting aside Schult’s assessment, Al went on, toying with the seams of his helm with a finger.

Al: “So, ya went outta your way to summon her. That means she’s the third one, right?”

Priscilla: “Impudent girl, daring to appraise me as she went. … There is no mistake.”

Schult: “The third one…?”

Schult could not follow the exchange that made sense only between Al and Priscilla. As he tilted his head in confusion, Priscilla snapped her open fan shut with a sharp sound.

And then—

Priscilla: “She is the third Royal Candidate. In other words, my foe.”

Schult: “—! That lady! She is a different person from the woman we met before in the royal capital, is she?”

The unexpected truth startled Schult, even as it made sense to him. He knew he had seen Priscilla behave that way toward the woman before—that was how she had acted in the capital when she met the previous candidate.

Al: “But a Kararagi native as a candidate, huh. That Dragon Stone’s not exactly picky, is it.”

Priscilla: “The soil of one’s birth is of no consequence. If you trace it back, my own birthplace is the Empire. Those truly fit are chosen of themselves when the time is ripe. That is all.”

Al: “Hearin’ ya say that, it kinda sounds like you’re rating that girl pretty highly, doesn’t it?”

Priscilla: “Al, present your neck. I shall sever it.”

Al: “Sorry, I got carried away!”

At Priscilla’s cold tone and gaze, Al dropped into a dogeza on the spot as if diving forward.

From what Al had told him, dogeza was a posture of expressing the utmost apology to the other party. At Al’s side, Schult also dropped into the same pose before Priscilla.

Schult: “Priscilla-sama, please find it in your heart to forgive Al-sama. It was a momentary impulse, that is all!”

Al: “Uooh, Schult-chan, that makes me real happy… and at the same time, the guilt of makin’ a kid do dogeza with me is intense!”

Priscilla: “Very well, that is enough. I am in good humor today. For that reason, I shall let it pass.”

Al: “For someone in a good mood, what the hell was that killing intent when you said you’d lop my head off…?”

Still unconvinced, Al cocked his head, and he and Schult rose from their dogeza. Then Al addressed Priscilla, who had her cheek propped on her hand, with a “But, y’know,” and went on,

Al: “Gotta hand it to ya, Princess. Wrappin’ up Gramps Leip’s screwup and doin’ a meet-and-greet with a rival candidate all in one go. I bet they're plenty scared o' you on their side too."

Priscilla: "Fool. They have reaped as much as we. At best, we are somewhat better off for having judged that vixen's forces to a small degree."

Al: "Huh…? No doubt they're strong, but it's not like we really got a clear measure of 'em, right?"

Priscilla: "Truly, your eyes are nothing but knotholes. Do you imagine that vixen would be so careless as to come into enemy territory with but a single bodyguard? The entire manor was encircled by her forces."

Al: "Ugh, for real? That's terrifying."

Al slumped his shoulders in dismay, and Schult's eyes went wide at Priscilla's words. Realizing they had been in such a pinch without even noticing, he was impressed all over again that a Royal Candidate was not someone who could be dealt with easily.

Yet in contrast to the astonishment of her two retainers, Priscilla remained composed—or rather, she seemed more than composed. To Schult's eyes, he could see her mood rising.

It was just like on that day of the tournament, when she had decided to take Al as her retainer.

Schult: "Priscilla-sama, you somehow seem to be having fun."

Priscilla: "Oh?"

At Schult's stray remark, Priscilla looked back at him with a curious little breath. Seeing the light in his mistress's crimson eyes, Schult felt the emotion he had felt when he first saw them rise up within him again.

Looking down at Schult as he lay on the verge of death, Priscilla had peered into his eyes and called them "Blazing Flame."

Later he learned that "Blazing Flame" meant a flame burning in a vivid crimson.

Red was Priscilla's color, the color Schult loved more than any other in this world. That Priscilla had happily called Schult's eyes a Blazing Flame—she had accepted him as part of that roaring blaze.

She had driven heat into a body that had only been growing colder, and dazzled him with a searing flame.

Schult: "Because Priscilla-sama seems to be having fun, I am happy as well!"

Al: "…Good grief. You sure are innocent, Schult-chan. Our enemies' full picture's slowly comin' into focus, and it's clear from the start they ain't gonna be simple… and you call that fun."

Priscilla: "Truly, Schult's words miss the mark entirely."

As Schult smiled, Al, wearing the air of a wry smile, tossed the topic to Priscilla. Taking it up, Priscilla began by seemingly denying Schult's words, and said,

Priscilla: "Do not use such a frivolous little word as "fun" for one such as me. Show it with words suited to something that can set this breast aflutter."

Schult: "Yes! Priscilla-sama is very enjoy right now!"

Priscilla: "Mm, not bad. …Yes. Whoever the opponent may be, the ending will be the same. In that case, all that matters is that the path I take toward it be bright and resplendent as amusement for me."

The green-haired beauty and the purple-haired great merchant—rival candidates whose names and circumstances were still not fully known.

Even with them before her, there was no shadow over Priscilla's path of conquest. She simply believed in her own victory without the slightest doubt and lost herself in the beauty of the flame that would burn away the darkness.

Priscilla: "Even when it comes to making them submit, my interest is far better served if the opponent has worth befitting it."

Al: “You’ve got a nasty personality.”

Al shook his head and muttered in a low voice at Priscilla, who hid her lips behind her open fan.

At the exchange between master and servant, Schult found himself smiling faintly.

There had been a time when he had resigned himself to death. A hollow time when he could feel no fear at the thought of dying. Plucked up from that, granted this time to live as he was now, he thought,

Schult: “We are very enjoy the present as well!”

—Schult was very happy.

10

The building had been put up as if to hide itself away in a remote region that no one but the old man knew.

It was an old, wooden house. The structure was a shabby two-story building, run-down to the point of being almost a ruin. There was no trace of anyone living there, and in fact, no one actually resided in it.

The first and second floors of this building were nothing but decoration. What mattered was not aboveground but underground, and to reach that place it was necessary to go through a complicated series of steps.

Old Man: “…”

The old man felt no dissatisfaction at carrying out those troublesome procedures. His position demanded the utmost caution. He felt no hesitation toward actions necessary to fulfill his long-held vow.

It was precisely because of that disposition that he had been able to go on harboring his ambition for decades without letting it rot.

Old Man: "…"

With the sound of a latch being undone, the door leading to the basement swung open. Snorting at the dust that billowed up and the smell of old wood, the old man, relying on the light of the crystal lamp fixed to the wall, set his foot on the stairs. As the white light cut open the darkness, the stairs creaked under him as he descended underground.

Once he reached the bottom, the old man turned the crystal lamp's light straight ahead. In the spacious underground room, there—

???: "—Is this visit not earlier than scheduled? Caution: Required."

Old Man: "It is to share an unforeseen development. You need not tell me."

What emerged within the light was a small, black-clad figure. The voice was high and emotionless, yet somehow carried a tone that seemed to show concern for the old man.

The old man, however, merely clicked his tongue at the owner of that voice and sharpened his gaze in irritation.

Old Man: "That one is a far tougher nut to crack than I imagined. She refuses to let me get a hand on the reins at all. This level of trouble is excessive."

???: "You cannot bring her fully to heel? It seems things did not proceed according to your expectations."

Old Man: "Whether it is keen intuition or simply strong ill luck, I do not know. All the stray dogs I had my eye on beforehand were taken off the board one after another. Measures must be taken so that my groundwork does not come to light, but…"

???: "It may be that they unexpectedly took the initiative. Careful deliberation: Required."

At the pointed remark in that high voice, the old man wrinkled the bridge of his nose in displeasure. Even so, the life burning in his eyes had not dimmed in the slightest. With those eyes, he glared fixedly at the one he was speaking with.

Old Man: “I demand that the plan be moved forward. We should put a collar on that one as soon as possible.”

???: “…Is that not premature? Under the present conditions, I cannot be certain of the safety of carrying out the plan. Should degradation occur in the soul, it will affect the Dragon Stone’s prophecy as well.”

Old Man: “Who asked for your opinion? I made a demand. You have no authority to refuse.”

The old man crushed his counterpart’s reasoned objection head-on with a hardline stance. To the other, who fell silent under his overbearing words, the old man went on, lacing his voice with scorn.

Old Man: “Who do you think you owe for still being alive? I do not expect a proper sense of ethics from a witch, but I have spent this much time. You will provide me an appropriate return.”

???: “…I have no objection. It was merely a suggestion. I shall comply with your demand.”

Old Man: “You should have said so from the start. You, and that one as well—women should not stick their noses in where they are not needed.”

Spitting the words out, the old man hung the crystal lamp back on the wall. At last, the whole of the basement room was illuminated, and the full figure of the person before him was laid bare.

It was a young girl with no limbs, chained to the wall. A girl with long, pink hair, wearing nothing but a thin, filthy black robe—a wretched sight.

Yet in the old man’s eyes as he looked at the girl, there was no pity, no compassion, not even interest. There was only the flame of stagnant ambition, the long-standing obsession that had gone on smoldering endlessly without ever going out.

Old Man: “You will be of use to me, witch. Before the Royal Selection begins, you will replace that one’s Knight and shatter that creepy self-consciousness of hers, turning her into a puppet. —I shall not be handing this country’s throne over to anyone.”

At the old man’s declaration, dark like a flame, the only girl who heard it—the witch—said nothing.

Her eyes stared at the smirking old man, her lips pressed tightly together without emotion.

With many schemes still tangled together, before the start of the Royal Selection could even be declared, turmoil would visit the Barielle manor. Neither the old man nor the witch knew what the old man’s obsession and the witch’s involvement would bring forth from that turmoil.

However, in the near future, at the place where the start of the Royal Selection would be proclaimed, the figure of this old man was nowhere to be seen.

—That was a future already spoken of, and it became a historical fact that was all but impossible to change.

Chapter 3:
A Graceful Prosperity Record
(Edited Machine Translation)

1

—The moment the light was born, I blinked in surprise.

The fact that the dazzling light caught my eye, that I felt a faint heat in my palm, and that the unexpected mechanism had slightly shaken my heart were all things that led to surprise.

However, at that moment, the scene that was burned into my eyes and heart the most was something different.

"—Ah."

Compared to that, the light and heat were all so insignificant that they could be put off for later.

I think it was probably because of that that things had happened.

I think that without it I wouldn't be here now.

It was something bigger than light, heat, or emotion.

It was—

2

—With the scheduled time approaching, Julius Juukulius looked up.

"It's already this late, huh. Sometimes I lose track of time when I'm dealing with paperwork."

He took off his glasses and gently rubbed his tired eyes.

This was the downside of having to look at small letters for a long time. His eyes weren't bad. He thought that using glasses was just a necessary ritual to change his mood.

Naturally, when acting as a knight, he wouldn't rely on his glasses.

However, when he was facing documents in his study like this, in his role as the next head of the Juukulius family, he needed to take off his armor so as not to be too tense.

This was a commandment that Julius had imposed on himself without anyone telling him.

"—Brother, it's almost time. Are you ready?"

Just as he was gathering up the documents on his desk, there was a knock on the door. The thin voice that came through the door was a familiar one, and Julius's cheeks naturally relaxed.

"I was just cleaning up. Sorry for troubling you, Joshua."

"No, of course. I have heard that today's promise is important to our family… no, to the kingdom. It is my duty to support you, Brother."

After hearing Julius's reply, a slender young man opened the door and replied bravely.

He was a handsome young man with pale purple hair tied in a ponytail and a gentle smile. His name was Joshua Juukulius. As his family name suggested, he was Julius's younger brother, three years younger than him. Joshua was turning 18 this year and was a perfect family man who devotedly supported his older brother.

He smiled at Julius inside the room, then looked down at the pile of papers on his desk and said,

"You have another important task ahead of you… You're working too hard, Brother. If you don't take care of yourself a little, we as a family will be worried."

"I appreciate your concern, but I know my limits. Besides, right now, no matter how much time there is, it’s never enough. The only way to make up for that is to work hard.”

“In that case, please at least give an opportunity for not only you but also those around you to work hard. For the time being, leave the tidying up of the work to me. You, Brother, need to get changed and get ready to greet the guest. This is also an important duty.”

He put his hands on his hips and gave a long lecture as if he was the one taking care of him, making him smile wryly. Joshua had been scolding him a lot recently. That was how worried he was.

He understood his concern. The current situation in the kingdom was far from reassuring or peaceful.

“However, you act for that purpose, Brother. Today’s meeting is also for that purpose, right?”

“You’ve become able to say such things. Let me say that as an older brother it’s reassuring. At the same time, I feel a bit lonely that Joshua is leaving my hands.”

“P-Please don’t tease me… Come on, get out of the way.”

Joshua pushed the back of Julius who was smiling thinly and pushed his brother toward the door. Joshua then began to quickly put away the documents lined up on the desk, causing Julius to sigh.

The brothers had similar hair color and facial features, but Joshua was born with a weak constitution. Unlike Julius, Joshua was not blessed with any talent for the sword, but he excelled as a civil servant. His abilities were more desirable in that field than Julius who was considered to be excellent in both literary and military arts.

His recent attitude showed that he had acknowledged this and had no hesitation in deciding his position. While Julius found this reassuring, it was not an exaggeration to say that he felt a little lonely as an older brother.

“Brother can be too meticulous, so I’m just the right amount of lazy to be suited to this kind of work. Now, get ready. Under no circumstances should you keep a lady waiting.”

Joshua, not noticing his brother’s sad expression, jokingly closed one eye. It was a picturesque gesture, given his handsome features, but Joshua’s behavior was a bit surprising as it was unlike him.

“I’m surprised Joshua would make such a joke. Who did you learn that from?”

“You think I have bad friends? There’s no one I would emulate except you, Brother.”

Julius was shocked once again by the immediate retort.

After that, he calmly reflected on his usual behavior for a while and nodded.

“—I see. Now that you mention it, that is certainly true.”

Indeed that was a manner of speaking that was characteristic for him. In fact, he may have even said that before. Just as he nodded in understanding, Joshua gave a wry smile and kicked him out of the room.

In preparation for the time when his older brother next returned to work, the capable younger brother would make an environment that understood his older brother more than his older brother himself did.

Taking advantage of his kindness, Julius returned to his room as instructed and got ready. However, he had already finished the preparations the night before. All that was left was to change clothes.

—Putting on this uniform was a process that has been repeated countless times.

But even so, every time Julius put on this white outfit he felt a sense of responsibility. This uniform carried with it great power, and with that power came the responsibility of wearing it.

It was truly “formal attire” and must therefore be worn with respect.

“—All right.”

He looked at his whole body in the mirror, checked that his appearance was fine, and then nodded.

Caring about one’s appearance was a sign of vanity. And Julius took pride in that. Therefore, every time he put on his pure white, untainted uniform, he questioned the nature of that vanity.

Looking at the magic crystal hanging on the wall, he saw that there was still plenty of time until the scheduled time. Still, it was polite to arrive earlier than the appointed time. After getting ready, Julius left the room.

After leaving a message to the members of the household and a few words for Joshua, he left the mansion. With that plan—

“—Oh, that was quick. I thought a playboy would take longer.”

“…”

As soon as he passed through the entrance, he was stopped by a lovely voice calling out to him.

Julius held his breath slightly and stared in amazement at the voice’s owner—a woman leaning against a pillar in the center of the hall with her hands clasped behind her back. It took exactly two seconds for his surprise to fade away.

He changed course and headed down the stairs towards the woman. Julius closed one eye at the smiling woman and asked,

“I don’t think this is the case, but our maids weren’t so rude as to make you wait here, were they?”

“Ahaha, of course not. This is just somethin’ I unreasonably requested. So don’t get angry at the maids, okay?”

“It can’t be helped if I’m given a warning like that. I’ll give them a warning, but more importantly…”

Julius gave a wry smile at the gentle way she spoke and paused.

She was a petite woman. Julius was not particularly tall, but she only reached his chest. With her slender limbs and delicate build, she was the very embodiment of the word adorable.

In fact, the woman’s appearance was so beautiful that one would hesitate to compare her to a flower or jewel, and her round light blue eyes and soft, gentle voice have a magical charm that captures the human heart.

There was no other way to describe her than as a woman who stands out above the ordinary.

“Huh? Why did ya suddenly go quiet? Ah, do I have bedhead or something? How embarrassin’.”

“No, that is not the case. Today too, there is not the slightest hint of fading in Lady Anastasia’s splendor. I too have been captivated by your charm once again.”

“…Really, Julius, it’s unfair that ya say things like that without any hesitation.”

The woman, Anastasia Hoshin, looked up at the honest compliment and muttered in a sulky tone. Julius’s smile deepened at this reaction and he resumed the topic he had left off on earlier.

“So, what happened? There is still a while until our appointment, and I was supposed to be the one to come and pick you up anyway.”

“It’s right before a big match, right? When that happens, I can’t wait. It’s a bit embarrassin’, though.”

Anastasia blushed at the reason for the unexpected visit.

“Before a big match… Is that because you are nervous?”

“Uh-Uh. —Excited, I guess.”

She replied bashfully—no, her smile had a hint of belligerence to it. Julius was momentarily put off by her answer, but then he was instantly relieved.

It was reassuring to see that rather than feeling nervous before the big match, she was excited and couldn't wait.

"But, if you say that, I feel at ease."

"I see. It seems that you're really motivated, Julius. In that case, I'll rely on ya, please?"

"Yes, leave it to me. —We are in the same boat after all."

Anastasia looked puzzled at Julius's response. Then, she smiled even more happily and said,

"That's right. We're in the same boat. So we hafta be good friends forever, right?"

She closed one eye and said with a cute, strong voice.

3

Julius Juukulius was a young knight who belonged to the royal guard of the Kingdom of Lugunica.

At the same time, he was the eldest son of the Juukulius family, a noble family of the kingdom, and was in a position to inherit the family someday.

For that reason, he was expected to behave in an appropriate manner both as a knight and as a noble.

It was a responsibility that many would find burdensome, but Julius was always aware of its weight and showed those around him how to behave with a strong sense of reason and self-control.

With such a sincere attitude, it was only natural that he was rated as the "Finest of Knights".

In fact, many people who knew him took that reputation for granted, and no one would ever unfairly criticize him. It was his everyday actions that earned him the trust and respect he deserved.

Julius himself felt that the expectations and praise he received from those around him were excessive. However, he didn't go out of his way to deny it. If his abilities were not up to par with the praise he was given, he would work on improving himself until he was worthy of it. –And that made him even more so the "Finest".

The royal guard knights were the model for the kingdom's knights, and even among them, he was said to be the most outstanding.

His loyalty to the kingdom was extraordinary, and his abilities and loyalty were recognized by everyone.

And so, the events of that day marked a major turning point for him and others alike.

"…"

—Seeing the brilliance of the dragon jewel, many people were left speechless.

Witnessing this amazement, Julius let out an inappropriate sigh of admiration. Reflected in his yellow eyes was one woman, just like the people around him

However, the emotions he felt when he saw her must have been completely different from those of the people around him.

An emotion spread deep in his chest and asserted its presence. It would be unrefined to give it a name. Seeing that radiance for the second time, he felt an excitement in his heart that was uncharacteristic of him.

However, for now, Julius gently suppressed his excitement and took a step forward.

There was a clear difference between the amazement of those around him and Julius's admiration. His current mission was to help fill that clear gap.

"As you can see, the dragon jewel has recognized her qualifications to be the next king. With this beautiful radiance, I recommend her as one of the five dragon maidens prophesied by the dragon stone."

Placing his hand on his chest, Julius took the lead in answering the gazes of the high-ranking nobles—filling more than twenty seats in the assembly—looking down upon him.

In fact, it wasn't a complete lie to say that it had the spirit of a battlefield. The gazes directed at him were intense, and even Julius, who was used to such situations, couldn't help but feel nervous.

The knight's voice, which concealed his true feelings, brought the people, who were still shocked, back to normal. Then, their eyes turned once again to the shining dragon jewel—to Anastasia, who stood in the center of the assembly hall—proving her qualifications as a dragon maiden.

It would be easier if they just stayed together like this, enchanted by the light, but—

"—Hmm. I understand what the knight Julius Juukulius has to say."

His wish was in vain, however, as the silence was broken by an old man with a thin face and a long white beard.

The old man was seated in the front row, in the center, nodding gently in his direction. His words and actions made Julius feel increasingly tense. This was because the old man was none other than the wise elder, Lord Miklotov McMahon, the representative of the Sage Council, the brains of the kingdom.

Ignoring Julius's tension, Miklotov stroked his long beard and said,

"In that case, the next most important thing is the person's own will. I would like to hear from her."

"—So that means it's okay for me ta talk? That's a relief. I'm not good at stayin' quiet for long periods of time. In my job, there are some parts where talkin' is the key."

"Well, well. That's a very encouraging reply."

"Right? If I don't keep my nerve at the last minute, I won't be able ta convince ya old men."

Anastasia responded to the gentle words of the wise elder with a relaxed attitude.

The exchange between the two created tension among those who were not involved. Many attributed it to Miklotov's intentions, while a few attributed it to Anastasia's courage. Of course, Julius was in the latter category.

The courage to remain calm on this big stage was worthy of praise.

"Then, could I ask you to tell me your name again?"

"Yes, yes. My name, right? —My name is Anastasia Hoshin. I am the representative of the Hoshin Company in Kararagi. Thank ya again, everyone."

"…"

Bowing deeply, Anastasia turned to the assembly hall with a fearless smile.

A murmur immediately erupted in the hall. This was because what she said contained words that could not be overlooked. This was also proof of Julius's great decision.

—The qualifications to become a dragon maiden, in other words, the qualifications to participate in the royal selection to decide the next king.

He was recommending her, a "person from another country", to have her qualifications recognized in a situation where all the high-ranking nobles who supported the foundations of the country were gathered together in the assembly hall inside the castle of the Kingdom of Lugunica.

"Please be quiet. I said I would hear what she has to say first."

The noisy room fell silent at the sound of his gentle voice. It wasn't the volume of his voice, but the quality of his voice that had the power to leave no room for argument. After he spoke, Miklotov nodded to Anastasia,

“The dragon jewel certainly shines. I have also heard your name and background. Hmm, now it is up to you to decide whether or not you wish to participate in the royal selection…”

“My feelings are…”

Anastasia hesitated for just a moment, and gave Julius a sideways glance. Julius, standing to her right, could only continue to stand there sincerely, meeting her gaze.

However, Anastasia closed her eyes at Julius’s attitude, turned back to Miklotov, and said,

“I’m qualified. I also have my reasons. So I want ta take part in the royal selection. That’s what I’m plannin’ ta do.”

“…”

Miklotov closed his eyes as Anastasia boldly expressed her desire to participate. Julius was also deeply moved by the unhesitant nature of her words.

“Knight Julius, please explain how Lady Anastasia was chosen by the dragon jewel.”

“Yes. It all started when I invited Lady Anastasia to come to our house from Kararagi. The purpose was to negotiate for the expansion of sales channels for the Hoshin Trading Company in the Kingdom of Lugunica…During this business meeting, the insignia that had been distributed to the royal knights began to shine in Lady Anastasia’s hands.”

In response to the request, Julius began to fluently explain the events that had taken place.

It had been about a month since he had invited Anastasia to the Juukulius household and met her for the first time. The purpose was to ask for help in reviving the kingdom’s stagnant economy – it had been the sole decision of Julius, who was worried about the kingdom's future, but the situation had taken an unexpected turn.

Searching for the dragon maidens was a priority duty for the knights of the royal guard.

For that reason, badges with dragon jewels embedded in them were distributed to the knights, and by some coincidence, when Anastasia touched one of them, it began to shine.

"After confirming this fact, I confided the situation to Lady Anastasia and did everything I could to persuade her to participate in the royal selection…and to identify herself as a dragon maiden."

"Yes. I was passionately wooed."

Anastasia, standing next to Julius as he earnestly explained the facts, had her hand on her cheek and looked amused.

However, Anastasia's claim was not wrong. It was true that Julius had spoken passionately, strongly appealing to her about how valuable she was.

"The head of a trading company in the Kararagi city-states…a young and beautiful trading company head, I see. That's also…"

After hearing the explanation of the recommendation process, Miklotov corrected himself and spoke vaguely. There was a hint of bitterness in his voice, and it was clear what it was—

"—This is a farce. You should state this clearly, Lord Miklotov."

A rough, husky voice interrupted Miklotov's thoughts. The voice came from a balding old man sitting to Miklotov's right with his thick arms folded.

There was a hint of rage on the old man's face and it was clear at a glance that he did not welcome the proposal.

In fact, the bald old man—Bordeaux Zellgef of the Sage Council—stood up and gave Anastasia and Julius a stern look.

"How dare you bring a foreigner into this kingdom's most important crisis without permission, Juukulius! You are a royal knight; don't you understand the seriousness of the situation?!"

"With all due respect, Lord Zellgef. I always try to be mindful of my responsibilities."

"So what are you going to do about this? Not content with just revealing the secret national crisis to a foreigner, you now propose that person as the next king? Stop talking like a fool! Are you really the one who is called the "Finest" in the royal guard? You will bring shame to the name of the kingdom's knights!"

His fierce pursuit was almost like a shout, and his spirit intimidated Julius. Though he may be old, Bordeaux was originally a knight of the kingdom. He could understand wanting to say something about chivalry.

However, it was a fellow member of the Sage Council who put a stop to Bordeaux's anger.

"Lord Bordeaux, you're getting too heated. We're still in the middle of what they're saying. I haven't heard enough from either Lady Anastasia or Knight Julius."

"…Listen, I don't think this impression is going to change."

After being scolded by Miklotov for his anger, Bordeaux, although dissatisfied, backed down.

Bordeaux led the discussion with his formidable arm, while Miklotov calmly kept things together. Although they were both members of the Sage Council, their attitudes were completely opposed, but their presence stood out even in the assembly hall.

Most people would succumb to either the soft or the hard tongue. However—

"—So, is it normal for one of ya ta attack and the other ta be nice? If that's the case, it won't work on me."

Anastasia said this without any change in expression, and the atmosphere in the assembly hall froze.

Of course. Bordeaux's angry attitude was no lie. In response, it would not be strange to see it as an insult to insist that his anger was fake.

However, it was the wise elder's smile once again that melted the frozen atmosphere.

"It sounds a bit rude to call it a method. It's a bit of a predictable flow, though."

"Yes, yes, a predictable flow. Then, I'll accept it."

"That would be relief."

Unlike the scoffing Bordeaux, Miklotov gave a slight bow with a bitter smile. Anastasia, who calmly accepted the wise man's actions, was just as different an actor as the two of them.

As if to confirm Julius's thoughts, Anastasia raised her finger and said, "By the way."

"Regardless of whether I have the qualifications or not, I have signed a written agreement not ta disclose anythin' about this matter, so ya can rest assured. Oh, let's not talk about whether I keep my promises or not. If people doubt that, it would be the same as doubtin' my merchant spirit."

"If I may add, I have brought that written agreement with me today. If requested, I will submit it immediately. Is that acceptable?"

"Hmm, I see. So you're fully prepared."

Before the meeting with the council, the two of them were busy preparing, and Miklotov nodded deeply in satisfaction. Then, the wise elder closed one eye,

"Of course, you're also prepared for what we will discuss from here on, right?"

"Of course."

"I believe you are convinced."

Anastasia and Julius responded smoothly to Miklotov's question.

The moment they were able to do that, or when everyone saw the light of the dragon jewel, they had made up their minds.

After witnessing the results, a person sitting in the back row of the assembly hall creaked her seat back.

Then she muttered a few words.

"My opponent isn't lacking anything, I see."

Saying this, the green-haired beauty closed her amber eyes and smiled with a very dignified look.

4

"Thank you for your hard work, Lady Anastasia. As expected, your performance was magnificent."

When the conference ended and they left the assembly hall, Julius generously praised Anastasia for her attitude during the discussion.

In response to the praise, Anastasia put her finger to her lips and said, "Hmm."

"Well, I'd say it was a passing grade. It was partly thanks to the preparations made beforehand, but I think the biggest reason was that I felt reassured havin' Julius there."

"I am unworthy of such words. I would be honored if I could be of some help to you, Lady Anastasia."

"Hmm, a perfect answer… Oops."

Anastasia pouted in dissatisfaction for a moment, then noticed something and stopped in her tracks. Julius followed her gaze as she turned around, widening his eyes slightly as well.

In the castle corridor, a figure stood tall and composed, not joining the wave of nobles leaving the room. Her gaze was sharp, but not intimidating. Simply put, she had a dignified presence.

In fact, the woman's presence was like a sword and was almost dazzling.

"Lady Anastasia, that person is…"

"I know, she's famous. Besides, it's hard ta mistake her for someone else."

Interrupting Julius, Anastasia stepped towards her with her hands clasped behind her back. The woman didn't move in response to Anastasia's approach, and the two of them naturally found themselves facing each other.

"Anastasia Hoshin."

"Yes, yes, that's me. You're Duchess Crusch Karsten. Or rather, would it be easier ta understand if I called ya Crusch the royal candidate?"

"You may call me what you like. I am in a position to compete with you. In other words, you and I are on equal footing."

"Hmm, just as the rumors say…nah, she's even more straightforward than the rumors say."

The green-haired woman who answered Anastasia's call—Duchess Crusch Karsten—folded her arms.

She was also a candidate for the dragon maiden qualifications, just like Anastasia, and was the first person to be recognized. As she was also a member of the upper nobles who were summoned to the assembly, she would naturally have attended the previous assembly.

Therefore, like Bordeaux, she could have objected to Anastasia's participation in the royal selection on the grounds that she is from another country, but—

"Ya didn't do such a thing. Is that a relaxed attitude?"

“Relaxed? I’ve never been one to indulge in such things. I am aware of the mission and responsibilities that have been imposed upon me. Besides, this is now my greatest wish. I will give it my all.”

“…”

Crusch’s way of life, which embodied what an honest and upright noble should be, was something Julius could respect. However, there was something strange about how Crusch was speaking just now. It was an odd feeling that Julius felt because he had had a few opportunities to interact with her.

She had always maintained a strong awareness of her responsibilities as a high-ranking noble. And yet, when Crusch declared that she would give it her all in the royal selection, she seemed tense somehow—

“It’s been a while, Julius Juukulius. How have you been?”

“—It has been a while since I last saw you, but I’m glad to see that you’ve remained well since then, Lady Crusch.”

“I heard from Ferris that you haven’t changed either…No, maybe not. I don’t think you would have done something like this if you were the old you.”

“…”

“If there’s been a change of heart, I guess it’s the same for both of us.”

Crusch did not reprimand Julius, who chose to remain silent in response, but merely nodded. Then she turned to Anastasia,

“Once the remaining two candidates are present, the royal selection will begin in earnest. I’m glad I was able to meet you face to face and exchange words with you before that happens.”

“Are ya the type of person who wants ta see the face of the person you’re goin’ ta defeat, Crusch?”

“I would like to know their face. And if possible, I would like to know that my opponent has a purpose worthy of aiming for the throne and is powerful enough to compete for it.”

“Not only do ya look like a knight, but even yer way of thinkin’ is like a knight. In yer eyes, do ya think I fit that ideal?”

“—Let’s have dinner sometime soon if possible. Anastasia Hoshin.”

Crusch smiled faintly and turned away without giving a clear answer to the question. However, that smile was the best possible answer to Anastasia’s question.

—Crusch recognized Anastasia as a rival candidate in the royal selection.

Without a doubt, Crusch was the favorite to win the royal selection. Her judgment made Julius nod in agreement, knowing that his own eyes were correct.

Anastasia quickly noticed Julius’s reaction and pursed her lips.

“What? Ya look awfully satisfied.”

“Of course. After all, Lady Anastasia has been recognized by Lady Crusch herself. She will likely be the most difficult opponent, but it is also an honor.”

“Lady Crusch, what’s with that? And what’s with it bein’ an honor? I’m not the type of person ta get fired up when faced with the glare of a strong opponent. I’d rather have an easy victory, so it scares me.”

Anastasia frowned, making a troubled face as she spoke.

It was still fresh in his memory that she was excited and couldn’t wait until the big stage where she would put her name forward for the royal selection.

“—That’s right. Anastasia Hoshin. I will tell you one thing.”

Crusch stopped in her tracks as she turned around and pointed a finger in their direction. When the two of them looked up at her, Crusch’s amber eyes narrowed.

“At the moment, there are three known candidates. In addition to myself and you, there is also Baroness Barielle, Priscilla Barielle… but she is also quite a formidable opponent. You should prepare yourself.”

“Thanks for the advice. But it’s okay. –I already know that.”

“…I see. That was just unnecessary worry.”

Strangely, Anastasia looked genuinely displeased. Seeing this, Crusch gave a wry smile, as if she had realized something, and this time she finally left the corridor.

Seeing her leave, Julius and Anastasia were left alone in the passageway.

“Lady Anastasia, what you were talking about just now…?”

“It’s not difficult. The second candidate, Priscilla Barielle… I just spoke ta her in person a little while ago. She seemed like a tricky opponent too.”

“You met Lady Barielle in person?!”

Unexpectedly, a look of surprise appeared on Julius’s handsome face. Glancing at the good-looking man’s reaction, Anastasia gave a slightly mischievous laugh.

“I was just tryin’ ta scout the enemy. The reactions might be different before and after I put myself forward as a candidate. I thought it would be nice ta stir things up while I’m at it.”

“You never cease to amaze me… So, did you have any success?”

“—No matter how many times we negotiate, it’s all a waste of time. But findin’ out after just one is a bit of a gain, if ya want ta call it that.”

“That is…”

Julius frowned slightly, wondering what that meant.

Julius knew very little about the second candidate, Priscilla Barielle. To begin with, there was a gag order on the royal selection itself, and the same went for information about the other candidates.

Those involved in the royal selection were limited to a few important people, including high-ranking nobles, and the royal guard knights who were tasked with searching for candidates with the qualifications to become shrine maidens. Julius, however, was more familiar with the situation than the other knights because he was the first to discover Anastasia, the third candidate.

All Julius knew about Priscilla was that she was the wife of Baron Leip Barielle, who was much older than her, and that it was the Baron himself who was most enthusiastic about the royal selection.

However, as if to correct Julius's perception, Anastasia shook her head.

"Everyone says that it's the Baron who's the real challenger, but if ya see them in person, you'll see they're mistaken. –The princess is a much bigger monster than the Baron."

"…Isn't calling her a monster a bit of an exaggeration?"

"Maybe it was inappropriate to call a girl that. But, Crusch went outta her way ta warn us…Don't ya think that's credible?"

Julius held his breath at the persuasiveness of that statement, while Anastasia narrowed her eyes in a smile.

The one the dragon jewel would choose would be someone who was qualified to be a shrine maiden who could communicate with dragons—in other words, someone who could fulfill the role that the Lugunican royal family had played up until now.

Given that her qualifications were recognized, how could he think that Priscilla, whose true character was unclear, was merely an ordinary person hiding in the shadow of her husband? In fact, Anastasia and Crusch, two talented people, had been recognized by the dragon jewel and their names were on the list of candidates.

That was an overly naïve, immature, and shallow understanding. Julius admonished himself.

“My opponents are a duchess and a giant monster… It looks like a tricky situation. Since I’m competin’, I absolutely do not wanna lose, so I need ta think about this carefully.”

“Think about it?”

“If we’re gonna do it, there’s no point if we don’t win. It’s better not ta do it than ta lose. So, I’d like ta go back ta the mansion now and discuss various things.”

As Anastasia gently combed the white fur of the fox scarf around her neck with her fingers, she curled her lips as she considered the pending issues for the upcoming royal selection.

Seeing her pondering, Julius realized that this was beyond his ability.

“My apologies, Lady Anastasia. I actually have an appointment with someone after this.”

“Oh, really? Hmm, then…can we talk tonight?”

“Yes. Then, let’s meet at night. This time, I will come and pick you up myself. —I will do my best to give you good news.”

“If Julius says so, then I guess I’ll get my hopes up.”

After saying that with a playful gesture, he made an appointment for the evening with a smiling Anastasia.

After that, Julius escorted her out of the castle and saw her off to the inn in a dragon carriage. He bowed to Anastasia, who was waving, then turned around with a firm grin on his face.

The meeting place was the knight barracks adjacent to the royal castle. Unlike normal times, Julius passed through a corridor filled with many knights and guards and stepped into the dining hall.

There, awaiting Julius was—

“—This way, Julius.”

A voice called out to Julius, who was looking around the room from the entrance. Looking towards the back of the room, he saw a red-haired young man sitting alone at a four-person table, waving in his direction. Waving back, Julius headed towards the table without hesitation. He then bowed slightly to the person he had been keeping waiting.

“Sorry to have kept you waiting. The business at the assembly hall was completed without any problems.”

“It was a meeting of the high-ranking nobles and members of the Sage Council. You played an important role, so I think it would be unbecoming of a friend to blame you for being late.”

“It’s a relief to hear you say that.”

Julius smiled and narrowed his eyes at the joking young man. Then he looked around the slightly crowded dining hall and deciding it would be too conspicuous here—

“—I have something important to tell you. Let’s move to another location, Reinhard.”

So he approached the red-haired young man—the “Sword Saint” Reinhard van Astrea.

5

In a corner of the royal capital’s commercial district, there was a bar called “Silver Shield” which was frequented by the kingdom’s knights.

The owner was a former royal knight who retired due to an injury, and as a result of his colleagues and subordinates who admired him spreading the word about him among the knights, the bar had become an unusual place with only knights as regular customers. The bar’s reputation was excellent, but the owner lamented that because there were so many knights among the customers, regular customers didn’t come.

Julius had also found out about this bar after joining the knights. Since then, he had been a frequent visitor for several years, but it wasn’t just for the food and drinks.

“Mr. Conwood, I’d like to borrow the back room.”

“Sure thing. …It’s rare to have both the ‘Finest’ and the ‘Sword Saint’. Please don’t plot anything evil. It would be terrible if the country were to be turned upside down.”

“Don’t worry. Our swords are there to stop it from being turned upside down. Like a shoddy pole.”

“—. Haha, that’s what a Knight among Knights would say.”

When the owner laughed at the end of the exchange, the whole bar, having heard the joke, became noisy.

Behind that, the owner tossed a key over the counter. Reinhard took the key with a wry smile and handed it to Julius who headed to the back of the bar.

At the back of the bar was a private room—a room with thick walls that provided some soundproofing.

The reason why the Silver Shield was so highly valued by knights was because there was no need to worry about secret conversations taking place in the bar being leaked. The owner and customers were all people connected to the knights, making it a special privilege.

“So, we came all the way here to have a secret chat. Can I assume it has something to do with the royal selection?”

After locking the door to the private room, Reinhard, leaning against the wall, got straight to the point.

The room had a round table and two chairs, no unnecessary decorations, and was a room made entirely for private conversations. Now that Reinhard had spoken, there was no need to worry about his voice leaking out. In that regard, Julius had complete confidence in his red-haired friend.

Therefore, Julius, leaning against the table, lowered his chin in response to Reinhard's question,

"As you may already know, a third candidate has been found. I recommended her to the council today, and they have confirmed her qualifications."

"Her…that means the third candidate is also a woman. At this rate, it looks like all the dragon maidens may end up being women."

"Are you unhappy with the idea of a woman being on top?"

"I have no complaints if the person is deemed worthy of the throne. However, the next king will, in short, be the founder of the next royal line. It may sound bad, but it's easier for men to pass on their bloodline."

As Reinhard looked at the royal selection from a different angle, Julius silently touched his own bangs.

The current Kingdom of Lugunica was not only without a king, but was also facing the danger of the royal family being cut off. As Reinhard feared, the next king would be the first of a new royal family.

In view of these circumstances—

"—I think it would be natural for Lady Crusch to become king after all."

"The Duchess's family is a family that has always been close to the royal family. There is no small amount of royal blood flowing in their veins. And above all, Lady Crusch has great potential."

"She herself is very keen to take the throne."

The more he spoke about the current situation, the more he felt that the optimal solution had already been presented.

Crusch Karsten had the makings of a king. She also had a good reason to desire the throne.

The reason why she was so strongly attached to the throne—even Julius knew it, though to a lesser extent.

“The entire royal family fell ill. So, it may be disrespectful to mourn just one person, but…it’s regrettable what happened to Prince Fourier.”

“Reinhard…”

“His Highness was an equal person. That was something I could say about all the members of the royal family, but I had many opportunities to interact with Prince Fourier. He didn’t treat the ‘Sword Saint’ with any special consideration…Well, I’m sure Ferris was the one he had his eye on.”

“Or rather, Ferris and Lady Crusch, right?”

Both Reinhard and Julius smiled as they thought of the same person. Thinking back, the only memories that the owner of that name had were ones that warmed their hearts.

That was the kind of person Fourier Lugunica, the fourth prince of the Kingdom of Lugunica was.

Julius hadn’t had many contacts with him, but even with the few he’d had, he’d gained a lot from them.

Crusch, who had been close to him and likely shared his feelings, had much more—

“—Therefore, it may be most natural for Lady Crusch to inherit the will of the late Prince Fourier and ascend the throne. I also think that this is a noble and beautiful thing to do.”

“But you’re not convinced. That’s what you sound like.”

“…”

Reinhard pointed out to Julius, whose words had gotten heated in the latter half of his sentence, his voice trembling at the end. Julius closed his eyes at his words, and remembered what had happened at the royal castle just before.

Facing Anastasia, Crusch had declared that she would give it her all in the royal selection.

It was a declaration of war, and though it was typical of Crusch, who preferred to play it fair and square, there was something about it that made him feel uneasy.

Surely, the cause of this unease lay in the root of Crusch's obsession with the throne.

The reason why Crusch wanted to take part in the royal selection and become the king of this country, her true intention was surely—

"—So that we won't forget, I suppose."

There was a great royal family member who remained as a warm wound in the hearts of Julius and Reinhard.

What if there was something that had carved a strong, large, deep, burning wound on that person's existence that would never heal?

Even though you wish that you would never forget, that you would never let anyone else forget, the sweet pain of that wound—

"It's frustrating that I can't put it into words."

"…No matter what the driving force may be, as long as it moves in the right direction, I don't mind. I have no doubt that Lady Crusch will govern well. That goes for you too, doesn't it?"

"Of course. However, that is…"

Pausing his words, Julius groped around in his mind, searching for the perfect words. There had to be words somewhere that would properly express the feelings that lingered in his heart.

And as he searched, his fingertips tracing his memory touched something.

It was a very succinct, spontaneous comment from someone that got straight to the point.

“That is—Is it a story that looks good?”

“Julius?”

“Should we accept that the king who holds the throne of the kingdom has her heart bound by something? Even if she is a wise ruler who rules well, is it the honor of a knight to place a wounded woman on the throne?”

He’d been told that before.

It was a knight’s job to look good. If you look good as a knight, you will naturally become more like a knight. You will embody the honor of chivalry.

Those words put into words the ideal that Julius had in mind almost perfectly.

“I believe in the code of chivalry. The loyalty I have given to the kingdom is true. Therefore, if I offer my sword to my country and to my king, I do not want to go against my code or my loyalty.”

“Is that chivalry something that cannot be followed under Lady Crusch?”

“Under Lady Crusch’s current circumstances, it cannot. However, it is not my place to say anything about it. That person has already been appointed a knight. Therefore, that role does not belong to me.”

What came to mind was a friend of his who was a knight who worried that he didn’t look like a knight.

He knew that he had sworn absolute loyalty to Crusch, whom he regarded as his master. So it was possible that something like that could never happen. Or, it was possible that his own thoughts were completely misguided and he had completely missed the mark.

But if Julius was right and would not turn away from his principles or loyalty and continue to be a knight—

"—I want to dedicate my sword to someone I can trust without any hesitation."

"…"

Julius spoke these words with passion and force. Reinhard, who had heard them from the beginning, raised his eyebrows in slight surprise.

However, his red-haired friend, leaning against the wall, nodded several times,

"I think it's good. It's very Julius-like and cool."

"…It's more than a little embarrassing to hear you say that."

"I was just being honest. You don't often show that side of yourself to those around you. That's why people often misunderstand you. They don't realize that the real you is so straightforward, it's almost too straightforward."

Reinhard gave a wry smile, and Julius looked away, feeling embarrassed.

It was just the way he was born. He couldn't change it now, and he didn't want to. It was sad that it caused misunderstandings, but it would be counterproductive to let it cause him to compromise his character. Moreover, it wouldn't be elegant.

"However, from what I've heard so far, I've only heard your statement of intent. It'd be fun to have a heated discussion with a friend about the future of the kingdom, but…that's not the real purpose, is it?"

"That's right. I've gone off topic a bit. It's a bad habit of mine to go off on a tangent. Sorry."

"There are other views to be had on the way. I don't mind."

Julius nodded to Reinhard at his friendly response. Then, he finally got to the main subject that he had summoned Reinhard to the private room for.

That was—

"—'Sword Saint' Reinhard van Astrea. The highest-ranking swordsman in the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica, the 'Knight among Knights', I have a favor to ask of you."

"Let me hear it."

This was not a proposal from a friend, but from the standpoint of a knight. Sensing this, Reinhard moved away from the wall and uncrossed his arms.

Seeing not his red-haired friend, but the current 'Sword Saint', Julius closed his eyes.

However, he only closed his eyes for a moment.

"Anastasia Hoshin—that is the name of the woman who has been recognized as a dragon maiden and joined as the third candidate for the royal selection."

"Hoshin…"

Reinhard frowned slightly at the familiar family name. However, Julius put aside the small feeling he had and continued speaking.

"I see in Lady Anastasia the potential to be king. Therefore, I would like to ask you, Reinhard…to be her knight and support her in the royal selection process."

—That was Julius Juukulius's best answer for the royal selection.

6

When he left the Silver Shield, the royal capital was already dyed orange by the sunset.

Spotting the setting sun over the Lugunica royal castle, Julius realized that he had been more engrossed in their discussion than he had thought. His appointment with Anastasia was at night, but he didn't have much time until sunset. Having time to spare was important in anything. Time to spare led to appearances and elegance. He hurried home.

Even if he was going to visit Anastasia, he couldn't do so in the clothes he was wearing.

The uniform of the royal guard would be conspicuous on a personal occasion, and it would be rude to visit empty-handed. Moreover, considering the importance of today's discussion, he would have liked to bring at least some high-quality alcohol.

So, with his head full of thoughts, Julius returned home—

"—Welcome back! We've been waiting so long! That's wrong! We've been waiting for you!"

"…"

Julius's thoughts were filled with confusion at the enthusiastic welcome he received at the gates of his home.

He was in front of the main gate of the Juukulius mansion in the noble district. As Julius walked up the hill and returned to the mansion, he was greeted by a petite girl who cheerfully raised both hands.

She only reached Julius's waist in height, and had distinctive orange cat ears and a tail. Her round, curious eyes sparkled, and she was a cute, charming demi-human—a kitten girl.

However, such an impression aside, Julius had already met the girl before. And not only the girl, but also the two kitten people on either side of her who looked very similar to her.

"Aside from Mimi, Hetaro and Tivey, what are you doing?"

"Th-The lady said to greet you. And then, my older sister dragged me along…"

"There's no point in me resisting, so I just went along with it obediently.”

The ones who answered Julius’s puzzled expression were two boys, one with a sad expression and the other with eyes clouded with resignation. The one with the sad expression was Hetaro, and the one with the clouded eyes was Tivey.

Between them, the only one who looked unusually happy was the girl named Mimi—

“I don’t mind you welcoming me, but may I ask about your attire?”

“Oh? Weird? Is it weird? The lady and the other ladies at the mansion praised me so much! Cute, they said I was cute! I’m so embarrassed!”

“I won’t deny that you are cute. Not only you, but your two younger brothers as well.”

“I-I don’t really need you to praise me for that…”

As Julius praised the proud Mimi, Hetaro’s eyes became teary and he complained about something. However, his assessment was not a lie. Julius pondered what to say other than a correction.

After all, Mimi and the other two were all wearing maid uniforms, the kind worn by waitresses. In fact, the lengths of the uniforms were adjusted to fit the three petite kitten people. He knew he shouldn’t say it, but it looked really good on all three of them.

He had to say, it was very charming, but—

“As boys, is it too much to ask that you have a certain level of common sense?”

“Do you think we dressed like this willingly, Julius?”

“I had hoped that this would not be the case. It seems my wish has been granted, so I am glad. This means… Lady Anastasia and Mimi are the problem it seems.”

Having immediately pinpointed the ringleaders, Julius shook his head in exasperation.

He didn’t like to interfere too much in personal tastes and preferences, but from now on, Anastasia would be in a more important position than ever. It would be necessary to be careful not to act rashly.

In particular, they must exercise strict self-restraint when it came to unbridled hobbies.

“These uniforms were specially made to fit your measurements. It doesn’t look like they were made just yesterday.”

“I took the lady seriously when she said she wanted to replace my old robes. …I’m grateful to her for giving me the chance to see my sister in her uniform though.”

“That means you’re not completely against it, so I hope you’ll be careful.”

“Wh-Wh-What, that’s wrong though?!”

As Hetaro shook his head and hands in a panic, Julius turned to Mimi. She was the oldest of the three siblings. Therefore, it was natural to speak with her.

“May I ask why you are here? I have an appointment with Lady Anastasia tonight, but…I told her that I would be the one to come and see her.”

“Hmm? Huh, but the lady came with us! I think she said she had something really important to discuss? And so, inishative? She wants to have that?”

“The lady likes to surprise people, so I’m sure that’s what she’s aiming for. As my older sister said, I think she wants to seize the initiative.”

Mimi broke down the contents of the story into simple terms, while Tivey added intelligently. Hearing the combined efforts of the siblings in reply, Julius felt a tingling sensation deep in his heart once again.

It seemed she was a woman who didn't let things go as planned and wouldn't let him take the reins.

"Oh? Is Julius having fun? Is it interesting? Are you having fun? What happened?"

"If I had to say, I was surprised by how you all greeted me. Your uniforms were also unexpected. The scheme was successful, Mimi."

"Oh! That's good! So what do you want to do? Go to the lady? Are you going?"

"I'm supposed to have returned home, so it feels strange to be shown around by guests."

"But we're supposed to have inishative! So, we'll show you around!"

Moving around quickly, the two younger brothers opened the gate at Mimi's signal.

After the exchange at the gate was over, Julius finally stepped onto the grounds. Then, following Mimi, who was humming a tune he had never heard before, the group headed to the front door.

"Are you three the only ones accompanying Lady Anastasia?"

"The lady left the Captain behind at the inn because his voice and size were too much and he got in the way. He's apparently drinking and waiting, so I think you don't need to worry."

"It seems there's no need to worry about him. With you three as Lady Anastasia's guards, that's enough, is that right?"

"Yes."

Listening to the off-key humming, Julius nodded in agreement with Hetaro and Tivey's pride.

Though it would be hard to imagine from their appearances, these three siblings were the vice captains of Anastasia's private army—and their abilities were undeniable. When the three of them were together, they were skilled enough that even Julius could not let his guard down.

“You all came to greet me, leaving the servants of this household behind. It seems best to assume that this household has already been subdued.”

“We didn’t do anything dangerous like that. Joshua seemed a little flustered though.”

“My younger brother is inexperienced. Perhaps I left him to do something terrible.”

Julius could picture his younger brother’s panic in his mind, and a wry smile tugged at the corner of his mouth. That smile made the other two, who had plenty of experience being pushed around by their superiors, chuckle in response.

Once inside the mansion, the four were greeted by members of the Juukulius household at the entrance. The servants, whom he had known for many years, looked remorseful for having let guests be sent to greet him, but Julius simply nodded in apology and told them to return to work.

Then, following the rest of the guidance from the excited Mimi, they made their way to the reception room.

“Heya, we’re coming in!”

Mimi opened the door with enthusiasm, and a room decorated in warm colors unfolded before them. There was a table in the center of the room, and looking in their direction was—

“—Welcome back. Did ya have a nice chat with yer friend?”

Anastasia smiled as if she knew exactly what he’d been doing.

7

“…”

As he took a sip of the tea he had ordered the waitress to bring him, the rich aroma tickled his nostrils. The warm aroma made Julius let out a sigh of relief and his mind regained its composure.

The tea that had been brought was Julius's favorite brand.

When facing an important conversation, he relied on the power of tea to help him prepare himself. The servants who have known him for a long time know this and will take care of things like this without him having to say a word.

Considering that, although meeting at home was unexpected, it could also be said to have been the right decision.

At the very least, he could feel supported by those around him as he entered into the conversation.

Be that as it may—

"Joshua, if you're not feeling well, you can go back to your room…"

"N-No, not at all. If I'm not able to be here, it will have a much bigger impact on me later. I'll try not to get in the way, so please keep me by your side."

Joshua, his face pale, shook his head in a panic. His younger brother was originally fair-skinned, but now the blood had drained from his face and he looked pale. He didn't want to push him too hard, though.

"…"

"…I understand. Just make sure you don't push yourself too hard. Make your own decisions."

Julius gave in to Joshua's silent plea and accepted his wishes. He thought it was lenient, but he understood his feelings. He didn't want to be left out of such an important national event because of poor health.

Anastasia chuckled at the brothers' conversation. In front of her, Mimi was curled up in her lap, and while stroking Mimi's head, she said, "Don't push Joshua too hard. …Though it might not be very persuasive comin' from me, the one who exhausted Joshua the most."

"You did nothing wrong, Lady Anastasia. I left the house to Joshua while I was away. Entertaining guests is one of his duties. Besides —"

"Besides?"

"Maybe you were going easy on him? Joshua hasn't collapsed."

"—. Hehe, ahahaha! What's with that, Julius? That's too funny."

For a moment Anastasia looked taken aback and then burst out laughing, unable to bear it any longer.

Seeing that smile, Julius lowered his chin in satisfaction. However, Joshua next to him was stunned at being used as a conversation starter. Julius shrugged at his younger brother's reaction.

"You stayed of your own volition, Joshua."

"I-I know that, Brother…!"

To Joshua's flustered voice, Julius replied briefly, "That's fine." Anastasia, watching this, tilted her head slightly,

"That's right. It's obvious, but Julius also speaks casually when talkin' ta his family. It felt a bit refreshin' ta hear it from ya."

"That may be true. I apologize if it was hard to hear."

"I said it was refreshin', so there's no need ta apologize. If ya can talk ta me without bein' too formal, that's much more welcome. Do I look like I wanna have a formal conversation?"

Anastasia tilted her head, Mimi on her lap, and Hetaro and Tivey on either side. Seeing how cute the scene was, Julius also smiled,

"By the way, I forgot to ask, but what are Mimi and the others wearing?"

"They're so cute, ain't they? It's unbearable, ain't it?"

"I agree with you about Mimi, but I do feel a bit sorry for the other two."

"Really? Hmm, I guess it can't be helped…"

Judging from her response that there was no deeper meaning behind it, Julius defended Hetaro and Tivey with a few words. Anastasia thought about his advice for a bit and then,

"Okay. Ya two can go get changed. There are new robes with the Ligers."

"What, really? What a relief, I'm off!"

"I felt like I was not alive. Julius, I'm indebted to you."

Their faces brightened as Hetaro and Tivey ran out of the reception room. Their skirts fluttered briskly as they ran through the room with light steps.

That was how much cross-dressing had affected them. Even if it suited them, the humiliation was probably a different story.

"Lady Anastasia, please don't play around too much. Your position is…"

"Different from before? Maybe. But even if my position changes, I won't change. Otherwise, there's no point. Right?"

"…"

Her smile remained the same, but Anastasia spoke with a different tone of voice. Julius felt as if her words had struck him in the heart, and he choked slightly.

The atmosphere changed. The room, the mansion—no, the world around Anastasia.

"I had a lot of fun talkin' with Joshua until Julius returned, but… it's about time we got ta the important main topic."

"The main topic."

"The outlook for the royal selection in the future, how we should face the royal selection in the first place…those kinds of things."

The one who swallowed, was it him, or was it Joshua next to him?

Julius, completely captivated by the woman, licked his lips to avoid being entangled in the gradually increasing pressure. Then, he stared back into Anastasia's light blue eyes.

Since she was bringing up the topic, Anastasia must have already had a plan in mind. To what extent that plan overlapped with Julius's wishes, he wanted to know first of all.

"Future prospects…May I ask what your wishes are for the royal selection, Lady Anastasia?"

"For me, winnin' the royal selection and gettin' the country…that would be the best outcome. With the kingdom on my scales, I'm interested ta see what will happen. But…"

Cutting off her words there, Anastasia closed one of her round eyes, and continued.

"I hate losin' battles. I'd rather not fight than lose. So I thought changin' the conditions for victory entirely might be an option."

"Changing the conditions for victory…? What do you mean by that?"

"It's a simple matter. For example, how about handin' over victory in the royal selection ta another candidate? If it would safely reduce the number of competitors, that would be tasty enough, right? Wouldn't it be profitable ta make a deal with another candidate usin' that as a condition and pull out somethin' good?"

"—! That is a huge disregard for the kingdom's prestige!"

Joshua lashed out at Anastasia, who was smiling with her hands clasped in front of her chest. Julius was of the same opinion as the red-faced Joshua; he was just late.

Selling the right to the throne. That was unacceptable. However—

“That’s what ya say, Joshua, but I’m from a different country. I don’t have the backin’ of the kingdom, and my competitors are a duchess and a princess with special circumstances…What are my chances of winnin’?”

“Th-That’s…”

“Besides, ya mentioned the kingdom’s prestige, but the dragon jewel chose me, who’s from Kararagi. At that point, the kingdom’s prestige had practically fallen to the ground.”

“…”

Stammering, Joshua glanced his way out of the corner of his eye, but Julius closed his eyes.

Anastasia’s words were realistic. She was by no means blessed with prerequisites.

In the first place, the reason Anastasia had put her name forward for the royal selection was because she had accidentally found out that she had the qualifications to be a dragon maiden, which was the qualification to participate. Not being too attached to that qualification, nor being too hung up on a right that came out of nowhere, could also be said to be a natural compromise for a merchant.

“The turf war in Kararagi had reached a stalemate, so I welcomed the opportunity ta expand our market ta other countries. That’s why I accepted the invitation, but…ta think that I would actually be qualified ta become the king of the country I was invited ta was like a dream.”

“It’s not a dream; it’s reality.”

“Let’s turn that reality into a more realistic profit. Is what I’m sayin’ really that strange?”

Julius looked away after hearing Anastasia’s words. Heat began to swirl in his chest.

He remembered the moment when she had touched the insignia and the dragon jewel shined. At that moment, Julius had been confused by the unexpected gift he had received—and at the same time, he had felt an irresistible sensation as if he was being swept away by a great wave.

Before he'd known it, Julius had been on one knee on the floor, asking Anastasia to participate in the royal selection. Even now, he still didn't think he was wrong to have followed that impulse.

"But, was it too much of a burden to you, Lady Anastasia?"

"I'm not talkin' about whether it's a burden or not. For me, it's like I've found somethin', and the question is how ta use it in the most profitable way. If I win, that's the best outcome. But if I think about what happens if I lose, there must be a smarter way ta do it."

Anastasia intentionally forced a rather undignified smile onto her pretty face. It was a slightly provocative move, but Julius felt relieved that she had assured him that it was not a burden.

The rights she had gained, the path of light that had opened up before Julius, she wanted to discuss how to handle it.

Julius lowered his eyes slightly. Anastasia's eyes narrowed at his reaction, and she cleared her throat. "Ahem." Then she spoke in a haughty manner,

"Well, ya see. I said it like that, but it's not like I absolutely don't wanna compete, ya know? It's true that I want a country, and I don't dislike big challenges. But in that case, I'd like ta ask a bit more from Julius…"

"Lady Anastasia, I have something to tell you regarding that matter."

"—?"

Anastasia stopped speaking and raised her eyebrows as Julius replied deeply.

However, perhaps sensing something unusual in the knight's serious gaze, she licked her lips,

“Well, I’d like ta think it’s somethin’ good.”

She chuckled. Julius nodded in response.

“I understand where your concerns lay, Lady Anastasia. As you said, being from another country and the fact that the Hoshin Trading Company is not yet firmly established in the kingdom will not be beneficial in the royal selection process. However.”

“Have ya come up with a way ta deal with that?”

“Yes. —I took the time until the evening to do that.”

It was entirely predictable that these topics would come up as a cause for concern during the discussion.

Julius was also the one who had recommended Anastasia for the royal selection. It was Julius who had first recognized her qualifications and suggested that she had the talent to join the royal selection.

Therefore, he had a duty to overcome all obstacles and do his best for Anastasia as much as possible.

“So, what have ya done for me in that time?”

“Right. Please be happy.”

Julius was also distracted by the good news he was delivering to Anastasia, who looked full of expectation.

Julius placed his hand on his chest and bowed respectfully as he spoke solemnly.

“—I have approached the kingdom’s greatest knight, the Sword Saint Reinhard van Astrea, to become Lady Anastasia’s knight. He has responded favorably, saying he would like to meet in person.”

Even if the fact that she was a foreigner couldn’t be changed, she could still establish a foothold in the kingdom—especially in terms of finding backing.

If that person was from the famous family line in the kingdom’s history known as the Sword Saints, then there couldn’t be any greater power.

That was the greatest help Julius could give to Anastasia.

And, upon hearing Julius’s report, Anastasia also broke out into a broad smile—

“—I’m goin’ back ta my country!”

For some reason, she was in a very bad mood.

8

In the reception room of the mansion, which seemed as if a storm had passed, Julius was reflecting on recent events.

—Just what kind of mistake had he made?

“I intended to do everything possible to accommodate Lady Anastasia, but…”

Immediately after he’d told her his brilliant idea, Anastasia’s transformation had been astonishing. Her smile had looked exactly the same as usual, but the intimidating aura she’d carried was on a completely different level.

Even Mimi, although trembling, had obeyed when Anastasia said they were going home.

“Brother, I have seen Lady Anastasia and the others to the inn…”

Just then, Joshua returned after seeing the guests off to the inn. Julius tilted his chin in response to his bewildered younger brother’s report,

“I see, that was a lot of trouble. Sorry to have you do that on my behalf.”

“No, I’m fine. More importantly, are you okay, Brother?”

Julius failed to smile at the concerned gaze. Deep down, he was still very shaken. It didn’t seem that it would be easy to fix.

“But we can’t just leave the relationship as it is.”

“Wouldn’t it be better to give it time for things to calm down?”

“That is one solution, but in this case it is difficult to say it is the best solution. What if Lady Anastasia were to make the decision alone and give up her right to participate?”

Of course, it was hard to imagine that the intelligent Anastasia would act so rashly, but there were times when anyone could not remain calm. He was aware that he had robbed her of her composure. He wanted to do everything he could to find a solution.

However, Joshua’s gentle face showed a look of confusion at Julius’s decision.

“What’s wrong?”

“Maybe I’m being weird, but…Brother, you’re against Lady Anastasia handing over her royal selection eligibility to someone else, aren’t you?”

“Of course. That goes for you as well, doesn’t it, Joshua?”

“Yes, that is true…I am of the opinion that the prophecies of the dragon stone should not be taken lightly…but isn’t it different for you, Brother?”

Julius couldn’t think of anything to answer Joshua’s question and his well-formed eyebrows furrowed. Joshua himself was frustrated that he couldn’t put it into words and kept repeating “Um”.

“Brother, you recommended Lady Anastasia to the royal selection. And for her sake, you even tried to get Reinhard to cooperate as a knight. Why is that?”

“—? Isn’t it natural? I found Lady Anastasia’s qualifications and recommended her for the royal selection. It is my duty to do everything I can to ensure that she is in the best possible condition."

"So, it was a sense of duty that made you do all this. It wasn't about whether or not Lady Anastasia was worthy of the throne; it was about your role…"

"That's not true. –I thought that Lady Anastasia was worthy of the throne. I even thought about offering my sword to her. That's why I want to do everything I can for her."

Naturally, this was the true feeling that came pouring out from Julius's heart.

Of course, Julius had not come to this conclusion simply because the dragon jewel had shined.

The light of the dragon jewel was just a catalyst. It only showed that she was qualified.

Everything that had happened afterwards was the result of Julius having seized that opportunity and following his own heart.

Revealing that the throne was vacant and worried about the kingdom's bleak future, Julius asked her to join the candidates in the royal selection in order to make the prophecy of the dragon stone come true.

What had Anastasia said to Julius?

The words she had spoken without the slightest fear—Julius remembered them all.

"—She laughed. She said her fingers were touching her dream. She was overwhelmed by the size of it."

Before the dragon jewel's light had stolen the conversation, Anastasia had told him her story.

Born and raised in the lowest class of Kararagi, she had started as a servant at a company and worked her way up to where she was today. It was the result of desperate efforts. Her ambitions easily led her to surpass her own limits.

The girl who had been born with nothing, who had not let go of anything she had gained along the way, now appeared before him boldly, holding everything she had grasped.

There, Julius saw Anastasia Hoshin's royal vessel.

—Everything, including the light of the dragon jewel, was merely a "bonus" that came afterwards.

"I want to offer my sword without turning away from my path, my pride, or my loyalty. I saw that in Lady Anastasia."

"…"

"I was fascinated by her rapid progress. I was eager to witness it."

To that end, he had intended to cooperate as much as possible.

"Apparently, it seems I was dumped by Lady Anastasia."

Saying that like a cheap joke, Julius felt his body become extremely heavy. It seemed that this truth had caused him more pain than he had expected.

At the very least, from now on, he would support Anastasia from behind the scenes—

"…Um, Brother, there's something I'd like to say."

"What is it?"

"Brother, you often say that I underestimate myself too much…but I don't think that you can say that about other people."

Joshua's sudden statement made Julius stare in surprise. Joshua gave a wry smile at his brother's surprise and continued playing with his long bangs.

"You're overthinking it, Brother. I get that. I understand that you chose the person you thought was the most reliable for Lady Anastasia’s sake. I get that, but let me say this. That’s a big misunderstanding! You’re wrong!”

“I’m wrong? But, Reinhard is the best knight in the kingdom…”

“No, that’s not true! Because the best knight in the kingdom is you, Brother!! There is no knight greater than the ‘Finest of Knights’ Julius Juukulius! That is the conclusion!”

Joshua, his face reddening as he made sweeping gestures, spoke passionately to Julius. Julius was thrown aback by his younger brother’s enthusiasm, and blinked repeatedly in surprise.

He had never seen Joshua express his feelings so forcefully before. Julius was shaken by this, but Joshua continued to press on.

“If the best knight in the kingdom is the ‘Finest of Knights’ Julius Juukulius, then what should you do, Brother? You need the best knight to serve Lady Anastasia.”

“…”

“I have heard your thoughts, Brother. As the Juukulius family, it will be quite difficult to support a person from another country as a candidate for the royal selection. We can probably expect a great deal of opposition, but…we’ll deal with it somehow!”

“Somehow… That’s not like you, Joshua; that’s a very careless opinion.”

“Right now, I will do whatever it takes to get things done. I don’t want to see you staying in the shadows for Lady Anastasia’s sake. That wouldn’t be elegant at all.”

“…”

Joshua’s pleading words pierced his heart.

This may have sounded ridiculous or cheap. However—

“—That’s a big deal.”

To tarnish appearances, to lack grace, would go against the chivalry that Julius believed in.

Joshua knew this better than anyone, so he used it to his advantage to persuade him.

That was the origin of Julius Juukulius, whom many people praised as the “Finest of Knights”. —It was a fundamental principle that must never be compromised.

“Brother’s wish is to support Lady Anastasia on her path to become king. To achieve that, what’s needed is the best knight in the kingdom, so there’s no problem!”

“What I wanted to do and what I need to achieve it came together. …It feels a bit like a forced effort, but can this be called elegant?”

“Everything you do seems elegant to me, Brother.”

“That’s an overly biased opinion. –But, I’m grateful, Joshua.”

Being persuaded by such uncharacteristic passion, Julius closed his eyes. Behind his closed eyes, he could see the image of Anastasia listening to Julius’s explanation with the glowing dragon jewel in her palm.

He could see her expression and eyes gradually blossoming as if bathed in light.

“I don’t know why Lady Anastasia is upset. But at the very least, I have not yet conveyed my words. I would find it unbearable to have this all come to an end before that happens.”

“In that case…!”

Joshua’s eyes lit up with anticipation, and Julius turned his gaze to the magic crystal in the room. Julius’s eyes, the same color as the crystal, were reflected in its pale yellow glow.

—It wasn’t too late to visit a woman at night.

"—I'm goin' ta sleep tonight. Don't let anyone through."

When Anastasia returned to the inn, her attitude sent a strong chill down Ricardo's spine, and he shivered.

He silently watched as she headed towards her room, leaving only a short message behind. He could hear the sound of the door being closed rather roughly, and Ricardo made a gesture as if wiping the sweat from his forehead.

"Oh, scary. What's with that attitude… Mimi, what happened?"

"No idea! The lady just burst out of nowhere! Mimi was curled up on the lady's lap so it was really scary! Everything else is a mystery!"

Ricardo scratched his dark brown head at the unreliable Mimi. Thinking there was little hope, he glanced over at Hetaro and Tivey who had returned with her, but they also shook their heads awkwardly.

"Y'all don't even know why the lady is in such a bad mood? That's troublin'. It's rare for her to get so angry even when a business deal isn't goin' well."

Sighing with his fanged mouth, Ricardo stroked his thick chest with his palm. From his chest to his stomach, his entire body was covered in dark brown fur—he was a dog-man demi-human. He was the leader of the Iron Fang, and the mood of his employer, Anastasia, was quite a source of worry.

—Ricardo and Anastasia had known each other for a long time. About fifteen years now.

Their first meeting dated back to when Anastasia was a dirty homeless girl. Even at a young age, she had possessed extraordinary eyes, and it had been Ricardo who had cleaned her up and introduced her to work as a maid at a company.

Their relationship had continued ever since, and now he found himself in a situation like this. Life was full of twists and turns. –Especially as someone who knew the current situation Anastasia found herself in.

“Otherwise, my dream would be whether the lady and ya could become proper wives. The lady scares men away, and ya…what, can ya get married?”

“Married? Don’t know, but it’s best to assume that things will work out somehow! That’s it!”

“You’re havin’ a good time… Hey, Hetaro, don’t glare at me like that. It’s not somethin’ we need ta talk about right now. Why don’t ya leave yer sister for a bit?”

“Captain, that’s like telling me to die…”

“That’s too much of an exaggeration!”

Younger children have no idea about the sorrow of those who are older.

As Ricardo lamented this, he suddenly noticed Tivey, who had left the conversation and had a troubled look on his face. He was fiddling with the monocle on his left eye and seemed to be in the middle of deep thought.

“What’s the matter, Tivey? Is there somethin’ botherin’ ya?”

“I was just thinking. I’m also choosing a place of business to establish the trading company in the Kingdom of Lugunica. It would be troublesome if the lady were to withdraw…”

“Withdraw? Why would she do that? That’s not like the lady.”

Ricardo laughed away his worries with his mouth wide open, while Tivey turned back to him with a serious expression on his face,

“On the way back in the dragon carriage, the lady was grumbling. If she was serious…agh!”

“Ya idiot, how can she be serious? Besides, ya saw the look on her face when she came out here, didn’t ya? There’s no way that lady would just quietly run away with her tail tucked between her legs.”

Poking Tivey's overthinking head with his finger, Ricardo waggled his tail vigorously.

The Hoshin Company's expansion into the Kingdom of Lugunica—this was supposed to be a new business plan put forward by Anastasia, but now it had transformed into merely one of the goals.

Ricardo clearly remembered the appearance of Anastasia on the day she had brought back the greed she desired for this kingdom. –That was Anastasia Hoshin.

"With a face that sparkles like that, how is it possible that greedy girl would give up?"

That was the look Anastasia made when she found something she truly desired.

It was the face she'd shown when she'd coveted the company, the three siblings, Roshi's life, and Ricardo.

So, Anastasia had once again found something she craved in this kingdom.

"She'll do whatever it takes to get it. Just like when she took over the company from Chuden."

"Vice President Chuden seems to be satisfied with his current position, though…"

"That guy has a difficult personality. I can't really say anythin' about other people, though."

Ricardo tilted his head as he recalled the squinty-eyed man he had known for a long time.

In any case, Anastasia had done everything well since they'd first met.

So her attitude had remained the same until now and likely wouldn't change in the future.

"So the reason you're in a bad mood is because ya were turned away from somethin' ya wanted."

As he remembered the reason for her rarely seen bad mood, the corner of Ricardo's mouth twisted.

In the past, when she was a child, Anastasia used to sulk more often than she did now.

It was when Ricardo easily evaded her, when the three siblings didn't listen to her as she wanted, when Chuden left her confused in the negotiations over the representation rights of the company—

"—In other words, she's in the middle of her evil scheme. What do ya think?"

"Unfortunately, even if I join the conversation halfway through, I can only say that I cannot give a thoughtless answer."

"That's a strange way ta answer. Like the lady."

Contrary to his words, Ricardo shook off his knees with a look of amusement on his face. As he slowly rose to his feet, he found himself a head taller than the good-looking man who had appeared in front of the inn.

Thus, the number of times he'd met him face to face could be counted on one hand, but—

"I hadn't noticed, but I guess that one was actually quite concerned about appearances."

"—? Sorry, but I don't see what you are saying again. Also, it is hard to give up on our conversation, but there is something else I need to prioritize right now. Would it be okay if you let me through?"

"Sure…is what I'd like ta say, but I guess that's not possible."

He made a show of giving way first, then blocked the way. The man frowned at Ricardo's childish harassment, while Ricardo gestured to Mimi and the others.

“I’ll deal with the customer. Y’all go and tell the lady that a customer has come. If she stays like that, she’ll probably say ta get rid of him, though.”

“Ah, she said not to let anyone through! Mimi has amazing memory skills!”

“Right? So my role is decided.”

“Aye, aye! Then, Captain and Julius, do your best!”

Mimi straightened up and recited her employer’s orders, and he stroked her head with his large palm. Mimi shook her head in delight, then took her two younger brother’s hands and ran into the inn.

Seeing them leave with a smile, Ricardo then rotated his shoulders. And then,

“I take it you are planning to turn me away?”

“That’s what the lady ordered me ta do. The hard part about bein’ a mercenary is that ya can’t go against yer employer. Well, even without that, I’d still be in the way tonight.”

“…”

The good-looking man narrowed his eyes. Tension grew in his limbs, and the air became tense at the same time.

Although he may have appeared to be a gentleman on the outside, what lied within was formidable—

“Usin’ a blade on the streets of the Flower Capital would be a big problem. So…I’ll make ya leave for today with my fists.”

“I see. I didn’t expect to be welcomed warmly, but I didn’t expect it to be to this extent. –However.”

The weight difference between the thick, massive man and the young man was more than double. Naturally, if they fought barehanded, it was obvious who would have the advantage—but even so, the young man laughed.

He removed the white cloak of his uniform and the knight sword attached to his waist, along with its sheath. Then, becoming lighter, he raised both his slender, supple arms and took a stance.

“Without a sword, I can easily defeat you. It’s disappointing that you think that.”

“…What d’ya know, I’m surprised.”

Seeing his bare-handed refusal to back down, Ricardo sighed in amazement for a moment.

Although he thought he had judged him to be a force to be reckoned with, it seemed he was still underestimating him as just a “knight”.

“…”

In front of him, what emerged was an unyielding spirit and a strong sense of pride honed through tireless training.

It was arrogant of him to think that he would be at a huge disadvantage if they fought barehanded.

“Li’l Ana bein’ all about looks isn’t somethin’ I can laugh at.”

He growled ferociously, his mouth twisting viciously, but there was a sense of relief in what he muttered.

Inside, he couldn’t stop laughing. He felt like slapping his knee at what he had just muttered.

—He had seen great potential in the young Anastasia, yet he had foolishly misjudged the young man in front of him.

10

“Oh! You beat the Captain? Amazing! How was it? How was it?”

“I’m happy to receive praise, but he went easy on me. In the first place, he had been drinking before I challenged him. I can't say he was in top condition."

After pushing past the gatekeeper and stepping confidently into the inn, he was greeted by three people who seemed to have been waiting for him to arrive. They were Mimi, Hetaro, and Tivey, the three siblings.

They all praised him for defeating Ricardo who had stood in his way, but Julius could not agree with them. Ricardo's consideration was obvious to Julius who had faced him.

The fact that they bumped fists together was probably just to save appearances.

"I take it that he set things up for me. That he deliberately played the villain in order to create an opportunity for us to talk."

"In that case, should we be villains as well?"

Hetaro asked, pointing to the door at the end of the corridor behind him. At the question, Julius closed one eye,

"What did Lady Anastasia tell you?"

"Like with the Captain, she said not to let anyone through. But…"

"The lady's made such a troublesome decision! I think, even no can mean yes!"

"I'll have to find out later who taught my sister that phrase."

Hetaro nodded repeatedly in response to Tivey's sigh. Mimi was completely unaware of her two younger brothers' overprotective behavior, but, in any case, he understood their opinion. Just like Ricardo,

"It seems you three will also allow me a chance to speak with her."

"If the lady is acting up, we won't be able to do our jobs either."

With no other choice, Tivey gave way to Julius. Mimi followed suit, and Hetaro followed after. Julius smiled at the path the three siblings had made.

“I don’t really get it, but I think it would be good to make the lady laugh! I thought that!”

“—Then, I’ll try to live up to those expectations.”

Mimi gave him a thumbs up and pushed him towards the room at the end of the hall. As he stood in front of the door, he took a deep breath,

“Lady Anastasia, I apologize for bothering you so late. It’s Julius Juukulius. I have come to speak with you. If you could please spare me a moment—”

“—N-No. Ya can’t. I’ve already closed up shop for today.”

There was a reply. He knocked on the door and called out, and from the other side of the door came a faint, high-pitched reply.

Julius’s cheeks stiffened at the rejection. If it were his usual self, he would have left the place with some nice words and decided to take the time to repair their relationship.

However, the words Joshua had spoken to him gave Julius the strength he needed.

“In that case, please excuse my rudeness and continue listening where you are. I would like to make a correction to what I said earlier. —I have retracted my recommendation for the Sword Saint to be Lady Anastasia’s knight.”

“…”

He could feel a slight sense of her holding her breath through the door. Closing his eyes, Julius recalled the face of the friend he had asked to meet earlier. He had spoken passionately for several hours and then took back what he had said that same day. His friend never got angry at his extremely dishonest words and actions.

However, as they parted ways, Reinhard smiled sadly and said, “I congratulate you for wanting to offer up your sword. I wonder if I too could yearn with such passion.”

Julius nodded in response to his friend’s murmur that seemed as if he felt he was wishing too much for himself.

“Of course you will. You too will definitely find a master to whom you can dedicate your sword. –For a hero, that will certainly happen.”

Did that sound arrogant? But, Reinhard sent him off with a smile. He’d like to think that his feelings were conveyed.

“—Why?”

A sudden question brought Julius, who was lost in thought, back to reality. A voice came from the door, asking Julius his true intentions in declining the cooperation of the Sword Saint.

This was it. Here, he must not make any mistakes with his words. He must speak his own feelings correctly.

“Lady Anastasia, it was none other than I who recommended you for the royal selection. I am responsible for leading you into this harsh battle. It is my responsibility to prepare everything in advance, to help and support you as much as possible.”

“Well, wasn’t the Sword Saint the way ya took responsibility? Julius was tryin’ ta fulfill his responsibilities. I’m not doubtin’ that, ya know?”

“—No, that’s not true. I told you. I have a responsibility to prepare everything in advance, to help and support you as much as possible. Therefore, I want you to have the best knight in the kingdom by your side.”

Not understanding, she became perplexed. She had no idea what Julius was trying to say. Of course. Julius himself knew that what he was about to say was preposterous.

However, this was the only option. Suppressing his hesitation, Julius puffed out his chest and spoke.

“I am Julius Juukulius, a member of the royal guard of the Kingdom of Lugunica. I humbly bear the title of ‘Finest’ as an honor of the knights—I am the kingdom’s best knight who will serve you.”

He stated it decisively. Immediately after saying this, Julius felt his body heat up.

At the same time as that heat, a change occurred in front of his eyes. The closed door slid open, revealing the person standing on the other side.

“…”

Seeing the petite woman, Julius knelt respectfully and gracefully. After observing his movements, she let out a long, deep sigh, and then,

“…That’s a really big boast. Sayin’ you’re the best knight in the kingdom, even surpassin’ the Sword Saint. That’s definitely not somethin’ ya would ever say.”

“My younger brother gave me the push I needed. Even now, my legs still tremble at my own boastful words.”

“Then, will ya correct it?”

“No. —It would be completely unreasonable for the first knight of the one who stands at the top of the kingdom to be anyone other than the best knight in the kingdom. Therefore, I hereby pledge my loyalty and sword to you.”

“I haven’t even said anythin’ about makin’ ya my knight yet; you’re so impatient, Julius.”

Putting her hand over her mouth and seeming to have regained her usual composure, the woman—Anastasia—laughed. Looking up at her smile, Julius quietly waited for her next words.

Anastasia also knew what he was waiting for. So she gently extended her pale, delicate fingers in his direction.

“—It feels surprisingly heavy.”

Taking the knight sword that Julius offered in her outstretched hand, Anastasia muttered this.

The slender knight sword was a sword that had been passed down in the Juukulius family. It was not a particularly famous sword, but the sword that had been passed down for generations had weight beyond the weight of lifting it.

“It’s the pride of a knight.”

“And then, proof of loyalty…did I get that right? It’s hard ta handle things ya can’t see. If this is a favor, then I’d be very happy if it didn’t have a price tag.”

Anastasia stuck out her tongue playfully and then tightened her cheeks.

And as soon as she became serious, her cuteness disappeared, and she began to emit a radiance that was simply captivating.

It was Anastasia’s own radiance that had captivated Julius even before the dragon jewel had shined in her palm.

“…”

Though she was not used to it, Anastasia slowly unsheathed the sword.

It was a blade that he must have seen thousands of times, but to Julius now it looked special. Leaving traces of that silver color on his eyelids, Julius closed his eyes and bowed his head.

Anastasia pointed the blade of the drawn sword at the kneeling Julius. She tilted the blade, and the flat of the sword hit Julius’s left shoulder, then his right shoulder.

—The ceremonial procedures for knighting were a widely known custom in the kingdom.

A knight was supposed to receive this knighting ceremony twice in his lifetime.

The first time was when a person who aspired to be a knight came of age and was recognized as a knight by the head of their family or a superior.

The second time was when they chose a person as their final master and were allowed to serve them.

In some cases, a third or subsequent time could occur, but this was considered shameful for a knight. This was because, in whatever form, it was synonymous with losing a master.

Therefore, being knighted a second time was equivalent to the biggest decision of a knight's life.

If only Anastasia, holding the sword in her hands, could also realize the meaning of offering it.

"So now, Julius…Julius is my knight. Ya can't take it back, ya know?"

"The same goes for you, Lady Anastasia. Now that I have become your knight, what you said about giving up your right to participate in the royal selection…"

"Ah, that? That was just a joke. I wasn't serious, honestly."

"What?"

Julius, who had thought that his first suggestion in their master-servant relationship would be for Anastasia to retract her statement, was stunned by how nonchalantly Anastasia spoke.

Glancing at Julius's reaction, Anastasia looked up in his direction,

"If I hadn't said that, things wouldn't have turned out the way they are now, right? I needed ta make sure that ya would desperately come and carry me."

"That's…But even in that case, you could have received Reinhard's help. What exactly is it about him that displeases you, Lady Anastasia…?"

“Yes, wait! I never answered that question. So it’s completely forbidden from now on! That’s enough now. My knight is Julius! That’s settled! The contract! Is sealed!”

Holding out her palm, Anastasia closed the door on Julius’s question, shutting it down completely. Overwhelmed by the force of her rapid-fire speech, Julius swallowed his words.

He had just sworn his knightly oath. After taking that oath here, he shouldn’t go against the words of the woman who had become his master so soon.

“…”

Telling himself this, Julius finally realized the truth, albeit belatedly.

He had offered his sword to his ideal partner, took an oath as a knight, and they had become master and servant.

“Julius?”

“Now, although it’s too late, I am astonished at my own actions. I proclaimed myself to be the best knight in the kingdom, and then forced a knight’s oath on Lady Anastasia and made a pact of master and servant.”

“Ah, true, that may not have been like ya, Julius.”

He felt embarrassed that his shameful behavior had been so obvious. However, in response to Julius’s reflection, Anastasia continued with a “But”,

“I’m happy that ya chased after me so desperately, ya know?”

“It’s a relief for me to hear you say that.”

“Yes, yes, isn’t that right? I’ve been sayin’ this for a long time, but I’m kind ta my people. I’ll also take good care of Julius, who has become my knight, so remember that.”

Anastasia was in high spirits, and Julius touched his bangs with his fingers. He felt embarrassed, perhaps because he was aware that he lacked grace.

More than that, it may have been because of the feeling he had gained as a knight that burned brightly in his heart.

“And then, since Julius and I are now truly in the same boat…it’s time ta close for today.”

“So you say.”

“There are so many discussions we missed today, right? I need ta recover my energy for that. It’s goin’ ta be busy from tomorrow onwards.”

For Anastasia, that seemed like a very leisurely way of saying things. “Time and money have the same value” was Kararagi’s way of thinking, and in keeping with that, it was an uncharacteristic way of speaking for Anastasia.

Anastasia looked at Julius with a smile like a blooming flower,

“Even if we don’t hurry, there’s always tomorrow. –Right? My best knight in the kingdom.”

“—That’s right. Tomorrow, and the day after, and for the rest of my life.”

He nodded at Anastasia’s words, placed his hand on his chest, and bowed.

“Good night, Lady Anastasia. Please, have pleasant dreams.”

“Mm, thank ya. Ya can dream about me, Julius.”

“That’s a very attractive proposition.”

Julius smiled back at Anastasia who waved back at him, then turned his back on her. He walked down the corridor and headed towards the entrance of the inn. There he found Mimi and her siblings as well as Ricardo.

He raised his hand to them. From this moment on, they and Julius were brethren.

Together, they would support Anastasia and become comrades who would do everything in their power for her.

“What’s that, ya got a good look on yer face.”

“Oh, that’s right! You got a good look on your face!”

Ricardo bared his teeth and laughed, and Mimi imitated him. He saw Hetaro and Tivey laughing as well, and Julius laughed too.

It was an awfully pleasant feeling.

“—I have been bestowed the greatest honor in the world by a wonderful woman.”

11

—The moment the light was born, I blinked in surprise.

The dazzling light, the faint heat in my palm, the unexpected mechanism, all of it surprised me.

However, out of all of that, there was one thing that burned itself into my eyes and heart the most.

It was—

“—Should I say congratulations?”

Leaning her back against the closed door, she placed her hand on her thin chest and took several deep breaths.

It was in the midst of this frantic attempt to calm herself down that the voice came.

Anastasia narrowed her light blue eyes at the familiar voice and glared into the back of the room.

This was a first-class inn even in the royal capital, and the spacious guest rooms had thick walls with great care taken to prevent noise from leaking to surrounding areas. In the room she had chosen, Anastasia locked the door behind her and said,

“Even if ya say congratulations, I don’t know what ya mean.”

“After all that, the thing you wanted came flying into your hands. I was so moved by that good fortune.”

“Don’t say mean things! Honestly, this is the girl who’s always been by my side!”

Anastasia retorted to the androgynous voice, pursing her lips as she stepped forward. Her feet led her to the bed—on top of which was a white fox scarf. It was something Anastasia always wore, and at first glance it looked like an ordinary piece of fur, but—

“More than the brilliance of the dragon jewel, you were attracted to his eyes as he spoke of his dreams. So you tried every trick in the book to get him by your side…but in the end, it was all in vain. Because he was the one who came to you.”

“—Echidna. Are ya my ally? Or are ya my enemy?”

Anastasia spoke sternly, and the fox scarf suddenly moved. It abandoned its role as a scarf, jumped onto Anastasia’s outstretched hand, and gently placed itself against her cheek.

With pure white fur and black eyes, it was a fantastically beautiful fox.

“Of course, I’m your ally. We’ve been friends for ten years. There’s no need to ask now, right?”

“But despite that, don’t ya think ya don’t show enough affection for me? I don’t deny Julius, but…this country will be the place where our contract will be fulfilled. Don’t ya think so?”

“That’s right. How much will you grow from that first opportunity you had as a child? I want to see where your fingertips lead. –Ah, that is my wish.”

Feeling an itchy sensation on her cheek, Anastasia narrowed her eyes at the fox's voice. There was a different kind of affection there that she didn't show to Julius, Ricardo, or Mimi and her siblings.

"Well then, I'll show ya. The ultimate goal of my desire. —Ta everyone, in a big way."

The love of her family, the loyalty of her knight, and the promise made to her friend.

—Anastasia Hoshin licked her lips, her heart pounding with sweet greed.

Chapter 4:
Felt’s Camp Formation Story Starting from Zero

1

The first thing I noticed was the unbelievably soft sensation wrapping around my whole body.

“Buah?!” A pig-like sound escaped my mouth in response to the unknown sensation. Waking up to my own voice, I opened my heavy eyelids, scratching my head. Covering my blurry vision was a pillow soaked in saliva—or so at least I thought. It’s gotta be a pillow. It’s hard to tell since it’s so pristinely white, as if it was just cleaned, and has an unbelievable silky texture, but it’s under my head, so it’s definitely a pillow, right?

Confirming the existence of the pillow my drowsy head was resting on, I noticed the anomaly wrapped around me wasn’t limited to just that. The pillow wasn’t the only thing with a ridiculously silky texture. The thin blanket covering my body did, too. Since there’s a pillow and a blanket, I must be on a bed.

As I suspected, there was a bed underneath me that nearly pushed my hand back when I pushed down on it. I pushed it several more times to check its resistance. It went without saying, but the hovel I usually stayed at didn’t have beds like this one. All I had was the discarded sofa I brought back and cleaned up. So what kinda magic was involved to turn that piece of junk into such a wonderful—

“Alright, that’s enough playin’ around.”

Not to brag or anything, but I’ve never had trouble waking up. Having been raised in the slums from a young age, having a good sense of danger was crucial. This was especially the case for me since I had a bunch of enemies due to my bad habits. I wasn’t even safe in my own resting place.

Still pushing on the bed, I turned my attention away from the pillow and scanned my surroundings. Looking up and down at the place I was in, I frowned. I reached a conclusion without much contemplation.

“Where the hell am I?”

Along with the soft texture of the pillow and blanket, I found myself in a room oozing with extravagance. It was somewhere a mere orphan from the slums could never have access to in a million years.

My usual-balled up rag was now a pristine pillow; the blanket that never lost its odor no matter how many times I washed it was now a clean, silky one; and the sofa that was infested with bugs was now a bed as soft as freshly baked bread.

Conclusion: This must be a dream.

“Ha!” I snickered at myself for having such an unfitting dream.

Well, in that case. I wrapped myself in the silky blanket again. It was refreshing not having to endure the stench of garbage in the cold morning air, but there was no point anymore as I already knew it was nothing more than a dream. It’s better to hurry up and wake up.

I would rather wake up to the desolate back alley I was used to than continue having a dream like this one. I was never fond of my life in the slums, nor was I attached to the people living there, but it was far better than this dream.

My goal was to one day escape my low quality life. I even formed a plan to achieve this by sharpening my thieving skills and setting aside a sum of money for savings everyday out of my measly income. I never wished to skip all the steps to get a life like this dream is showing me. That’s nothing but an insult to my plan.

It pissed me off that I was even having this dream. Hurry up and wake up, me. I wasn’t sure if sleeping in my dream would help me wake up in real life, but that was the only method I could come up with.

Then an unfamiliar voice hit my ears. “I thought you had woken up, but are you still resting?"

"—!" Startled, I instinctively reached for my waist only to notice my knife was nowhere to be found. Instead, my hand simply brushed past my ass and swung behind me. In fact, this was when I finally realized I wasn't wearing anything. There was nothing for me to cover myself with other than the blanket.

Clenching my teeth at my predicament, I grabbed the pillow near me and stood up as I glared at the person who spoke to me. When I turned around, the person had just opened the door to enter the room. The man who entered the white, extravagant room was a red-haired bastard.

Upon realizing I was glaring at him, he furrowed his brows as though he was taken aback. "Your clothes were conspicuously soiled and noticeably worn out, so our maids are repairing them. Your substitute clothes are on the way. If you would wait momentarily…"

"Wait just a minute," I said, stopping him in his tracks by raising my palm.

"—?" The bastard with eyes as blue as a bright sky showed a confused expression on his ridiculously handsome face, which irritated me even further.

As stated earlier, I wasn't bad at waking up. So, as soon as I saw this bastard's face, I started to remember everything that happened to me and how I ended up in this situation. And how this was not a dream, after all.

"Nevermind my clothes for now. That's not to say that I don't wonder why the hell you decided to strip me, but we can leave that aside for now. For now. Can you guess what I want to ask?" I said, scowling at him.

"I can think of a few possibilities, but I am not certain as to which one is correct. Will you give me the answer?" The red-haired bastard—known as the Sword Saint by everybody in the royal capital—Reinhard answered back with a question.

Feeling my blood boil at his oblivious attitude, I yelled, “Where the hell am I! And you! Why the hell did you have to knock me out?!”

Accidentally exposing myself in the heat of the moment, I hastily grabbed the blanket to hide. I must have looked like an idiot. A chuckle escaped Reinhard’s lips, and in response, I shot him a threatening glare, my fang on full display.

“Apologies for my insolent actions,” Reinhard responded nonchalantly to my apparent anger. “Please allow me to explain my reasoning behind my actions. Lady Felt,” he said, kneeling before me, piercing straight through me with those blue eyes.

2

I sat with my legs crossed on the bed, wrapping myself with the blanket while shaking my leg in irritation. As soon as I saw Reinhard’s face, I remembered everything that had happened up until I passed out.

The thieving request from the woman in black who promised a hefty reward; the insignia the dim-witted-looking silver half-devil had; the young guy with intimidating eyes I encountered after successfully stealing the insignia; and the events following after rendezvousing with Old Man Rom at the loot house. I remembered everything. Even Reinhard’s anxious look at the time.

He placed his hand over my face and everything went pitch black after that. Next thing I know, here I am.

Although I didn’t like the idea I was in another person’s control, I told myself there was no point in whining about it. Remember what Old Man Rom said: It’s important to be ready for anything, and keep a level head.

“Talk,” I said. “I’ll refrain from condemning the great knight for kidnapping a young girl until then.”

“Well then,” he said, smiling bitterly. “In that case, I must do my best and explain myself to resolve any misunderstandings.”

He’s smiling, this bastard. I clicked my tongue. And when will the damn clothes be here?

Paying no heed to my irritation, Reinhard searched his breast pocket while keeping his ever so soft expression. He was no longer wearing the conspicuous white knight uniform he had on when I had approached him in the slums. Nevertheless, the plain top and bottom he wore were unquestionably expensive, and added with his naturally handsome appearance, they looked ridiculously good on him.

“First of all, we are in House Astrea’s second mansion located in the royal capital’s upper level area known as the Nobles’ District,” Reinhard explained. “The room we’re in right now is a rarely-used guest room. So please forgive us if you feel cramped.”

“I can only take that as sarcasm. I can fit ten of my bedrooms in here.”

Although I spoke with as much hostility as possible, he replied with a simple sorry. He then pulled something out of his breast pocket and placed it on his palm for me to see, to which I groaned. “I believe you’ve seen this before, my lady?”

“That’s the thing I stole.”

“Technically, no. The insignia you’re talking about was returned to its rightful owner: Lady Emilia,” Reinhard explained, the insignia with an emblem of a dragon still placed on his palm. “The one here is a different one of the same kind. One I have been entrusted with.”

After hearing his explanation, I noticed there were in fact a few minor differences from the one the half-devil chick possessed. The differences were small details like the shape of the dragon’s wings and the jewel it held in its mouth, but that was the extent of it.

“So, what of it? I don’t want that thing anymore,” I dismissed.

“Please hold it once and you’ll know what I’m talking about,” Reinhard insisted, without any explanation.

Unable to come up with any retort, I reached for the insignia as told. I picked it up with my fingers, rolled it on my palm, and noticed it emanating light in my hand.

“I’m holding it,” I said. “But I don’t get it. It’s just glowing.”

“Just glowing…is the important part,” Reinhard explained. “The dragon jewel won’t light up in my hand, nor will it in any other person’s hand. No one else, other than you, Lady Felt, and a handful of chosen individuals.”

“Chosen? By a rock?” I snickered, believing he was just messing with me.

Some rock chose me? Who the hell does this rock think it is acting so high and mighty?

However, without changing his expression, Reinhard looked at me intently before continuing. “No, not by the rock. You’ve been chosen by the dragon… No, by fate.”

“Fate…” Instead of just snickering, this time I bursted out laughing. “Fate! Ha! Fate, you say?! How stupid!” I continued laughing, slapping my knee, showing my fang. And to wonder what he was gonna say with such a serious look on his face. “Listen up, Reinhard. Fate is a word losers who love to give up always use as an excuse. They justify their failure by blaming this thing called fate. It’s a perfect word for excuses. But I have no use for it.”

“…”

“Screw fate. It’s nothing but a word to get pity and make excuses. I don’t know what a bastard like you is so happy about, but leave me out of it.”

I swear, the biggest losers who have a habit of running away always resort to the word fate every time they fail. Whether it be their lack of strength, intelligence, luck, money, dreams, it’s all because of fate to them. Screw that. I make my own choices. How I turn out in my life is my own responsibility.

Reinhard remained silent, wearing a solemn expression. Wish he would solemnly let me go.

“Lady Felt,” he finally spoke. “No one can escape fate. The ones who can are only those blessed with certain qualities, possessing great resolve and courage.”

“Shut up. Are you tryna brag about how you are one of them? I’ll beat you up.”

“Unfortunately, just like everyone else, I’m not blessed with such a quality.” Reinhard responded to my hostility as he softened his expression, laughing.

It was a wimpy, bitter smile. Of all the expressions he had shown me up until this point, it, along with his response, irritated me the most.

“Whatever, we’re done.” I said. “I don’t want to talk to a bastard like you. So what if the rock glows? I’m going back to the slums. Just give me back my clothes.”

Yelling was no use, and I had no chance in a fight, so I had nothing more to say to this man. But I had no intention to walk around buck naked. They might have been worn out, but my clothes were some of my meager possessions. I wasn’t going to let them go. However—

“I am afraid I cannot fulfill that request. I have an obligation to inform the royal castle about those who can make the dragon jewel shine. You must be under surveillance for now—a duty you must oblige if you are a citizen of the kingdom.”

“What?! Screw that! If I’m a citizen, you say? This country hasn’t done a thing for me!”

“Even in poverty, living in the royal capital means you are under the protection of the kingdom. However small it may have been, you must have received its blessing. I cannot accept your defiance.”

“It’s not like I wanted to live here! I just didn’t have the money to get out! If you want, I’ll leave immediately. Just throw me out!”

“I cannot agree to that request. Please understand.”

“—!”

My patience was reaching its limit listening to this stubborn bastard. Reinhard, on the other hand, stayed composed the entire time. I was the only one turning red.

With my eyes bloodshot, I took a few deep breaths. Be ready for anything, and keep a level head. “F-Fine, bastard… I’ll take your words into consideration. I will. So just hear me out for a sec.”

“I’m ready to compromise as best as I can. But I must report you to the royal castle and keep you in our house until I get further instructions from the higher-ups. This is non-negotiable. So…”

“Not about that. Something more fundamental…about my clothes. How long are you intending on keeping me stripped, Mr. Great Knight?” I said as sarcastically as possible.

Reinhard widened his eyes. It was the first human-like expression I saw on him.

He gave a rather elegant bow. “My apologies,” he said, before turning his back to me. “I will call the maids now. You may choose from a number of options…”

“And sike! As if I’ll do as you say!”

You can’t be so careless, you idiot!

I grabbed the pillow behind me and threw it at him. He was facing away from me as planned. Without waiting for it to reach him, I jumped back, landing on the floor with my bare feet, and accelerated.

Reinhard moved swiftly before the pillow made contact, catching it in the blink of an eye. It seemed as though my plan failed, but it was all going according to plan.

“Take this!” I threw the sheets I had removed from the bed, covering his field of vision, making him lose sight of me for a split second. I took this chance to make an attempt for the door—would be something an idiot would think of doing. “Later!” I yelled, sticking out my tongue.

Using my momentum from jumping backwards, I pushed the window open with my back, as I held onto the curtain to prevent myself from falling.

I had scoured the room during our conversation. From the view outside the window, I speculated we were on the second floor. As long as I killed the momentum with the curtain, I should have been able to land safely on my feet.

I outsmarted the Sword Saint. That thought crossed my mind when —

“What?” The curtain that was supposed to be supporting me was severed in a flash. The horizontal slash was clean. It would have been impossible to replicate such a feat even with a pair of scissors or a blade. To accomplish this with only his hand made him more than a master. He was a monster.

“You, damn monster!” I exclaimed as I fell.

“This is the second time in the past two days that I’ve been insulted by that word,” Reinhard said, now falling alongside me after jumping out the window in pursuit.

He quickly passed me, reaching the ground first. I, on the other hand, felt sick, not being able to recover from the shock that the curtain was sliced in such a fashion.

“Pardon me,” Reinhard said as he caught me when I finally reached the ground.

Using the pillow in his hand to soften the impact, I fell into his arms like a puzzle piece falling into its place. The blanket I had wrapped myself in fluttered in the wind, making it feel like I was wearing a dress. What am I, a princess being carried by a handsome prince? This ain’t funny at all.

“You may not have known this, as I still haven’t given you a tour of the mansion, but we have stairs for moving between floors.”

“Don’t sass me! Hurry up and let me down! How long are you intending on holding a naked girl?!” I yelled as I floundered in his arms, which he masterfully controlled with simple maneuvering. I get that he doesn't want to let me escape, but why hasn't this bastard let me down?

"If I let you down now, your feet would get dirty. However, I understand your wishes, Lady Felt. So allow me to propose a compromise."

"Compromise?"

"I will meet you halfway. If you can successfully escape from this mansion without getting caught by the people here, then you are free to leave. In return, while you are living here, I would like you to listen to me as much as possible."

"Is that right?! I can run away? No take backs!"

"So do you agree to these terms?"

"You better keep your word, you bastard. If I can escape, I win. Got it?!" I said with a big smile, pointing a finger at him.

He said he's meeting me halfway, but he just dug his own grave. I'm gonna win this for sure. In these sorts of wagers, there's the aggressor and the defender. And the aggressor almost always had the advantage. In this case, I'm the aggressor. I win.

Reinhard let out a smile at my words. It was neither a bitter smile nor a polite smile. It was one that made it hard to tell what he was thinking. It was a normal smile.

Then he looked up at the window we fell out of. "Seems like the maids have noticed the commotion. We should head back to the room."

I clicked my tongue. "Just carry me safely, Mr. Great Knight!"

3

An old couple was waiting for us when we returned to the room. Reinhard explained that they were chamberlains of the mansion and were in charge of managing the giant building. In other words, these are the three people I gotta avoid getting caught by to escape. This is good. I have to be cautious of Reinhard, but it should be easy to get past this old man and old lady.

However, my good mood didn’t last long.

“Hey, man,” I said in a trembling voice.

“Yes ma’am?” Reinhard responded nonchalantly. “I think it suits you very well, my lady.”

Standing next to Reinhard was the old lady, smiling gently, carrying a load of bright colored dresses in her arms. They’d made me wear a yellow one.

“Wh-Where are my usual clothes?”

“They’re safe and secure in our possession,” answered Reinhard. “Please feel free to choose any dress you like. We’ve prepared enough to last a whole month.”

“But why, though?! Why can’t I just wear my regular clothes…”

“As we agreed earlier, it’s a compromise. I will meet you halfway with your wishes, so you must listen to my requests.”

I groaned as I was lost for words. He did. This bastard did mention something like that. So, while I was getting happy about my assured win, this bastard was plotting his own agenda.

Reinhard closed one eye before continuing, as if to taunt me. “And you agreed to this, did you not, Lady Felt?”

“You bastard! I’m gonna escape this damn place before you know it! Just watch me!” I yelled in a voice loud enough to make the whole mansion tremble.

4

And thus, my sad, pathetic, pitiful attempt at escaping had begun.

In retrospect, I still believe my initial assumption was correct. I was allowed to plan my escape as much as I wanted; there was no shortage of methods, and I had every advantage in that I could choose when and how often I made an attempt. Even back at the royal capital, when I was making a living as a thief, the aggressor always had the advantage. The defender had no means of anticipating when their opponent would make a move. In fact, they usually didn’t even know if their opponent would make a move. There’s no way for them to prepare, so I just have to find an opening and move swiftly.

Regardless of the time of the day or where I was in the mansion, I made an attempt at every chance I thought I saw. Whether it was against the old lady, the old man, Reinhard, or even all three at the same time, I carefully observed the situation, made preparations, and executed my plans. As a result, I came to one conclusion: Everyone in the mansion was a monster.

“…”

I gotchu this time! I clenched my fist as I jumped over the red-haired head.

I kicked the wall, jumped towards the ceiling, and grabbed onto the chandelier. Using the chandelier like a swing, I let myself go in a forward motion. Creating distance between myself and the chaser, I accelerated as soon as I landed, running away faster than the wind.

“Alright! It’s my win today! Take that you…gya?!”

Before I could finish my parting remarks, my collar was grabbed from behind, lifting my feet off the ground. “Ugeah,” I gagged upon having my neck constricted, due to being picked up like a cat.

“Lady Felt, I don’t think it’s very lady-like to gag like that,” Reinhard said.

“Ugeah, ugeah, it’s not very lady-like, is it? Ugeah,” I repeated, looking straight at Reinhard, who was still holding me by the collar.

“What a troublesome person,” Reinhard exasperated, smiling bitterly, which ticked me off even more. Oblivious to my irritation, he looked up as he continued. “But to think that you would get past me in a matter of a few days. It’s quite impressive.”

“Like hell that makes me happy, shit! Also, I’m not some stray cat! Let me down!” I said, flapping my feet.

“If so, may I take it that I win today as well?” Reinhard directed a normal smile at me that wasn’t bitter, to which I only looked away. He remained unperturbed, however, as if that was enough for him. “Then, from now on, I would be very happy if you would refrain from saying ‘shit’. It doesn’t sound very…”

“Shit,” I said to let him know I was listening.

I saw his smile turn bitter again in the corner of my eyes.

After dozens of interactions like that, my life under surveillance continued. Even after a week passed since our agreement, all my attempts were thwarted with ease. The bastard appeared out of nowhere every time I tried to make a move, as if he had eyes everywhere in the mansion.

However, he wasn’t the only problem.

“Come on, Lady Felt. Pouting like that ruins that cute face of yours,” said the person responsible for my last failed attempt. We were in the canteen, where I had been dragged.

A plate exuding a sweet aroma was placed in front of me as I sat sulking. My stomach growled at the warm, sweet smell of the pastry. The old lady let out a gentle smile when I instinctively placed my hand on my stomach.

The old lady—who Reinhard calls ‘Auntie’—was one of the people managing the mansion. She was tall and slender with faint blonde hair. I called her Granny, but she still looked young, and it was easy to imagine she was quite the looker in her younger days. Despite this, I was uneasy around her for different reasons than Reinhard. It might be because she’s always smiling and looks so kind.

“We’ve prepared pastries for snack time today. They’re your favorite, right, Lady Felt?” Granny said eagerly with a faint smile, seeing me look back and forth between the plate and her.

Well, since she's insisting. Still somewhat hesitant, I grabbed the hot pastry and began pushing it in my mouth.

As I bit into the crusty surface, the sweet filling melted in my mouth. The hot, sweet taste danced on my tastebuds, giving me a braingasm.

"Mmmm," I let out. This is too good. I can't help smiling.

I hated being in the mansion. I also didn't care for the pretty clothes or the soft bed, but it was impossible to not like the food. They were incomparable to the ones in the slums.

"Can I take you with me when I make my escape?"

Granny chuckled. "I'm very flattered. But I'm afraid my husband will starve to death if I leave. Although, I'm sure the Young Master can fend for himself."

"That's a no then, huh?" I said, clicking my tongue.

Granny's husband—who Reinhard called Uncle and I called Gramps—was a man of few words in charge of tending the garden and going shopping. He had a full set of white hair and a wrinkly face, but there was a glimmer of kindness in his eyes. In other words, he was the type of person I was uneasy around. I speculated his muteness had something to do with the giant white scar on his neck, but that wasn't important. The important thing was that he was also my enemy. Even the day before yesterday, when I tried escaping while we went shopping together… "He anticipated all of my movements and dragged me back here."

"He and I are both old now. We can't move like we used to. So don't be so mean to this old couple. It makes me so, so sad."

"Says the person who throws me around like it's nothing."

Even without Reinhard, Granny and Gramps' defenses were impenetrable. The term monster was not an exaggeration. These threes' abilities far exceeded any other humans' I had seen up to this point. Well, I guess that scary knife lady and the half-devil chick were also something else. Although now that I think about it, that intimidating looking bro was pretty normal. That’s kind of a relief.

“By the way, why are you two so amazing? Is it because you’re Reinhard’s associates? Or are all rich people like you?”

“Please, please, you’re overestimating me. I’m just a tad experienced in martial arts due to my upbringing… The truly exceptional one is my husband. He was so cool when he was young… No, actually, he’s still very cool even today.”

“Granny, Granny, get back to the point.”

“Oh my, how embarrassing,” she said, blushing. She must have gotten embarrassed for suddenly bragging about her own husband.

She must really love him. But that’s not what I’m interested in.

“I didn’t see Reinhard for lunch. Is he out on an errand?” Seeing Granny still blushing, I forcefully changed the topic.

“Yes,” she answered, hands still on her blushing cheeks. “The Young Master had an urgent matter to attend to. He should be coming home shortly. I know you miss him, so please kill some time talking to this old lady.”

“First of all, no one’s missing him. And second, I’m done eating so I’m out of here.” I stood up while licking the sweet jam on my finger. Truth be told, I wanted to lick the plate as well, but when I did once, Granny yelled at me like it was the end of the world. I don’t want to go through that again.

“I have to clean up and prepare for dinner, so I won’t be able to tend to you, but please don’t do anything reckless, okay? Otherwise, the Young Master will get mad.”

“I ain’t a kid, you know? Although, I do want to see Reinhard get mad. Anyways, thanks for the food.” I left the canteen, waving Granny goodbye.

I decided to prance around the mansion, but it had been a week since I arrived and there was nothing else left for me to see. Also, if I tried to make a run for it, Gramps or Granny would definitely catch me in no time. I don't know why, but I can tell.

"But I will definitely escape one of these days."

I feel like I'm slowly getting pulled in by Granny's cooking, but I refuse to let myself get comfortable here. I have to escape. I have reason to go back to where I belong.

"I hope Old Man Rom is doing fine," I muttered the name of my sole family back in the slums.

Although we aren't related by blood, that never mattered. Old Man Rom was and always will be my one and only family. One week prior, I got him involved in my mess because of the mistake I made and even got him injured. To make matters worse, I hadn't been able to check up on him since I was captured by Reinhard. Although the half-devil chick seemed to have tended to his injury, and he wasn't one to die so easily, Reinhard never gave any clear answers whenever I brought it up.

"That bastard's never straight with me when it's about something he doesn't want to talk about. I'm definitely gonna escape from this damn place."

I felt my blood start boiling as I thought aloud before I came to a halt. The door in the back of the hallway I was walking in caught my attention. It looked like it led to an ordinary room, but it grabbed my interest for some reason.

"Wasn't that door usually locked?"

There was usually an imposing lock preventing anyone from entering, but this time the lock was open. I approached the door that was freed from its shackles and turned the knob, opening it with ease.

"..."

Looking around to check that there was no one watching, I entered the room. The cold floor greeted the sole of my foot as I tiptoed my way in.

It was a dimly lit room. Despite it being daytime, the thick curtains shut out any light coming in from the window, which also contributed to the cool temperature. The room was also empty. Although there was a bed in the middle like all the rest of the other rooms in the mansion, that was all. There was nothing that explained why the door was usually under lock and key. And it's not like there's an exit I can use.

"How boring. And here I thought there'd be some hidden treasure or something…huh?"

Before I could finish expressing my disappointment, I caught sight of something that nearly stopped my heart. It was something that took me completely by surprise. There was a woman sleeping in the bed.

What startled me the most was the fact that I had never seen this woman before, and also that I didn't notice her presence at all. I mean, it's like she isn't even there.

"Wh-What the hell is wrong with this woman?"

I cautiously approached the bed. However, no matter how close I got, I couldn't feel any life coming from her. Despite this, I could tell she wasn't dead or just a mannequin. There were features of a living person on this woman. Her cheeks and lips were tinged in red as proof of the blood flowing through her veins, and her chest was moving up and down from breathing, albeit slightly. She's alive. But she has no presence.

"What the hell? Who is she anyway?"

I scratched my head, attempting to calm my nerves. As my heartbeat stabilized, I regained my composure, allowing me to organize my thoughts.

A woman I've never seen before, a locked room, and me. I soon reached a conclusion.

“I see, so that bastard Reinhard’s been keeping a different woman other than me.”

“You’re gravely mistaken.”

“Gyah!” I exclaimed, startled by the sudden voice that came from behind me.

Placing my hand on the bed, I jumped to the other side, and turned around to see who was at the door. It was Reinhard. He was leaning on the door frame with a contemplative expression on his face. It was a look I had never seen on him before.

“I don’t think I was out for very long, but…” Reinhard started. “I suppose this is my mistake.”

“It’s unlike you. Why don’t ya tell me who this woman is while you’re at it. Right now, you’re nothin’ more than a creep who likes to kidnap women and keep them locked up in my eyes.”

At this point, I was seriously wondering if all the women in this country were locked up inside the rooms of this mansion that I hadn’t entered yet.

Reinhard let out a small sigh as I stared at him suspiciously. “She’s my mother.”

“What?” I said after a brief moment to take in what he had just said.

I glanced back at the woman on the bed. She was an incredible beauty with long blonde hair. She looked no more than twenty-years-old. It would have made more sense if I was told she was Reinhard’s sister. If he’s lying, it’s a really bad one.

“You just added being a liar on top of being a woman snatcher.”

“It may be hard to believe, but it’s the truth. My mother—Louanna Astrea—is afflicted with a condition known as ‘Sleeping Beauty’. She’s remained in the same state ever since she first went to sleep. She’s been asleep for about seventeen years now.”

“Seven…?!” At a loss for words, I gasped at the number of years I just heard. If what he’s saying is true, I’m fourteen right now, so she’s been asleep since before I was even born. Wait, more importantly… “Reinhard, how old are you?”

“I’m turning nineteen this year… I was only able to spend time with her for the first two years of my life,” Reinhard said, shrugging his shoulders as he glanced at his mother, smiling bitterly.

He’s making that bitter smile again. It was the bitter smile that made my stomach churn in irritation.

“So you have your sick mother locked up in a corner of your mansion? You’re a noble. You have money, don’t ya? Why don’t you fix her?”

“You’re absolutely right. However, it’s a disease without a known cause. That’s not to say I won’t be willing to give her the treatment she needs as soon as they find a cure for it. Such is the reason we have her kept in this mansion located in the royal capital.”

“Don’t smooth-talk me like that.”

He didn’t stammer even once. He must be used to giving this explanation. He’s had this conversation a lot, huh?

Annoyed by his generic rhetoric, my patience reached its limit. “It’s your family! Of course you’re doing everything you can! And I criticized you in spite of this! Why won’t you get mad at me, you bastard?!”

“There’s no point. Your questions were understandable, and I believe my explanation was sufficient.”

“Yeah, whatever then!”

Talking to this stubborn bastard’s gonna make me go insane.

Reinhard’s mother remained fast asleep, despite shouting so loudly in her vicinity. Etching her beautiful face in my mind, I went for the door. Reinhard was standing there, but that didn’t matter. I stomped my way past him.

“Lady Felt,” he said, pulling me by the arm. I thought about biting him, but he continued. “Please don’t say a word about my mother to anybody. Sleeping Beauty is a rare condition, and I don’t want to cause any trouble. Also, I would really appreciate it if you would refrain from entering this room.”

“Just how…” nonchalant can you be. But before I could utter those words, he showed a faint smile.

“And thank you for considering my feelings.”

My mind went blank, unable to comprehend his words. However, I quickly processed them and nearly exploded in anger at his despicableness. This bastard knows why I was so angry, and why I wanted him to get mad at me.

“Reinhard, you’re a real bastard!”

Tearing my arm loose, I left the room. Reinhard quickly followed me after closing the door and locking it behind him. As he walked alongside me, I could tell that he had a faint smile on his face without even looking. So I refused to look his way.

“By the way, Lady Felt, I went to the guard station earlier.”

“…So what?”

“Seems like the old gentleman you were with left the station during his treatment and has disappeared. They’ve lost his tracks. I’m very sorry.”

“…” I came to a halt.

“I’ve been trying to locate him ever since you asked about him,” Reinhard continued his report, looking down. “I’m unsure if it’s because they didn’t want to make the fact that they lost him public, but the person in charge of the station kept his mouth shut for a while. I’m very sorry for my belated repor…”

“Of course he won’t stay at the station…” I said, smiling. “But if he can run away, it means he’s doing well.”

Reinhard raised his face, furrowing his shapely brows. “I wanted to take him into custody before reporting to you.”

“Ha, no need for that. My family can’t be stopped so easily. People from the slums are tenacious. You wouldn’t understand.” I laughed, lightly punching his chest, and began walking again.

Reinhard continued walking next to me without my permission. He looked relieved.

“You know, you do look like your mother,” I pointed out, seeing the resemblance after getting a look at him.

“Really?” Reinhard said ecstatically, turning his face towards me.

Taken aback by his enthusiasm a little, I nodded. “Yeah, your eyes and nose are identical. I’m still a bit skeptical about whether she’s your mother or not, but I don’t doubt she’s related to you.”

“Are you still suspecting that I’m a woman snatcher?” he asked with a dumbfounded look on his face.

“You might not be a serial kidnapper, but you still kidnapped me and have me locked up!” I spat, picking up my pace.

I’m in a good mood today. Guess I’ll spend the rest of the day planning for tomorrow’s escape. I’m also hungrier than usual.

5

So Old Man Rom is doing well. Although I had no new information about him other than the fact that he ran away from the guard station, I was elated just by this fact alone. That ain’t to say I’m gonna stop tryin’ to escape outta here. I was enthusiastic as ever, or perhaps even more so, to escape from the kidnapping knight. I tried the hardest I’ve ever tried to accomplish this goal. And the result of my efforts, you ask? Well, this is how it all ended.

After two months had gone by since I was captured by Reinhard, and had failed my 300th attempt (the bastard was counting), he said to me, “Please get ready. We are going to the castle now.”

All my efforts ended in utter failure.

“Please stop pouting like that,” he said as I sat across from him, looking out at the scenery that rhythmically moved up and down.

Exhaling sharply out my nose, I turned my pouting face forward. Reinhard was sitting there with his usual annoying smile. I was sick of seeing that face. I admit he’s good looking, but no matter how good his appearance may be, none of that matters if his personality is despicable. What’s worse is that he’s really annoying.

What annoyed me the most was his smile. It creeped the hell out of me. I wouldn’t go as far as to say he secretly looked down on me, but it was definitely a face that didn’t reflect his true feelings. It’s as if he was wearing a mask. However, as rare as it was, there were moments when he flashed a smile that showed his true nature. This was the smile he was showing me as he sat in front of me. One of his rare smiles. The smile of a victor.

“Don’t get so cocky just cuz you have one up on me and have me on a leash. You’ve just been gettin’ lucky for now.”

“I have no intention of being cocky, let alone keeping you on a leash,” he responded coolly. “I’m just sincerely asking you to listen to my request.”

I snickered and crossed my arms. “Good at twistin’ words, aren’t ya?”

To annoy him with bad etiquette, I started throwing my back against the seat, making it creak. However, for some reason, Reinhard didn’t try to stop me. Does he see me as some naughty kid and tryna be the bigger person? How annoying.

“I don’t like it one bit,” I said as I threw a kick at him, attempting to leave a footprint on his uniform.

I should have got him in surprise, but he blocked it with ease, letting out a simple, “Whoa.” There was barely any surprise on his face. Only his usual smile.

He had blocked and pushed my leg aside with his own. Even this movement alone seemed elegant, making me furrow my brows. He was still directing a smile at me, which ticked me off even more.

“Take this, and this, and this, and this,” I said for each kick I threw at him.

He blocked each one using only the tip of his feet, letting out a gentle grunt each time. I should know by now that I can’t get through his defense without any forethought. I decided to devise a strategy to etch my footprint on this bastard. But before I had the chance to execute it, a voice rained down on our parade.

“You two, we are about to arrive at our destination. Stop playing around,” Granny said from the front seat, beyond the screen divider. I looked at her. Her long blond hair was tied in a ponytail. She continued. “Please behave yourself, Lady Felt. And you too, Young Master. You’re making this old lady nervous. It makes me so, so sad.”

“I can’t argue with you, Auntie,” Reinhard said. “Lady Felt, can we call it a truce for now?”

I clicked my tongue. “Fine, whatever.”

I didn’t care for Reinhard’s wishes, but I couldn’t defy Granny either. Also, even though she sounded like her usual self, there was a tinge of unease in her voice. Now that I think about it, she seemed more uptight than usual when we left the mansion. After realizing something was off with Granny, I came to think Reinhard was acting a little different as well. It’s also my first time seeing him in his knight’s uniform in a while. I looked him up and down.

Noticing my stare, Reinhard tilted his head with a faint smile. “Is something the matter, Lady Felt?”

His demeanor just then looked incredibly innocent, as if I was looking at a child.

“Take this,” I said as I threw another kick at him to divert away from the topic.

He blocked it, yet again, further dampening my mood.

We were riding on a dragon carriage: a means of transportation often used by nobles and merchants, where they had an earth dragon draw the carriage. You may think, as a person from the slums, I wasn't acquainted with such a vehicle, but that's not entirely true. The ones carrying cargo often had hoods on the carriage, allowing me to sneak in quite easily when I wanted to rummage through the loaded goods. I also took advantage of the ones that were parked in warehouses as a place to sleep for the night during cold seasons. So, I was well acquainted with this vehicle.

Nevertheless, I had never formally ridden one as a passenger—let alone in an extravagant one. It was all my first time.

"Well, now that I'm on it, it ain't that big a deal," I commented on my first ride. "I was more excited before getting on."

"Which means you were looking forward to riding one, I take it? In that case, I deeply apologize for not being able to meet your expectations."

"Stop takin' my words out of context. Jeez."

Reinhard kept a solemn look for a while, before lifting up his face with a bright smile. "If you'd like, would you like to try dragonback riding next time instead of taking a dragon carriage? I have some experience with earth dragons. I may be able to teach you."

"By dragonback riding, you mean riding them on their back?"

"Yes." Reinhard nodded, still smiling.

I was honestly tempted by his proposal.

It's hard to explain, but I've always liked jumping and running around. At one point, it was my habit to navigate the vast royal capital by traversing the roofs of the buildings. Although part of it was to get familiar with the layout of the city (as Old Man Rom advised me to do), it had also become a sort of a hobby to kill time. The wind, the view, and the thrill from jumping off from there were all amazing. And when I'm on a high place, I—

“You must really like high places,” Reinhard commented.

“Wait a minute! When you put it like that, it just makes me sound like some idiot who likes to climb on high things! I also like to run fast! So what I’m tryna say is that…” It must feel good to ride on a galloping earth dragon. Even though I was quite confident when it came to running, I wasn’t arrogant enough to think that I could beat an earth dragon in speed or stamina. Running was their main job, after all. But before I mouthed these thoughts, I noticed something. “Wait, was I talking out loud about me liking high places?”

“You have a rich variety of facial expressions, Lady Felt.” Reinhard responded. “I never get tired of watching you.”

“Quit it with the leering! Imma make you pay for it!”

As embarrassing as it was for me to make such a face, it was also creepy of Reinhard to be able to discern its meaning so accurately. Is he really some sorta monster?

“…”

The point was that the invitation to ride an earth dragon was tempting. Although for a brief moment, it felt like one of his more normal proposals. However, I quickly steeled myself, remembering my current predicament. It’s already been two months and I’m still not able to get past Reinhard’s defenses, and Granny’s been dragging me in with her cooking.

“There’s no way I’m gonna let you have your way anymore,” I said. “If I wanna ride an earth dragon, I will on my own. I don’t want your help.”

“How unfortunate,” Reinhard said with a chuckle. “If you change your mind, please let me know.”

“Shut up,” I retorted, clicking my tongue.

I proceeded to throw my legs on the seat. He stared at me disapprovingly, but I ignored it. I’m wearing a dress I don’t even want to, as he requested. He’s gotta let me do at least this much.

"By the way, will you tell me why we're heading to the castle already?" I asked.

"Let's see…" Reinhard responded. "How about we keep it a surprise?"

"How about I beat you up? You may be good at blocking my kicks, but when I set my mind to something, I don't stop 'til I get it done. Even if I have to assault you in your sleep."

"No need to threaten me in such a way. I'll tell you," Reinhard replied, raising both of his arms as if to convey his surrender. "Do you remember our conversation about the insignia?"

That's the conversation we had two months ago. I nodded in response without saying a word. He was talking about the insignia with a gem that lights up when I hold it. Now that I think about it, my life's been messed up because of that stupid thing.

"I reported it to the royal castle, and here we are today. I'm sure it'll cause you great stress, but I'll be by your side if you need anything."

"Give! Me! More! Specifics!"

Don't give me the 'if you need anything' crap! Can't you explain it better?! However, Reinhard only smiled bitterly and didn't even attempt to give me any more information. What is it with this guy's attitude? Should I just jump out of the carriage now? Looking back at it now, I should have followed my instincts and attempted an escape. Instead, I obediently remained seated for some reason. Maybe I had been somewhat tamed in the past two months. By Granny's cooking, of course, and not by Reinhard. I clenched my teeth. There'd been way too many things I needed to reflect upon ever since I was caught by Reinhard.

"Lady Felt, the long awaited royal castle is in view," Reinhard said.

As I was reflecting on my current self, I couldn't help but get curious by Reinhard's announcement and leaned forward in my seat. Beyond the divider was Granny in the passenger seat, and the ever so quiet Gramps holding the reins next to her. As I popped my head between them, the landscape in front of the carriage suddenly jumped into view.

“…”

I gulped at the sight I should have been used to by now.

As I mentioned earlier, I liked high places. The elevation of the royal capital rose incrementally as you made your way towards the middle. And right in the middle, at the highest point, was the castle where the king lived. Surrounding it was the Nobles’ District where the nobles lived, then the Commoners’ and Merchants’ Districts, and lastly the slums. I would sometimes sneak into dragon carriages and smuggle myself into the Nobles’ District, a place a commoner usually would never have access to. Not to steal, but to enjoy the view from the top. Nevertheless, it was my first time being as high as I was at this moment.

The very center of the royal capital. The highest point where I can take in the cleanest air in the country.

“This is the center and highest level in the capital of the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica—Lugunica Castle,” Reinhard explained as I stared, lost for words.

He was on his knee next to me, gazing at me as I leaned forward to get a better view. He was so close I could almost feel his breath. My face reflected in his blue eyes, and not the castle.

“Take this!”

I attempted a headbutt to his nose, which he evaded with a simple “Whoops.” I clicked my tongue.

6

“Gyaaaahhh! It hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts, it hurts!” I screamed in a voice that sounded like a chicken getting strangled, tears in my eyes, in a room that was neither too big nor too small. But no matter how desperately I cried and called out, the people behind me showed no mercy. They continued to squeeze my body like a wet rag.

“Stop, stop! You’re killing meeee!”

“Endure it a little longer. This is necessary. It is a duty you must abide as a lady.”

I never considered myself one, nor do I intend to become one in the future!

I wanted to run away, but seeing as Granny was standing by the door, that was out of the question.

The women who call themselves servants of the castle continued to grab me from behind and squeeze my body into some kind of clothing called a corset. The only explanation they kept spouting was that it was necessary and that I had to endure it. I was forced out of the dress I didn’t even want to wear in the first place, and now I was handled like some kind of a doll. There were six servants in total. I couldn’t even get past Granny, so my chances of escaping were nonexistent. I should’ve taken my chances while we were still in the dragon carriage.

After taking me into the castle, Reinhard rendezvoused with another knight at the entrance and went on his way. That other knight was also handsome. Are Reinhard’s acquaintances all good looking or monsters? I tilted my head in wonder as Granny dragged me into the room we were in, where I had been a subject of abuse ever since. I was mentally and physically exhausted.

“Abuse, you say?” Granny exclaimed. “Do you really see me as such a heartless monster, Lady Felt? How sad. You make me so, so sad.”

“S-Says the person laughing at me getting my body squeezed.”

I had already gotten used to seeing Granny’s fake crying. Seeing as it didn’t affect me anymore, she quickly dropped her act and stuck out her tongue. How cute.

The dress the servants prepared and were trying to make me wear was a yellow one. As much as I wanted to say I couldn’t tell the difference from the ones I usually wore, having been forced to wear all kinds of dresses every day for the past two months, I was able to distinguish between them. The one they prepared was unbelievably expensive. From the way it was tailored to the fabric it used, it was eye-catching.

“Which means it’s something I hate…” I was exasperated. “Ugh, my stomach hurts, and the texture of the clothes sucks; what the hell is all this? What is that bastard tryna make me do?”

“Please reserve your complaints for the Young Master,” Granny said. “Besides, you look splendid, Lady Felt. You look like a princess.”

“Please don’t call me that. You’re making me cringe.”

Granny’s exaggerated compliment was reminiscent of Reinhard’s. Could it be that Reinhard learned to make compliments from Granny? I began to wonder if he learned how to talk from Granny, and his handling of earth dragons from Gramps. Actually, I know his mother is sick in bed, but I’ve never heard him talk about his father. Well, it’s not like he would have mentioned his mother if not for my intrusion. Maybe he just doesn’t wanna talk about his family. We don’t need to if he doesn’t want to. It’s not like we’re pals or anything.

“Sorry to intrude. Is Mr. Sword Saint around?” came a raspy voice as the door to the room opened.

Even though the servants were done putting the corset on me, I was still in the middle of changing. As they shrunk back at the sudden intruder, I turned my attention to the door to examine the man. His unshaved face was red from liquor and exuded an air of depravity. The way he stumbled in his strut reminded me of drunkards in the slums who were frequently seen with a bottle in their hand. If he had been wearing old, worn out clothes, and shown a beer belly, it would have been a perfect depiction. But the clothes he had on, as wrinkled as they were, were still of fine quality. In addition, he wore steel boots and had an impressive knight’s sword equipped to his belt. Upon closer observation, I noticed, even though they were soiled, he was wearing the same white knight uniform as Reinhard. It’s hard to believe, but this old man is also a knight.

As I examined him, he looked around the room. He then tilted his head as if he couldn't find what he was looking for.

"Huh, that's weird," he said, scratching his unkempt red hair. "I heard people from House Astrea were usin' this room."

"How insolent of you to walk into a room a lady is using to get dressed!" yelled Granny, who had been quiet until this point.

Granny glared at the man with anger incomparable to when I licked the plate back in the mansion, almost on the verge of killing intent. No, maybe not killing intent. It's something else. But it's something serious, for sure. As I couldn't make out the situation, I was quickly given the answer by the man's next words.

"Hey, it's you, Auntie. Thought ya were an old piece of furniture that's seen better days. Don't surprise me like that."

"How sad. To think that mockery would come out of your mouth before an apology. If you no longer have a shred of the noble qualities required to be a knight, kindly lay down that sword you have hanging at your side."

"Harsh as usual, aren't ya." The man smirked. "But shouldn't you also be careful how you speak to me, Granny? Have you forgotten your place?"

"Master Heinkel..." Granny said, seemingly hurt.

From the way she called out his name, I was able to figure out that they knew each other. A knight with dirty red hair and clouded blue eyes—I see. I'm startin' to get it. I started to get the whole picture, but I was also starting to reach my limits.

"Hey old man, aren't ya being a bit arrogant for a guy who just walked into a room I was getting changed in? Where's my 'sorry' or 'excuse me'?" I said as hostile as I could.

"Wha?" He turned his attention towards me as if he just noticed me. He had a derisive expression on his face, to which I glared back. He then placed his hand on his forehead and began laughing, showing his yellow teeth. "Oh I see, I see, missy! My bad for that. I didn't know there was a little kid getting changed. You were so small, I didn't even notice you."

"Want me to etch a mark on your face with my foot, so you'll never forget about me? You piece of shit," I spat at the yellow-toothed man as I lifted my dress, ready to throw a kick at him at any moment.

Tensions were high. I was about to kick him across the face.

Then Granny put herself between the man and me.

"Vice Captain Heinkel," she spoke. "Are you not aware of the event taking place here in the royal castle today? If you are, you should be able to tell who this lady is."

I couldn't discern the meaning behind Granny's words. The man also didn't seem to understand what she was saying.

He sucked his teeth in annoyance. "Sorry to tell you, but I don't have a clue about what you're talkin' about. I've been workin' real hard slackin' off at the office today, as usual. I haven't heard anything from Marcos…"

"The royal selection," Granny muttered.

The man quickly went silent at her words. His expression visibly hardened, then turned it into a giant frown. His derisive countenance was no longer there. He turned his serious eyes towards me and looked me up and down, as if to examine me like I did him earlier. As I started getting irritated, he looked right up at the ceiling, covered his face with his hands, opened his mouth wide—and started laughing.

"I see, I see. So that's what this is about! That red-headed brat chose this brat to be the sacrificial lamb this time! How perfect! Ain't this just perfect! How can I not laugh about this?!"

He suddenly kicked the bookshelf by the wall, scattering all the books on the floor. Amidst the scattered books, he continued laughing like a madman. The lady servants yelped. I took a step towards the man, who was still laughing hysterically. I didn't know what he was talking about, but I could tell he was making fun of me. I've always hated it when people made fun of me. Don't screw with me.

The man was covering his face with his hand and wasn't paying attention to me. He's full of openings. I imagined how hilarious it would be to sweep this drunkard's legs and knock him to the ground. I shifted my weight and got ready to—

"That's enough," said the man. Right as I was about to go for a leg sweep, he closed the distance to the point where I could smell the liquor on his breath. "Even though I may just be a drunkard, you won't be able to do anything to me with those clothes on."

Taken aback, I instinctively jumped backward, landing right in Granny's arms.

"You should be embarrassed," she told the man, her voice bitter.

The man laughed derisively. "I thought you would realize that that was out of kindness and you would commend me." He turned his condescending eyes towards me. "You'll realize it soon, too, Missy. You and I are just toys fated to be played around with by the same monster. I can't wait til the time comes when we'll be lickin' each other's wounds."

He licked his lips disgustingly and turned his back as if to say he had said what he wanted to say. Then, without looking back or cleaning up after himself, he left the room.

After the madman left, the lady servants hurriedly closed the door. Things finally started to settle down after that.

"Lady Felt, are you alright?" Granny asked. I felt my shoulders loosen up as she held me from behind. She took out a handkerchief and gently wiped my forehead with it. It tickled a little.

"Don't worry, Granny. It's not like he did anythin' to me."

"Still, please allow me to apologize. If I had acted sooner, you wouldn't have had to go through such an unpleasant experience. I wish I could cut him down."

Sensing her strong emotions in her voice, I let out a huff. The corners of my mouth started to rise. I was making a bitter smile. It felt like Reinhard's personality had rubbed off on me, which irritated me a little.

"Don't say what you don't mean, Granny," I said. "If you cut that guy down… Sure, it might feel good, but it's gonna cause a lotta trouble, right?"

"Lady Felt…"

"That's Reinhard's dad, right?"

Even though she didn't make any noise, I could sense Granny gasp right behind me as she heard my words. I might be stupid, but with so many glaring similarities, added with their awkward interaction, it doesn't take a genius to put two and two together. It's true that Reinhard shared similar features with his sleeping mother, but if I had to answer who he resembled more, I'd have to say his father. Their similarities went beyond just their eye and hair color. They had similar facial structures and even similar stances. As someone who had spent a lot of time observing Reinhard to plot an escape, I was able to pick up on the fact that the man was his father.

"Like father, like son, they both piss me off."

"I am deeply sorry to hear that," Granny apologized, looking genuinely depressed.

Due to her position, she could neither agree nor disagree with my sentiment.

I decided to drop the topic. There was no reason for her to feel sorry. She did nothing wrong. If that guy turned out to have such a terrible personality because of his upbringing, that would be his parents' fault and not Granny's.

Granny maintained her silence, and the lady servants, too, seemed to be influenced by the somber atmosphere in the room.

"Well, that's enough about what's done. Let's clean this mess up," I said rather loudly, clapping my hands. I wanted to liven up the atmosphere of the room. “It'd be dangerous if someone stepped on the shattered glass, and ya’ll are still in the middle of dressin’ me up, aren't ya? My sides are all out in the open. Ya better not say this is how it’s supposed to look.”

I raised my arms up sideways to let the lady servants see the state of my dress. I suddenly became embarrassed when I realized I’d tried to pick a fight in such a state. The dress was still only clipped on, and as for my upper body, all I had on was a corset that was tough enough to possibly stop a knife from getting through.

The lady servants looked at each other and seemed to be hesitant at first, but soon broke into two groups and went back to work. One group helped me get dressed and the other cleaned up the mess. Although, the nature of their job was just squeezing me into my clothes.

I groaned and moaned as they continued to constrict me. Then I noticed Granny looking at me with a soft—no, a softer-than-usual expression. “Granny? Why are you makin’ that face?”

“No, it’s nothing,” Granny said, shaking her head. “It’s just that, I was reflecting on the fact that the Young Master’s judgment was right as usual.”

I snickered. “Don’t bring that guy up. Just thinkin’ about the guy pisses me off.” The despicable face of the redhead popped up in my mind then overlapped with the man from earlier. I shook my head to erase the man’s face, leaving only Reinhard’s face remaining. Sure, the dude’s despicable, but he’s much better than that other guy… wait, wait, why am I even thinkin’ about Reinhard? Old Man Rom and Gramps are way more of my type.

“If you weren’t here, Granny, I’d totally have tried to catch Gramps’s eye.”

“My, you shouldn’t say things like that, Lady Felt. Grimm… I mean, my husband is mine. You may not have him,” Granny said, her tone sounding scarier than usual.

“I know, I know. I was just kidding,” I said, bursting into laughter.

Granny nodded satisfactorily.

The lady servants finished dressing me up and dragged me in front of the mirror. It’s a dress. I’m wearing a dress.

“You look beautiful, Lady Felt,” Granny commented.

I decided not to deny her, as I usually would have. Not only would she have been troubled with a response, I was also rather surprised with the way I looked. I knew it was a bit more expensive than the dresses I usually wore, but these types of clothes only looked good on a particular type of person. The prime example would be the royal guards’ uniform. It looked good on Reinhard, but looked like old rags on that old man. That’s why I was against wearing this dress. But as I saw myself in the mirror wearing it, I was surprised to see it fit rather well.

For the past two months, Granny treated my hair and fed me three times a day to my content everyday, I was able to sleep well at night due to all the energy I used trying to escape, and I even got the hang of moving smoothly while wearing a dress due to having to wear them everyday. Suddenly, I started to realize the meaning of the past two months.

As I was reminiscing about the time I spent in the mansion, a pair of people entered the room.

“Excuse us, Grandmother. We are here to escort you to the throne room.”

When I turned around, pink-haired twin girls—or so I thought because of their identical faces—jumped into my view.

“Leaving aside the fact that I don’t know who you two are, what did you just say? Did ya just call Granny Grandmother? And what’s this about the throne room?”

Wait, actually, even I can tell that’s where the King is. I knew from the moment I was brought to this castle I was in for a headache, but what’s this about going to a room where the King is? Furthermore, aren’t all the royals already dead—

“Flam, Grassis, introduce yourselves to Lady Felt,” Granny instructed the twins.

So, you’re just gonna ignore my questions, huh?

The twins stepped forward and bowed their small heads. They were short. I’m quite small myself, but these girls were even smaller. They also looked younger than me.

“I’m Flam Remendis.”

“Grassis Remendis.”

They said, still bowing their heads.

So, their last name’s Remendis, huh? It’s kinda tricky to tell ‘em apart just by looking. I think maybe their bangs are a tiny bit different?

“I’m embarrassed to say, but they are my granddaughters,” Granny said, as she took a bow alongside the twins. “They shall take you to the throne room.”

“Wow, granddaughters? There’s a surprise. So, about the answers for my earlier questions…”

“You’ll have all the answers you need once you get to the throne room. The Young Master should be there as well.”

So they ignored my questions on purpose. I made a big frown to express my discontent, but Granny kept bowing and wouldn’t explain any further. So stubborn. I always thought I was pretty stubborn myself, but I had to concede to Granny this time.

“So, I just have to follow these two?”

“Yes, my husband and I will be waiting here for the Young Master and you to return.”

“Don’t pair us up like that,” I said, laughing.

I turned around and faced the twins. They wouldn’t even flash a smile, which made me think they must have undergone rigorous training to become first-class chamberlains. I'm gonna follow them and go to the throne room where Reinhard is waiting, huh? I had no clue what awaited me there, or how it had anything to do with the glowing stone, but it didn't seem like I had much of a choice.

"Whatever, bring it on. Being looked down on is the last thing I want."

If I backed down now, people'll think I ran away with my tail between my legs. My pride won't allow that. I crossed my arms, pumped out my chest to make myself look bigger, and followed behind the twins as they began walking. Granny and the lady servants saw me out. I took each of my steps as firmly as I could on the red rug laid in the hallway. Whatever's ahead, bring it on. I prepared myself for whatever laid ahead.

7

"Well, there was no point in preparing myself."

Such was my reaction a few hours later, feeling like a large amount of smoke was coming out of my head. I was slouching on the sofa in the anteroom I had been brought to. I was exhausted. There was so much stuff that happened, it stressed me out to even think about it. First, I had to sort out the good things and the bad things.

"Although I was relieved to see Old Man Rom was there," I muttered. "What is this about makin' me a queen? Are they nuts?"

So this is what Reinhard and all the rest of the people wanted to do at the throne room, just because I can make some stone glow up, huh? They're all so stupid.

"I don't know anything about a dragon or qualification."

Placing my chin on the back rest, I rolled the insignia in my hand. The stone inside it remained glowing, as if it was trying to aggressively prove a point, then would completely fade whenever I let it out of my hand. When I hold it, it lights up. When I let go, the light fades. Apparently, that's all it takes for them to drag me into a competition to become the queen.

“Not that there’s any point in complaining, now that I decided to do it.”

Knowing that there was nobody around, I scratched my head, messing up my hair. Reinhard and Granny both hated it when I did this. They often said I’ll damage my hair or that it’ll lose its beautiful color, but I hated worrying about such small things. If anything, I wanted to take off my dress and change into a more relaxing outfit as well.

“But I guess I’ll just have to wait ‘til I get back to the mansion. And there’s also Old Man Rom!” I said, raising my tone at the last bit of the sentence.

Old Man Rom was my one and only family. Although I wasn’t too sure about all the details, he was captured by the guards for trying to save me. He was in some real trouble, so I agreed to enter this thing called the royal selection in exchange for his release. As long as he was safe, I had no regrets about it.

Now that we were done talking with all the other candidates of the royal selection, (including the half-devil lady I met before) Reinhard went to pick up Old Man Rom. The plan was to wait for their return, and then we would all go back—or rather, dragged back—to the mansion.

“I suppose it isn’t realistic to successfully escape now.”

Considering the gravity of the situation, even I understood I was now in a position where I couldn’t just easily run away. I couldn’t even escape from the mansion. If I couldn’t run away from three people, how can I run from an entire country?

Also, if I’m being honest, I was in a rather good mood. This wasn’t because I was admired as a candidate participating in the royal selection. I mean, I made an enemy out of all of ‘em by pickin’ a fight with ‘em. But the mere fact that I got to pick a fight with them was exactly what put me in such a good mood. I finally had the chance to say everything I wanted to say to everyone I wanted to say it to. This alone made me ecstatic.

“I’ll worry about everything else later,” I said to myself, as I lounged on the sofa, before I noticed someone was at the door. “Huh?”

“Lady Felt, is this a good time?”

It was one of Granny’s granddaughters, Flam or Grassis, but I couldn’t tell which. They were right behind me in a room full of important figures earlier, which helped me. So, she was already someone I felt like I could relax around.

“Yeah sure, come in,” I said.

“There’s someone who would like to see you. It’s Miklotov McMahon from the Council of Wise Men.”

“Whoa, there’s a guest?!” I swung my legs down and stood upright from a lying position. The door opened and a person I recognized entered. “Hey, aren’t ya the most important old man in that other place from earlier?”

“Hmm, the-most-important is a bit of a stretch,” said the white-bearded old man named Miklotov. “People tend to give me a little more respect due to my age, but that’s all. If we’re talking solely about our positions, Lady Felt, you will be way above me from now on.”

I laughed. “Give me a break already. You’re gonna make my head explode.”

“That would be a problem,” Miklotov said, laughing. “The commencement of the royal selection was just declared with the five of you present.”

If I remember correctly, he’s the representative of the gathering of the most important figures in the country called the Council of Wise Men. He was in the throne room earlier. Out of all the people who were yelling and whining, he was the only person who was easy on me. There was also a sense of kindness in his eyes and voice, so I had a good impression of him.

"But now that you're here, are you planning on doin' somethin' nefarious to me?" I asked about his intentions.

"No, I would never think of doing such a thing," responded Miklotov. "I simply wanted to have a talk with you, Lady Felt, outside of a place such as the one we were in earlier. Of course, however, I'm not the only one who wished for this."

I tilted my head at the old man's cryptic words. However, I figured out what the old man meant as soon as I tilted my head: There was another man of small stature with a cunning countenance hiding behind him.

"Whoa, there was another one here?! Don't frighten me like that! Why didn't you say anythin'?!"

"It's a little complicated to explain, but we had our reasons," Miklotov answered. "Rickert, introduce yourself to Lady Felt."

"Yes, sir," said the man as he stepped forward.

I recognized his face as well. He was also in the other room earlier, though not on the stage, but among the rest of the lined-up people. He was the one criticizin' the other candidates and me, actin' haughty.

"Apologies for my earlier behavior. My name is Rickert Hoffman."

"Ah, yeah, sure. Although, I can't say I'm confident I'll remember it."

I was introduced to too many faces and names I had to remember in the past few hours. I was already having a hard time remembering the faces of the other candidates, there wasn't enough room in my brain to store the face of some guy who was on the fringes.

The man who called himself Rickert, however, didn't say anything about my standoffish response. I was a little surprised by his lack of reaction. Considering his earlier behavior, I would've expected him to start making a fuss about how I'm not fit to be a queen. Instead, he quietly stared at me.

“What are you lookin’ at me like that for?” I asked.

He remained quiet and kept looking at me up and down. If I thought he was trying to size me up I would have kicked him in his shin. However, I didn’t feel any ill intentions or ulterior motives in his gaze.

“Is she really your blood, Your Highness?” he muttered.

“What’d you say?” I asked back.

“Nothing, I just wanted to apologize for my rude behavior earlier, which is why I asked Lord Miklotov to set up this meeting. I thank you for your time,” he said, bowing and talking quickly.

He says he’s here to apologize for his behavior, but I don’t like how he’s suddenly changing his attitude. Furthermore, is that really his only reason for being here? Ever since I came to this castle—no, ever since I was captured by Reinhard, I’ve had no choice but to let other people control my actions. People are also keeping secrets way too much. Honestly, I’m not loving this situation at all.

“However, aside from apologizing,” said Rickert, “there is something I’d like to ask you, Lady Felt.”

“Oh?”

“As I mentioned in the other room, you will be exposed to countless hardships. From the story about you being raised in the slums, to proving your royal lineage… These will all present themselves as thorns on the path you’re about to take. Do you truly have the resolve to walk down such a path, and weren’t just being boastful earlier?”

I snickered. “Looks like you’re finally being your true self.”

His diplomatic attitude was gone. In its place was the gleam in his eyes I saw earlier. I wasn’t particularly happy about this, but it was much better than him trying to act polite. After all, if he wants to bite, I can bite back too.

“First of all, let me make this clear for you,” I started. “I haven’t the faintest idea of this path full of thorns you or the old man here are talkin' about. Isn't that obvious?"

"Wha—"

"I haven't heard about any of these things until today. I was suddenly thrown into this situation I've never even thought that I would be in. And all of you want to ask me if I'm ready to take on the responsibility or whatnot. It's hysterical to the point of absurdity." Rickert was taken aback, and the old man widened his eyes, but I had no intention of stopping. My coming hardships? Path full of thorns? These lot really don't get it, do they? "There's never been a single day or moment where I wasn't risking my life. Forget about tomorrow, or the future. If such things scare you, ya might as well just close your eyes, ears, and even your mouth, and go to sleep. But if you do, you'll only be wasting your time, and the tomorrow you fear so much will arrive before you know it."

"…"

"If you want to make someone happy by using phony words like fate or resolve, leave that for Reinhard. Cuz I sure as hell don't need 'em. So you can ask me the same question all you want, but I'm not givin' you an answer. That's my resolve."

Having blurted out everything I wanted to say, I crossed my arms and puffed out my chest. There was no telling how they felt about my speech. The old man nodded as he kept playing with his beard, and Rickert cast his gaze downward with his knuckles clenched.

"So, you're willing to be the next Lion King?" Rickert asked.

"The Lion King?" I said. "The hell is that? I thought I'm just supposed to be a normal queen. Sounds like a real pain in the ass."

"Yes, a path full of thorns tends to be a real pain in the ass."

I see, thanks for the clarification, man.

As I frowned to express my discontent, Rickert let out a small sigh. This small sigh might have been his way of saying he didn't have any more questions. He bowed once again, and went behind the old man.

“Thanks for talking with Rickert,” the old man said.

“I don’t mind that. But it left me with a bunch of new questions. I can’t say I’m exactly satisfied.”

“However, we were relieved from the many questions that we had,” said the old man. “You were able to put two people at ease within the few hours since the royal selection even began. Don’t you think this is a step…no, two steps forward?”

“You know, for a significant figure, you sure come off as sly,” I remarked.

Maybe this old man isn’t kind, but just a sly guy.

The old man simply gave an old-person laugh at my remark. He kept playing with his long white beard as he gave a bow. Looks like he’s done with his business here.

“It would be a great honor to speak with you again if the opportunity ever presents itself, Lady Felt. I am looking forward to what you will be…achieving, in the upcoming royal selection.”

“Yeah, yeah, thanks for the very ambiguous support.”

He laughed. “Oh? But it might not be as ambiguous as you think.”

Sounds suspicious. I didn’t respond, but my face said it all as the old man and Rickert left the anteroom. Rickert kept a bow until the very end, but I was still skeptical about his intentions. Whatever they were, however, the arrival of the two guests while I was already exhausted made me even more tired. I was at my limit.

“Yo,” I yelled at the entrance. “Flam or Grassis, or whoever you are!”

“I’m Flam, Lady Felt,” answered the chamberlain who was by the door. “Grassis is the aloof one.”

I dismissed her statement with a wave of a hand.

"Don't let anyone else in. I'm tired, and my back's killin' me from having to wear this tight dress," I said, tapping my back like an old woman.

"Understood, I won't let anyone in," she answered. "So, please take your leave."

The last part of her sentence caught my attention. Was there another guest here to see me? Maybe they were someone who wanted to suck up to me now that I'm a candidate to be queen. Such suspicions arose from my past in the slums when people acted nice to me whenever I began making money.

"So, a rat was here to see me, huh?" I muttered. "Hey, who was that just now?" I asked.

"It was the Young Master and a very large old man."

"You didn't need to turn them away!!"

I jumped up and raced to the door.

Why the hell would she turn away Old Man Rom, and even Reinhard for that matter? Couldn't she be a little more flexible?

"Old Man Rom! I missed you so much!" I exclaimed, as I jumped into my one and only family's arms.

8

I didn't tell Reinhard the old man and Rickert came to see me in the anteroom. One reason was because I didn't think it was necessary, and the other was because I was reminded of how frustrated I was at him for tricking me when I saw the bastard's face. Sure, I meant everything I said in the throne room. That's why I was able to give that speech to the old man and Rickert. I'm not about to run away from a fight, and there's also people I gotta get back, like that arrogant red-woman! But all that aside, everything boils down to one thing. It's that—

"All of this has been going exactly how you've planned, right?" I said, leaning back in my seat as I glared at Reinhard, who was sitting in front of me.

The dragon carriage we were in slowly descended the hill, heading for Reinhard's mansion in the Nobles' District. The carriage was barely moving inside, which supposedly had something to do with this thing called a Divine Protection, but I didn't know what that was. All I understood about it was that no matter how much the carriage itself may rock for whatever reason—like when it's on rocky terrain, for example—the inside didn't get affected. This convenient power allowed me to focus all my energy on denouncing Reinhard.

As for the man himself, he simply stared at me and said, "My lady, the hem of your skirt is rolled up. Even though there isn't anyone around, you should not allow yourself to look like that. A lady is defined by the behavior she shows when there are only close acquaintances watching."

"Don't give me that lady crap," I said bitterly. "And who are you calling close acquaintances? You better not have included yourself in that category, cuz we're for sure not close."

Despite my reluctance, I fixed my skirt like he wanted. I wanted to take it off in the anteroom before leaving, but Reinhard kept whining, so I had to keep it on until we got back to the mansion.

"My stomach is killin' me…" I complained. "How do nobles even eat in these things? I don't think I'd be able to eat pretty much anything in this."

"It's rather uncommon to witness individuals indulging in a full meal at social gatherings, especially when they're wearing dresses. These occasions are typically meant for relishing the company of others and engaging in delightful conversations. Admiring the elegant outfits of fellow attendees is also an integral aspect of such events. On that note, Lady Felt, you look exceptionally lovely."

"Did you stop me from getting changed because you wanted to say that?" I intensified my glare at him.

He said nothing, only smiling faintly. I'll take that as a yes.

“I’m taking it off.”

“We don’t have a change of clothes ready. Please keep it on.”

“Then I’ll stay in my underwear. It’s better than looking at your creepy smile,” I said, but he didn’t look like he was taking me seriously, which made me seriously contemplate taking off the dress. However, I decided against it, realizing how dumb that would be.

I turned my attention away from Reinhard, and clicked my tongue in a way so that it wouldn’t sound like I was sulking.

“I mistakenly let myself go with the flow earlier,” I said, “but I should’ve been more careful in choosing my partner. What the hell was I thinking choosing someone who’s caused me nothing but grief?”

“I hate to disagree with you, but I believe it would have been difficult to find another knight to serve you,” responded Reinhard. “Considering your ambiguous lineage, there isn’t a better house to support you than ours. Also, this is a personal reason, but at this point, I don’t really want to serve anyone other than you, Lady Felt.”

“Don’t say that as if you were ever subservient to me. When have you ever listened to me?! Keep talkin’ nonsense and I’ll beat ya to a pulp!”

As I yelled and screamed, another voice that wasn’t Reinhard spoke inside the carriage. “That’s enough, Felt. I know it may not be easy to be calm right now, but yelling won’t solve anything.”

The man who spoke was the giant sitting next to me, who had to squeeze into his seat despite the carriage being rather large. It was Old Man Rom. I’m happy I finally reunited with him, but that statement just now didn’t sound like he was on my side.

“Fine, whatever, I don’t wanna make any excuses so I’ll stop,” I said.

“I said to calm down, but I didn’t say you can’t feel down. At least don’t hesitate to confide in me when you do.”

“I appreciate that, but maybe another time, when I really feel down. I can’t be dependent on you so early on.”

Old Man Rom patted my head with his giant hand. Truth be told, he hurt my neck everytime he did this as he was bad at controlling his strength, but I was never able to resist him. It gave me a sense of nostalgia every time. However, I knew I couldn’t cling onto this nostalgia forever. This was a resolve I made in the anteroom.

“So, the Sword Saint Reinhard, huh?” Old Man Rom said in a dignified voice with his hand still on my head.

Reinhard and Old Man Rom exchanged looks. There were only the three of us in the carriage. Granny and Gramps were in the driver’s seat. They volunteered to sit separately from us so we’ll have time to catch up, but the atmosphere is kinda heavy.

“I heard she was in your care while I was away,” Old Man Rom began.

“In my care is an overstatement,” Reinhard responded. “If it weren’t for your guardianship, Lady Felt might not have been able to stay at our house, and today might not have happened. If there’s anyone who should be expressing gratitude, it’s me.”

“Yeah, about that. Are you serious about making this girl the queen?” Old Man Rom asked without changing his tone. The atmosphere was tense as ever.

Old Man Rom moved his hand from my head to my back. With his size and strength, he could have easily grabbed me and run away. In fact, I genuinely thought he was going to do just that for a split second. And if I noticed it, Reinhard must have noticed it as well. In spite of this, he showed no signs of doing anything. There wasn’t even a slight change in his expression. He simply nodded.

“Yes, of course. Lady Felt was chosen by the dragon jewel, and she herself decided to participate in the royal selection. And I am her knight. I am determined to serve and help my mistress achieve her goal with everything I’ve got.”

“I must say, it’s a surprise to hear that the Sword Saint of all people is so attracted to her,” Old Man Rom said. “Although I shouldn’t be the one to say this, I can’t say I empathize with your judgment. This girl is only half the size of kids around her age.”

“Old Man Rom!” I exclaimed. What the hell does that have to do with anything!

However, Old Man Rom didn’t flinch at my loud voice. “I’m not making fun of you. This is an important discussion. As the royal selection progresses, things will only get harder and harder. We can’t afford a shred of uncertainty in our team if we’re really going to throw ourselves into such a tidal wave. We must discuss everything with full transparency, right?”

“Absolutely,” answered Reinhard. “May I call you Mr. Rom?”

“I go by Old Man Rom, but I suppose you won’t comply. You can call me whatever you want for now. Right now, I want to know your true intentions.”

With his bulky arms crossed, Old Man Rom fidgeted in his seat, causing the carriage to creak. He glared directly at Reinhard with an intensity as if to monitor every movement he makes. Even though I was their subject of discussion, I started to feel out of the loop. Then, Reinhard made his move. He removed his sheathed sword from his belt and handed it to me.

“What is this about?” I asked.

“I’m proving my loyalty to you, Lady Felt. I am prepared to serve you my sword both literally and figuratively,” Reinhard explained. “We cannot move forward with this discussion without doing so first. At least, both Sir Rom and I can’t.”

I said nothing. Being lost at words, I glanced at Old Man Rom. I wasn’t sure if I should accept his offering. His words sound exaggerated, and felt like it might trigger a bigger problem. Old Man Rom, however, wiped away my anxiety with a nod.

“The youngster’s got a point,” he said. “Take it, Felt.”

“Even though you never let me hold it in the past when I wanted to steal it from you,” I said, as I received the sword reluctantly.

The sheath was white, and everything about it was remarkably built; I’d never seen anything like it. Reinhard always had this heavy sword with him. Knowing that it was that precious to him, I even tried to steal it from him several times in the past as a form of payback for not being able to escape. Obviously, I failed every time, so I had mixed feelings about it being handed to me so easily.

“There’s a large nick on it even though it’s your precious sword,” I commented.

I repositioned the giant sword with both hands and traced the groove on the sheath with my fingertip. It looked like the claw mark of a stupidly large creature.

“That’s the claw mark of a dragon,” explained Reinhard. “According to legend, it was etched by the Divine Dragon Volcanica.”

“When you say the Divine Dragon…you mean that really famous dragon? You’re kidding.”

Even though I didn’t know the details about the event, I knew that it must have taken place a few hundred years ago. There’s no way a sword that old would be around today completely intact. Despite such thoughts, the eerie dignifying air the sword emanated made me consider otherwise. As absurd as it may sound, it was as if the sword was talking to me, saying: “I am the Dragon Sword Reid. I have slayed the Witch, and am still awaiting a worthy opponent.”

“The Dragon Sword Reid, huh?” Old Man Rom muttered. “How surprising to see that you are willing to lend such a legendary sword to Felt.”

“This sword is exclusively reserved for the inheritor of the title of Sword Saint. The Dragon Sword itself chooses its opponent and its place of battle. Its true power is capable of altering the core principles of the world. It’s that powerful.”

As I held the sword in my hand, I couldn't say Reinhard was exaggerating. I've held many swords in my days (albeit, they were all stolen) but none of them were anything like this one.

I looked at Reinhard. "So, now that you've handed me the sword, what are you gonna talk about?"

"Right," said Reinhard. "We were talking about why I believe you, Lady Felt, are suited to be the queen, yes?"

"She might've met the requirement to be a candidate since the dragon jewel glows in her hand," said Old Man Rom, "but it's far too early to associate her with the perished royal family based solely on her hair and eye color. You must have some sort of evidence before making such speculations…"

"I know why the last Royal Guard disbanded."

I didn't know what Reinhard meant, but Old Man Rom was visibly shaken.

His eyes were widened, and his voice shaky. "Wh-Why… Do you know about that…"

"I'm sure you of all people know the answer to that question, Mr. Cromwell."

"I see, so you know about me too. That person's wish will go in vain."

"If that's how it's meant to be," responded Reinhard, to which Old Man Rom grimaced.

His expression was that of the one he made whenever he admitted defeat to someone, but I didn't know why he was making such a face. Even though this whole discussion was supposed to be about me, I had no idea what they were talking about.

"Felt, this youngster won't betray you," said Old Man Rom. "No, he can't betray you. I'll vouch for that."

"Wh-Wha? What were you two even talking about just now?

Explain it to me so that I can understand too. Otherwise I can't…"

Before I could finish my thought, Old Man Rom placed his hand over my mouth, shutting me up.

"Felt," he said, as he patted my head with his giant hand, knowing full well I wouldn't be able to talk back whenever he did that. "You are my one and only family. So I want you to trust me."

"That's unfair," I complained. You won't tell me anything, nor will you let me say anything.

As a sign of my protest, the least I could do was to glare at him as intensely as I could. For some reason, tears started to fill my eyes, but I clenched my teeth and held them in. Through my blurry vision, I saw Old Man Rom make the gentlest smile of the day.

"How envious."

Such were the words I thought I heard him say, but I wasn't sure since I made a loud noise when I inhaled through my congested nose.

9

"There's really nothing left," I said, as I stood in front of the rubble.

"Nothing at all," Old Man Rom said next to me. "But if there was even a little left, we might've not been able to completely give up. It's better that it was wiped out without a trace."

"As the one responsible, I'm happy to hear that," Reinhard commented next to Old Man Rom.

"He didn't say it to console you," I spat at him.

The three of us, Reinhard, Old Man Rom, and I stood in that order, in front of what used to be the abandoned warehouse that was once our loot house.

We were supposed to go straight back to the mansion, but I made them change the carriage's course to see the remainder of the loot house. I was curious about this place since I wasn't able to come see what happened to it ever since Reinhard captured me, and it wasn't a stretch to say this was where it all began.

"What's gonna happen to this place?" I asked.

"At the moment, the public work sector is stagnating in the lower districts," responded Reinhard. "One of the main reasons is said to be the economic problem the kingdom is facing, but I doubt that's the only reason."

"I see, so they wanna have a place where all the dirty low-class commoners can gather in one spot, huh," I said. "Sounds like something people who watch over us from their ivory tower come up with. Makes me sick."

I kicked a pebble, trying to compose myself at the sickening structure of the world. Reinhard looked away. For a moment, I thought he looked away because the topic made him feel uncomfortable, which would have been a rather unseemingly childish attitude. However, that was not the case.

"Who's there?" Reinhard asked, as he stepped forward still looking away from us.

Old Man Rom and I followed his gaze, which was directed at the street next to us. Three men were standing there in the shadows. They were all differently sized: big, average, and small. They looked like nothing more than dingy delinquents, but their apparent filthiness wasn't solely because they were residents of the slums. They were all bruised and covered in wounds that appeared to have been inflicted on them recently. Noticing their bruises, Reinhard dropped his guard and instead furrowed his brows in worry.

"Are you hurt? If you are in need of help…"

"Shut up," yelled one of them, cutting off Reinhard's offer, as he stepped forward. "Just give us all your valuables! We won't take your life if we don't hafta!"

He had a dagger in his hand. What a violent guy.

“Hey, Rachins, we don’t have time to be doing this…” another one exclaimed, but the man who held the dagger and was called Rachins paid no heed to his comrade’s warning.

“Idiot! This is exactly the time we need to be doing this! We messed up using Russell’s name. We’ll be killed if we stay here! We need money to run away!” As he yelled these words, the man brought the dagger closer to his waist, and began slowly approaching us. The other two behind him didn’t try to stop their comrade anymore.

I guess I gotta stop him. As I began to have such thoughts…

“That’s enough.”

Reinhard moved faster than I could utter a word. He struck the man on the neck with a knife-hand. Remembering how he sliced a curtain with the same technique, I got worried that he’d chopped the man’s head off, but fortunately it didn’t come to that. The man simply lost consciousness and collapsed on the spot.

“Wha—?”

Taken aback by their comrade suddenly getting knocked out, the remaining two gasped. Reinhard played with the dagger he’d taken from the man who was now on the floor. As he turned around to face them, they finally realized who they’d picked a fight with.

“R-Red hair and blue eyes… Are you the Sword Saint Reinhard van Astrea?!”

“You’re kiddin’! What are the odds we encounter such a guy right here right now?!”

“I’m glad both of you’ve recognized me,” said Reinhard. “Your friend is unconscious, but he’s still alive. If you retreat now, I promise we will not go after you. Do we have a deal?”

The two men’s legs were shaking. Even though it seemed like Reinhard was giving them a choice, in actuality, it was more of a threat. However, he didn’t seem to be aware of what he was doing. In fact, there was a good chance that he thought he was doing the right thing. As I watched his obliviousness, I began to get irritated.

It was like watching the epitome of this kingdom’s treatment of the slums.

“Wait Reinhard,” I said from the side.

“Lady Felt?” Reinhard said, surprised by my interruption, amidst the unconscious man by his feet and two others standing scared.

Ignoring him, I glared at the two men. “You bastards said you had to run away, right? Did ya’ll screw somethin’ up?”

The men groaned and made a pitiful face at my question. It was evident by their reactions that they were stuck in a rut, unable to get out of the mess they found themselves in. And it’s none other than the structure of this country that caused them to be in such a predicament.

“Look Reinhard, this is the slums. You were ready to let them go out of kindness, but that’ll just be a waste. The price of a life here is as cheap as a grain of rice. I’ll bet you anything, they’ll be dead this time tomorrow.”

“I don’t think it’s appropriate to make a bet based on someone’s life,” Reinhard commented.

“Are you serious?” I said as I pointed a finger at him for trying to change the subject. “That’s not the important part.”

He gazed at my fingertip for a moment.

“I understand what you want to say,” he said. “But then, what do you propose we do…”

“I told you before, Reinhard. I hate the way this kingdom is right now, so I’m gonna tear it all down. And I didn’t mean just up there, but also down here,” I said, as I pointed to the castle, then down at the remainder of the loot house. Lastly, I turned my attention to the men making pitiful faces behind me, and pointed at them as I puffed out my chest. “You lot, come with me. I’ll turn the tables on this shitty situation.”

“Lady Felt?!” Reinhard exclaimed, breaking his voice, which I enjoyed listening to.

However, he wasn't the only one surprised, but also the men. I quickly realized my proposal was out of the blue, and decided to explain my thoughts in detail.

"My plan is to tear this whole country down and recreate it. If I can't even save some delinquents I just met on the street, how the hell will I be able to achieve such a grand goal? Am I wrong?"

Reinhard and the rest were lost for words. I didn't regret for a second what I suggested, however. And I wasn't going to go back on my words, either. After all, my family who's been listening the whole time hasn't tried to stop me.

Then, my one and only family stepped forward.

"There's no persuading her, youngster," Old Man Rom said, backing me up. "She's stubborn once she sets her mind to something. Besides, it's amusing, isn't it?"

He tapped Reinhard on the shoulder, and carried the unconscious man on his.

"Amusing, you say?" Reinhard asked, staring at Old Man Rom.

"She's an orphan from the slums, the blemish of society! And who does she choose as her first vassals? Some hoodlums from the slums. How can I not laugh at this? How is this not amusing?"

"Hey, hey, Old Man Rom, you don't hafta put it that way," I said with my hands crossed behind my head, chuckling along with him. "Although, you're not entirely wrong."

Old Man Rom turned his attention towards the other two.

"C'mon, you two. Even if you just wanna run away from Russell, you'd have a better chance with us. Beyond that… Well, you can decide after spending some time with this girl," he said, gesturing at me with his chin.

He then began walking toward the outskirts of the slums—the main road, where the dragon carriage was parked. Granny and Gramps should be waiting for us there, but how should I explain this to them?

“W-Wait, what in the world is happening right now?”

“I don’t know, but we can’t leave Rachins! I’m going!”

The big one and the small one hastily ran after Old Man Rom. Watching them run from behind made me feel happy for some reason.

“You look happy,” commented Reinhard next to me.

I closed one eye and looked up at him. I thought I picked up a certain tone in his voice.

“Wait, could it be that you’re a little irritated?” I asked.

Reinhard widened his eyes and shook his head. “I’m not upset at all. I’m just a little taken aback, since this was all unexpected. Honestly, it was an idea I wouldn’t have been able to come up with.”

“Why don’t you be more honest with yourself and scold me for doing something so stupid?”

“If I do, will you listen?”

I sneered. “No way in hell.”

Reinhard showed his usual bitter smile. The bitter smile he showed whenever he wanted to avoid confrontation. I swear, this guy may be handsome, but his smile sure irritates the hell out of me.

“Why don’t you just say it,” I muttered.

“Say what?”

“Just say that I did something stupid. Leave aside whether I’ll listen or not, and just say it. It’s a matter of whether you want to say it or not.”

He asked me if I would've listened to him. Once I answered I wouldn't have, he proceeded to stay quiet. Instead, he just made the troubled look that I so despised. Whenever you smile like that, it's when there's something you're not telling me. "And that's what I hate about you the most, you bastard."

I let out all my pent up feelings. Having heard my words, Reinhard opened his mouth in disbelief. That's a rare look. Whenever I was around, he always had a bitter smile or a look of shock. The face he was making at the moment was closer to the latter.

"Nobody has said that to me before," he said.

I snickered. "Is that so? Can't imagine a world like that."

He's never been insulted in his life before?

As I smiled sarcastically, he shook his head, "No. To be precise, I've never been told that by anyone other than my family before."

"Don't say things like that so suddenly! You're killin' the mood!"

I wasn't sure if he was joking, but I couldn't laugh at it, especially after having met his father. It's hard to empathize with him. Old Man Rom is my only family and we rarely ever get into an argument.

Casting my gaze away, I kicked a pebble again. I thought we should get going so we could catch up to Old Man Rom and the others. However, Reinhard wouldn't budge, so I stood there with him.

"Lady Felt, you called me a bastard," he said suddenly.

"Huh? yeah, maybe I did," I said, frowning at his sudden accusation. "Don't tell me you wanna fix my language. Although I agreed to participate in the royal selection or whatever, I don't intend on changing the way I talk."

"That's not it," he responded. "Although I'd like to have a word with you about that in the future… I'm not sure if I'll have the chance to."

"The hell is that supposed to mean?"

"Lady Felt, you often address me with 'bastard' instead of 'you'," he commented. "However, you stopped addressing me like that a few days ago. I believe it was at about the same time you found my mother."

I said nothing. I wasn't conscious of his observation. I couldn't keep track of whether I addressed someone as 'bastard' or 'you'. However, if his observation was correct—

"Are you tryna say that I address people as 'bastard' when I consider 'em my enemy?"

"Yes," he answered. "And if such is the case, I must have truly disappointed you just now. I'm beginning to doubt if I'm even fit to be your knight…"

"You really are creepy, you know."

"What?"

I was dumbfounded that he was contemplating such a pointless thing. However, he seemed to have been shocked by my response and stood motionlessly. In that instant, I threw a kick at his shin. My kick that kept missing in the carriage on the way to the castle finally landed, leaving a footprint on his pants.

"Finally I got you," I said. "Although I feel bad for Granny since she has to wash them, it feels good to get one in on you."

"Is this your answer, my lady?"

"What? There's no meaning to this. I just wanted to kick you." Does this guy think there's a meaning to everything in the world? How hard-headed can he be? I stuck my tongue out at him. "Just like this kick, I call you a bastard in the heat of the moment, when I feel like it. It's creepy you even keep track of such a thing. Don't tell me you're keepin' track of other things too."

"I won't deny that."

“That’s what I’m callin’ creepy! But do you get what I’m sayin’? You’re worrying about nothin’.” He was still looking at me all confused, so I pointed at the footprint on his pretty white pants and continued. “Haven’t you been listening to me? I’m gonna change everything I don’t like. Your pretty little pants were the first thing. Just as I predicted, it felt good doin’ it.”

He said nothing.

“No matter what’s goin’ on in that little head of yours, I’m not changing who I am or how I live for anyone. There’s no point if I did. You want me to be the queen, no?” Whether that has somethin’ to do with my lineage isn’t my concern. Frankly, I don’t even care. What matters is who I am right now. “Reinhard, it’s up to you whether you’re my ally or just another bastard. The choice is yours. Otherwise, I’ll just leave you behind.”

I don’t care if he’s hailed as the Knight Among Knights or the Sword Saint. No matter what people call him, I will assess and evaluate him myself. And right now, he’s just a pain in the ass with an irritating smile, who also happens to be my knight.

“Look at that,” I said. “That’s a better look on you.”

“What?”

“It’s the first time you’ve smiled like that ever since we got here,” I said, gesturing at his face with my chin.

He touched his face. The corners of his mouth were upturned, and his eyes had closed the gap with his cheeks. In other words, he was smiling. The only other times I’ve seen his face like that was when I told him he looked like his mother and when I gave him an order in the throne room. Well, it’s definitely an improvement.

“You sure surprise me all the time, my lady.”

“Alright, you’re smiling a bit too much now.”

“I’m sorry, I’m remembering the declaration you gave back in the throne room… Of all the things you said you will tear down and change, I’m just honored that I was your first.”

“What?! Don’t get cocky! Besides, you can easily wash off that footprint!”

“No, I’ll ask Auntie to keep it as it is to commemorate this day.”

“You’re really creepy, you know that?!” I screeched, running towards where Old Man Rom was waiting.

Reinhard stood still, watching me run off. I stopped and turned around. And I pointed at him, who was smiling faintly.

“What are you doin’? You’re my servant, aren’t ya? Hurry up and follow me.”

“I am your knight, Lady Felt. No one else’s.”

“Ah, shut up,” I said, flashing my fang as I smiled.

As I stood with my hands on my waist, he began to walk towards me. He extended his hand to offer escort, but I snickered and slapped it away. Walking away from him, I knew he was making a bitter smile without even looking. However, I could tell it wasn’t out of pure bitterness. Ah well, it’s not like I wanna see his genuine smile so much. I guess I’ll let this one slide.

The main street came into view. I saw Old Man Rom squeezed inside the carriage through the window, and though I couldn’t see them, I suspected the three delinquents were on it as well. Gramps and Granny, who were waiting for our return by the carriage, looked confused, longing for an explanation for the new faces. I scratched my head. Looks like the path full of thorns I’m about to take really is gonna be a pain in the ass.

“Opening up such a path,” said Reinhard, as if reading my mind, “that will be my job.”

“And my job will be to stomp through it, huh?” I laughed aloud. “Sounds fun.”

Reinhard also smiled. “Yes, it does.”

END

Sloth IF:
Natsuki Rem’s Life in Another World From Zero

Prologue:
The Beginning

—A very heavy atmosphere was spreading inside the dragon carriage.

???: "…"

The atmosphere was not heavy because of nervousness or caution; it was just plain awkward. To feel like it was reality with her skin, the girl softly pulls up the blanket that was on her body.

The dog carriage was not being pulled by an earth dragon, but a large Liger, and it was not being shielded by divine protection. The passenger carriage had a rough structure, and so it shook noisily. They weren't really good circumstances, but since they weren't in a position to spend all they wanted, they just had to deal with this.

???: "…"

They already didn't even have too much travel expenses left anymore. Once their lives were at risk, they also had to use the money that they were hesitant to use at first because of guilt. Still, even if they temporarily pulled through their difficulties, the problem of money would always follow them around unless it was solved fundamentally.

Plus, money wasn't the only problem they had. There was an even more serious problem.

That was—

???: "A wife…but you look like you just had a nightmare, certainly."

A voice suddenly calls out to the girl at the corner inside the cramped carriage. When she looked back with just her eyes, she saw a small—no, a figure that was too small. It was maybe a child, or something smaller.

He had white hair and a lovely dog face—it was a beast man kobold.

???: “I can see why you’d be cautious, but I don’t mean any harm, certainly. I was just curious, certainly.”

Rem: “…Thank you very much for your concern. But…”

The girl stiffened up, but the tone of his voice made her relax. He probably just had good intentions. However, the girl’s heart wasn’t ‘strong’ enough to allow herself to be spoiled by his good intentions.

If she wasn’t tense, she’d become more and more corrupted. That was terrifying.

???: “You’re practically glass, certainly.”

Rem: “Like glass…?”

???: “Glass is hard, but fragile, certainly. That’s what your guys’ hearts seem like to me, too, certainly.”

His point truly made her heart crack like glass.

By ‘You guys’, it felt like he was saying that she wasn’t all alone. A black-haired boy was cuddling next to her in a blanket, sitting up and sleeping. She was leaned against him, and they were sharing warmth.

And so, this boy was the true reason why there was a heavy atmosphere in the carriage.

Subaru: “…I’m sorry…I’m sorry. I’m…so weak…so…everything’s my…”

Rem: “…”

Every now and then, feelings of shame leaked from the lips of the boy having a nightmare. The passengers felt something serious from his voice and tears that made it seem as if he carried the guilt of everyone in the whole world, and they couldn’t move an inch.

Rem: “Don’t talk about other people’s situations so bluntly…”

???: “Seeing everyone as a threat now is something you probably couldn’t avoid, certainly. It may have been unavoidable, but you can’t just never do anything about it, certainly.”

When she looked down with their arms linked, the beast man just looked like white fur. The fur that spoke as if she knew them irritated her just a little bit. She just didn’t want to make a big fuss about it.

Seeing her conflicted like that, the beast man gets a hat that he’d been hiding, and he took something out of it. And then, when he smoothly put his hand straight in there,

???: “Take this and go to Banan town. A friend of mine will help you out, certainly.”

Rem: “…Why…are you doing this?”

His voice sounded like he had good intentions. There was a place and a person’s name written on the paper he forced her to take. It seemed this beast man’s name was also included in the few lines. She didn’t know why he was doing this.

The beast man smiles with a “It’s obvious, certainly”, in response to the girl’s question and says,

???: “People should help out each other in times of need. As an adult, even more so when it’s a child. “The more bonds you make, the more good bonds you get.” That’s the Kararagian way I believe in.”

He tells her that kindly, and the girl grasped the scrap of paper tightly. After that, she brought her knees together, put her head on the shoulder of the boy next to her, and she let out a sobbing voice.

The beast man stares at the girl and the boy with kind eyes, and he patted their heads.

Chapter 1:
2 Months

1

—Kararagi city state is a large western country that is one of the four large kingdoms.

It’s a country comparable to the large countries the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko in the north, the Volcanica empire in the south, and the Lugunica kingdom in the east, but it became what it is now in a very peculiar way in comparison to other countries.

Kararagi city state’s history is quite shallow in comparison to the other three countries. A few hundred years ago, a bunch of warlords of small countries fought in the west—the rivalry between countries was an undying danger zone.

The west combined and became Kararagi city state as a single country.

Each small country changed into towns, and the country managed those towns with the parliamentary governments of the town leaders. In this system, the “Great Heir”, elected by the town leaders, is the one who holds the final decision.

Kararagi, which contains such circumstances, has completely different values in comparison to other countries. It not only developed distinct politics, but distinct national characteristics and culture too.

Wafuu culture and Wasou were some examples, but the most characteristic thing of all was—

Subaru: “I’m sorry, Rem. It went awful. I tried ma best, but it was just awful…”

The thick Kararagi accent—it was a dialect that was particularly easy to understand in Kararagi city-state, and it was a part of the unique culture that spread. The one who demonstrated it was a person apologizing with his forehead on the floor.

It was a young man with black hair and sharp sanpkau eyes. He was in a Wasou dyed deep blue, sitting upright in a room of tatami mats made of knitted grass, making a pathetic look.

—Natsuki Subaru was his name.

As you could tell from his terrible Kararagi accent, he didn't come from Kararagi. Although, Subaru didn't come from anywhere in this world anyway. He was suddenly summoned from a different world, went through various experiences, and as a result, he was now in Kararagi. —That's all.

And so, Subaru was apologizing to the girl facing him sitting straight. As she smiled at Subaru's apology,

Rem: "—Please stop speaking like that. It doesn't suit you at all, Subaru-kun."

Subaru: "It don't?"

Rem: "It's horrible, to say the least."

Subaru: "That's too harsh! Ah, well, I'm sorry. Okay, I'll stop now."

She says that to Subaru with a smile, and he dejectedly stops with the poor accent. However, while showing the dissatisfaction he had inside by pouting, he rubbed two fingers together.

Subaru: "Well, I know I'm not good, but you know what they say, "When in Rome, do as the Romans do". I'm doing my best to fit in with everyone else as soon as possible."

Rem: "It's great that you're doing your best, and I could learn a lot of things from you. However, how should I put this…Subaru-kun's accent sounds like something you'd hear from someone who isn't from Kararagi and is making fun of the accent, and it's kind of irritating."

Subaru: "So that's why Kansai people get pissed off by Tokyoites' fake Kansai accents?!”

Rem: “Tokyo? Kansai accents?”

The ruthless comment sinks Subaru instantly. A question mark showed when Subaru lamented as the girl shook her blue hair and tilted her head.

Her hair that came to the shoulders and her pure eyes were both light blue. Looks that gave off a lovely and kind impression. It was a beautiful, pretty girl wearing a light blue kimono gracefully.

The girl’s name was Rem—or officially, Natsuki Rem. Although she had the same last name as Subaru, she obviously wasn’t his sister or his relative. They were family in a different way.

Subaru: “But like, umm, yeah. It’s not like my speaking has anything to do with work going wrong, okay. Work went wrong just because I’m incompetent…”

Rem: “Work went wrong? Like how?”

Subaru: “Agh…ghghgh you see, well…”

Subaru tried to beat around the bush, but Rem questioned him directly. Subaru thought hard about how he should respond to the fastball thrown at him, and he mumbled.

Seeing Subaru worry like that, Rem smiles softly as she said,

Rem: “Tell me all about what happened. Don’t worry. No matter how awful Subaru-kun was, even if you messed up big time at a work that doesn’t fit you, I won’t get mad.”

Subaru: “I messed up big time at a job that didn’t fit me and I was god awful!”

Subaru gets crushed by Rem’s kind lead-in, and he spreaded his legs on the tatami mat. Like that, he falls over sideways and timidly starts to poke the tatami mat with his finger.

Subaru: “I was too naive. I was beyond naive. From what I thought the basics of manual labor and day labor were, I was under the impression that anyone could do work that was in high demand…"

Rem: "So you were under that impression…and what else?"

Subaru: "Besides! I was reckless for trying manual labor with a crappy fish fry body like mine in Kararagi where Demi-humans are hired! Actually, I tried to cover up the quality of my work with the number of rounds. However, I had to carry three times as much with one round and I didn't have enough stamina!"

While Subaru's voice cracked, he did his best to give an explanation as he looked back on what happened this morning.

He has been living in a different world for no less than a year now, and he was aware of the fact that he was way stronger than before, but it was still difficult to close the gap in specs between him and genuine different world people.

Incidentally, today's job was carrying goods, but he got mixed with muscular Demi-humans, and it was simply hilarious how Subaru was working with a bright red face without even carrying a large amount.

Rem: "Oh, I see…so, how'd you mess up? What did you do?"

Subaru: "I tried re-wrapping goods, and I threw out everything…the damage canceled out today's pay."

Rem: "…The people there didn't ask you to compensate out of kindness, huh."

Salt was inside the bag and some was put back inside, but most of it mixed with sand on the ground, making it impossible to get it back. As a result, they were forced to cut the schedule short, and so he went home.

Rem sighed at Subaru, who gave an awkward report with a gloomy look, and said,

Rem: "I hope that you come across a pretty nice job, Subaru-kun."

Subaru: “It really pierces the hell out of me when you say that… wait, what about Rem? Why are you at home at this time? What about work?”

Rem: “Temple Elementary School is on break today. I told you this morning that it seems like the cold is spreading between kids. … Subaru-kun, you shouldn’t try and change the subject, you know?”

Subaru: “Agh”

Subaru admitted defeat and groaned pathetically at Rem, who glared at him with scornful eyes.

As you could tell from the daily labor failure story, Subaru didn’t have a job. To put it accurately, he had the will to work, but he didn’t have a job.

And unlike Subaru, who was job hunting, Rem got a job promptly. It was a job where she taught at a kind of school children institution, which was called “Temple Elementary School”.

Rem was very wanted for general education in this world, as someone who has mastered all sorts of skills like arithmetic and etiquette, and she never stopped working this year.

You might as well say that Rem was contributing 10 times more than him in regards to getting by, although they were in honest poverty. There truly was a wide difference between her and Subaru.

Subaru’s self-awareness of that and his impatience were what made him blame himself more and reflect more.

Subaru: “Damnit…I’m really sorry again, Rem.”

Rem: “Subaru-kun, you promised not to say that.”

Subaru: “I mean, I did make that promise, but it’s truly pathetic how it is a promise.”

Subaru brings his body up from the floor, sits cross-legged, and bites his lip.

He was proud of Rem being needed by people around her and being useful. However, recognizing it and being spoiled by it was a different story. Not to mention, the one who wanted this—the one who wanted to live supporting each other was Subaru, after all.

By no means was it to let Rem do all the supporting and get spoiled as much as he wanted.

Rem: “It’s okay, don’t worry. They’ll all realize how amazing Subaru-kun is eventually. You just haven’t found a job that goes well with your great talents yet. So, keep trying. Because I’ll work for money!”

Subaru: “That’s exactly how someone becomes a typical gigolo!”

Rem: “Ah, Subaru-kun?!”

Subaru bestirred himself and stood up before he melted in the huge, spoiling aura. Subaru leaves behind Rem, who was surprised by his energy, and he ran towards the room’s entrance.

And then—

Subaru: “Just you wait, Rem! I swear I’ll find a job! I’ll support you!”

Rem: “Okay. Please come back before dinner.”

Subaru: “Damn it! I will support you, you hear me—!!”

Rem waves Subaru goodbye, and he rushed out of the room—out of the tenement house while being on the verge of tears.

He puts on his zoris and runs off to the streets of Kararagi.

Job hunting—even in a different world, it was extremely difficult for people who were unqualified and had a blank period.

2

—Kararagi city-state’s 2nd town, ‘Banan’.

The next largest town after ‘Kyo’, the first town, located west of Kararagi—that is where Subaru and Rem, the Natsukis, live.

The streets are made up of Wafuu architecture, which is culture characteristic of Kararagi, and it seems it is deemed the cradle of the Wafuu style, which spread all over Kararagi. But well, to Subaru, Wafuu architecture was something that didn’t really make him feel like he was in a different world at all.

Because the streets didn’t make him feel like it was a different world, but rather—

Subaru: “—It feels like the Edo Period, or going back a bit forward, the Meiji Era and Taisho Era.”

As Subaru coughed, he saw buildings constructed with wood lined up nicely. Wafuu architecture, which stood on the streets, was also characteristic of the stores with open doors.

People walking down the road were wearing zoris and kimonos, which were wasou, but they were all true different world people. Among those that had hair color and looks that differed from Subaru’s common knowledge, there were a lot of Demi-humans representing beasts.

Japanese culture that forced itself into another world—Subaru had that impression of Kararagi customs, including the Kararagi dialect that sounded just like Kansai dialect.

Subaru: “It’s like people in a fantasy cosplaying. Well, the material is nice so it looks good on everyone, and it all comes together perfectly, though.”

It is very common for manga and games to have countries with Japanese culture in fantasy worlds in the first place. The problem was that it still felt weird actually confronting the scene, and it felt like that for longer than he’d expected. It was a feeling Subaru finally took in after a about a year.

That being said, he still had doubts even if he gulped down the weird feelings.

He couldn't believe that Kararagi's culture uniquely developed from zero. This culture had to have started spreading with people who came from the same place as Subaru.

In other words, people who came from a different world like Subaru and that steel helmet guy, Al—

Subaru: "—Stop it, just stop. Deal with the more realistic problems in front of you. Even if you solve the world's mysteries, you still don't have a job. I'm saying this to myself, talk about depressing…"

How much was this world's history influenced by people who came from the same place as Subaru? He should worry about that when he had more room to think and live. He'd put it off for now.

Right now he had to focus on job hunting, and he had until dinner for that.

Subaru: "It's already afternoon, so I actually don't have much time…! Anyway, first I'll go to the public employment security office and…"

???: "What's wrong, Su-san? You're walking with a serious look… what a scary face!"

Subaru: "Don't be so rude about people's serious looks…"

Someone made a rude point about Subaru's face as he frowned and walked around town. Once Subaru turned around to see whose voice it was, he saw a tall man right beside him. He'd seen his face before.

Subaru: "With that dog face, you must be Hal-san. Don't startle me."

Halibel: ""A dog face". Don't put it that way. I'm a wolf of dogs."

The one who opened his big mouth and laughed at Subaru's words was a demi-human with a wolf face, not a dog face. He was a tall one with black hair and a black kimono, and he bit on a golden kiseru with his back teeth. A lot of ordinary dogs were petite, and he had the credibility to call himself a wolf as he was one head taller than Subaru. However, his eyes were always narrow slits, and so if we're talking about dogs, he looked more like a fox rather than a wolf.

The name of the wolf he called Hal-san was Halibel. He was Subaru and Rem's neighbor of the housing complex 'tenement house' they lived at, and you could say that he was the first acquaintance they made at Banan.

Halibel: "You look like you want to say, "If you're not a dog, then you're a fox". Su-san, you just don't know when to stop, do you?"

Subaru: "Don't make complaints based off people's looks. I really was thinking that, though."

Halibel: "I am neither a Kobold nor a Fox. I'm a Wolf. We are a rare species on the verge of extinction, so don't make that mistake. It kinda feels like I'm carrying the pride of our kind, you know?"

Subaru: "If you're going to carry it, do it a little more seriously."

You'd obviously want to choose someone that could at least carry the pride. As for Subaru, pride—or at the very least, the wolves' title, who were on the verge of extinction, wasn't something he'd leave in the hands of Halibel. He may be taking care of them, but that didn't mean he'd immediately trust him.

Subaru: "I can't chat with you right now. I'm burning with the will to work. Don't get in my way."

Halibel: "Come on, Su-san, that sure is a cold way to greet me. I'm really depressed, so stop it. Besides, even if you're burning with the will to work, you don't have a job. It's just cinders."

Subaru: "I'm also really depressed, so can you not?!"

Subaru's neighbor's counterattack makes his voice crack. Halibel shook the kiseru in his mouth up and down. After that, as he exhaled smoke that entered his lungs, he said,

Halibel: "Go ahead and get more and more depressed. A man that troubles such a good wife is hopeless. How brave of her to not complain once even though her husband has no job and indulges himself in drinking…I feel bad for Rem-chan.”

Subaru: “I don’t indulge myself in drinking! But it hurts how that’s the only thing I can deny! To tell you the truth, I’ve been troubling Rem. …I really can’t compete with her.”

Subaru dropped his shoulders dejectedly as his current worthlessness was pointed out objectively. Halibel went “Harharhar” at Subaru happily while he was like that.

Subaru: “Did you come here to make fun of me? Or did you come here to cheer me up?”

Halibel: “We’re both jobless, and I thought we could have a pity party or something.”

Subaru: “No way! It would be too much to have a pity party with another unemployed person right after I almost became a gigolo!”

Subaru shakes off Halibel, who came closer to him, and he full on rejects being treated as his partner.

Besides, strictly speaking, Halibel wasn’t jobless. This glib talking neighbor was a tenement house manager—whether he was actually doing manager like work or not, he had the title of a manager as a vocational worker.

Although he had only ever seen him napping, grooming, drinking, or using his Kiseru, he was employed.

Subaru: “Basically, Hal-san is a dazzling being out of my reach.”

Halibel: “Don’t say something so sad, we can be friends. It’s true that I can get money just by lying down all day and playing with the fray spots of my kimono, but putting that aside, I think it’s precious how Su-san is working hard to earn money, you know? Isn’t it just lovely?”

Subaru: “Shut up, you slacker! …Actually, who did you go to to become a manager?”

Halibel: “Hmm, sorry to disappoint, but I just happened to be acquaintances with the owner of the tenement house. With that connection, I was able to be a couch potato…Sorry, Su-san, I’m a winner.”

Subaru: “Damn you!!”

Subaru hisses without hiding his anger as he listened to his shaky story.

In the end, personal connections meant everything in an environment where even academic backgrounds were useless. And Subaru didn’t have any personal connections, even if you were to disregard the fact that he was in a different world.

A man that traveled two worlds and failed to create relationships—that was Natsuki Subaru.

Subaru: “Struggling alone, and to top it off, jobless. …Looks like I’ll just have to wait for my death.”

Halibel: “You have Rem-chan. Struggling alone is an exaggeration!”

Halibel suddenly opens his large mouth widely, and he bursts into laughter as he looked up at the sky. Subaru, seeing that dog face in the corner of his eye, sighed deeply.

Subaru: “Look, you know my situation. I’ll be going job hunting. My goal is a disposable income of 15,000, and the condition is that I pay for traveling expenses and put it into pension and insurance.”

Halibel: “I don’t have actual work experience, but how’d you come up with that condition?”

Subaru: “I thought I’d go for a dream that was just barely realistic. Now I want to apply this condition to the common knowledge here and find out the minimal requirements for landing a job…”

Freeing himself from being supported by Rem was his biggest goal at the moment. However, he wanted to avoid temporary measures, such as choosing jobs that won’t last long and dead-end ones.

Subaru's goal was to get a job he could do for his whole life, one that he could be proud of as a family head.

Subaru: "—And so, I came to the public employment security office."

Out the Banan town areas, at a place away from the crowded, thriving street, there was a store.

It was the 'employment agency' which Subaru called a public employment security office. It was a place that acted as the bridge for interpersonal relationships with things like job arrangements and introduction letters for people.

There were several employment agencies in Banan, but Subaru always used the same one. Because of that, he was friends with the shop owner—

???: "—Ugh! It's dimwit!"

The moment he showed up at the reception desk, the man in the shop suddenly welcomed him harshly.

Subaru: "That's one rude way to greet a client, and you shouldn't use such a cruel nickname."

???: "You're the one that's rude! You screwed up at the goods carrying scene, didn't you?! I was told to never refer such a good-for-nothing!"

Subaru: "Aaa, the foreman told me to take care on the way home, I didn't want to know about this side of him…!"

Subaru collapsed as he was called incompetent, and a lizard faced man is what appeared before him—he was a lizard man. Lizards weren't rare Demi-humans, but he was so fat that he had a strangely large width, and so he looked more like a frog, rather than a toad. It was characteristic of him to wear a cute apron.

Crane Donahue was his name, and he was the owner of this employment agency officially recognized by the town. Employment agencies officially recognized by the town were scarce, and it was known as conscientious work.

However, the man that was supposed to be conscientious looked down on Subaru in an annoyed way as he said,

Crane: “How do you mess up at carrying goods? You’re going to become a job hopper at this rate.”

Subaru: “Er, well, you see, I was totally focused on trying to do as much work as others and…”

Crane: “Daily allowances have fixed rates. You could’ve made profit by sitting back and letting everyone else do the work.”

Subaru: “…That would be unfair. I don’t really want to do something unfair…”

Crane: “Why are you so insistent?! I don’t care if you do a good job, good grief…”

Subaru grumbled to protest, and Crane folds his crest. Then, he suddenly noticed someone standing behind Subaru.

Crane: “Oh! It’s Halibel! Sorry for not contacting you for quite a while!”

Halibel: “Oh, it’s fine, don’t worry. I just came to check on Su-san’s future.”

Subaru: “Future…well, anyway…”

Subaru cleans off his knees, stands up, and compared Crane and Halibel. After that, he pointed at Halibel and tilted his head at Crane.

Subaru: “You know this playboy?”

Halibel: “Playboy! Playboy! Why does it have such a lovely ring to it? From now on, I’ll be calling myself ‘The Eternal Playboy’. Does it sound good? Does it sound bad?”

Subaru: “What’s bad is that you actually like it.”

While Subaru joked at Halibel's name sense, he waited for Crane's reply. Seeing that exchange, Crane groans as he folded his big arms.

Crane: "Dimwit…I mean Mr. Subaru, you made it big. I knew you could do it."

Subaru: "You can't just blatantly change the way you treat someone!"

Crane: "Well, of course I'm going to use 'Mr.'. Who do you think Mr. Halibel i…"

With a look of shock and fear, Crane stopped when he was about to say something. Subaru raised an eyebrow at that unnatural reaction, but Crane went "Oh" while looking away as he said,

Crane: "Mr. Halibel is, you know…a-an eternal playboy."

Subaru: "He got that name just a second ago."

Crane: "Anyway! Moving on! So what's the matter? I can refer Mr. Subaru! But, don't ask for a relaxing gravy train, alright? The goods carrying one was your best shot."

Subaru: "It doesn't have to be a relaxing gravy train. I just want you to refer me to a job with a future. The conditions are negotiable, but please give me one for a family head."

Crane: "That's the first time I've been given the condition "One for a family head", but…"

Crane briefly scanned the shop as he puzzled over Subaru's request.

It was an employment agency approved by the town, but the store itself was neatly taken care of. The one floor wooden shop had minimal chairs and tables, and the bulletin board wall was filled with help wanted advertisements and wanted people forms. People searching for jobs would select a job from the posters, and the people who wanted a job done would ask Crane and he'd put up a form. That was the sort of system it had.

Subaru: "If I accept exterminating a dragon and fail, your reputation would be damaged as the one who got me the job.”

Crane: “I would never ask you to do that, and I’d leave the country once something like dragon extermination was announced.”

Halibel: “If it was in an empire, I’d exterminate a dragon with pleasure. If you have a good plan to kill it, you might even defeat the kingdom’s God dragon. Then you could take the country and…”

Subaru: “Oh! Crane! That’s it! Let me check out that ‘Zarestia Bed Search’!”

Subaru’s voice interrupts Halibel, who lit his Kisero and puffed it. Subaru approaches the wall dramatically, and once he tore off the poster, he read the contents aloud.

Subaru: “Let’s see…”Recruiting investigators for the bed of the great spirit Zarestia! The habitat of the Great spirit that has been a mystery for many years—the time has come to recruit members to explore it! Working conditions are negotiable, and the reward depends on results!” This! This…this doesn’t sound good at all…”

Crane: “Why are you talking so loudly to yourself?! Also, I’ll be putting that back. Give it here.”

When Subaru’s eyes turned lifeless from the absurdity of the recruitment details, Crane confiscated the poster. Then, when he looked at the details, he groaned an “Oh” as he said,

Crane: “I forgot to take this off. Applications closed quite a while ago. It’s just a crappy recruitment form I left on there just because I was told to do so. Just forget about it.”

Subaru: “Did it actually happen?”

Crane: “There are a lot more idiots in this world than you think.”

Subaru felt depressed when he heard Clane reply as he shrugged.

Involving yourself with great spirits would be nothing but a suicidal act. Just normally coming in contact with them would be reckless in itself. —I just hope that those daredevils died peacefully.

That was Crane's misinterpretation of Subaru's facial expression, and when he touched his own apron he said,

Crane: "I now know that you're so cornered that you'd jump at a job that's pretty much suicide. So…I really don't know if I should give you this…!"

Subaru: "So you're saying you have a job that's better than pretty much suicide?!"

Crane: "It depends. But well, you have to work for your cute wife…!"

Crane took out an application as if to say to him, "This is all I can do for you now!". Subaru nervously accepts what he held out to him, and he looks at the application details.

Subaru: "…A maid at Riften Magoji's place?"

Crane: "It's a short term job that lasts for one month. You'll be doing subordinate work, but Mr. Subaru has the skills, so…"

Saying that, Crane shows off his apron as he pinched it. The apron was way too cute for a giant like him, but the flower pattern on it was what emphasized that impression in particular.

Subaru: "An old fart with a lizard face may be wearing it, but it still looks great."

Crane: "You put it on yourself! My wife really liked it, though!"

Subaru: "That's just because I was sewing buttons back on. How's that related to this?"

Crane: "Take a good look at the guidelines. It says that it's a workplace with a lot of women. Good thing you have a special skill to attract women."

Subaru: "You're just jumping to conclusions! Besides, I'm more worried about the point "Only taking young men"."

Only taking young men at a workplace with lots of women—he could not figure out what went on over there.

According to the description, he just knew that it was subordinate work—sorts of chores. They weren't looking for special qualifications and inhumane manual labor. If only he didn't refuse being a manservant…

Subaru: "…Thanks, but would I even stop being a day laborer with this?"

Crane: "As if you could find a lifetime job out there so conveniently. Listen up. First you gotta start from the bottom, get your face and name out there, and then you'll find your favorite after earning trust. Don't you know that?"

Subaru: "You referred Rem to a job at Temple Elementary School at the start."

Crane: "Well, that's because Rem-chan is cute."

It was an irrefutable argument. You could not argue against Rem's cuteness. Stuff like Subaru's poor excuses weren't effective in society.

Crane: "Kararagi isn't nice enough to recognize an unemployed man as a full-fledged man,"

Subaru: "I came here to look for a job, didn't I?!"

He came to the public employment security office and was being treated coldly because he was unemployed. This was proof that, despite having the will to work, he was lacking the most important thing: "trust from society.

That being said, Crane's judgement was fair. Subaru dropped his shoulders in defeat.

Subaru: "Please make me a letter of introduction. I will do my very best to be liked."

Crane: "Yep, do your best. Mr. Riften is a brave dealer, but he's known to be a calm person."

Subaru: "…Brave warrior?"

Crane: "Brave dealer."

Subaru tilted his head at the slight difference in nuance, but Clay wasn't concerned about that as he finished writing the letter of introduction fluently, carefully put it into an envelope, and gave it to Subaru.

Crane: "On the morning of the day after today, go to Mr. Riften and tell him that you came from me."

Subaru: "Okay. Thanks as always."

Crane: "And lastly, be careful! Sheesh, don't mess up this time!"

He puts the letter of introduction in his pocket and left as he waved goodbye to Crane, who went back inside the shop. Then, he went back to the main street with Halibel, who had been smoking his Kisero at the street.

Subaru: "But, damn. …Hal-san sure has a lot of free time."

Halibel: "Why say that all of a sudden?"

Subaru: "It looks like you're jobless, gazing absentmindedly at other people job hunting. That's too awful."

Halibel: "When there's someone below you, you cheer them on, right? I'm the group that gives you courage."

Subaru: "Courage isn't what I'm getting from this. It's more like something dark, I think."

Subaru replies to Halibel cracking jokes, and he sighs. Although, Halibel still was actually the employed person here, and so Subaru was the one who had a low position in society.

Halibel: "Still, you're having quite some trouble with job hunting. What did you do before coming to this town?"

Subaru: " "…"

Halibel's casual questioning makes Subaru hold his breath for a moment.

However, he quickly smiles to hide his hesitation and he shrugs as he went, "Well".

Subaru: "I moved from place to place in Kararagi with Rem. I'm glad we settled down this town. It's all thanks to you that we were able to rent a tenement house. You're a lifesaver."

Halibel: "About that, you should thank Elder instead, the one who referred you. Connections are a way of life. If you're blessed with them, that shows you have something to offer."

Subaru: "…About that, I don't contribute much at all. It's all thanks to Rem."

Subaru replies as he thought, "That's the only thing I'm 100% sure about", and he stretches lightly in the crowd.

As he was temporarily relieved of the burden he had thanks to getting a job.

Halibel: "Moving from place to place in Kararagi…eh."

3

Subaru: "Sorry, Rem. I did ma best, but…"

Rem: "—Subaru-kun?"

Subaru: "Ah, yes, I'll stop. I apologize. And my next job will be short term."

Subaru was sitting straight on the tatami mat. He showed the letter of introduction he got from the employment agency to Rem, who had been working in the room's kitchen for the evening. Rem, who stopped cooking dinner, points out Subaru's poor Kararagi accent, and when she took the letter of introduction, she looked over the details.

Rem: "It may be a short term job, but it's still a step forward.

Subaru's breakthrough begins here. I can see it. Subaru-kun will be respected by a lot of people, and they'll build a bronze statue."

Subaru: "I wonder if ophthalmology exists in this world…"

When he gave a bitter smile at the exaggerated statement, Rem went "Oh" as she got surprised while looking at the letter of introduction.

Rem: "This is a job at Riften-sama's residence."

Subaru: "Yeah. Do you know Riften-san?"

Rem: "No, we aren't direct acquaintances. Among the kids I teach at Temple Elementary School, there are also ones from merchant houses, so I sort of know about Riften-sama, the brave merchant."

Subaru: "There it is, 'Brave Merchant'! He's not like a fierce shogun or anything, right?"

Rem: "Haha, fierce shogun…S-Subaru-kun, please don't make me laugh."

Rem chuckled, like she got a kick out of what Subaru said, and she breaks into a smile because of Subaru's question. Then, Rem said, "Listen" to Subaru as she held up a finger.

Subaru: "Oh, just like a teacher."

Rem: "Don't make fun of it. Brave merchant is a way to point out a merchant's rank in Kararagi. Excellent merchants are given the ranks 'Great Merchant', 'Wealthy Merchant', and 'Brave Merchant'. It's an honor."

Subaru: "'Great' and 'Wealthy' makes sense, but isn't 'Brave' kinda weird?"

Rem: "Because in Kararagi, where trade flourishes, achieving success in trade is practically like distinguishing yourself in a battlefield. Riften is also someone who's respected."

Rem replies like that, and she looks at the letter of introduction a bit nervously. Seeing Rem somewhat uneasy, Subaru knits his brows, and he called her name.

Subaru: “You seem kinda uneasy. What’s up?”

Rem: “Well, according to the rumors I’ve heard, there are a lot of women working at Riften-sama’s mansion…so a handsome, young man like Subaru-kun working in a workplace like that would be…”

Subaru: “You’re being pretty subjective!”

While Rem expressed her considerably subjective opinion, she folded and unfolded the letter of introduction. Subaru somehow sensed what Rem was worrying about, judging from her unease.

Subaru: “Silly.”

Rem: “Oww. S-Subaru-kun?”

Rem holds onto her head after suddenly getting chopped by Subaru. Subaru says “Good grief” to Rem, who had a surprised look, and he sighed.

Subaru: “Don’t worry about such odd things. Who do you think I am?”

Rem: “I’m sorry. But I’m worried now. Riften-sama, as someone who hires tons of women, will see cute ol’ Subaru-kun and he might not feel turned on…”

Subaru: “Ughhhh! That’s a little different from what I thought you were worrying about!”

Rem’s one-sided worrying dumbfounds Subaru, and he changes the topic.

Subaru: “But cute? Just look at my eyes. How are they cute?”

Rem: “I just can’t get enough of the manliness of Subaru-kun’s eyes.”

Subaru: “What exactly do I look like to you?!”

There were a lot of things about Rem's assessment of Subaru that other people couldn't really understand. In any case, Subaru held onto Rem's shoulder, as if to tell her that she shouldn't worry and to calm her down.

Subaru: "You don't need to worry. Rem is the only one for me. That goes for when I'm at a place with a bunch of girls too, got it?"

Rem: "Fuwa…ye-yesh, got it. Subaru-kun…"

As he whispered while patting Rem's head, her face turned red, and she nods. Then, Subaru also felt affection for Rem, who became submissive to him for a bit.

When Rem lifted her head slowly, her wet eyes met his up close. They get closer and closer, close enough to feel each other's breath—then, a pot whistled.

Subaru: "Owaa!" [Rem: "Kyaa!}

The sound of a pot lid falling breaks the silence. Rem rushes to the kitchen in a panic. She turns off the heat of the cooking stove that used a magic crystal, makes sure the pot settled down, and rubbed her chest in relief.

Rem: "—Haha" [Subaru: "Haha"

Then, they both smiled at each other at the same time.

And so, they laughed for a while, and when that settled down, Rem clapped as she went, "Alright".

Rem: "Let's eat. Subaru-kun, please set up the table."

Subaru: "It's more like a low dining table, though."

While still feeling slightly awkward, the two of them start to prepare the food. When he moved the low dining table against set against the wall to the middle of the room, Rem took off the lid of the pot vigorously.

A steamy pot and the smell of delicious, warm vegetables—today's menu was ‘Mizutaki’.

Subaru: “A pot. It’s nice to have every now and then. It’s the best when you have it with Ponzu.”

Rem: “I kind of wanted to eat something sour with assorted vegetables. Subaru-kun, are you fine with sour stuff?”

Subaru: “I like it. I’m surprised. You like sour stuff?”

Rem: “No, I really just kind of wanted to eat it, but…”

Rem curiously puts her finger on her jaw and tilts her head slightly. However, Subaru ignored her for now as her actions weren’t unexpected to him. Besides, Rem choosing a menu giving priority to what she wanted to eat was a good sign.

Since it was proof that she was slowly getting out of the habit of always prioritizing Subaru in one way or another.

Subaru: “Delicious! You did awesome today again!”

Rem: “My…for you to be happy that you have a cute wife who’s a good cook…I’m embarrassed.”

Subaru: “Well, I really was serious. I’m a such a lucky guy.”

No matter where they moved, Rem was always good at cooking. It was tough at the start with different kitchen utensils and different ingredients, but after living in Kararagi for a year, they were adapting nicely.

It’s just that there were a few parts they couldn’t adapt to, unrelated to tastes.

Subaru: “Uuu…my stomach hurts. I can’t move an inch…”

Rem: “I’m stuffed. Subaru-kun, my lap is free now.”

Subaru: “Yay! I’d like to make a reservation.”

Rem: “Reservation taken. A special seat, just for Subaru-kun. Hop on."

Rem taps her closed lap, and Subaru falls onto it. When he left his head on her soft lap, he felt his whole body being wrapped in happiness.

Their stomachs clearly took in more than a two person meal, and their stomachs relaxed to whatever extent they wished for.

Subaru: "Haa…Rem's amazing."

Rem: "Yes. But Subaru-kun is lovely too."

Subaru: "Those two things aren't related."

Rem: "To me they are. Closely related, that is."

Unlike Subaru's assessment, apparently to Rem, there was a tight knot connecting trust and Subaru.

He wasn't so sure if he was living up to that assessment. So, "Rem is amazing" was, without a doubt, Subaru's real thoughts, gratitude, and apology.

Rem probably knew that too. —He felt pathetic for that, again.

Rem: "After resting our stomachs for a bit, let's go to the bath-house. You have to rest up in preparation for work."

Subaru: "But my job starts the day after tomorrow?"

Rem: "I know. So, Subaru-kun has to take it easy tomorrow. —But not tonight."

With Subaru on her lap, Rem brings her lips near his ears, and she warmly tells him that. The warmth of her voice makes Subaru feel the chills, and his ears turned red.

Subaru: "…R-Rem, you're amazing."

Rem: "Yes. Because I'm loved."

Subaru lets out a whisper, and Rem replied to him while looking embarrassed.

—Although, Subaru didn’t notice that Rem’s ears were also bright red.

4

—Two days later, Subaru visited Riften Magoji’s mansion with an introduction letter.

Subaru: “As expected of the rumored Magoji palace…it’s so huge.”

Subaru, who showed the letter of introduction at the residence’s main gate and was let in by the gatekeeper, shows his admiration like that.

A residence in the north side of Banan nicknamed ‘Magoji Palace’. Buildings of Wafuu architecture were usually one-story buildings, and Magoji Palace was no exception. The palace conspicuously built on vast land looked just like a Daimyo’s mansion that shows up in historical plays.

Subaru: ““Walk to work takes almost an hour. Uniform is covered in your payment”.”

Thanks to the letter of introduction, Subaru was hired without problems. He had an interview just in case, but the mistress arranging the servants looked at Subaru and just gave him an OK—the deciding factor was unknown.

In any case, Subaru was employed as a novice choreman, put on the uniform he was given as he felt nervous with the new job and his coworkers he met with for the first time, and he stepped forward towards his workplace.

Magoji Palace was the place, but just like the guidelines said, there were an overwhelming amount of women.

At the very least, Subaru didn't see any men at the place other than the gatekeeper. The gatekeeper wasn't even inside the court, so Subaru truly was the only man at the residence. He couldn't count the amount of female coworkers on his hands and toes, let alone on just his hands. It sure was an imbalanced workplace.

Still, it had nothing to do with what Rem was worrying about. Subaru wasn't trying to do anything to his female co-workers, and most of the women were married.

However, that was if he overlooked the fact that there were other problems constantly coming up.

???: "Natsuki-kuuun! Hey, can you do this for meeee?"

???: "Oh, Subaru-kun, come here! Come oooon, help meee."

???: "Kyaaa! Subaru-chan, you handsome man! That's it that's it! You sexy guy!"

Then, shrill voices—he was a bit hesitant to call them that, but cheers like those came from all around the palace. They were all cheers coming from Subaru's co-workers that were working at the palace with him.

Even Subaru liked getting attention from men and the opposite sex. He did, but…

???: "Hahaha, what a nice butt."

Subaru: "Dohyaa!!"

He gets his butt pat as he passed by—no, he gets his butt rubbed relatively hard, and he shrieked. He immediately turned around as he held onto his butt, but the offender had already disappeared into the direction of the corridor.

Subaru was disgraced while not knowing what to do, and he broke down and wailed his heart out at the wall of the corridor.

Subaru: "I-Impressive sexual harassment…that's an environment with Osaka grannies for you…!"

Yes, his face was covered with tears as he cursed his own bad luck of jumping into a place infested with demons.

Subaru's butt was rubbed just now by Osaka old ladies—in Kararagi, they actually had nothing to do with Osaka, but the women were close to that in terms of their nature. Still, he didn't know who the offender was.

All of the women at the Magoji palace were suspects, previous offenders, habitual offenders—Subaru was thrown into a pack of hungry tigers, and sadly, he was nothing more than a shaking bunny.

Since, regardless of the humans and Demi-humans, this workplace was at the mercy of middle-aged women and no one else—-!

Subaru: "What is he?! A cougar lover?!"

???: "That's a pretty close-minded judgement."

The wall listening to Subaru's complaints answered him…not. A rich, low voice came from behind, and it came from a man that appeared there. And, since it was a man's voice and as it was in the residence, the candidates in the were narrowed down at once. If it wasn't the gatekeeper, then it had to be an intruder—

Subaru: "P-Please! Someone get help!!"

???: "Unfortunately, you are the only one that can answer. Right now, you are the only one who can save yourself."

Subaru: "True! But what are the gatekeepers doing…"

Subaru, without nodding at the just opinion, faces the owner of the voice from the front. It was a thinnish middle-aged man with a mustache and thick eyebrows. He was wearing kimono, which you could tell was made out of high class material at a glance, and an aura of influence emanated from his whole body—he immediately realized who he was.

Subaru: "Could you be…Riften Magoji…-sama?"

Riften: “Correct. I am your employer. Riften Magoji. Now, you don’t have to be so respectful. I just came to see the newcomer after finally finishing my work outside.”

The man—Riften calmly nods at Subaru’s point as he felt on his moustache. Just earlier, even though he didn’t know his identity, he still had acted impolite, and he didn’t even mention it. So, he must be a tolerant person.

Thus, Subaru talked about the doubts in his mind, making use of his tolerance.

Subaru: “Master, if I may call you that…I’d like to ask, are you into cougars?”

Riften: “You’re pretty direct. However, that’s a misunderstanding.”

Subaru’s suspicion that the work environment was too reflective of the employer’s tastes makes Riften shrug his shoulders as he went, “Good grief”. And then, when he took a deep breath,

Riften: “Women are delicate and beautiful. Just touching them makes me feel at ease. That sense of security is irreplaceable, and their open-mindedness gets more charming as they age—don’t you think so?”

Subaru: “My butt’s been touched close to 1000 times in the past few days!”

Riften: “That’s because you have a nice butt.”

Subaru: “You are too biased with your workers!”

Riften: ““Hit it, and you’ll hear it”. I see, so that’s why Mr. Crane gave me the letter of introduction. I understand.”

He was gaining understanding without showing any concern for Subaru. However, Subaru, the main person, was not understanding anything.

Subaru: “Well, regarding the work environment, I’ve come to the conclusion that Master is a cougar lover.”

Riften: “That’s a sad misunderstanding. One day, I’ll clear up your misunderstanding and you’ll truly understand me…actually, I’d like to see if you really will stay here until that time comes.”

Subaru: “That’s really suggestive. Why do you feel that way?”

Riften: “You think you’re the only man I’ve ever hired at my palace?”

Riften laughed lowly, as if the inside of his throat trembled. When Subaru looked at him, with his appearance he vaguely felt like he looked like an evil Edo-period prefectural governor. As he had that thought,

Subaru: “I just thought that all the men couldn’t take the sexual harassment and disappeared…”

Riften: “Although this is the first time I’ve heard ‘sexual harassment’, I can roughly imagine what it means. And let’s just say that I won’t deny your guess.”

Basically, he was saying that Subaru was chosen as one of the periodic sacrificial scapegoats.

It was already bad enough that the workplace was full of girls, so it would surely be a rough environment for a man with no resistance to sexual harassment. The more one had pride as a man, the more devastating the mark would be.

Riften: “Still, in comparison with all the other men, you’re kinda… tough. I expect good things from you.”

Subaru: “Th-Thanks…”

Once Riften tapped Subaru’s shoulder, he started to leave the corridor, leaving him with doubts. Subaru watches him leave, and he curled his lips as he thought about his employer’s eccentric nature.

Perhaps a human needed to sacrifice their human nature in order to become great. Or maybe, since he had senses that were different from others, his results were recognized as unique and he was able to move up in the world.

Subaru touches the shoulder Riften tapped as he said, “In any case”, and sighed.

Subaru: “…Even if he has expectations of me, he’s only going to be disappointed.”

Subaru’s listless whisper reaches no one, and it disappeared into the wooden floor.

???: “Subaru-chaaan! Come here for a seeeecond!”

Subaru: “—. Okay! I’m coming now!”

When Subaru heard a yell from afar, he started to run as he changed his expression.

As if to say, “There’s no time to stop moving”, to his job at this busy mansion and to his coworkers.

Chapter 2:
3 Months (1)

1

After that scene with his employer, Subaru spent a few days working at the palace.

You could say that it was going smoother than one would expect. It seemed that the many men hired at the palace quickly gave up under the environment, but Subaru didn't falter.

A big part of why he didn't is because, first of all, Subaru got hired because they were taking anyone as long as the person was a 'young man'.

Knowing why he was hired, he was able to do his job while taking it rather easy. He was also fortunate to not have his pride hurt by his coworkers' somewhat excessive physical contact.

The most fortunate thing of all was that women were attracted to Subaru, just like Clane had claimed.

???: "Subaru-chan is a hard worker. He's so great."

???: "He's super skillful, and he's considerate. Unlike my kid."

???: "I don't get tired of talking to him, and he's like a child since he smiles a lot."

These were the opinions of the women who were gossiping during break. He smiled a lot, talked a lot, cracked a lot of jokes, asked a lot of questions, and moved around a lot. Subaru had a mostly favorable reputation.

They also liked how he didn't awkwardly show off or try to cover up his mistakes. Even the sexual harassment that became a problem died down dramatically after he got through the first few days.

Subaru: "I guess this means I've been recognized as a coworker."

That's what Subaru understood since the butt rubbing damage became 1/10th of what it had been.

This was the type of treatment outsiders would get while they were one. However, once you were recognized as a colleague, you wouldn't get such treatment. All the men didn't have enough perseverance.

Subaru: "Well, I was confused about what the perseverance was for too…ah, it's done."

Subaru threads the last needle, and he bit off the remaining thread with his teeth. And so, what Subaru made with his own hands were clothes that had flower decorations sewed on—it was a palace uniform.

Subaru sewed flowers on the clothes for the employees working at the palace and for the spares. It was to distinguish the guests and employees at the banquet that was being held tonight at the palace.

Since Kararagi dresses were typically Wasou, it was possible to mistake guests, who wore kimonos, for servants. A plan was needed so that the atmosphere wasn't spoiled.

Subaru: "Can't have servants wearing maid clothes here."

Subaru took responsibility and added flower decorations with the hostess' permission, and it wasn't a part of his professional duties. Subaru's female coworkers did tell him, "You didn't have to do all that", though.

Subaru: "It's a banquet, right? The guests and I would be more happy with everyone wearing cute uniforms."

Then, Subaru got everyone to leave as he made that response.

Instead, the women who wore uniforms with flower decorations at the banquet concentrated on their hair and makeup so much that you might think they were guests, and that caused a different commotion.

On top of that, someone other than Subaru's coworkers surprised him at the banquet—

Rem: "—Did I surprise you? Subaru-kun"

Subaru: "…I'm stunned."

Rem: "Then this was a huge success. Hehehe, Subaru-kun's uniform is lovely too."

It was Rem who said that and surprised Subaru at the banquet hall wearing a hair-pin and a kimono that had flowers drawn like morning glories with dark blue cloth.

Rem, with her gorgeous dress, was so beautiful that all eyes in the hall were on her. However, she didn't react to her surroundings, and she just waited for Subaru to speak.

Subaru: "Ahh…my wife is soo cute."

Rem: "My…for you to say that you're a lucky guy for having the best wife ever…I'm embarrassed."

Subaru: "You sure said it…but why are you here?"

Subaru questions Rem, who wriggled her body and forth as she touched her blushed cheeks with her hand. Rem said, "Well you see", in response as she lifted the sleeves of her kimono and continued,

Rem: "I was actually invited by the parent of a child I teach at Temple Elementary School. I was going to decline at first, but it was at Riften-sama's residence. So I borrowed a kimono."

Subaru: "So you came to see me work …Um, is this parent that invited you a man?"

Rem: "Please relax, it was a woman. Subaru-kun's such a worrywart."

She was invited to a banquet, which is a party, and she was even given a kimono. Of course Subaru would be cautious. Seeing Subaru like that, Rem smiled slightly as she said,

Rem: “I too would be an Oni if something ever happened. That’s when I’d smash that person’s abdomen into bits and pieces.”

Subaru: “Doesn’t that kinda sound like you’re saying that you’re not usually an Oni?!”

He’d never heard a phrase that was as convincing as “I’m an Oni”.

When Subaru got cold feet from imagining an abdomen being smashed, Rem fixed the position of her hairpin as she said,

Rem: “She was a dry-goods dealer and she said that she had plenty of kimonos, so I borrowed one gratefully. But the one thing I didn’t get is what she meant when she said that it could be advertising if I wear it…”

Subaru: “It’s just what it implies. It’ll get publicity if a beautiful woman wears it.”

The excitement of the surrounding looks not calming down despite knowing that they were married was proof of that. Seeing Rem in her kimono sure was a treat for Subaru, but his anxiety from male instincts was much stronger.

That being said, at least he was managing to not worry at all about Rem’s feelings wavering. After all, he did now know that even if someone tried to carelessly do something to Rem, that person’s abdomen would turn into bits and pieces.

Subaru: “Anyway, I really enjoyed the surprise. Rem, you go enjoy yourself, though I won’t be able to look after you because I have work. The cooking will be as good as Rem’s.”

Rem: “Mm, you can’t beat me. Subaru-kun’s stomach is mine.”

Subaru: “You make it sound like you’re literally going to take it away…”

Rem: “Still, it feels kind of strange. I get to see Subaru-kun working his hardest. It’s like…”

Subaru: “…”

That’s when Rem paused. What was she going to say next? He could no longer tell since Rem just said, “No”, as she shook her head and changed her mind.

Rem: “I’ll be with the one who invited me. When I get the chance, I’ll put food in Subaru-kun’s mouth, so please look forward to it.”

Subaru: “That’s a pretty original way to enjoy a party!”

He wasn’t planning on relaxing, but he gained one more reason to avoid doing so as Rem left. Subaru watches his wife mix in with the guests at the banquet, and he shrugged his shoulders as he went, “Good grief”.

Suddenly, Subaru felt someone standing next to him—

Halibel: “—Rem-chan is such a great wife.”

Subaru: “Wait wait wait wait, something’s wrong here.”

Subaru turns around to the familiar voice, and he glared at the wolf man that appeared—he glared at Halibel. With casual clothes and casual behavior, he ate the food on the plate he was holding.

Halibel: “Mmm, this is excellent. Is there anything in this world that’s more delicious than free liquor and free alcohol?”

Subaru: “There is. It’s called food made by one’s beloved wife.”

Halibel: “Agh! You’re boasting about her! I have to drink some alcohol to get through this.”

Subaru: “Forget about that, why are you even here?!”

Subaru hit Halibel’s hand as he reached for the alcohol, and he pressed him for an answer. Subaru’s force makes Halibel open his slit eyes slightly, and when he made an evil smile he said,

Halibel: “Of course the gatekeeper would know me. It’s the power of networking which Su-san doesn't have."

Subaru: "You're a trespasser!"

Although he wanted to fault the gatekeeper for letting a suspicious person through, Halibel being well known was what you'd call a mystery. Thinking back, he did remember Clane respecting Halibel.

Subaru: "You aren't a feudal lord that came to check out the town or anything like that, right?"

Halibel: "'Feudal lord'. You sure know some outdated words. That's what the king was called before Kararagi settled down."

Subaru: "Really? Not that I know anything about it, though."

Subaru wanted to just talk, but it seemed like this was going to be another point connecting his former world and the different world again, so he gave a nasty look as he didn't want to delve into it.

Riften: "—My oh my, it's Mr. "Eternal Playboy". I'm happy to see you."

Halibel: "Oh, Rif-san, long time no see. Sorry for coming today even without being invited."

Halibel replied to Riften, who greeted him, as he raised his bottle of wine which he got his hands on god knows when. Riften calmly nodded at that behavior, however Subaru quickly bowed his head to his employer as he said,

Subaru: "I'm sorry, Master. I will kick out this suspicious man right away."

Halibel: "Hey now, that's cruel, Su-san."

Riften: "I like your hard work, but that would be unnecessary. It's rare for Mr. "Eternal Playboy" to show up at banquets like this. So rare that I'd like to apologize for not sending a written invitation."

Riften acted gentlemanly while Halibel acted relaxed. Their relationship also was a mystery to Subaru.

But, if there was one thing he could point out confidently it would be—

Subaru: “Did that ‘Playboy’ nonsense actually spread?”

Halibel: “Taking what you like is the Kararagian way, after all. I’m happy that I was able to get a simple title thanks to Su-san.”

Subaru: “I-I see…hopefully you can become a sage someday.”

It might be difficult because of the ‘Eternal’ part at the front, but he couldn’t give up his hope.

Riften: “By the way, these past few days I’ve been carefully observing how you work…”

Subaru: “Oh, sorry. I’ve been talking to guests so much that…wait, a few days?! Observing?!”

Riften: “I told you, didn’t I? I have high hopes for you. I’ve been receiving information from the hostess, and you sound different from the men I’ve hired. You’re more…feminine than all of them.”

Subaru: “Feminine?!”

Riften: “A truly intriguing word. I hear you’re the one that made it spread.”

The unexpected evaluation and the expression that said he’d brought it upon himself make Subaru’s eyes widen. He did remember saying ‘Feminine’ with his female coworkers several times, but he had underestimated Kararagi people’s adaptability.

But, it still wasn’t clear how that led to ‘feminine’ being the evaluation

Subaru: “So why did Master end up pointing out me being feminine?”

Rifter: “The hostess has mostly the same opinion as the other women, although your femininity isn’t the only thing that’s been recognized.”

Subaru: “The same opinion…”

Rifter: “Incidentally, I’ve heard from Mr. Clane that you’ve been looking for a place where you can have a long career.”

Subaru blinks with surprise as the conversation made an unexpected turn. Seeing Subaru’s reaction, Riften raised his thick eyebrows, and he reached out for Subaru’s chest—and he touched the flower decorations.

Riften: “This is well done. And you did it quick. The girls like it. Keep this up for the rest of your work period. —I’m hoping that I can tell you something good on your final day.”

Halibel: “…”

When he nodded deeply, Riften and Halibel exchange a few words, and he went back to the middle of the banquet. He had an obligation to entertain the guests as the host of the party.

Despite being busy, he spared time to tell Subaru something. As for what that meant—

Subaru: “…Hal-san, I should look forward to what he was talking about, right?”

Halibel: “If that was an indirect layoff notice, then I don’t think I can believe anything in this world anymore.”

Halibel answered Subaru’s question while opening a sake bottle. The previous exchange had so much impact on him that he forgot to warn the uninvited guest about his bad manners.

So, when Subaru took away the sake bottle from Halibel’s hand, he said,

Halibel: “Oh”

Subaru: “Looks like you’re out of drinks. I’ll go get more.”

Subaru collects the empty bottle as he hurried out of there.

While stopping himself from breaking into a smile, he made up his mind to take the initiative and work harder than anyone else tonight at the banquet hall. He also had to deal with the uninvited guest now to do that.

—As he felt excited inside since it seemed he'd be able to give some good news to Rem.

2

Rem: "—Oh, Subaru-kun."

It was after the banquet cleaning when he exited the main gate to go home.

Subaru gets his named called, and the slight surprise makes him raise his face. Then, it was Rem who was leaning against the palace gate, wearing her kimono which he'd seen at the banquet.

Subaru: "Rem? You didn't go home with the person you came here with?"

Rem: "I was going to, but I was selfish and said that I was going to stay here. I promised to return the kimono and hairpin I borrowed tomorrow."

Subaru: "That doesn't worry me, but…actually, it does. If something happened while you were out this late…"

Rem: "Thank you. But the gatekeeper was there with me, so I was fine."

Rem holds Subaru's hand as he rushed up to her, and she smiled at him to calm him down,

When Subaru turned around as he heard her words, he saw the gatekeeper he knew giving him a thumbs up. Subaru bows his head to show his gratitude towards him, and he considers not snitching on him to the hostess for letting Halibel through.

Subaru: "On another note, why were you waiting here? Did you have some urgent business to take care of or something?"

Rem: “It’s nothing like that. I’m wearing clothes that I wouldn’t usually wear, so I just wanted to walk home together.”

Subaru: “…”

Rem: “I rarely wear kimonos like this…should I have not tried it?”

Subaru: “Erm…”

Subaru scratches his head with his hand that wasn’t being held, and he looked away from Rem. He saw the gatekeeper looking through the gap between his fingers. You know what, I’m going to snitch on him to the hostess tomorrow.

Subaru puts off that thought for later, and while feeling his ears turn red, he said,

Subaru: “I’m happy that you said that. Actually, I’m lame for making you say all of that. I want to show off my beautiful wife while walking home too. Thank you.”

Rem: “Yes. Please show the whole town that I’m yours.”

Subaru: “Now that’s a lot of people you’re talking about here!”

While being surprised by Rem’s idea, Subaru waves at the gatekeeper, and the two of them walked back home.

It was deep at night in the town Banan. The moon and starlight were not the only things showing in the twilight; Banan was being illuminated by hanging paper lanterns. Magical stones weren’t blazing in them; they were candle flames.

A beautiful girl in a kimono walking next to him, and a street illuminated by the night sky and paper lanterns—Subaru was not in a different world. He felt like he was seeing an optical illusion, as if he got lost in the past of his former world.

Rem: “—? Subaru-kun, what’s wrong?”

Subaru: “I just got lost in my thoughts for a little bit. I know I said that I wanted to show off as we walk, but I just remembered that I'm the type that wants to have everything to himself. I want to enjoy it at home."

Rem: "I-It's a borrowed kimono, so we can't do naughty things, you know…?"

Subaru: "But what if it's just for a little?"

Rem: "Oh…i-if it's just a little…"

Subaru's naughty statement makes Rem look down with her face turned red. While loving her profile, Subaru said, "Still", as he began to speak.

Subaru: "I didn't expect Rem to be at the party…or I guess banquet. You must be close with that person to have been invited to go with her."

Rem: "I don't think think we should be friends since I'm a teacher and she's a guardian. But yes, we are."

Subaru: "I see. I'm so glad. We've finally just barely managed to settle down in this town now."

While responding to Rem, he remembered this year's journey where they moved from place to place.

Although he'd talked about it with Halibel when he went job hunting the other day, Subaru and Rem continued to move all around Kararagi until they settled down in Banan town. It was because they couldn't really find work and houses, however they finally were freed from their difficult problems at this town.

While wandering around, they visited Banan because of an introduction letter they got from a person they met, then they were introduced to Halibel, the tenement house manager, and they finally found a house. Rem got a job quickly, and even Subaru, who felt down because he was unqualified, was one step away from living the full-time employee life he'd dreamed of.

It was smooth sailing—it seemed they were finally in a situation where they could say that.

Rem: “I had the time of my life tonight. Subaru-kun praised my kimono, and I got to see my husband work up close. My heart is full.”

Subaru: “I praised Rem in a kimono, not just the kimono alone, you know? Also, I’m full because of the treats you gave me during my break at work.”

Rem: “Everything was so delicious, so I thought you’d love it too…”

Subaru: “Yeah, that was very sweet, and I love you, but…”

Even before the banquet, for some reason women made Subaru taste a lot of food, so he was full and couldn’t carry anymore weight. He was currently holding it all because of the naughty arrangement they made and his willpower.

Rem: “Plus, I was able to tell all your coworkers to take good care of you.”

Subaru: “I’m definitely going to be teased by everyone tomorrow…”

Rem: “—?”

He’s already treated as a toy as is, so of course the women would be so delighted to be asked a favor from his cute new wife. He was now terrified of how everyone would act tomorrow after work.

Subaru: “…”

The trivial but happy conversation stops. However, the silence was not something uncomfortable. It was just something that went between them naturally.

Even though they weren’t talking, it wasn’t awkward. There certainly was a natural feeling of distance between them. If it was just the two of them, there wouldn’t be anything to go with the silence.

—Thus, the world that unnaturally fell silent was a matter unrelated to their silence.

Rem: “Subaru-kun.”

Rem called Subaru’s name about at the same time when he noticed that something was up.

Rem, who stood still and held onto Subaru’s hand tighter, stops him. That makes Subaru hold his breath for a bit, and he—tried to look at her, but he hesitated.

Since he knew why Rem stopped him and why she called his name.

Subaru: “…”

A small person was standing at the front of the street at night.

The shadow was in front of the moon, and its whole body was vague as it was under cover of night. It was shorter than Subaru and a little taller than Rem, and he just knew that it was a woman since she was thin and looked delicate.

She had on this sort of black dress that you’d mistake for darkness, and her hakama was boldly shortened to only cover half of her thighs, and he could very clearly see her white, long legs stepping on the ground.

It was an unarmed, young woman with a lot of revealing spots—if she was just that, then she’d seem like a beggar or a prostitute. And although he was hesitant to say it, neither of those were rare in large towns. Poor people who lost their family and lived in the streets and prostitutes taking customers in back alleys were natural to encounter.

—Hence, it was the glitter of the eyes of the woman standing still that made him think she was different.

Starlight was in the background and a shadow was casted on her face, but the woman’s eyes were shining in a penetrative way. That sharp light frightfully and violently directed hostility towards Subaru and Rem and—

Subaru: “Ah—”

The moment Subaru understood that hostility, he felt his hands and legs getting colder rapidly.

Subaru: "…"

He couldn't move. Subaru completely lost control of his consciousness with hostility before him. His eyes widen, he forgets to breath, and his knees tremble pathetically. And then—

???: "—What…are you doing"

The presence deeply rumbling the atmosphere swept towards them as wind.

He was despairingly too late to realize if it was a voice or just someone calling out to them. That's how much he forgot about the world, and the being was standing firmly as a foreign body.

It was a woman, but it wasn't. She had the shape of a person, but she wasn't a person. It was a repulsive enemy.

???: "—What…are you doing"

The repulsive enemy repeats the wind, her words.

It was a question, a threat, an attack, and mercy. It was even mercy.

Because she could've made someone like Subaru disappear long ago if she wanted to. It didn't happen solely because the enemy had mercy. Could there be anything else to it?

If there was something besides mercy and pity, it would be to let Subaru live.

Rem: "Y-You…"

Subaru's voice was gone. Hence, that wasn't Subaru's voice. It was Rem's, who was standing next to him. She held onto Subaru's hand so tight that it hurt, and it woke him up. The pain made Subaru face reality. Rem also stayed aware

Rem/Subaru: "…"

They were both overwhelmed by the being before their very own eyes.

Rem was the only one who was desperately looking for a way to escape while feeling pressured. Subaru's senses were also telling him that he had to do so. But, his spirit wouldn't respond.

He didn't have the strong spirit to respond. He couldn't do it with the enemy in front of him.

—Since Subaru couldn't choose to do something like fight an enemy as someone who ran from his enemies.

???: "—Die."

He was afraid.

The moment he came to that conclusion, the enemy expressed a very straightforward judgement.

Right after that, the increasing pressure becomes so severe that it practically burns his skin, and the hostility sublimates into murderous intent.

Wind blows. As if the seasonal night wind lukewarmly and gently brushed against his skin—

???: "—Come here!!"

When that fatally connected to him, Rem jumped away to the side while holding Subaru. The space they had been in splits roundly within an instant. The space splitted, as if it was bitten off by the jaw of a beast.

Anything left at that place wasn't a living thing. And so, no doubt about it, it was the murderous intent of the women before their eyes that was left there.

Rem: "Hya—"

???: "Die"

Since the hostility was unavoidable, Rem summoned up mana to attack and defend. However, her opponent's murderous intent was fast and strong like a sudden gust. The wind's jaw attacks Rem continuously, and she had no choice but to concentrate on dodging it.

Rem: "Ku…u—"

The kimono backfired. It reached down to her ankles and it was elegant, but in exchange, it restricted her actions. Even if she concentrated on dodging, she would eventually lose the ability to do so. It was getting worse and worse.

???: "Die die die die die."

Her murderous intent gushes out again and again as the shortest chant using the smallest amount of words, leaving no way out. It was too tall to jump over for Rem, who was holding onto Subaru. And first of all, even if she were to jump high, they'd become easy targets. As for the option to escape to a place with lots of crowds, she wasn't so sure if the women had the mentality to hesitate in sacrificing people, so that would be the very last option—.

Rem: "…"

Rem frantically racked her brain and struggled as much as she could to find one of the few chances of winning.

Subaru couldn't move since he was being held in her arms as he was swung around by the force of her jumping away. When the hostility turned into murderous intent and was acted upon, he even lost the willpower to act brave.

Despite knowing that he had to move and think.

???: "Die."

Without budging an inch, the woman repeats a chant of death.

???: "Die."

The wind's jaw eats the sky, the ground, and the town.

???: “Die.”

The enemy was so much stronger than him that it wouldn’t even be an exaggeration to say that it was like a cat playing with a mouse.

A way to turn things around, a suggestion that’d turn the hopeless situation around, an attack to paint over the distress—

Subaru: “…”

He had no time to find all that, and he couldn’t buy any more of it.

—I don’t want to die.

Subaru’s mind and body become chains, and that thought alone was what coiled around him, like a strong curse.

Rem: “If I could at least…”

Rem forces her voice out of her throat in response to the raging wind that was trying to kill them. Subaru knew what was going to come after her interrupted words. She was going to say this.

“If I could at least—just save Subaru.”

Subaru: “…”

There’s no way he’d let that happen. To show that he was against it, Subaru put a little strength into his hands that were holding onto Rem’s kimono. He put in all the strength he could muster up into his fingertips.

To say that even if he were ripped off easily by force, his heart is the one thing he’d never let someone rip out,

Rem: “But…”

Rem sensed that from Subaru’s slight movements. However, Rem really knew just how bad the situation was, much more than Subaru did, who was restrained as someone was trying to kill them.

They were being cornered. Soon enough the jaw of the wind would take away her legs, slurp on her guts, and devour her life.

Before that happened, she just wished for the one she loved to live longer, even if it was just one second—

???: “Die—”

???: “—That’s not happening. That’s enough.”

Right before the decision lead to action, there was the sound of the jaw of the wind biting on steel.

The bite attack changes the space that had been breaking up to this point. It didn’t stop with one blow; a loud, sharp sound cut up the night in line with the consecutive bite attacks.

Rem: “…”

The change even makes the girl who continued to chant and chant death stop moving. Rem, who was holding Subaru, also stopped, and she blinked, wondering what just happened.

The one who came into their sights was a tall person with a black kimono that shook at its edges—it was Halibel, who smoked the kiseru in his mouth and stood between them.

Rem: “Hali…bel…?”

Halibel: “Yes yes, this is the Ha-san you all know. That was a close one, huh, Su-san. That would’ve been bad if I hadn’t come. Rem-chan even looked like she’d made up her mind for good.”

Subaru: “Why…are you here…”

Halibe: “Ahh, I get why you’re curious, but I’ll have to postpone the explanation for now. Or else…”

Subaru could not comprehend the sudden appearance, and his trembling voice didn’t make Halibel act any different from how he usually would. It didn’t help relieve them, but rather it just increased the feeling that they were in an emergency.

Without caring about those thoughts Subaru had, Halibel slowly turned around to face the woman and said,

Halibel: “It’d be hard to fight that girl.”

Halibel says that, sounding like he wasn’t even in the mood to fight, and he slowly stepped towards the enemy. Subaru tried to say, “That’d be reckless” from behind.

However—

Rem: “Let’s let Halibel-sama handle this.”

Subaru: “Rem? But she…she’s…”

A terrifying opponent. A being with unordinary strength. Halibel was going to fight someone like that.

Subaru was trying to say, “We should at least try our best to run away”.

Rem: “—Halibel “The Great”.”

Subaru: “…Huh?”

Rem: “The one deemed the strongest in Kararagi city-state—that’s Halibel-sama.”

Rem’s quiet statement makes Subaru stiffen up, unable to use his voice. After that, he looked at Halibel’s back, as he closed the distance between him and the enemy, and it simply took his breath away.

The one who poured alcohol at the banquet. That guy was going towards the enemy, like it was just a walk.

Subaru: “This is…”

Halibel: “—Unbelievable, is what Su-san might be thinking. How about you?”

Halibel, facing the woman, takes the words right out of Subaru’s mouth, and he talked to her in an over-familiar voice.

He put aside Subaru and Rem, who were behind him, and stood in between them and the woman as if to say, “You have to get past me before you lay a hand on these two”, but the enthusiasm didn’t show on his face.

Halibel was being aloof, just like he would be whenever he took naps at the tenement house.

The woman also kept the same attitude. The woman standing still didn’t show any interest in Halibel’s appearance, and she kept directing the unlimited hostility towards Subaru and Rem.

Anything standing in her way would get smashed—thus,

???: “Die.”

The invisible murderous intent becomes wind, and the attack cuts the space into the shape of a globe—the bite attack went for Halibel. A threat at the end of death that went through defenses and relentlessly devoured its target.

There was only one way to protect himself against that—don’t let the bite attack reach him.

Halibel: “…”

Halibel puts his hand inside his kimono, and he threw something at lightning speed. An object that was thrown at such a speed that no ordinary person could’ve seen it—that collides with the wind—the bite attack didn’t crunch on Halibel’s guts; it stopped at a completely different place and crunched on the thrown object.

Halibel: “It doesn’t matter if I can’t see it. My nose is extremely effective.”

???: “…”

Halibel: “Oh, but don’t get me wrong, okay? I’m a wolf of dogs, and that’s one of our important aspects.”

Halibel would always say something to relieve tension whenever he first met someone. After that, she turned her head slowly, although it wasn't as if she'd understood him, obviously.

The woman looked at Halibel with her piercing eyes, and it was the first time she looked at someone other than Subaru and Rem.

Halibel: "Oh, so you finally look this way…"

???: "Die."

Halibel: "—There."

Halibel misfires the bite attack yet again by throwing. However the woman changed the priority of her murderous attack, and fire power focused on Halibel at once.

???: "Die die die die die."

Halibel waved his arms and demolished all the murderous winds wildly fired all at once. After brushing away the first gust of wind, Halibel went, "Alright" as he gained some momentum and said,

Halibel: "It seems you took interest in me, so how about I meet your expectations!"

???: "Di—"

Halibel: "Hoho. —Which me would you like to get killed by?"

???: "…"

Halibel steps on the street with his zoris, and he roughly shook his body left and right. An irregular feeling, and footwork that was captivating in a way. Right after that, a Halibel's body shook strangely—

Halibel: "Now," [Halibel: "Which me would you like?" [Halibel: "I'm the devoted type." [Halibel: "And I'm like a bossy husband."

Subaru: "—Wha?!"

It was not the woman who raised a surprise voice upon seeing an unbelievable phenomenon, but Subaru, who was being protected in the back.

And it was just natural to do so since he saw Halibel say a bunch of words unanimously as four people.

Halibel: “By the way, my strength isn’t divided into 4ths. I’m four people, and my strength is quadrupled.”

Halibel: “I begged and begged my parents for siblings, and then more came.”

Halibel: “Sorry, that was a lie.”

Halibel: “I saw myself in the mirror and pulled them out.”

Halibel: “Sorry, that was a lie too.”

The four Halibels crossed their arms, smoked their kiserus, and randomly talked as much as they wanted.

It was like coming into a bad dream. But, the four Halibels were not just illusions.

They were all there and felt real. The four Halibels, fighting power quadrupled.

Halibel: “…”

Halibel, who did not multiply, but cloned himself. Seeing that right before her made the woman stop acting for the first time.

It was doubtful whether the continuous bite attacks would work on Halibel, who could now act as 4. The possibility of having her invisible attacks defended against and getting hit with a severe counterattack increased immediately.

Whether or not the woman still had the sense to make such calculations was unknown, however—

???: “Die.”

Halibel: "…Is that all you can say? Seems like you have some pretty complicated family circumstances."

The woman bent her knees and jumped. She easily jumps onto the roof of a building next to her, and she looked down on Halibel and the others while cracking the roof with her bare feet. The moon was in the background, not one bit of the light in her eyes weakened, and it looked so beautiful that it was beyond human understanding

Halibel, who stood as four on the ground, and the woman dressed in black with the moon behind her glared at each other.

It felt like time it was going to continue forever, but—

Subaru: "—Rem?!"

The two of them did not break the stalemate. It was Subaru, who could only be there as a spectator. Halibel looked back at Subaru, who held onto Rem as she became dead tired in his arms and his voice trembled.

Taking advantage of that chaos, the woman tries to blend in with the night sky—"

Halibel: "Sh—!"

Three of the Halibels wouldn't overlook that.

The throws attack the woman from three sides, and two of the shots were repelled by the wind. However, the third shot drawing an arc slips through the wind, and the thrown object—the kunai pierces the woman's thin back.

???: "…"

The woman gets injured, lets out a slight groan, and she tries to flee.

Halibel: "…"

Halibel sharpens his hearing and looked out for the disappeared woman's movements for a bit. There was a possibility of her taking advantage of the darkness and continuing the fight. Still, it was apparent that the woman withdrew, knowing that she was at a disadvantage.

As a result, Halibel was satisfied and—

Halibel: “Guess one should be fine for now. Anyway…”

Subaru: “Halibel! Hal-san! Rem is…!”

Halibel finally runs up to Subaru and Rem as he was called out to desperately. At the same time, his clones disappear, and he went back to his normal self like an illusion.

Still, there was no time to talk about that mysterious phenomenon. Subaru continues to desperately call out to Rem, who was dead tired in his arms.

Halibel: “Did that black girl’s attack hit her?”

Subaru: “I checked! But there are no injuries on her body! But she still fainted and…”

It was chaos. However, he was sure that Rem had no wounds. She also fainted suddenly. The woman most likely did something after she escaped to the roof.

However, it misfired, and as a result, Rem collapsed instead. And that was—

Halibel: “Maybe she casted some strange magic or something…she does feel hot. It feels unreal, but it could be an illness.”

Subaru: “…”

Halibel: “That look sure makes me feel nervous. I’ll carry her back to the tenement house…”

Subaru: “N-No, I’ll…I’ll carry her! I’ll bring her back to the tenement house…”

Subaru interrupts Halibel, who stretched his arms, and picked up

Rem as he tried to control his shaking legs. Subaru stood up, and for a just a moment, his words made Halibel ponder something in his slit eyes.

However, he quickly said, “Okay” with a deep nod.

Halibel: “Then you carry her to the tenement house. I’ll call a magic user, and we’ll meet up with you guys in your room. Use a light street with a lot of crowd to go back.”

Subaru: “Yeah, I’ll leave it to you!”

Subaru immediately began to run with Rem in his arms without any objection. He had a desperate look and his thoughts were covered with uneasiness, but he still had strength to walk. He wouldn’t run out of strength before getting to the tenement house.

Halibel looks at them go off, and he takes one deep puff of his kiseru as he said,

Halibel: “Anyhow…anyhow…”

The wolf man gives out smoke, and he ran off to the street at night, searching for a magic user.

3

—It’s all my fault.

Subaru: “Haa…haa…”

—It’s all my fault. It’s all my fault. It’s all my fault. It’s all my fault. It’s all my fault.

Subaru: “—!”

—It’s all my fault!!

Subaru: “Haa…!”

Subaru rushed to the tenement house with rough breathing, wide open eyes, and a bright red face.

He couldn't feel Rem's weight in his arms. He was just one person holding another in his arms as he ran, and yet the burning heat of the blood flowing through his body wouldn't let Subaru stop, as if it had become magma.

Subaru: "…"

He sprinted as fast as he could. Even though he tried to not shake, it still wasn't perfect. There's no way it was comfortable. And yet, Rem, who was unconscious, had not reaction. That was way too terrifying.

Magic, illness—Halibel's worries bound Subaru's mind with the chains called anxiety.

The black clothed woman that appeared—his fear of that enemy was completely disappearing from his head right now at this moment.

Being targeted with hostility, being exposed to murderous intent—they were all trivial matters.

Compared to the reality where he didn't know what was happening to this precious girl right now at this moment—

Subaru: "—Damnit!"

Subaru did not choose a direct route while dealing with his impatience; he chose the streets with the most crowds. Once he came out of the space that was unnaturally empty by crossing two streets, he saw everyday life, as if nothing had happened, and he felt everyone walking the streets at night looking at him.

A man changed his expression and ran through the street while holding onto a girl. It was a miracle that no meddlers with a weird sense of justice stopped him.

Still, he wasn't hoping for a miracle like that. Right now, there was only one wish he'd like to be blessed with.

Subaru: "Please…Rem…"

He just prays sincerely for Rem to be safe.

For her to open her eyes, call his name, and smile at him. That’s all.

If Subaru, as someone who couldn’t do anything back in that situation, had the right to shamelessly beg for a miracle, that would be the only thing he’d wish for. Nothing else.

Subaru: “…”

Subaru somehow made it back to the tenement house as he desperately prayed to the heavens. He forces the slide door open with his feet and puts down Rem in the dark room. He did not wipe his face dripping with sweat. When he turned on the light in the room, he spread a futon in a hurry, and he moved Rem onto it.

Subaru: “Rem…Rem…answer me…Rem…”

Even though he called her name, there was no response from Rem, who kept breathing painfully. With a sorrowful look, Subaru gently loosened the sash of her kimono, and he took off her sleeves. The borrowed kimono was tangled everywhere, and it seems she had dropped the hairpin that she had on her hair.

It was as if the Rem he saw this night dressed up, smiling gorgeously, was just a dream.

Subaru: “Rem…please…”

He scoops up water into a bucket and wipes Rem’s forehead and the back of her neck with a wet towel. He feels a fever from the forehead he touched. He couldn’t tell if it was a slight fever or a high fever. Currently, Subaru himself was in a condition where his anxiety and agitation wouldn’t die down, and he couldn’t say that he was at a normal body temperature.

Right now, he had no choice but to wait for Halibel to bring a magic user as soon as possible.

Even here, there was not a single thing Subaru could do.

Subaru: “Rem…”

Subaru holds onto Rem’s hand as she laid down on the futon, and he prays at the girl’s thin fingers.

Nothing happen, please. Please, wake up, I beg of you. If you could just wake up safely, smile like nothing happened, and then call my name—

Subaru: “…”

Who knows how long his praying went for. When Subaru heard a sound behind him, he was in a trance. It was the sound of a door opening. No doubt about it, Halibel had arrived with a magic user.

Hoping for that, Subaru turns around, and he was tried to say, “Take a look at Rem”—

???: “—Huh? What’s up with that pathetic look. I can’t bear to look at it.”

The woman leaning against the side door with her arms crossed says that in a contemptuous tone. That makes Subaru’s thoughts freeze completely for a moment.

It was a woman dressed in a kimono. She was wearing a pure white dress that was completely clean. She was wearing the white kimono with the right side over the left, and it looked like burial clothes. However, her dress’ hakama was shortened to the middle of her thighs, and he couldn’t find any sign of “death’s” shadow in her freely exposed long, thin legs and white skin.

The tips of her short, milky white hair were made into an uneven shaggy cut. Her sharp almond eyes were deep indigo blue. Although she had provocative facial features, they made an oddly beautiful face.

It was beauty created because it was unpolished and uneven. It was like an accidental beautiful face that was created as a result of a wild animals putting together whatever they thought was beautiful —it was an uncanny work of art made up of truly beautiful things without even being particular about beauty.

An unordinarily beautiful face that would take anyone's breath away and make them lose their sense of reality. Subaru looked at that with his very own eyes, but the woman's beauty wasn't why he stiffened up.

He had a memory of the woman's face, although vague. And it was also a very recent memory—

???: "Hello? I'm talking to you. Do you even hear me?"

Subaru: "Y-You…"

???: "Oh. You can talk after all. Can you cut that out? It freaks me out when I get ignored. Cause, you know…"

After Subaru's trembling voice made the woman open her eyes wide, she put her hands together in front of her chest. And then, she had a slight smile on her face—a ferocious smile a carnivore would have upon finding its prey, and she said,

???: "—If you die before I kill you, that would dishonor the "Shinigami" name."

Subaru: "…"

The woman—the second attack of the woman that had continued to chant death makes Subaru move on impulse

He grabs the water bucket near Rem's pillow and throws it as hard as he could at the woman. He wasn't expecting it to do damage. He just needed to keep her in check. In fact, the woman had dodged the thrown bucket and the water thrown out of it with a displeased look.

Subaru: "Ruaaa—!"

That's when Subaru tackled the woman from a low position in order to grab onto her waist. He'd have a chance if he pushed her down and got on top of her. He'd smash her head with all his might. He was going to do it. He was prepared to do that easily with all the anger and energy he had right now—

???: "—Can you not hug me just because I'm cute?"

Subaru: "Ga—?!"

The low charge at her stomach gets blocked. The woman backs away easily, and when she grabbed the back of Subaru's head with her right arm as he was bent forward, she immediately held him to the ground by brute force. Subaru's nose hits the wooden floor, and he sees sparks. His face gets crushed by such brute strength that you wouldn't believe that they were thin arms.

He grinds his teeth, and he bends the lower half of his body like a Shachihoko while having his face on the ground. He goes for the woman's head with his imperfect heel attack, and she brushed it away with her free hand in an annoyed manner. However, distracting her, even if it was just for a little bit, was good enough. He twists his body, forces the woman's hand off of his neck, and jumped up.

???: "Yuck, you're covered…in sweat!"

Subaru: "Like I care!!"

He waves his right hand and jumps at the frowning woman yet again. He kept going for the lower half of her body. At least there wasn't a clear difference in ability for standing techniques. He'd force her out of the tenement house and keep Rem away from danger, even if it was just for a little bit. Even if it really was just for a little bit.

Subaru: "—Dzu..raa!"

His spirit was superior, and he tackled the woman's waist before her arms could stop it. He holds onto her thin waist by force, throws her at the door vigorously, and she immediately rolls out of the tenement house. He instantly tried to get on her to get the upper hand, but…

???: "Don't get so cocky!"

Before the woman fell to the ground on her back, she hit Subaru's chest with her knee as he clinged to her, and the impact of her long, beautiful legs sharply pierced Subaru's body, as if gouging his intestines. He chokes, and all of his bones crack. Even if he tried to hold onto her with his arms, the structure of his human body wouldn't let him.

Subaru was the one who came off and fell to the ground. He immediately tries to get up to scratch off dirt. But the woman put her bare feet on his head and pushed it to the ground.

Subaru: "Go…o…"

???: "Don't get up, stay down. You'll dirty the air. Sweat will fly."

He lifted his arms and grabbed onto the woman's thin ankles. He strengthens his grip. She didn't budge an inch. She snorts at his resistance, and once again, she swung down her foot that she lifted easily. She crushes his nose. Twice, thrice—

Subaru: "Ka…a…"

???: "Don't touch me, pervert. I didn't come here to fool around with you. Listen. Go to sleep."

She steps on Subaru one more time for good measure, and he was silent. Seeing Subaru dead tired with his blood spreading onto the ground, the woman turns around with satisfaction, and she started to go back to the tenement house.

She said that her goal wasn't to play around with Subaru. The woman's goal was not about Subaru—

Subaru: "—What are you trying to do?"

???: "…"

Subaru was clinging onto the woman's legs while having his nose crushed and dirtying the ground with his nose blood. Dirt and blood dirty her white skin. The woman's eyes were getting colder.

???: "Get off of me."

The woman's sharp demand was frank. Her breathing sounded suspicious, and Subaru couldn't respond with words.

He just put his other arm around the woman's ankle, which he was already clinging onto with one arm, to express his intent.

???: "Look…"

The woman brushes up her hair and looks at Subaru, who stuck onto her, in dumbfoundment. And then she sighed and kneed the man who was glaring at her with his face dirty with nose blood.

???: "I said get the hell off of me."

She knees his lower jaw, and the intense impact bounces the brain inside his cranium. The cerebral concussion even makes him feel like he was losing consciousness, and he saw blood from his nasal cavity get on her dress.

He falls down. Still, he didn't let go. He was grabbing onto her, and he wouldn't let her go.

???: "You're going to die."

Subaru: "Hyaa…"

He shook his head disapprovingly. The pain…the pain was unusual; it was irritating his whole body, and his head was being affected the most.

His crushed face, kicked body, kneed lower jaw, his whole body hit by unbelievable strength was having a big chorus of pain and powerlessness.

The danger alert was going off as loud as possible, and the fear that made him feel like "death" was near makes his hands and legs go cold. His vision was blurred by either blood or tears, and his shaking was getting worse and worse.

Death was right before his eyes. The woman Subaru was grabbing onto right now was the embodiment of death. She was a Shinigami.

“Death” is scary. Terrifying. Subaru feared “death” more than anyone in this world.

Doing as the woman said and begging for forgiveness was the right move if he wanted to avoid “death” and get away.

But, but, but, he wasn’t allowed to do it. She wouldn’t let him do it. And he couldn’t do it because—

???: “—You can’t stop me. After all, you are a loser”

Subari’s resistance was all for naught; the woman started walking. She enters the tenement house without even pulling him off as if to say that he was nothing to her. She goes up, steps on the tatami mat, and heads towards Rem.

Subaru: “Gi…ga—”

He bites on the tatami mat and tries to stop her. The tatami mat tears off of the floor. He stretches his legs to a pillar and hanged onto her knee. He takes him off by force. He gets dragged along, and he resists as he scratched the tatami mat. He resists.

???: “You just don’t know when to give up, do you. You poor sport. Aren’t you ashamed of struggling so much?”

Subaru: “Oooo! Oooo!!”

???: “So unsightly! So unsightly so unsightly so unsightly! So low! So lame! Are you stupid?!”

She harms Subaru with abusive language, but he still shook his head stubbornly like a child. Subaru would try to stop the women, even if it meant bleeding, losing teeth, and having his limbs torn off.

His unreasonable stubbornness makes the woman click her tongue irritatedly—

???: “This is retribution, but it still leaves a bad taste in my mouth! I am just…”

The woman grimaces with her beautiful face and she makes it to the futon with Subaru. Then, she looks down at Rem, who was sleeping there, and turned her palm towards her.

If that palm reached Rem, her sleep would end in an undesired way. Thus, Subaru called out to her woefully—right after, the woman stopped moving.

???: "—Ah?"

The woman's mouth was wide open with her hand reached out towards Rem. She then knits her brows and takes a long look at Rem, who breathed painfully. From top to bottom, slowly.

Subaru swallows saliva with blood without knowing what that look meant.

Subaru: "What…are you…"

???: "Ahhh! Damnit! Are you serious?! This won't do! I can't do this!"

The next moment, the woman suddenly erupts, and she kicked at the tatami mat as she roughly clicked her tongue. And then, the woman shakes off Subaru, whose eyes opened wide because of her strange behavior, and he sends him flying towards the corner of the room.

Subaru: "Damni…"

Subaru's carelessness leads to her being released, and he completely regretted his mistake. He falls onto the tatami mat, immediately gets back up, and he tries to grab onto the woman. Then the woman attacked his face with her bare feet.

Subaru: "Ga…"

???: "Calm down. Good grief, what a noisy man."

With a dumbfounded look, the woman looks down on Subaru, whose shout was stopped by her kick, and he collapsed onto the tatami mat. After that, the woman points at her own nicely shaped nose as she said,

???: “Your face looks pretty ugly now. Can it be fixed?”

Subaru: “…”

???: “Sure sucks to be a human. Since if you get scarred, it stays there.”

The woman says just that, and she alternates between looking at Subaru and Rem in an annoyed manner. He could tell that the emotion in her eyes wasn’t peaceful. So, he had to get up and restrain her. However, his body wouldn’t listen to him—

???: “Time is up, huh. Guess I have to go.”

Subaru: “…”

Stricken with a sense of helplessness, Subaru gets left behind, and he hears the woman let those words out. Her eyes were not looking at Subaru and Rem, but at the open entrance. She then went towards the entrance—towards the tenement house, just like she said, without doing anything to Subaru and Rem.

Subaur: “Wai…”

???: “Just curse at your bad luck. Tremble and regret as much as possible.”

He was unable to put together the words to stop her, and he had no clue what the woman’s sharp parting remark meant.

Subaru just stayed silent, stained the tatami mat with the blood coming from his nose, and he could only watch the woman leave.

Then for a while it was just Subaru and Rem, who was breathing painfully, left in the room

Halibel: “—Su-san? Are you okay? What happened?!”

Halibel arrives late to the chaotic situation. When he was called out to by the dog face that rushed up to him, Subaru moved to breath heavily from his nose clogged with blood and his mouth as he said,

Subaru: “…Take…care of…Rem.”

Subaru says that to the wolf man taking a look, and his consciousness disappeared.

4

???: “With this, the treatment is over for now. Now you just have to rest.”

The old healing magic user says that, and he wiped off the remaining traces of blood on Subaru’s face. The old magic user actually quickly finished the treatment after he examined Subaru, who was half alive.

Because of that, he went from having wounds all over his body to having serious body bruises, and the dull pain in his nose settled down to a level where he could ignore it. Now he’d have no trouble doing the very least: “standing and walking.

Halibel: “Su-san, how are you? Think you’re good? Think you’re gonna die?”

Subaru: “When I bite with my jaw, I feel pain that feels like my body is getting joint locked, but I’m not dying somehow. Thanks. …Thanks, but…”

Halibel: “Hold it hold it. I know that you want to prioritize Rem-chan. However, you can’t just forget about your condition.”

Halibel, who shrugged his shoulders, and he forced his opinion before Subaru could, who mumbled.

Halibel had returned to the tenement house, and the one he looked at was Subaru, who had stained the tatami middle in the middle of the room with blood and fainted as he said something like a will before doing so. Rem was sleeping on a futon, and if Subaru were to debate who was having more of an emergency, unfortunately he’d have no chance of winning.

But, in Subaru's heart, he still wanted to prioritize Rem—

Halibel: "Rem-chan can't do whatever she wants, of course. However, that goes for you too. That's the decision I came to fairly with Sensei. You owe me, right? Forgive me in consideration of that."

Subaru: "Owe you…"

For letting them live in the tenement house, and for saving his life just now—he kept getting more and more indebted to Halibel. Plus, he wasn't so shameless that he'd consider worrying him as paying off his debt.

Subaru: "Okay. But apart from that, Sensei, please take care of Rem."

???: "Leave it up to me. You guys are getting in my way. Leave to the front."

The old magic user responded bluntly and waved at Subaru, who bowed his head. Following his instructions, Subaru and Halibel leave to the front of the tenement house. On the way, Halibel stretched his long arms and helped prevent Subaru from almost losing his balance because of body pain.

Halibel: "Woah. You have to be careful, Su-san. You just started recovering two minutes ago."

Subaru: "You start to worry too quickly. …But you really did save me."

Halibel: "Su-san being honest…this is just wrong. But it pains me to be thanked. After all, I really failed at predicting an attack in the tenement house."

The two of them were sitting next to each other on a bench placed in front of the tenement house. When Halibel lit his kiseru, the smoke he inhaled went out into the night sky, and he said that.

Halibel: "I didn't expect her to attack continuously. I thought that she wouldn't act for a few days."

Subaru: “It wasn’t even close to a few days. We met again within 10-20 minutes.”

Halibel: “I was really shocked when I saw you bloody in the room. I thought to myself, “I messed up by sending Su-san back home alooone. Let’s not make the same mistake next timeee.”“

Subaru: “That won’t situation won’t happen to me again.”

Halibel: “So, I was going to go attack the enemy, and then Su-san talked. I thought your heart had stopped beating. I thought you were dead.”

Subaru: “…Aah, right.”

Halibel: “…”

Halibel goes from looking at the sky to looking at Subaru’s profile. It was a brief exchange, but it was clear that Subaru’s thoughts were elsewhere. Subaru was not focused on his conversation with Halibel; he was thinking all about Rem’s well-being as she was being diagnosed in the room right behind them.

He trusted the old magic user’s skill in relation to external wounds, enough with his own body. However, Rem didn’t have external wounds. It was an illness, or perhaps—

Halibel: “I don’t think it’s magic, though I only took a glance. Incidentally, you can consider it to be different from a kind of black magic. Rest assured.”

Subaru: “How can you be so sure?”

Halibel: “Because I’m a black magic specialist. You can believe in my stamp of approval.”

Subaru: “A black magic specialist…? I can’t just let that comment slip by.”

Halibel: “There’s a long story to my past. For now, just think of it as one less thing to worry about.”

Although it was a pretty impactful reveal, Subaru didn't object to Halibel's statement. It was concerning. However, he wasn't concerned about it right now.

Just like Halibel said, that was one less possibility of a threat to Rem's life. Even if it didn't make him feel relieved, it was enough to ease his mind.

And so, they waited for a while as the smoke Halibel gave out went into the night air—

???: "—Thanks for waiting."

Subaru: "Sensei! Rem, how's Rem?!"

???: "It's night right now and there's a girl sleeping, so quiet down. —I have something to tell you. Come inside."

Showing only his face outside, the old magic user beckons Subaru to come in. Impatience and the somewhat alarming atmosphere makes Subaru catch his breath, and he slowly went back inside the room.

The room was still in its disorderly stated caused by him raging at a woman. Only the futon Rem was sleeping in was fixed nicely, and it made him feel that the old magic user was somewhat thoughtful.

???: "Hey idiot over there, put out your kiseru's fire. It'll harm her."

Halibel: "But usually you wouldn't say anything unnecessary. … Okay okay, fine I get it."

Glared at sharply, Halibel obeyed the old magic user and put out his kiseru's fire. He sat down heavily at the entrance, and Subaru's mind makes him come towards Rem's bedside. The old magic user sitting at the side opposite of Subaru beings speaking with a hoarse voice as he said, "Alright".

???: "Let's start with the good news. This girl is not unconscious because she's injured or has an illness. And I'm guessing you've heard from that idiot that it has nothing to do with a curse."

Subaru: “…Yeah.”

???: “Basically, this means there is nothing wrong with her.”

Subaru: “Huh? No wait…”

The old magic user’s statement makes Subaru’s eyes widen, as he couldn’t understand what he was saying.

He said nothing was wrong. Rem collapsed. Her breathing sounding painful. These were all true facts. Although, her breathing was calm now, perhaps because of the treatment.

Subaru: “Sensei, Rem collapsed. She was in pain. Examine her more thoroughly!”

???: “You’re an idiot, just like the one over there. You jump to conclusions too quickly. I’m not done talking.”

Halibel: “You don’t have to call people idiots…”

???: “ Quiet, idiot. And I’m going to tell this idiot something. That was the good news…now I’m going to tell you the better news.”

Subaru: “The better news?”

There wasn’t anything wrong with Rem, so what kind of unbelievable news did he have in store for him next? Subaru decided to keep silent in hopes that his next words would provide clarity.

And then, after a pause, the old magic user continued speaking to Subaru, who waited for his words.

???: “—Congratulations.”

Subaru: “Huh?”

Subaru was taken aback by the next word he said, and let out a sigh.

—He didn’t fully understanding the word “Congratulations”. Was it a name of a person? A name of a place? Whichever one it was, it was a different world proper noun that Subaru wasn't familiar with. What did it mean?

Subaru: "Um, so you're saying…Rem can be saved because of 'Congratulations'?"

???: "Hey, playboy. There might be someone who's dumber than you are."

The old magic user scratched his head with a dumbfounded look as Subaru questioned him with a stiff expression. Halibel scratched his head similarly as he went, "Well" and tried to make him see the matter his way.

Halibel: "Shouldn't you have told him in a different way? I'm not surprised that this confused him."

Subaru: "What do you mean 'confused me'?! Please just tell me! What's happening to Rem…"

Halibel: "You see, Su-san. By congratulations he means congratulations. And I congratulate you too."

Congratulations, or rather, 'congratulations': "the word that was repeated to Subaru, who was confused.

That word meant—

???: "Your wife is pregnant. It's your child."

Subaru: "Pregnant…she's pregnant?!"

The old magic user's explanation shocks Subaru as his eyes opened wide.

Pregnant, congrats, congratulations—all that goes around inside his head, beating up his brain. Subaru continued to be confused as the magic user looked at Rem with a serious expression.

???: "Don't worry about her being unconscious. She just exhausted herself so much that she became light-headed. She'll get up soon if you let her rest. Collapsing is not something that should be praised, though.”

Halibel: “She does push herself way more than your average wife, after all. We can’t learn anything from what happened tonight. That being said, this doesn’t mean that we could be completely relaxed, either.”

Halibel was murmuring about how Rem ended up exhausting so much that she fainted.

It’s true that they couldn’t learn anything from what happened tonight. They weren’t going to get attacked frequently like that. Still, it wasn’t like they had fought off the enemy; she just retreated on her own for some reason. He couldn’t possibly believe that everything was over now.

Halibel: “But she really didn’t kill you when she could have, huh.”

Just like Halibel said, the woman had plenty of chances to kill Subaru and Rem before he arrived.

She was hostile enough to make him tremble, and yet nothing happened with it. It was also true that she settled down. That’s how they escaped death by the skin of their teeth. Her true motive was still not clear at all, though.

Halibel: “—Su-san, are you okay?”

Subaru: “…Eh…ah”

Halibel taps Subaru’s shoulder, as he wouldn’t participate in the conversation, and he looks at his face. After doing all that, Subaru finally returns back to reality, and his eyes met the slit eyes in front of him.

His mind and heart were a mess with chaos and confusion.

It seemed Halibel could tell, and so when he made eye contact with the old magic user and they nodded at each other he said,

Halibel: “Su-san, we’ll be leaving for the night. The girl from earlier shouldn't come now. I have something I want to tell you, but that can wait until tomorrow. …Sensei."

???: "Let your wife sleep. You should get some rest tonight, too."

Halibel: "So that's that."

Halibel and the old magic user take turns speaking to Subaru, and he nodded at them in silence like a doll. When he made that slow movement, Halibel grabbed onto Subaru's head, and then he forced him to turn around to Rem.

Halibel: "Su-san, you have to be the first one Rem-chan sees when she wakes up. Got it?"

Subaru: "—. G-Got it."

He tells Subaru something else again, and his eyes finally vacantly settle on one place. Halibel makes sure Rem was in his black eyes, and he quietly gets up with the old magic user as they leave the room.

He was helped countless times in this night alone. Subaru really should've stood up and saw off the two of them, but he didn't have the energy to stand up, and they didn't want him to do that.

They put the fallen door back up, and the helpful guests leave the room behind. Left behind, Subaru silently reaches out for Rem's hot hand as she was lying down on the futon.

Chaos and confusion were still heavily disturbing Subaru's mind. They told him to rest, but even if Subaru was shameless enough to sleep in a situation like this, he wasn't going to be irresponsible.

First he was going to wait for Rem to wake up and make sure that she truly was safe. Subaru had to make sure of it before he could think about anything else.

Subaru: "—Rem."

Subaru shortly calls her name, and he continues to gaze at the girl's face as she slept.

Only the breathing of Subaru and Rem, the married couple, was left in the room.

5

A few hours had probably passed since then.

It was about to be the break of dawn when Rem nervously opened her eyes slightly.

Rem: "…Subaru…-kun?"

The color of the sky changes into signs of morning, and the dim light faintly shines on the room through the window. A weak light was in Rem's bright, light blue eyes in this scene that was shaded a color between black and blue.

Subaru: "—Mm. Good morning, Rem."

Rem's voice, which made it sound like she was dreaming in a way, brings Subaru back to reality.

Subaru's thoughts were engulfed in a swirl of stagnation in these past few hours he spent staring at Rem's sleeping face.

The tumultuous day, the busy banquet at night, suddenly having his life threatened on the streets at night, getting severely hurt at his own home he arrived to, the opinion of the old magic user that came afterwards, his thoughts on all of that were put on hold.

It felt like he kept having recurring thoughts, and it also felt like he kept looking away from them. In any case, he used waiting for Rem's awakening as an excuse to avoid wanting an answer

The time he could've used to run away ended, and it was now the time to face the situation.

Subaru: "Rem…umm…"

Rem blinks with her tired eyes, and she slowly moves her head while being half-awake. In the middle of doing this, she notices Subaru holding onto her hand, and she happily broke into a smile as she went, “Hehe”.

Rem: “What’s wrong, Subaru-kun? You were holding my hand while I was sleeping…”

Rem’s flower-like smile slowly stiffens, and she starts to open her eyes. Her consciousness gets freed from the cage of slumber, she puts her thoughts in order as the memory of last night came back to her vividly.

Rem holds onto Subaru’s hand harder, and when she sat up in a panic she said,

Rem: “S-Subaru-kun, are you injured?! I fainted, and then…aah, why…”

Subaru: “Calm down, Rem. I’m fine. And I don’t…have any injuries now.”

Subaru hid the second disaster that happened in the tenement house, although he did hesitate a bit.

If he made it clearer, the traces of Subaru getting physically abused in the room would become noticeable. However, she wouldn’t be able to tell with the current dimness anyway. It was okay to cover it up, just for this moment.

Fortunately, Subaru’s reply didn’t make Rem suspect any chaos, and she was relieved.

Rem: “Thank goodness. If anything happened to Subaru-kun after that, I would be very…”

Subaru: “I hate to admit it, but it’s all thanks to Hal-san…to Halibel. He fought off that suspicious person.”

Rem: “Oh, I see. Halibel-sama did. I’ll have to thank him later.”

It seemed that her memory was clear to a certain extent, and that she remembered Halibel coming in to help. In fact, it seemed like Rem clearly remembered things that happened up to the point where she was about to faint.

Once she closed her lips tightly, she continued with a, "So" as she said,

Rem: "What happened to me…"

Subaru: "You…"

Rem: "What I remember is that Halibel-sama showed up, and then I focused on my forehead to protect you as much as possible. However, that's when my consciousness faded away and…"

With her free hand, Rem touches her forehead—the spot where her horn appears, and she knits her thin brows. Her poor condition and fainting—Rem had no idea what was the cause of those things.

Rem: "I've never fainted like that before…umm, I'm sorry."

Subaru: "Y-You don't need to apologize. I should be the one doing that. You're always saving me…I wasn't able to move promptly in a time like that…that was really pathetic of me."

Rem: "No, that's not true…"

Rem's apologetic attitude hurts him inside. Subaru shakes his head at her apology, and harshly condemned himself.

He could not be afraid anymore, and that also went for the powerlessness and cowardice he described to her. He was being spoiled by Rem's feeling of guilt and delaying important news for as long as possible.

After confirming Rem's safety, his thoughts would move one step forward—he had to move forward.

Subaru: "Rem, listen. The truth is that you were examined by a magic user. After you suddenly collapsed."

Rem: "—Okay."

Subaru had a determined look, and Rem nodded with seemingly stiff cheeks.

With a serious look, he told her that she was examined by a doctor. It was natural for her to be nervous. However, Subaru, with how he was right now, really did not have the composure to show concern for her nervousness.

He hesitated many times, and wet his dry lips. Seeing Subaru do that, Rem closed her eyes as she said,

Rem: “Subaru-kun, please let it out. Whatever the truth is, I’ll accept it.”

Subaru: “…Ah”

Rem: “Even if it’s that I don’t have much time left, I’d like to spend it with Subaru-kun and…”

Subaru: “—Apparently, you’re pregnant.”

He interrupts her with that.

Rem: “Huh?”

He’s going to let me know that I have a serious illness. Rem was preparing herself for something like that, and so she was taken aback.

Rem opens her eyes, and she was looking at Subaru in dumbfoundment. Subaru nods at her, forgets about the dryness of his lips, pushes away his hesitation, and repeats himself.

Subaru: “Rem, you have a baby inside of you. —A child, and it’s ours.”

Rem: “…”

Hearing those repeated words, with her eyes wide open, Rem rubs her stomach with her hand that Subaru wasn’t holding onto. She still couldn’t tell with how it looked. It could be a misdiagnosis. That’s how unreal it felt.

A new life was inside of Rem. And it was theirs.

Subaru: “Were there any signs? Something that seemed weird.”

Rem: “I had…a slight fever…for a bit…I just thought that maybe I was tired. After finally settling in one town and being relieved, my body was tired…that’s what I thought.”

Rem answers Subaru’s awkward question while choking.

He was bothered by the fact that Rem didn’t tell him about the noticeable symptoms of her slight fever, but he understood how she felt. It was when their lives were finally starting to settle down. She didn’t want to use her poor health as a reason to interrupt that. Subaru would’ve done the same thing if he was in her position.

Rem: “A child…inside of me…a child. Subaru-kun’s…and mine…”

Subaru: “You fainted because you’ve been acting different. You’re in this condition where you get tired more easily than usual, and you’ve been getting exposed to tanger, getting tense, exhausted…”

Rem: “I-I’m sorry.”

Subaru: “Like I said, you don’t have to apologize. I’ve always been the one who should be apologizing.”

He made Rem overwork herself, which he shouldn’t have done.

Even though he didn’t know that she was pregnant, that was no excuse. He selfishly brought Rem with him, and he was a burden to her because of his own incompetence.

They did not finally have an everyday life; even a dangerous situation like that was just like how they were before.

Subaru: “…”

He couldn’t forgive himself for that. The one who couldn’t even move in his last moment. The weak one who couldn’t even accomplish his goal of not letting that person get close to Rem and was saved just because she was fickle.

The one who was always hurting Rem, Natsuki Subaru—.

Rem: “Subaru-kun…umm”

Subaru: “What is it?”

The hesitation in Rem’s words becomes clear. Subaru notices her agitation, and he spoke as kindly as possible with his voice to get her to relax.

As he did, he had only one thing in his mind, which was that he wanted keep her away from him after all the times he’s hurt her.

Rem nervously beings to talk to Subaru as he felt that way.

Rem: “Subaru-kun…what do…you think?”

Subaru: “What do I…by that do you mean…”

Rem: “We…have…a ch-child…about that, do…”

“You regret it?”. —Her next words were probably going to be something like that.

Rem’s weakness for not saying it and his own stupidity for making her say it make Subaru tremble, as if he was struck by thunder.

He was an idiot. A complete idiot. There should’ve been other things he had to say to her other than the fact that there was a baby inside of her at this moment and that they were blessed with a child. There were things, but he was such an idiot.

Subaru: “I…”

Subaru speaks reflexively, and that’s when he had trouble putting it into words. Rem’s watery eyes were sincerely staring straight at Subaru, waiting for his answer.

Doing something like saying a thoughtless statement on the spur of the moment would be unacceptable. Now was the time to make his frozen thoughts move again in front of Rem and ask his mind a question.

—The new life inside Rem is Natsuki Subaru’s.

The first emotions he felt when he imagined seriously facing their new life that was growing.

That was—

Subaru: “Let’s…see. —I think I like it and I’m glad.”

Rem: “…”

Subaru: “We have a child…a baby. And that…makes me…”

He faces the first, the very first deep emotions he had.

He felt surprised. He also felt anxious. But, more importantly, he felt passion. Natsuki Subaru defined that passion welling up in him as the first time he learned what it meant to be glad.

Subaru was happy to have a child with a girl so precious to him.

Subaru: “—Rem!}

Rem: “Fua?!”

Subaru gives in to the urge hurting his chest, and he hugs Rem without thinking.

That sudden action surprises Rem, and the warmth she felt from Subaru, who was very close to her, makes her goggle in astonishment. Subaru brings his lips near her ears, and with everything he felt, he said,

Subaru: “Thank you, Rem. —Thank you. Thank you, Rem.”

Rem: “Subaru…-ku…”

Subaru: “I’m so happy. We have a kid…a family.”

Rem: “—Ah”

Subaru cleared away his anxiety about the distant future, acted on the impulse he felt at this moment, and all of his words were his true feelings.

He had a baby with Rem. The two people who lived in Kararagi and called themselves a married couple, although it was just for form's sake—they were going to become a true family.

Rem: "Oo…foo…"

Being hugged, Rem nervously put her arms around Subaru's back. While hugging each other on the futon, Rem lets out a voice from her lips that sounded like crying.

It had to be the relief brought by the needle of his words breaking up the anxiety that had been growing endlessly.

Subaru: "Thank you, Rem."

Rem: "N-No…no, wait. I'm the one that should be…"

Subaru: "Thank you, Rem."

Still hugging each other, Subaru expresses his gratitude again to Rem, who let out a sob. When Rem accepted it, her throat clogs up, and warm tears fell down from her eyes.

The intense impulse inside Subaru's chest naturally goes to his throat, and then into his eyes, spreading all through his body, and he begins to shake.

Subaru: "Ah…haha…hahaha…"

He tries to hide it before that impulse turned into tears and then into sobbing. His laughter was also shaky, and as a result, he couldn't hide anything anymore, though.

This was the moment where he just simply wanted to share the joy of being blessed with life as a married couple.

Because even if there were still things he had to think about, anxiety, and danger—

Rem: "Subaru-kun, thank you. —I love you."

Subaru's gratitude and Rem's confession were, without a doubt, real.

Chapter 3:
3 Months (2)

1

Halibel: “—Still, that really surprised me. My heart almost stopped beating again.”

Subaru: “About that…”

Rem: “We’re sorry for troubling you.”

Subaru and Rem were the ones who bowed their heads side by side in the room as it approached dawn. In front of them, it was Halibel who was making them apologize as he nodded calmly.

He puts his hand inside his kimono, moves his eyes while he scratched his chest, and stared at the wall of the room with human made dents and cracks. At the very least, these marks weren’t there last night.

Habliel: “What’s up with all that?”

Subaru: “They’re the result of a ceremony to confirm a married couple being blessed with a new life…maybe.”

Rem: “I’m sorry. I couldn’t control myself very well, I guess because I was so confused.”

Subaru wiped his face with a towel, while Rem hung her head, showing regret.

In short, the dents in the wall were from Subaru crashing into it, and Rem was the one who made that happen. It happened right after she was told that she was pregnant and they shared the joy of being blessed with a child.

Subaru: “Yesterday was the continuance of shocking events. I wanted to make sure that having a child wasn’t just a dream, so I asked Rem to hit me a little hard, and then that happened.”

Rem: “shrug”

Halibel: “…Well, I’m just glad you didn’t die because of it. I wouldn’t really be able to rest in peace if you did.”

Halibel comments on the married couple’s unusual sort of way they talked about their happiness with each other, and he looked away from the wall’s dents. After that, he slightly opened one of his slit eyes as he said,

Halibel: “Anyway, let’s talk about the cost of repairs for the wall later…”

Subaru: “Later?”

Halibel: “I have something I need to talk to you about, although it’s nothing big.”

Halibel, sitting crossed legged on the tatami mat, started talking as he shook the kiseru in his mouth up and down.

The way he entered the topic sort of made the nervousness from last night return to Subaru. Rem’s hit filled with love proved that the tumultuous series of events wasn’t just a dream.

In short, all of it wasn’t just a dream, including what Halibel did last night.

Halibel: “In short, saying that I’m a “Playboy” as a tenement house manager was just a disguise.”

Halibel confidently made a confession about himself, as if supporting Subaru’s thoughts. The first major event that happened in the morning, continuing from last night. There seemed to be a serious light in Halibel’s eyes—

Subaru: “Wait, no there isn’t. And he isn’t even apologetic.”

Halibel: “Why would I need to be apologetic? I didn’t do anything wrong, and I also protected you guys.”

After saying that there was more to it, Halibel responded to Subaru like he always would. It was very like him to be aloof and go at his own pace. He just accepted that, since he could even be confusing by suddenly starting to use an authoritative tone, like his personality had changed.

Anyhow, while Subaru fixed the position of Rem's futon blanket cover as she reflected upon herself, he said,

Subaru: "So about why you came out with that revealing, shocking truth…"

Rem: "Sorry, Halibel-sama. I, uh, kind of figured."

Halibel: "Whaaat! How embarrassing! If you did, then that's really embarrassing! How embarrassing!"

Subaru's eyes were half-open, while Rem's eyes looked down awkwardly. Listening to their replies, Halibel looks up at the ceiling, and he sighed dramatically as he opened his big mouth and said, "God daaaamn it."

Subaru: "Hold on. You sigh stuff like, "God damn it", but aren't you said to be famous? Actually, I did sort of figure judging from the reactions of people around you, but you didn't even try to hide your name. So, being found out and being troubled are things you brought upon yourself."

Rem: "I also heard a lot about Halibel-sama "The Great"……so I thought you were testing us at first when you said that you were a tenement house manager."

Halibel: "Ah, so I've been found out since the beginning. Woe is me…"

Subaru: "Woe is not you."

Subaru just now realizes that he had been left in the dark by the two of them as he made that joke.

How anxious did Rem feel for not telling even Subaru that they had suddenly met Kararagi's strongest on the first day they moved? He was pathetic for being unaware of how much Rem had struggled, despite having peaceful days in this town.

Subaru: “You should’ve told me. Rem, why did you carry the burden all by yourself?”

Rem: “Subaru-kun…”

Rem is always like this. She always sacrifices herself more than others. Even though they were living together now, she sacrifices herself for Subaru.

That’s why she put the burden on herself until the situation came to light, yet again.

Rem: “I’m sorry. I didn’t know Halibel-sama’s true motive and…”

Subaru: “And?”

Rem: “And you’re terrible at lying. I didn’t want to provoke Halibel-sama since it’d show in your behavior if I carelessly told you about his identity…”

Subaru: “So you thought very realistically and didn’t trust me!”

Subaru gets showered with Rem’s sharp words again and again, and so he raises his voice. Seeing Subaru do that, Rem waved her hands in a panic as she said, “Oh, you’ve got it wrong.”

Rem: “I do trust Subaru-kun. Really, words are not enough for me to describe how much I trust you. However, trusting you and making you do something you’re incapable of doing are two different matters.”

Halibel: “The more you speak the more I feel bad for Su-san, so let’s leave it at that, shall we?”

Rem tells her realistic opinion without hesitation as she put her unlimited love and trust into words.

In actuality, Rem was right to be concerned. Subaru wasn’t so sure that he’d interacted with Halibel in the same way after she’d told him about his nickname.

Still, there was something he had to confirm in order for him to be convinced.

Subaru: “This may be a basic question, but is Hal-san really the strongest person in Kararagi? You sure it’s not someone else in your family, or a good little twin brother?”

Rem: “About that…sorry. I’m not completely sure.”

Halibel: “I’m in a bit of an awkward position now that you’ve apologized for that.”

Rem apologizes in response to Subaru’s meaningless point, and it hurt Halibel.

Halibel: “I mean, do you have a problem with me being the strongest or something? Listen, I am the strongest. Or is the the kind of thing where you love the same old me too much, and not the real me?”

Subaru: “It’s not something disgusting like that. It’s something more idealistic. A strong person should have a strong person’s personality, something like that.”

Halibel: “Now you’re just insulting me!”

Halibel raised his voice unexpectedly because of Subaru’s reasoning. Still, somehow he was Kararagi city-state’s strongest—he was the strongest in one of the four large countries.

Of course, he’d like him to have a fitting character. Like how that “Sword Saint” Reinhard van Astra is an overwhelming warrior in the Lugunica kingdom.

Subaru: “…Well, I guess that’s just me being sentimental.”

Halibel: “It’s not like I don’t see your point, but this is what I’ve been doing for a long time. To be honest, I don’t care that much about being known as the strongest…and I don’t understand being proud by being strong in a head-on fight and having confidence.”

He skillfully moves the kiseru in his mouth and draws a circle at the tip. Halibel's attitude makes Subaru knit his brows, and he tilted his head as he said, "Being strong in a head-on fight?"

Halibel: "I'm a shinobi warrior. My specialty is attacking around my opponent's weak points. Oh, but the details on how we fight are classified information. It'd endanger our existence. Sorry, we're all mostly dead now, besides me."

Subaru: "I don't really get your joke on getting wiped out. Also, a 'shinobi'…"

Haibel: "Oh, people from outside the country might not understand it. As for 'shinobi', it's like 'that'. Like, how could I put this? They're 'that'. It's a job where it'd be bad if I explained 'that' part."

Rem: "You haven't been specific about anything…"

Rem mercilessly casts aside Halibel's explanation that lacked the main point. Forgetting about the two of them, Subaru was correctly connecting shinobi with "shinobu" inside of his head—in other words, he connected it with ninja.

He went from being astonished by the existence of wasou and wafuu culture, from katanas to chopsticks, and now finally even ninjas. Because of this, Subaru didn't have trouble understanding it. He didn't, but because of that, Halibel's confession now had a different meaning.

He was obscuring various parts of his confession by joking, but there was some truth in his main point.

—That is, there was going to be some catch after finding out that he was a ninja.

Subaru: "…"

Halibel: "Su-san, you look pale, are you okay?"

Subaru: "What do you want from us?"

Subaru, cheeks stiffening with caution and nervousness, questioned Halibel, who sat cross-legged. Next to him, Rem also gets affected by the nervousness, and she gripped tight onto the futon blanket cover. Halibel could become a foe or an ally, depending on how he acts next.

And if he turned into their enemy, Subaru would have no chance of winning while holding Rem as she was pregnant.

Halibel: “If, say, in this situation, I said your lives—what would you do?”

Subaru: “I would…”

Halibel: “…”

Subaru: “I would make excuses and say that we’ve been neighbors all this time, Rem and I are newlyweds, she’s pregnant, and I’d shamelessly beg for our lives in desperation, appealing to your emotions…probably.”

Halibel: “I see.”

Subaru’s voice and facial expression were truly serious, and that was his reply to Halibel’s question. After that, Halibel sighed, and his eyes open just slightly in surprise.

However, Rem, who listened to the same declaration Halibel heard, smiled at Subaru’s reply. She reached out for her husband and held onto his free hand as proof of her trust.

Halibel sees the two of them unite like that, and he changed the way he held onto the kiseru with his hands.

And then—

Halibel: “—Wahahaha! S-Su-san’s so lame! So uncool! Making that face in front of your wife, “appeal to my emotions”……ahahah!”

Subaru: “You’re laughing way too much!”

Halibel: “O-Of course I’d…I’d laugh…ahh, hah…hah…hah…I’m gonna die of laughter…! S-So this is what you were trying to do… an ingenious scheme!”

Subaru: “That’s groundless, and I did reply seriously.”

Halibel: “I know I know.”

After laughing his ass off, Halibel wiped away the tears he had from laughing too hard. Then, being looked at by Subaru’s displeased eyes, the wolf man raises his hands as he said,

Halibel: “Hahh, man that cracked me up. Sorry for laughing. But, you can relax. The hypothetical situation was absolutely hypothetical. After all, even if I really did have a job where I’d get in trouble for getting found out, it would be horrible to act without changing my name.”

Subaru: “Th-That’s true.”

Halibel: “Besides, it would be too counterproductive of me to get rid of someone I saved. If I was going to do that, I might as well not have bothered saving you yesterday.”

Subaru: “…”

He touches on the attack that happened last night, making Subaru tremble as he remembered the predicament.

In truth, if Halibel hadn’t come, Subaru wouldn’t be alive right now. The baby inside of Rem wouldn’t be alive, either. On top of that, the baby would have been lost without them ever finding out about its existence—

Subaru: “I’m really sorry for saying this so late. Hal-san…Halibel-san, thanks a lot for yesterday. You are lifesaver. You saved me, Rem, and the baby inside of her.”

Rem: “Please let me thank you too. Thanks to you, we didn’t end up losing our, erm, child. Thank you very much.”

Halibel: “Wooow, how sincere. I’ll gratefully accept your thanks since it makes me happy, though.”

Seeing Subaru and Rem quickly bow their heads, Halibel cheerfully smiled. However, after that, while still having a smile on his face, he pointed the kiseru in his hand at Subaru as he said,

Halibel: “Okay, I accept your thanks. Still, you gotta quit it with that discomforting speech. It’s really embarrassing for Su-san to call me Halibel-san at this point. Rem-chan you too. If you could stop with the ‘Halibel-sama’ stuff now and be more informal with me, that’d make me happy.”

Subaru: “…Yeah, got it. Thanks, Hal-san.”

Rem: “I’ll see what I can do, Halibel-sama.”

Halibel: “Your wife sure is stubborn!”

Halibel raises his hands to surrender to Rem, who stubbornly insisted on keeping the honorific. Then, Halibel lit the kiseru that he held with his raised hands, and he put it in his mouth. He then smokes it.

Once Subaru saw the rising smoke, he made a sour look.

Subaru: “Hal-san. Tobacco can harm a pregnant woman’s body, so from now on, smoking is forbidden in this house.”

Halibel: “Ohh, don’t worry about it. Mine has no tobacco, unlike a normal kiseru. Mine is like medicine. It’s used by shinobis.”

Rem: “Medicine, you say?”

Halibel: “Yes. If I don’t smoke this regularly, I’ll die. Hahh, and then we’d all be wiped out.”

Subaru: “There you go again with jokes on getting wiped out…!”

His excuse sounded like a joke, but the wafting smell of the smoke made Subaru think otherwise. The smell of the smoke Halibel put out certainly was different from what you’d call tobacco, although Subaru wasn’t very knowledgable about it. It did not have the smell of tobacco, but the smell of medicine—but it’s not like that’d be good for a mother’s body, either.

Subaru: “Anyway, refrain from doing it when Rem’s here. If there’s ever a time when you're torn between decisions, you could help our child out by bravely dying out."

Halibel: "You just said that I'm a lifesaver though!"

Subaru: "Being a lifesaver and being a smoker are two different matters. Go do it by the window."

Halibel gets sent from the middle of the tatami mat to the side, and he gives out smoke out the window while being sulky. And then, with his slit eyes, he looked at Subaru, who protected his wife and child, and said,

Halibel: "Putting the matter of the child aside as something to be handled by the husband and wife…let's talk a little more about last night, shall we."

Subaru: "Mm, alright."

Halibel: "So, first I want you tell me about that person from last night. Do you have any idea who that girl is?"

Subaru: "…"

He starts talking about last night, and Subaru hesitates to answer his question about knowing who the culprit is.

He'd never seen that woman with a blade-like presence before. They truly weren't acquaintances. Still, it wasn't like he had no idea why she'd attack them.

The woman was clearly going after Subaru and Rem. This wasn't like something where they were unluckily dragged into an indiscriminate attack, since they were attacked not once, but twice, and she chased them all the way to the tenement house.

There could only be one reason as to why they were being chased someone with such bloodlust—it had to be because Subaru and Rem were living alone together.

Subaru: "Wi…"

Halibel: “Wi?”

Subaru moves his stiff cheeks and his lips, and he tries to touch on who she might be. However, the fear Subaru should’ve forgotten about returns, and it continued to tear his mind apart as he tried to open the cover to his memory.

—Actually, he didn’t forget it. He had never forgotten about it.

The fear was still coiled around Natsuki Subaru as the chains of regret.

Subaru: “…”

Even the two letters of the words he tried to speak were unbearable for his tongue.

Seeing Subaru act like that, Halibel impatiently played with his whiskers with his fingers. And then,

Rem: “—Subaru-kun, last night’s culprit isn’t who you think it is.”

Subaru: “Rem?”

Rem: “I know what you were feeling and what you were thinking just now. And I don’t think you’re right…yes, that’s what I’ll say.”

There was an unexpected difference in their opinions. Subaru instead opened his eyes wide at Rem, who made that statement. She nods at Subaru, and Halibel gave him a serious look.

He takes that look head on, and Halibel slightly opened one of his eyes as he said,

Halibel: “You shouldn’t lie to take care of Su-san. I know this doesn’t sound convincing coming from someone who calls himself a playboy, but we aren’t playing around here. This is a life-threatening matter.”

Rem: “I’m not lying. I…I have the nose to sniff out that enemy. I couldn’t sense it in the person from last night. So, the culprit is not related to what he thinks.”

Halibel: "—. How reliable is your nose?"

Rem: "I'm able to be with Subaru-kun right now because of my nose."

Those words did not justify anything. Still, they were declared so confidently that it didn't feel that way. As a result, Halibel's reacted a little late.

Meanwhile, Rem brought Subaru's arms towards her, and she hugged them firmly.

Rem: "Here's proof."

Halibel: "Su-san and Rem-chan sure are quite the…troubling neighbors."

Subaru: "…Says the guy who hid his identity."

Halibel: "I wasn't able to hide it, though. But, you got a point. Then I guess we're neighbors in the same boat. We're friends at this tenement house, so let's get along and work together."

Halibel suddenly smiles, and he faced the two people who were close to each other as he suggested to work together. His words surprise Subaru, and then Rem and him look at each other. They didn't understand his true motive.

Kararagi's strongest was going to help them in this situation where they had no allies and were being targeted by an enemy of unknown affiliation. It was a charming proposal, but he still wanted to know Halibel's intentions before jumping at it.

What did he have to gain from supporting Subaru and Rem in this situation?

Subaru: "I don't get why you'd help us out so much…"

Halibel: "Don't stress over complicated things. Elder asked me to take care of you guys, and plus you have no friends. Fussing over pros and cons is a part of Kararagi, however losing friends is an extraordinarily heavy loss. Isn't it just natural for me to act so that I don't lose any?"

Halibel says that, and he makes a gesture that looked like a wink as he normally would. He wasn't completely sure if it was a wink because both of his eyes were always squinted like slit eyes.

Everything about his behavior lacks seriousness, and so it didn't feel like there was an ulterior motive behind him doing it. Everything about Halibel's character is aloof, and that makes him who he is.

That's exactly why he believed him and why he didn't think he was just telling a lie he'd like to hear.

Subaru: "I understand. Thanks a lot for saying that. We're going to rely on you so much."

Halibel: "Yep, depend on me as much as you want. Once you become parents, you won't be able to whine with the child there anyway. Now's the time to depend on me before that happens."

Subaru felt temporarily relief, saved by his generous response. Once Halibel nodded at Subaru, who was finally relieved, he continued by saying, "Still."

Halibel: "We have no idea who the culprit is—that's our biggest problem."

Subaru: "About that, how about you make around 1000 clones and overpower her by sheer force of numbers?"

Halibel: "You truly are going to depend on me a lot, huh…Also, cloning is pretty much my trump card. I can't just use it recklessly. 1000 clones is impossible, and I'm bluffing pretty hard when I'm four."

Subaru: "How about your sense of smell as a wolf? Maybe you can go after the culprit's smell or something with that."

Halibel: "About thaaat, I did try it."

Halibel snorted at Subaru, who had his clone tactic rejected and suggested an alternate plan. As he moved around his black nose and sniffed he said,

Halibel: “How strange. I can’t smell that girl’s scent anymore. If you want to escape my nose, you have to get rid of your scent pretty carefully…I guess she’s just that skilled.”

Subaru: “This mean she’s taken countermeasures against Hal-san.”

In this situation, what’s terrifying is that woman’s meticulous planning.

In regards to the sequence of events of last night, Halibel becoming Subaru and Rem’s ally was still unconfirmed information. However, the woman perfectly prepared for that uncertain factor, and she attacked.

A night attack after people were cleared from the street, and a surprise attack where she came after him at the tenement house—in a way, both of these attacks weren’t matching in meticulousness, especially in the latter event where they exchanged some words to a certain extent.

Halibel: “Basically, right now we’ll just have to wait and see. No unnecessary sacrifices will be made this way, although I did talk about this with the town’s policeman just in case. It’d be problematic if the town became covered in bodies after picking a fight carelessly.”

Subaru: “It makes sense to clear out people. You think they’ll find her?”

Rem: “You shouldn’t expect much, I think. I should just take the initiative and act.”

Subaru: “You absolutely mustn’t do that.”

Subaru rejected Rem’s frail opinion with powerful words.

Although there still weren’t any changes showing in her appearance, Rem was pregnant. He wasn’t going to allow her to overwork herself. He even wanted to make her take a break from her job at Temple Elementary School and rest at the house.

Then, Subaru suddenly had a realization.

Subaru: “…Crap. What am I going to do about work?”

Rem: “I have to go to Temple Elementary School too.”

Subaru and Rem, who were focused on the conversation, notice that it’s right around the time to leave for work, and their faces became pale.

This was a critical moment for Subaru if he wanted to keep his job, and of course, it also was for Rem, who was a fulltime worker. Absences from work without notice were inexcusable; ICD—inform, contact, discuss—is essential for a working adult.

Halibel: “Ahh, should you really be worry about that right now?”

Subaru: “Don’t be stupid. Don’t lump me with you when you have unearned income. Were going to eat, whether or not there is an enemy. Money is needed in order for us to eat. We aren’t going to miss anything in our daily life.”

Subaru talked back to Halibel, who acted shocked, and he continued with a, “Besides.”

Subaru: “This is frustrating. It’s so outrageous how this keeps messing with the flow of our lives even though it’s all her fault. I’m not just going to sit back and let this happen.”

Halibel: “…”

Their daily lives were still waiting after the reasonable attacks by the enemy and repelling danger. Subaru and the others had lives to live even after their eventful story.

Therefore, he absolutely couldn’t stand breaking down what they’d built up.

Subaru: “Plus, we have a tight family budget.”

Rem: “And we’re going to have one more member, so we need to save up.”

Halibel: “What kind of threat is this?! You two truly are a ridiculous married couple.”

They used their lives and their new life as an excuse, and Halibel went into deep thought with a troubled look. The two of them were firmly determined. Understanding that, Halibel let out a deep sigh with his big mouth.

Halibel: “The enemy probably won’t attack today or tomorrow for now.”

Subaru: “What makes you say that?”

Halibel: “She took countermeasures while considering my nose, right? I came to this conclusion because I don’t think that she’d rush it and make a mistake.”

Rem: “I think he has a point.”

Rem also agreed with Halibel, who raised a finger. Subaru was convinced too as he said, “I see.”

They were thinking that the enemy wouldn’t do anything without enough preparation, precisely because she is smart. You could say that they trusted her meticulous style, although it wasn’t very fitting for someone who’d hurt him so much.

As long as they followed the twisted trust that came from the right track—

Halibel: “I’ll stay with Rem-chan for today. That way, Su-san can also relax, and the doctor from yesterday can come too once it becomes fire time.”

Subaru: “…Got it. I’ll go to the palace and talk with Riften-san and the landlady. I’ll tell Temple Elementary School that Rem will be taking a day off, too.”

Rem: “…Yes. It’s unfortunate, but please do.”

Although Rem seemed bummed out, she nodded in agreement with Subaru’s plan without opposing it.

As for Subaru's job, he had no choice but to reveal the situation and wait for Riften and the landlady's decision. It was depressing how the hinted path to being promoted to a full-time employee was undoubtedly far away, though.

However, once Rem moved forward in stages of pregnancy, she'd no longer be able to work at Temple Elementary School without being hindered by the enemy. That alone was a sure fact.

Rem: "Please let me continue for as long as possible, Subaru-kun."

Subaru: "…We'll have to have a good talk about that, too."

Rem: "Okay"

It was now Subaru's turn to support Rem, as she was dealing with two problems—her job, and pregnancy. So that no other agonizing things would torment Rem's heart, even if they were justifiable.

Subaru: "Alright, although it's extremely hard for me to do this…I think…I'm gonna…go to work…!"

Halibel: "You should just quit if it's so hard for you."

Subaru: "Don't just say that so casually, undeserving noble. I'm going to be 'that', you know. From now on, I'm going to be the provider of my family."

He says that and somehow stands up after almost getting smashed by the weight of being a provider.

That…that's right. Rem has a baby. Subaru's going to be a father.

He's going to become the provider in order to protect this place called the Natsuki home.

—These were the thoughts weighing very very heavily on Subaru.

Rem: "Take care, Subaru-kun. I'll be waiting for you to come back home."

Subaru: "—Yep, I'm off now."

Rem, smiling slightly, gently relieves the pressure and reluctance Subaru had, and she sees him off. After that, Subaru took a deep breath, and then he goes towards the tenement house exit. He put his hand on the door, and he finally turned around.

Subaru: “Hal-san, please take care of Rem, seriously. If something happens, please sacrifice yourself.”

Halibel: “I never had a talent for dodging attacks, mind you.”

He waves, makes sure Halibel promised him, and he left.

The wind was cold, and the rising morning sun was slowly starting to brightly shine on the town of Banan.

Subaru: “So bright.”

He probably thought that the morning sun was brighter than usual because of his current state of mind.

While thinking that way, Subaru started walking towards his workplace to fulfill his duty.

2

—The turmoil that continued from last night—this series of events shocked Subaru significantly.

It was hinted that he’d be promoted to a full-time employee at his workplace, and then his life was threatened by an unfamiliar enemy on the streets at night. Once he got home, he was nearly killed by the enemy that followed him, and lastly, Rem’s pregnancy was revealed.

Honestly, the good and bad major events were too much for a single day. He even wanted to complain.

Still, there were plenty of happy realizations that happened because of the major events continuing.

—First and foremost, there was celebrating Rem being pregnant. That was a huge deal.

As usual with many men, the shock from unexpectedly finding out one's partner is pregnant is immeasurable. Subaru also was so shocked that he couldn't even tell that his surprise was surprise.

However, after the first wave of shock subsided, pure joy as well as gratitude towards Rem were left in Subaru's mind, so he was happy about it himself.

Children should be loved by their parents and born with joy and blessings.

Even though Subaru knew that this rule didn't apply to all children, he wanted to believe in the ideal. Or at least, Subaru was raised in such a way that made him believe in it.

That's why he wanted to love his child. He believed that being loved brings happiness.

That being said, always being worried about not being prepared enough is an entirely different matter.

—And then there was the second realization; they realized they were blessed with the people around them.

First of all, they were able to settle down in Banan town thanks to the connection they made with the person they had met on their journey. News got around, they made connections with Halibel, and then that led to them escaping death by the skin of their teeth last night as well as his help this morning.

And then he even realized it in Temple Elementary School when he came to tell them that Rem would be absent from work.

???: "—Pregnant! Really! Wow, that's great!"

Subaru was blessed so much by the Temple Elementary School staff that he was the one who behaved modestly.

Frankly, it was a personal affair of a newcomer. He prepared himself for insults like, "The new female teacher doesn't know how to responsibly separate her private life from her job!" but it wasn't anything to worry about.

Another teacher covered for her absence, and he was told that a higher-up would talk about what would happen from here on out. He did nothing but thank them. In an unexpected way, he found out about his wife's popularity at her workplace, and it made him proud as a husband.

That's how things didn't go as he expected in a good way, and then Subaru went to his own workplace.

He had to tell his employer Riften and the landlady superior about the situation and discuss what they'd do from here on out. Of course, this was a personal issue. Subaru was planning on discussing it when the opportunity came.

He was going to, but—

???: "—Subaru-chan, your wife is pregnant?"

All his enthusiasm went to waste, as it seemed they'd already heard about it from someone somewhere. For some reason, in the palace it was already well known that Rem was pregnant, seeing how he was plied with questions at once.

His memory on what happened after that wasn't very clear, but it did end with a warm conclusion of, "Ooh, Subaru-chan may have a childish look, but I guess he really does get some, too."

After that, he did have another opportunity to have a discussion with Riften.

Riften: "I heard about your situation. That's a pretty tough spot to be in."

Subaru: "Y-Yes…sorry. I've troubled Master with my private life…"

Riften: "What? I don't think it's a bother or anything. A new life means the birth of a new client."

Subaru: "You are so open-minded."

He reveals the situation to Riften in the tearoom, and the way he accepted it dumbfounded him, rather than surprised him.

Seeing Subaru react like that, Riften continued speaking as he said, “Also.”

Riften: “I heard about what happened last night from Mr. Halibel. If there’s anything on your mind, feel free to talk about it. The ladies and I will listen to what you have to say.”

Subaru: “Well…I, uh, appreciate it. However, why are you doing this?”

Riften: “Why am I being so nice? I told you, I have high hopes for you. I invested the asset hope in you. Of course I’d try everything so that I could recover my shares.”

Subaru’s extremely understanding workplace and his employer’s powerful words were starting to move him to tears. However, it was too pathetic of him to look like that. He was being spoiled too much.

Riften: “I’m sure that the ladies will respond nicely, too. That’s the trust you cultivated.”

Subaru: “…It’s only been about two weeks.”

Riften: “Two valuable weeks, that is. That’s all there is to it.”

He basically tells Subaru that it’s no big deal, and now was the time when he had to look up.

Everyone at the Magoji palace became true lifesavers to Subaru in this moment.

He was fortunately blessed with lifesavers, neighbors, and with people at his workplace.

The tumultuous day let him know that he was blessed with many things, including a child.

—All the more reason for the mysterious woman to cast a shadow on his happiness.

For Subaru and Rem, the enemy was too unpredictable. They had no clue as to why they were being targeted, ‘according to Rem’. Still, that beautiful, cruel killer would definitely show up again.

Even with Halibel, the one renowned the strongest of Kararagi, they couldn’t achieve relief easily.

And so, Subaru quickly left home and hurried on home, depending on the kindness of everyone at the palace. He’d return the favor, no matter what. So, he’d depend on them, just for now.

Connections helped him out with one urgent matter. Subaru didn’t have any bright ideas for the remaining problem—for countermeasures against the woman, but with Halibel, someone who was familiar with the town, and Rem, who had extensive knowledge, perhaps they would come up with a solution.

While having hopes like that inside, Subaru ran through the street and—

???: “—You look like a fool walking around all alone. Are you even trying to protect your woman?”

—Right in the middle of the street, he was convinced that Halibel was quite off with his foresight.

3

???: “What are you playing dumb for? Look, can you take your eyes off of me?”

The woman showed up in front of Subaru in an extremely unashamed way, like it was no big surprise.

He was in town in the middle of going back from the Magoji Palace to the tenement house. He managed to leave work early in the afternoon thanks to the people around him being considerate, and so it was currently in the afternoon with the sun high up—that was obvious. However, there were surging crowds walking past each other, and they were practically sticking out like sore thumbs.

In fact, the woman’s brutish beautiful face charmed people, and it wasn’t suitable for spying at all, for better or worse. If she had the same objective as last night, then perhaps the street being unclear was some sort of blunder by her.

Or maybe she was going to attack him despite all the attention.

Subaru: “…”

Subaru muffles his voice and looks at the street. Nobody could tell that this woman, who was standing in the middle of the street as if she owned it, was a dangerous person. If she attacked with as much force as she did last night, many people would get harmed—especially if the attack was as vicious as her first one was. He could not imagine the amount of damage it’d cause.

Subaru: “I messed up…I thought you were cautious.”

Clear out people, prepare for the enemy, and find out where he ran. He was inclined to believe that she wanted to secretly accomplish her objective and was going to at least carry out those things cautiously.

This was the result. She had the whole town hostage, and he couldn’t act.

Subaru: “How cruel it is for you to be such a sharp woman.”

???: “Huh? You sure can be rude out of nowhere. How could you greet someone like that?”

Subaru: “Everyone around are hostages, and if I run away, you will show no mercy. That’s your plan, isn’t it?”

The woman squints, her eyes were cold, and she had on the same white clothes from last night. The well-dressed woman’s Wasou being pure white without a single stain-although that wasn’t a very rare sight-and her beautiful face being eccentric created this ethereal sort of harmony.

That’s what he’d think if Subaru never found out that this silent person standing, looking like a painting God drew, was actually a sadist who hurt him and made him suffer.

???: “Well, whatever. We can talk for a little while we walk.”

Subaru: “What?”

???: “It’s too noisy here, and we’re going to the same place anyway. You do know that you aren’t in a position to refuse, don’t you?”

Jerking her chin, the woman overbearingly tells him to walk with her. The people around were being held hostage. It was frustrating, but he had no choice but to do what she told him.

If only she hadn’t said those unforgivable words.

Subaru: “You’re going to the same place…which means…no way, you bastard.”

???: “The home you and your woman live in. Some mutt is taking care of her right now, right? That’s why you’re here. If its owner is here, wouldn’t you feel more at ease if he had a collar?”

Subaru: “Don’t be ridiculous! Why would I let…as if I’d let you come with me! I won’t let a dangerous woman like you see Rem…”

???: “—Shut up.”

Subaru: “…”

The woman grumpily says those two words to Subaru, who firmly denied her request.

Hearing the sharpness of her tone, Subaru feels an illusionary knife stab his throat, silencing him.

His blood was freezing because of the woman’s sharpened hostility. It was the pressure from last night that very well might make one fall to their knees, practically disgracing themselves.

However—

Subaru: “…Like hell anyone would let you see Rem.”

???: “Wow. I’m kind of impressed. I thought you were gonna be a coward and freeze up.”

The woman’s slit eyes widen, and she said that to Subaru, who opposed her as he bit his lip. After that, she pointed a finger at Subaru, whose face turned red from anger and agitation, and said,

???: “Still, I won’t listen to you. And besides, you’ve got it all wrong.”

Subaru: “I’ve got it all wrong?”

???: “I’m not trying to kill you guys. Not right now, that is.”

The woman shrugged her shoulders as she opened the hand she pointed at him, waving it. She had calm actions and calm behavior, however this was the same way she acted last night when she beat up Subaru.

This woman is capable of beating Subaru to death while smiling, after all.

Subaru: “…How can I believe you?”

???: “I’m capable of killing anyone I want to kill. When I thought to kill you yesterday, I had plenty of time to do so. And yet, I didn’t kill you. So, I have no intention of killing you.”

That was some poor logic for proof. And yet, it had undeniable weight.

It was the sort of truth that was pride and a fact, and you could only call it a self-evident truth.

The woman was an enemy. She had both hostility and bloodlust. However, she left without taking Subaru and Rem’s lifes, showed up the next day, and told him that he was headed towards their home —.

Subaru: “I have no idea what you’re thinking.”

???: “You want me to tell you right away…What are you, a baby? Doesn’t your female partner have a baby? If you’re gonna to be a parent, how about you be a little more independent and use that noggin of yours?”

Subaru: “Seeing as you’ve changed after overnight, are you taking me to the tenement house to apologize or something?”

???: “Hah, that’s rich. It’s a good thing I’m not planning on killing you, huh.”

The woman scoffs at Subaru, and she starts to walk with her back turned on him. She didn’t speak, but her shaking milky white hair was silently pressuring him to come with her.

Even if he resisted now, the woman would still head towards the tenement house. The town was also being held hostage.

Subaru: “How do you know Rem is pregnant?”

???: “Because I could tell by looking, obviously. Can you not assume that I’m similar to a slow male like you?”

Subaru: “Rem didn’t notice, either.”

???: “Okay, then can you not assume that I’m similar to slow males and females like you guys?”

The woman dutifully corrects herself and walks through the town with Subaru while humming. It was unfamiliar, messy humming that didn’t have a melody or anything really, but something about it sounded nostalgic.

That being said, Subaru didn’t stop being cautious of the woman one bit, and he kept thinking about how he’d have no way to tell the two in the tenement house if she ever let her guard down.

Still, coming up with a dramatic idea in the mere 15 minutes it’d take to get there was highly unlikely—

Halibel: “—I did feel like your smell was coming back awfully quickly.”

Halibel, who was lighting his kiseru in front of the tenement house, let that statement out.

He came out to the front for a smoke break, and he happened to meet Subaru and the woman once they arrived. When Halibel stared at the two of them with imperceivable emotions in his slit eyes, he said,

Halibel: “The day after you discover your wife’s pregnant, you bring back another beautiful woman. What’s that say about you as a man?”

???: “I think it means he’s the worst, what do you think?”

Halibel: “I’ll have to agree that he is on the outside. But this isn’t the time to be joking around.”

???: “Hmm…”

Halibel, who took smoke into his lungs and breathed it out from his nose, ponders something. Then, he slowly stands up, and he looked at the women as he cleaned off his butt.

???: “Can you not get cocky just because you’re huge?”

Halibel: “Now that’s a new false accusation. You’re such a beautiful woman, so you could at least let me win in height.”

???: “One who enjoys being praised by a mutt is merely a mutt of a woman.”

There was no way to get along with this woman. The woman’s stern reply didn’t bring down Halibel, but as for Subaru, he was worried about this grim situation and Rem-who would have to get involved eventually.

Subaru: “Halibel, where’s Rem?”

Halibel: “I’m surprised you asked in this situation. …She’s inside. She wouldn’t listen when I told her to at least let me do the housework. I gave in.”

Subaru: “Sounds like Rem.”

Although she was pregnant, you could actually say that she was still in the early stages of pregnancy. Since her stomach didn't look all that different, at this point housework shouldn't be that much of a burden on her, although this was just Subaru's guess he made based off the little knowledge he had in health and physical education.

The woman next to him was 100 times more likely to be a burden.

Halibel: "So, really, who is that girl? She does have quite the foul mouth, but is she a friend of yours?"

Subaru: "No, you must know who she is. …She's the woman who attacked us yesterday."

Halibel: "Huuuuh?"

Subaru was disappointed by Halibel's poor guessing ability as he thought about how slow he was to get it. He thought that he was having a pointless conversation to kill time, but apparently that was not the case.

However, Halibel had an odd look after Subaru made that point, and he said,

Halibel: "She's…the girl from yesterday? But wait…"

???: "What? Are you trying to say that it's a lie? Are you trying to say that I don't look like someone who'd do something like that? Can you not make me laugh? I threw this guy all over the room, beat him to a bloody pulp…wait! Come to think of it, yesterday you disgusted me with all that sweat you were covered in! What are you going to do to make up for that?!"

Subaru: "Nothing! My body is shaky as hell now, be satisfied with that."

The woman interrupts Halibel, and in the middle of talking, she heats up with anger as last night came to her mind. Seeing that unreasonable behavior, which was like an outburst of anger, Subaru tries to appease her rage by reasoning that he could still feel the pain from the bruises on his body.

And then, once this ruckus suddenly began in front of the tenement house, it happened.

Rem: "—I'd like to talk."

The tenement house door opened, and the one who step foot into a dangerous situation was a blue-haired girl—it was Rem. Rem finished up the housework, and when she loosened the tied sleeves of her kimono, she smiled at Subaru.

Rem: "Welcome home, Subaru-kun. You're quite early today. You really wanted to see me that badly?"

Subaru: "…Yeah, I sure did. To be honest, it hurts when I'm not with you, even if it's only for one moment."

Rem: "W-Well…yes, erm, I feel the same way. Oh no, now I'm blushing."

???: "Can you not?!"

The married couple's innocent exchange make the woman's displeasure explode in a different way. The woman pulls her own short hair out as she said,

???: "Sheesh, this is just wrong…"

Rem: "I'm sorry about that. How about we go inside and cool down first? I'll make some tea, so please come on in."

???: "…"

The woman was probably trying to say something you would never expect to hear from her.

The women looked stupefied. Subaru and Halibel also exchange looks. Seeing their three reactions, Rem tilts her head, and while softly making a happy look, she said,

Rem: "You shouldn't startle the baby. Let's have a good talk."

So, she most definitely had mouthed, "The mother is strong."

Tia: “My name is…ahh, it’s Tia. Call me that for now.”

The woman—Tia, who was let into the room and sunk onto the tatami mat, named herself in an discomforting way.

In front of Tia, Subaru and Rem were sitting next to each other, and Halibel was standing and leaning against a wall near the entrance. It was almost like a stressful interview in a meeting hall, but you couldn’t necessarily blame them once you considered the tension covering the room.

In fact, something like a stressful interview or a defense was about to begin—it was a scene to get to the bottom of Tia’s objective, as she went out of her way to come back to the tenement house.

Subaru: “I really hope this isn’t the sort of thing where the culprit comes back to the scene of the crime just to double check things…”

It’s possible that she named herself to further her relationship with them. Rem places the tea in front of Tia, perhaps in response to her compromise, and when she quickly bowed, she said,

Rem: “I’m Rem. Next to me is Subaru-kun, my husband. The one at the wall is Halibel-sama, who lives in the next room. Pleased to meet you, Tia-sama.”

Tia: “Subaru-kun and Halibel-sama?”

Subaru: “Just “Subaru” and “Halibel” is fine. Anyway, Rem, you don’t need to say this girl’s name with a “-sama” honorific. She’s like…like an enemy.”

Tia was practically treated like a guest, but she was still someone who should clearly be classified as an enemy. Subaru was the one who insisted on that, but Rem shook her head as she said,

Rem: “I have to. Since Tia-sama has been invited, she’s a guest. And you’re treating someone who just came to talk poorly. She came here because she had something to talk about. Isn’t that right, Tia-sama?”

Tia: “Humph, I think I like you a little more than that male. Rem, was it? I’ll keep that in mind. As for the male and the mutt, they’re a no-go.”

Tia, being in a better mood because of Rem treating her politely, took a sip of her tea. She choked.

Tia: “Ouch! So hot! It’s so hot.”

Rem: “Oh, I’m sorry. Are you okay?”

Tia: “I-I’m impressed. I let my guard down, and then this happens. You’re a tough one.”

Subaru: “You just inflicted pain on yourself. Quit it, otherwise this conversation will go nowhere.”

With his hand, Subaru stopped Rem from apologizing to Tia, who wrongly resented her as she displayed her inability to take in hot things.

It seemed like he’d misread Tia’s character, as she’s been having listless interactions. However, Subaru would never let his guard down. He was staying alert for when she’d strike like she did last night.

Tia: “The male seems to have a sickness of becoming tense and pointlessly marking his territory. Whatever. I’ll finish this business quickly, just like you want. I don’t have much time, either. In fact, I’m very busy.”

Subaru: “Business…”

Tia: “Like I SAID, I didn’t come here to kill you. —That does depend on you guys, though.”

At the end of Tia’s statement, her voice turned cold, and once she put down her teacup, she looked at the front with her sharp eyes.

And then—

Tia: “For mercy’s sake, I’ll assume you did it on the spur of the moment. So, don’t worry about the whole retribution thing. Give back the light ball instead.”

She declared that as she stared at Subaru—no, she stared at Rem.

That was the first thing that confused Subaru. Tia’s eyes fell on Rem and she literally thought nothing of people like Subaru who were right next to her. The next thing that confused him was the “light ball” Tia talked about, as he had no idea what that was. It seemed Rem didn’t either, as she said,

Rem: “light ball…?”

She tilts her head, and a question mark appeared. However, Tia wasn’t happy with that answer.

Tia: “Respond carefully. “Yes” is the only answer I want to hear. A wrong answer will cost you parts of your body.”

Tia tells that to Rem as she stuck her hand out in front of her and pointed at her with a white finger.

Her quiet voice sounded calm, but it was fake. There was anger hidden within her tone, and it was just counting to the time when it’d blow up.

Tia directs her anger at Rem by saying that her answer would affect the outcome, and she meant it. In this coercive negotiation, it was as if she was saying that people like Halibel wouldn’t be able to deter her—

Subaru: “H-Hold on.”

Tia: “No. Choose your words wisely, and that goes for you too, not just Rem. Make one wrong move, and your female partner’s fingers won’t suffice.”

Subaru: “What are you, a devil? Whatever, doesn’t matter, just listen. What is this light ball?”

Tia: “Playing innocent, huh. It’s what you guys stole. I don’t know what you call it, but it’s my light ball. I came to get it back.”

Subaru: “What the hell is that…”

Subaru’s answer makes Tia’s mood worsen even more. But no matter how much anger she had inside, Subaru would not give her the answer she wanted.

This is because Subaru truly had no idea what the “light ball” was, and of course, neither did Rem.

Even though she said they stole it, it was a bolt from the blue. Even if she ranted about it, they couldn’t imagine how what kind of object it was or how important it was to Tia.

But—

Tia: “I warned you. Choose your words wisely. You failed to do that.”

“…”

A wind blows by, going between Subaru and Rem, and it created a sharp mark on the wall in the back.

Sharp cracks were vertically cut into the tenement house wall, as if it had been showered with slashes. The sharpness was so fierce that, had the target been a person instead of a wall, it could’ve easily torn them in half.

A kind of threat and warning. By using force, Tia demonstrated that they wouldn’t get off next time.

Halibel: “…”

Halibel, watching in the back, couldn’t move. Perhaps he had no chance to move because he didn’t see the demonstration coming, which wasn’t done to hit them. He wasn’t sure.

In any case, for Subaru and Rem, this demonstrated that it was a force to be reckoned with. Afterwards, Tia posed the same question to Rem.

Which was—

Tia: "—Where is the light ball? Give it back."

Rem: "…I'm terribly sorry. My answer is the same as Subaru-kun's."

Tia: "…"

Rem: "I can't return something I don't know about."

Tia: "I see."

Rem answered firmly as she stared straight at Tia. Hearing Rem's answer, Tia closes her eyes, and then she moved a finger on her right hand that she held out.

The wind blew. This time it intensely blew off the room's fusuma, splitting it into two.

Tia: "Are you still not going tell me?"

Rem: "It's not that I can't tell you about it. I have no clue what it is."

Tia: "You sure are stubborn!"

Tia's anger towards Rem. who still stood her ground, finally explodes.

Tia stands up, and she stuck her hands out left and right. The next moment, the terrifying wind devastates the room, and the room is cut up by kamaitachi. Destruction demolishes the room.

The wall, the fusuma, the shelves, the tatami mat, the tea table—everything gets destroyed, falling down in the room. Subaru was stiff and holding his breath, as the waves of the raging wind fell all over him.

However, Rem didn't avert her eyes, and she didn't run away in fear.

Tia: "Gr…rrr…!"

Tia no longer had a main target for destruction in the room, and she finally roared. She looks at Rem, then Subaru, and then Halibel, and then she said,

Tia: “I-I’m going to kill that mutt. Are you still not going to give it back?”

Rem: “Nope, I can’t.”

Halibel: “I mean, there’s kinda no other choice with how the conversation’s going, but aren’t you treating me too poorly here?”

Rem’s strong will stubbornly pushes aside Tia’s desperate threat. Now that it’s turned out like this, even if Tia were to cruelly kill Halibel, her wish wouldn’t be granted.

Tia: “Well, I guess it’ll help my mood just a little bit.”

Halibel: “Su-san, may I cry?”

Subaru: “I feel you. You say ‘little’ because, like, when things don’t really work out, you get deeply disappointed.”

Halibel: “Not exactly the kind of support I was hoping for…”

Subaru, seeing Halibel sulk unhappily out of the corner of his eye, let out a brief sigh. Looking around the room, there were traces of destruction all over the place—however, Subaru and the others were all uninjured.

Once one saw that, even Subaru could tell what was going on, no matter how slow on the uptake he was.

Subaru: “You really don’t have any intention of killing us.”

Tia looked at Subaru, who came to that conclusion, with her eyes filled with anger and hatred. However, her sharp eyes couldn’t kill people, no matter how much bloodlust they had.

The room was cut up by Tia’s anger, but that anger was not bloodlust. This is because she “has no intention of killing them”, just like she has been saying from the start.

The threat was simply a threat and nothing more. In fact, it was like she was making an abnormal amount of effort to avoid harming them.

Subaru: “And yet, yesterday you nearly killed me…”

Tia: “I didn’t know Rem had a baby at the time…”

Subaru: “—So that’s why.”

Tia: “Oops.”

Tia let the cat out of the bag with a sulky look. It was too late for her to shut her mouth.

In other words, she—

Rem: “You didn’t kill us because Subaru-kun and I have a child…?”

Tia: “You stole the light ball. A sin is a sin. However, that sin is yours. The baby has nothing to do with it. Taking its life would go against my beliefs as a “Shinigami”.”

Subaru: ““Shinigami”……”

Hearing Tia express her thoughts, Subaru takes a brief look at Halibel. He felt like Tia had called herself a “Shinigami” last night, but he couldn’t remember things very clearly from the time when he was nearly killed. Seeing Subaru give him that look, Halibel tilted his head slightly to indicate that he had no idea what she meant. It was a self-proclaimed name, and nothing more—even with that granted, her power was little too much for the name.

Subaru: “In any case, you won’t kill us. You’re even avoiding hurting us. So…”

Tia: “So “give it up”? There’s gotta be a limit to how impudent a thief can be. I’m going to get the light ball back. If the baby gets in my way, then I’ll just have to wait for it to be born.”

Subaru: “That’d take too long, first of all…”

While being torn between her beliefs and anxiety, Tia shows that she won't give in one bit.

Seeing Tia's distress, Subaru looks at Rem, wondering what they should do. When Rem nodded at Subaru's look, she spoke while kneeling upright, not even breaking down within the wind.

Rem: "Tia-sama, like I've said many times, I have no idea what this light ball of yours is. I'll repeat myself again, I am not the one who stole it."

Subaru: "Rem was always with me. Rem had no time to do something so outrageous, and she'd never do such a thing, either. Why are you accusing us anyway? Was there some sort of deciding factor?"

Tia: "Isn't it obvious?—It's the nose."

Subaru: "…"

Tia answers Subaru's question confidently, pointing at her own nose. Hearing that answer, Subaru grimaces, and he lost his breath as his chest was struck by an unexpected force.

She found them by relying on her sense of smell. Chills and understanding were what welled up once he heard that-things that were expected.

Tia sniffed out Subaru with her sense of smell and came here—

Tia: "Judging by that look, you must know something. Protect your female partner all you want, it's no use. Rem reeks of the smell of a thief!"

Subaru: "…"

Hearing Tia's triumphant words, Subaru loses his voice for a moment.

Then, he thoroughly thinks about the words she said and says,

Subaru: "…Rem? Not me?"

Tia: “Huh? What’s this, you trying to protect her with an awful tearjerker act? Sorry, but my nose can’t be fooled. My nose tells me that Rem is the culprit!”

Tia sternly points at Rem, and she declared that once again with a triumphant look.

She was aggressive in anticipation of Subaru feeling guilty, based off his reaction. However, it was not the kind of guilt Tia was hoping for.

Thus, a very complicated atmosphere started to spread between Subaru and the others.

Tia: “Wh-What…you people…Are you trying to belittle me with those looks?”

Subaru: “We’re not…”

Rem: “There has to be some sort of misunderstanding…”

Tia: “I am not wrong! My nose is absolute! Hey, mutt! You have a dog like face, so you must get it, right?”

Halibel: “Why would you think that I’d take your side? Are you my wife?”

Tia: “Like hell I am—!!”

Tia’s white face turns red, and she yelled as she stamped her feet. It no longer looked like she had the intimidating air that she had in the beginning; she was just a lone girl who dug herself into a hole.

After Tia breathed heavily and glared at Subaru and the others one by one,

Tia: “You aren’t returning what you stole! You’re looking down on me! Who do you people think you are?! You’re gonna regret becoming parents if this is how you act!”

Subaru: “Let’s stop all this emotional denial. Also, how about you give it up already? You made a mistake. None of us stole whatever that light ball is.”

Tia: “NO I DIDN’T! Rem had to have stolen it! There’s no way I’m wrong…”

Rem: “Okay, well..”

Subaru couldn’t figure how how to deal with Tia, who finally started throwing a tantrum. Rem was the one who interrupted Tia, who was acting stubborn like a child, which was improper for how she looked.

Rem: “Tia-sama, it seems you think that Subaru-kun and I have stolen something.”

Rem softly speaks to Tia, as if she was trying to reason with an unreasonable child. After that, Tia’s face stiffened, and then she turned around to face Rem.

Tia: “For the record, you are the only one who did it. This male doesn’t seem to know about it.”

Rem: “Subaru-kun and I do everything together and go everywhere together. Understand?”

Tia I-I understand…”

Rem said, “Good” and raised her finger at Tia, who was quickly discouraged from acting the way she’d acted before as she nodded.

Rem: “I want to get back your stolen light ball. However, we don’t know what it is. If you don’t believe me…would you wait until you are convinced?”

Tia: “Until I’m convinced…”

Rem: “If your nose is correct, then we are the ones who are lying. If you keep an eye on us, eventually we might expose ourselves. That’s what I mean.”

Rem jiggles her finger as she says, “What do you think?”, leaving the choice up to Tia.

The suggestion would take up quite a lot of time, but Subaru thought of it was a temporary measure to temper a child. However, after Tia pondered the suggestion for a while,

Tia: "—Sounds interesting. All right, I'm in."

Subaru: "R-Really?"

Tia: "It's as Rem said. She'll get busted eventually for sure, so I'll wait."

Tia sticks out her somewhat busty chest, and she answered Subaru's doubts confidently. But it was still hard for Subaru to believe her choice. She snorted as she saw his face.

Tia: "I'm not lying. I'm confident in my nose. Look, there's no way I can lose! If I'm wrong, I'll even give you the light ball to make it up to you!"

Subaru: "Attacking us to get it back creates an infinite loop!"

In any case, if Tia has accepted Rem's idea as a good one, then the problem was solved. Or at the very least, Rem and Subaru shouldn't have to worry about being hurt by Tia anymore.

Subaru: "That's if we could trust that she isn't lying, though."

Rem: "It's fine. I believe that Tia-sama really is telling the truth. …I can tell since I watch plenty of kids at temple elementary school."

Subaru: "It's kinda worrying how that could be used as evidence to convince me."

Still, she really did sound like a teacher with the tone of that persuasive argument. In other words, Rem successfully convinced him because she was gifted with the skills of a female teacher.

Subaru: "Impressive, Sensei. That was well done."

Rem: "Of course. But when you're with me, I want to be called wife instead of Sensei."

Subaru: "—Good point. As expected of my wife. She's the cutest girl ever and she's so reliable."

Rem: "There you go, well done."

Rem praises Subaru, who corrected himself, as if she was playing around with him. Seeing her smile, Subaru scratches his head. He thought to himself, "I'm no match for her."

Tia, who quickly noticed them whispering to each other, glares at them angrily.

Tia: "Hey! What are you two whispering about…is it about the light ball?!"

Subaru: "Even if we were the culprits, we wouldn't be so stupid enough to whisper about it in front of the owner. How long are you going to stay here anyways? If we've come to a conclusion, then…"

Tia: "What are you saying? I told you, I'm keeping an eye out until you slip up. I'm staying here."

Subaru tilted his head as he listened to Tia's tone, which made it sound like she was saying, "Why are you asking something so obvious?"

Subaru: "Staying here…for how long?"

Tia: "Until you slip up."

Subaru: "…"

Tia: "It's still pretty crowded with three people in this room, though. I better not be staying with that mutt. Not only would it be cramped, but I'd get covered in fur."

Subaru: "You're going to stay here?!"

She makes a threat from an unexpected perspective, and it causes Subaru to raise his voice as he practically screamed. Hearing that, Tia breaks into a smile in great delight.

Tia: “Ahh, that scream, oh yes…I finally get to hear it, makes me kinda happy.”

Subaru: “I’m being serious here! As if we’d live with you! This is a house for a husband and a wife, use your head!”

Tia: “—? Isn’t Rem already pregnant? What’s wrong with me staying here?”

Subaru: “Well…well?”

When she asked Subaru about his thoughts, something prevented him from replying, “Even so”. It seemed Tia was not messing around, and she was saying that it was a genuine question.

If they were having sex just to have kids, then Tia’s viewpoint would be correct.

Subaru: “But then at night we’d be missing something needed to keep family happiness…”

Tia: “Stare”

Subaru: “Stop! Don’t look at me like that! Even if you do, you still can’t live with us!”

Tia looked at Subaru doubtfully, but he still stood his ground while giving excuses. Besides, even if she disregarded the thoughts of the husband and wife, three people would be too much for the room, just like Tia said.

Subaru: “Hal-san, the manager and landlord, wouldn’t even allow it anyways. Don’t forget that you’re the one who destroyed this room and beat me to a pulp!”

No landlord would be bold enough to negotiate deposit and key money after she destroyed the rent so much.

Subaru hoped for that in his statement, and Halibel nodded with his arms folded.

Halibel: “Yeah, Su-san’s right. First we have to talk about compensating for the room."

Subaru: "That's not the point!"

Halibel did not listen to Subaru telling him that this wasn't about the landlord.

Tia: "Me? Compensate for this room?"

Rem: "Tia-sama destroyed it, so that's a given…that goes for our damaged household goods, too, if you could."

Rem looks around the room devastated by wind that was now a mess, and she makes that request to Tia.

Things like shelves and furniture were destroyed by the wind slashes. Of course, the tatami mat and walls were, too. There were some cutlery that barely avoided being damaged, but the clothes in the wardrobe and the futon in the closet were probably different.

The daily necessities they obtained by managing with the little income they had were destroyed—it was a bit tear inducing.

Rem: "I'll help clean up, so Tia-sama, you can use this room. Halibel-sama, let Subaru-kun and I use another available room and…"

Halibel: "Yeah, that's fine. As you know, the tenement house is full of free rooms. Pick whichever you want and move over."

Rem: "Thank you very much."

The broken tableware pile up, and the damage to the memories depress Subaru. Rem and Halibel, the realists, put aside his sentiments, and once a room was assigned, they set a plan for the future.

Tia, who had seized the initiative in the beginning, was left behind by the quick progress, and she scratched her cheeks while being taken aback.

Tia: "How should I put this…you guys are like…tough."

Subaru: “I’ll have to agree with you on that.”

This was the only time Subaru agreed with the beautiful, unreasonable killer.

5

Halibel: “Su-san, got a second?”

Halibel beckoned him and brought him out of the tenement house when Tia started to reluctantly obey Rem, who diligently worked on cleaning the room.

Rem seemed to be enjoying herself, sleeves tied as she completely focused on cleaning the room, and nobody could stop her now that she’d enter such an intense state. It actually seemed like Tia was weak to Rem’s pushiness, and she was helping her obediently, although she didn’t look like she was getting into it.

Subaru: “Looks like I can take our eyes off of them for a bit.”

Subaru sees that Rem has the situation handled, and he exits the tenement house as he stepped over the door that was out of place. It was already after sunset. The round moon was up in the completely dark night sky, bejeweled with the glimmer of the stars.

Halibel, looking up at the sky as he left a trail of tobacco smoke in it, first starts speaking by saying “Sorry”, and Halibel: “You were quite frightened during that conversation, right? Sorry for not doing anything.”

Subaru: “It’s not anything you should apologize for…is what I’d like to say, but I was really frightened. Especially when Tia started to destroy the room.”

Subaru shrugs and uses the conversation as a chance to talk about why they had to clean the room in the first place.

Halibel just watched things play out in the destructive wind without moving an inch. Rem didn’t move to show that she’d stand her ground.

So, as for why Halibel didn't do anything, stayed silent, and watched the mayhem…

Halibel: "She had no bloodlust. No hostility, either. So I was able to tell that she wouldn't hurt anyone, even though she acted up like that. …You might not understanding my reasoning, though."

Subaru: "Of course I'd know once I could tell those things were missing. Although I was late to notice, I also came to that conclusion once I saw the end result. It's just that…"

Halibel: "Once you considered Rem's safety, you wanted me to stop her? Yeah, I had a feeling you'd think that, so that's why I thought I'd apologize."

Halibel knocks the ash off his kiseru, apologizes once again, and bowed deeply.

As long as it was rational, Subaru had no complaints for him. Plus, Halibel was helping him out of kindness. It would be too arrogant of him to blame him just because of that decision considering how he hasn't paid him back yet or rewarded him.

Subaru: "Although, I'd appreciate it if I had a say next time. It's not guaranteed that I won't move carelessly and almost get hit by the wind, you know?"

Halibel: "If 1-2 of your limbs fly off from the sharpness, the doctor can put them back on just fine."

Subaru: "Once I let my head fly off I'm dead!"

Getting hit somewhere meant death. Considering how he didn't get hit, he got lucky. He felt very relieved knowing that he lived by the skin of his teeth.

Halibel: "I'm glad that you forgive me. I kinda felt down for arriving too late last night, too, when you were beat up."

Subaru: "Really?"

Halibel: "Forgetting about the title as Kararagi's strongest, I do regard myself as a shinobi. And so, being outsmarted sure isn't something to be pleased with."

Halibel shows his pride, and Subaru tugs on his chin as if to say "So that's how it is".

When he heard of ninjas, things like information warfare, undercover agents, assassination, ninjutsu, and all sorts of roles came to mind—but perhaps those were like characteristics of spies from ancient times. Messing up with counterespionage sure would be a failure for a ninja.

Subaru: "In that case, why don't you let one of the people working for you handle it? Since you're the strongest ninja in Karagi, aren't you the leader of Shinobi groups or something?"

Halibel: "Shinobi groups! We have no dangerous gatherings like that. I've never even seen any other ninjas outside of myself. How'd you come up with that idea?"

Subaru: "Don't you have special educational institutes like shinobi villages or something?"

Halibel: "I've heard about some living in the middle of nowhere in hidden villages due to racial circumstances, but as for my wolf brethren, they couldn't run and hide so they're reaching extinction…"

Subaru: "An extinction joke!"

If ninjas were endangered, then so were wolves. Halibel's culture and race were on the verge of dying out. They were also starting to decline because they knew their place.

Subaru: "Basically, don't expect too much from your ninja side."

Halibel: "Not sure what a ninja is, but yes, you certainly shouldn't expect too much. So, I have a proposal that isn't related to my apology from earlier."

Subaru: "A proposal?"

Halibel: "—About Tia, don't you think we should get rid of her while we can?"

He spoke those words with no hesitation in his usual tone. And so, Subaru completely froze. 5 seconds pass, then 10, slowly.

Subaru: "Hal-san?"

Halibel: "She has no bloodlust. Her hostility has settled down as of now, too. However, she is still dangerous. If we turn our backs on her defenselessly, she could get rid of us if we don't do anything."

Subaru: "Well…still, even so…"

The emotions in Halibel's slit eyes weren't clear. But his statement truly did have a certain level of persuasiveness. This was the chance to free themselves from anxiety about the future.

Even if it was now, right after Rem and Tia had explored the possibility of coexisting, although in a superficial way.

Halibel: "You see, my nose isn't picking up Tia-chan. Not just yesterday, but right now, too."

Subaru: "Even now? Is it because she got rid of her scent?"

Halibel: "Meticulously, yes. I've never heard of this "Shinigami" nickname that she spoke of, and she's such a beautiful woman. Like it or not, she'd become the talk of the town should she show up. And yet, I don't know who she is. That means pretty much nobody knows her."

A mysterious woman with an unknown identity that took countermeasures against Halibel's sense of smell—nothing about Tia's position changed.

They were now able to have conversations and the time for them to part has been postponed. Those were the only things that have been accomplished. Not to mention, how effective would the arrangement be with this girl who had a tendency to be moody?

Halibel: "If we act now, we could make it seem like she was never there. Rem-chan will have to lie, but I'll deal with the girl."

Signs of the cold smell of blood came from Halibel, who made a cruel proposal.

The man before Subaru finally didn't seem like just a lively playboy. It was the first time he could tell that he was a shinobi deemed the strongest in Kararagi.

But at the same time, he could also tell what Halibel was expecting as he gave off a cold, intimidating air.

Subaru: "…Sorry, Hal-san. For making you play the bad guy, leaving you to hold the bag."

Halibel: "…"

Subaru: "But you don't need to play the bad guy. It's not that I'm not worried…but Rem already told Tia so much. So I'll believe in her too."

Halibel: "Can you believe in that girl?"

Subaru: "I'm not talking about Tia. I'm going to believe in the eyes of my wife, the one who persuaded Tia."

In the back, they were working on tidying things and cleaning the room. The voices he could hear were having a conversation, and they were Rem who was gung-ho, and Tia, who was sulky—it seemed things were going somewhat smoothly.

He wanted to see the light at the end of that tunnel. Given that the killer doesn't end up killing them, that is.

Halibel: "…Su-san, you sure aren't one to let things go, huh."

Hearing Subaru's reply, Halibel puts his kiseru back in his mouth once again, and he murmured.

Then, the cold air coming from his body vanished within an instant. Once that went away, all that's left was the same old sluggish wolf.

He had acted the way he did out of consideration for Subaru—he acted like a shinobi so that Subaru would feel less guilty if he ever wanted to eliminate danger.

Subaru: “You said that I don’t let things go, but I feel like that should be said about you instead with how you were acting.”

Halibel: “No way. Besides, you’re the one who forgave someone who nearly killed you, and you don’t even know if she’ll change. This isn’t just a matter of being softhearted.”

Subaru: “Ahh, now that you mention it…”

Halibel tells Subaru that, and he remembered how Tia nearly killed him. Although he knew how strong she was, he had forgotten about how he was targeted by her violence nature.

This explains why Halibel was worried about Subaru and Rem.

Halibel: “Did you really forget? Even with all the pain you still feel all over your body?”

Subaru: “Don’t remind me, now it’s coming back to me…”

Subaru remembers his joint pain, and he moves around his limbs as he said “Oww” with a pathetic look on his face. Seeing him act like that, this is when Halibel let out a long sigh in a dumbfounded manner.

Halibel: “If Su-san and Rem-chan insist, then alright. I won’t do anything.”

Subaru: “I owe you one…actually, not sure if I should say that here. Well, I already owe you plenty anyway.”

Halibel: “You keep on indebting yourself. Looking forward to the day you pay me back.”

Halibel said that while smiling, though it wasn’t clear if he wanted to get paid back or not. Hearing his words, Subaru pouted, and he hung his head as if to say that he was absolutely correct.

Ever since he came to the town Banan, he's just been depending on people's kindness and being helped.

Subaru: “I gotta pay everyone back eventually.”

Halibel: “It'd be problematic if you died on us, so hang in there and stay alive until then.”

Subaru: “Damn, what a positive reason to avoid dying.”

Subaru smiles back at Halibel, hearing him say that, and he stretched his body. Just then, a voice coming from inside the room called out to the two people outside.

Rem: “Subaru-kun, please help me choose some clothes that would be fine.”

Tia: “You males are the only ones taking it easy…This is why you can't trust males. They should just spend all of their time outside hunting, honestly.”

Hearing Rem and Tia call on them, Subaru and Halibel look at each other, and they both move.

Halbiel knocks the ash off his kiseru, while Subaru stretched lightly.

—And with that, the night of day zero of the noisy days at the tenement house advanced.

Chapter 4:
6 Months

1

Subaru and Rem's moving finished quickly.

Because all they did was move the undamaged belongings to the next room.

The tenement house room assignment went smoothly. The room they had originally lived in was left to Tia, while Subaru, Rem, and Halibel lived to the left and right of it.

They did propose the idea of leaving a room in between each of them, but—

Tia: "Suggesting to keep the rooms apart…So you're saying that you do feel guilty!"

Then, it had to be rejected because of Tia loudly suspecting them. After several nights, Tia would end up regretting the room assignments with a red face since voices could clearly be heard in adjoining rooms, probably because of the thickness of the walls.

In any case, the moving finished without any problems, and so began the life of the strange neighbors in the tenement house.

Tia: "I gotta make money."

Halibel: "That's the first thing you're gonna say in the morning?"

Gathered at the breakfast table, Tia suddenly started the conversation like that, holding a chopstick in each hand.

The round tea table used as a dining table split into two last night, so they hurriedly forced the broken boards together for temporary use.

Two outsiders were sitting at the dining table for some reason—they were Tia and Halibel. They were shamelessly enjoying meals together, even asking for seconds, taking advantage of Rem's kindness.

Not to mention, Tia's face was so bad at using chopsticks that her whole face was covered with grains of rice.

Tia: "Listen here. I may be allowed to live in that shabby room, but I don't want to if it's a mess like that. Screw that. Which is why I'm asking you to hurry up and fix it. And then…"

Halibel: "Maybe if Su-san and Rem-chan were paying for it, but there's no way I'll lend you money. Borrowing and lending money doesn't work without trust. Like, you've already ruined any trust you had, how shameless can you be?"

Tia: "Hey, come on! What do you think?"

Subaru: "Your face caught my attention so much that I couldn't join in on the conversation, riceling."

Her rice makeup was too next level for Subaru to understand it.

His point makes Tia's face turn sour. While she carefully picked the rice off of it, Rem nodded at her as she said, "I see."

Rem: "So Tia-sama is looking for a job. Well, that's not our problem."

Tia: "You know, lately I feel like your words have been hitting me where it hurts…"

Rem: "Subaru-kun's just one step away from being a regular employee. He's already far ahead of you. There's no recovering from this. Subaru-kun won."

Tia: "Forget about that male's victory, I just wanna know what exactly you're trying to say."

Rem roots for Subaru, breathing heavily as she laughed "tee-hee", and Tia urged her to go on as she raised her hand. Seeing that, Rem clears her throat, and then, Rem: “I think you should use an employment agency. I highly recommend finding a job you’re a good at and earning money.”

Subaru: “So your best bet is to get referred at Clane’s employment agency…hm. By the way, are you even good at anything? And do you have any qualifications?”

Tia: “My specialty is killing. I don’t feel like killing right now, though.”

Subaru: “There’s no way you’d find a killing job with that unmotivated attitude!”

Tia folds her arms, and she threw out her busty chest, rice still stuck on her face. Still, if they take her words into account and recommend murder, they very well might end up quickly regretting last night’s decision.

Subaru gives Halibel, who knew the town very well, a quick glance, seeking help.

Halibel: “Hmm, let’s see. Requests for murder aren’t posted on the employment agency bulletin board.”

Tia: “M-Makes sense.”

Halibel: “Stuff like that are hidden in the back. If he knows you, that is.”

Subaru: “It’s the dark side of the town I never knew about—!”

Perhaps even employment agencies recognized by towns have shady jobs. Subaru felt down, as he felt like he just found out about the good-natured lizard faced man’s complicated circumstances.

Halibel: “No no no, it’s a joke. Just a joke. You shouldn’t take it seriously.”

Subaru: “Huh? A joke? Oh, I see, thank goodness. You really had me worried there. I don’t know how I’d face that cute apron wearing lizard from then on.”

Halibel: “Clane doesn’t accept those kind of jobs. Unauthorized employment agencies handle that sort of stuff.”

Subaru: “From now on, I will never use anything other than authorized employment agencies.”

Rem: “Actually, if you get fully approved this time, Clane-sama will never have to help you again, so make that your goal.”

Subaru: “Ohh, that’s right!”

It’s pointed out that his goal was being lowered by trying to keep things as they are, making him have a realization. While feeling thankful for Rem having his back, Subaru felt more motivated to work at the palace.

Yesterday, the staff also cared about him. Starting today, he’d go full throttle.

Subaru: “My motivation has went up now that I think about it that way. All right, let’s go to work!”

Rem: “Yeah!”

Tia: “No! What about me?!”

Tia erupted when Subaru and Rem got excited and stood up hand in hand. With her hands, she threw the food left on her plate into her mouth, chewed on it and swallowed, and then

Tia: “Introduce me to this guy I don’t really know! And then I’ll do a killing job!”

Subaru: “You idiot! Who in their right mind would let you do a night job like that?! Hal-san, tell her!”

Halibel: “I kinda do classic night work as a shinobi…that said, I’m not too sure about letting you kill, so how about you try something else. Like suppression requests or bounty hunting.”

Halibel cracks his knuckles, and he gave those conditions, causing Tia to tilt her head. However, the adventurous ring to it made

Subaru's eyes widen.

Subaru: "Bounty hunting! Suppression requests! That sounds awesome!"

Rem: "What kind of work are they exactly? Can Tia-sama do them…?"

Rem had a pretty realistic reaction in comparison to Subaru, who thought adventurously. Rem sees Tia's side of the dinner table, which she got extremely dirty—she sees that she lacks things like the ability to do delicate tasks and etiquette and hoped that the job wouldn't require those sort of skills.

Halibel: "The main jobs are catching evildoers popping up on wanted posters, sometimes beating them up. And then there's also the evil witchbeasts that show up every now and then."

Tia: "Basically, hunting. My specialty!"

It was like Tia's eyes shined for a moment. And then, when she energetically stood up from the tea table, she grabbed Halibel's neck as he tried to have a quick smoke, having finished his meal.

Halibel: "Hmm?"

Tia: "Now, show me the way. I have no idea what to hunt, after all."

Halibel: "Wait! Su-san! Rem-chan!"

Subaru: "See ya."

Halibel: "Oh, come on!"

Tia drags away Halibel, and resistance was futile. Subaru had no reason to stop her, and he wasn't so sure that he could stop her anyway.

With the noisy neighbors leaving, only the married couple was left in the room.

Rem: “Ummm…is it really okay for us to let Halibel-sama take care of Tia-sama?”

Subaru: “Hal-san shouldn’t have any problems. If Tia were to try and do something harmful, only Hal-san would be able to stop her, so it makes sense to have him near enough to keep an eye on her.”

Rem: “I see, that does make sense. Plus, moss might grow on Halibel-sama’s body if he doesn’t work like everyone else every now and then.”

Rem encouraged Halibel, understanding and moderate sharpness showing in her words.

Letting Halibel handle Tia was actually already an established thing—Halibel even gave his consent. That last interaction was just like something a play would regularly have, nothing more.

Fortunately, Halibel didn’t have to stay with Subaru and Rem anymore to protect them since he now had a good grasp of the tendencies of Tia, the attacker. Hence why he didn’t need to worry about working while being in constant fear of when she’d attack.

Subaru: “Now I just have to worry about if I’ll become a full-time worker and Rem’s stomach.”

Rem: “…As of right now, I believe that I could work without any difficulties.”

Subaru: “It’s going to be our first child. I don’t want anything to catch us off-guard. Although. From the little knowledge I have, I remember that most childbirths take 9 months and 10 days.”

Going off of Subaru’s knowledge, it would take roughly 10 ten months to go from pregnancy to childbirth—however, there was no way to find how how long she has been pregnant. He guessed about three months since her stomach didn’t look all that different. Besides, there was another problem.

Rem is an Oni—a Demi-human species, although they didn’t look like it. Could a normal human’s knowledge really be applied to having a feel for when she was pregnant and when she’d give birth?

On top of that, there was also an irregular condition where it was a mix between a human and an Oni.

Subaru: “Is there anything else we can do on top of keeping in touch and seeing that healing doctor?”

Rem: “I’m sorry. I don’t know much about this stuff. In a time like this…”

Subaru: “…”

Rem: “I-In a time like this, maybe we should find an experienced midwife.”

Rem hesitates, unable to find the right words, and then she says that. The reaction was unnatural, however Subaru did not say anything about it and just nodded as he said, “Yeah”.

He knew what Rem was going to say. There was an unspoken agreement between Subaru and Rem to not never touch on that subject.

Subaru says “All right” to pull himself together and put that matter behind as he continued,

Subaru: “Let’s just live like we always have until your stomach starts changing. However, if you aren’t feeling well, tell me right away. Even if it’s just a slight fever. I’ll get mad this time if you don’t tell me.”

Rem: “Understood. But if you do get mad, what would you do?”

Subaru: “You know. I’ll lock you in the room, and I’ll watch over you the whole time. Meanwhile, I’ll borrow from Hal-san for our living expenses, making us go into deep debt. It’ll be tough times once the child is born.”

Rem: “That’s…so…terrifying. I won’t let your idea become reality.”

Rem giggles, bringing herself close to Subaru since the fear was too much for her to handle. He embraces Rem’s slender body, and they hug each other in silence for a while.

As they did that, it naturally got closer to the time when they both have to leave for work.

Subaru: “All right, I’m gonna give it my all today too. I’ll be praying for nothing to happen to Hal-san and Tia as well.”

Rem: “Praying, yeah.”

They smile at each other one last time, and then they left their new room at the tenement house.

—In the evening, they would find out that their praying was off in a good way.

2

Halibel: “This is actually a really good catch. Even I rarely come across them.”

These were the thoughts of Halibel, who came with Tia on her first job. Tia came back with a bag filled with her reward, and she proudly put her feet on the table, but Rem scolded her for her actions, disheartening her.

Food was set on the dining table, knocking the closed reward bag onto the floor. Subaru had doubts about the report, seeing Rem lecturing Tia on the side.

Halibel: “No, I mean, I see why you’d be suspicious.”

Subaru: “After seeing that, yeah. Well, as long as it went well, it’s a good thing. So, what is this good catch? Tell me about it in detail.”

Halibel: “Hmm, so, at first, as decided, we chose a job on a wanted poster to catch a petty thief. But then that suddenly fell to our feet…obviously, I couldn’t just look. That became the reward we were dealing with, and then in the end it became a brutal arrest.”

Tia, who was brought to Clane’s employment agency, experimentally participated in bounty hunting with Halibel’s referral. Basically, they chose a random wanted poster on the store bulletin board, correctly tracked down the wanted criminal, and cornered him.

Halibel: “It was a petty crook committing theft at stores. But when we tried to break into his room, there were magic stones in it all over, causing a commotion. He ended up using them to try and suicide.”

Subaru: “So he was a really dangerous terrorist!”

Halibel: “Tia-chan socked him and tied him up. And then he said that he knew even more dangerous smugglers and that some of them are in town. We somehow got him to tell us their location, and we rounded up all of the idiots hiding in town, foiling their plan to destroy the city.”

Subaru: “That’s the feature film like incident that happened on your end today?!”

Subaru could only be amazed by the major event that happened behind the scenes and could’ve destroyed the town.

Subaru was completely unaware of the incident; he was even asking his female coworkers at his workplace what to do when the baby is born, and they laughed at him as they replied, “It’s too early for that stuff”.

Subaru: “Then, this heroine that saved the town got scolded because she put her feet on that dining table, and she’s all quiet now.”

Halibel: “Indeed, she is.”

Subaru and Halibel nod deeply. In their eyes, they saw Rem hesitantly explaining the importance of manners to Tia, who was completely afraid. Rem did not scold people by yelling; the way she did it spoke to the heart, and so it was rather painful in an emotionally.

Rem: “And so, manners are important. That also goes for showing respect to the people you eat with and the food you are served. Do you understand?”

Tia: “Yes yes, I understand. I UN-DER-STAND.”

Rem: “Tia-sama?”

Tia: “I-I told you, I understand…”

Perhaps this was a result of knowing that she was going to be a mother. Rem had no mercy when it came to being commanding, even with someone who was rather stronger than her. Overwhelmed by her force, Tia obediently sits down in front of the dining table girl-style.

Faced with Tia having downcasted eyes, Rem lets out a sigh, and then she said,

Rem: “Tia-sama, take this.”

Tia: “What’s this for…”

Rem: “I’m giving it since it seems you have trouble eating with chopsticks. Please use it with care.”

A wooden spoon—that’s what gets handed to Tia at the dining table, and Rem’s smile makes her eyes widen. Then, after she closed her eyes tight she said,

Tia: “Th-That’s kinda smart. All right. I’ll use it.”

As she said that, she accepted the present spoon. She had a grin on her face.

Tia: “It’s not feeding, but something like it…”

Halibel: “So, seeing her act like that, I guess Su-san wins the bet for now.”

Subaru: “If the bet is that Tia won’t cause any problems, then Rem is the one who won. And she still is.”

Halibel: “Ahh, that’s true.”

When Subaru sneered, Halibel replied by suddenly smiling. Seeing those two men act like that, Rem, who finished her lecture, clapped her hands.

Rem: “Now, let’s eat. Tia-sama had her first job today, and even Halibel-sama worked too, so the food should be delicious.”

Halibel: “Great, but is there some for me?”

Everyone follows Rem’s instruction and sits at the dining table. Subaru was curious as to why there was food for Tia and Halibel like it was the most natural thing, but the two of them had expectant looks on their faces, so he didn’t say anything.

They express their thanks in unison(Tia did it reluctantly), and he stopped caring about his concern once they started eating. Tonight’s menu was a fish focused Japanese style dish arranged by Rem. They dig in.

They were greatly pleased. Tia especially was digging in.

Tia: “I’m impressed, Rem. The light texture of the fish and the taste changes with the slightly burnt part. I can’t stop eating…!”

Rem: “Thank you very much, Tia-sama. There’s actually white vegetable sauce in it.”

Tia: “—! No way! Th-The the flavor is this refreshing?!”

It seemed like Rem was happily feeding Tia, who kept overreacting. It looked like a rare animal enjoying food that didn’t exist in its habitat.

It also seemed like the bloodlust disappeared and that she completely opened up to them, which made Subaru feel relieved.

Halibel: “Gotta bathe after eating. We made a lot with the reward, so you wouldn’t get angry if I drank after taking a bath, would you?”

Rem: “As long as you don’t make Subaru-kun and I drink, I have no complaints. Don’t make Tia-sama do it, either.”

Subaru: “You probably shouldn’t for safety’s sake…”

The three of them face each other, and they take a glance at Tia.

She was focusing on picking the leftover grains of rice in her rice bowl, paying no attention to their conversation.

They were afraid of having no idea what she would do if they got drunk. Unfortunately, Halibel would have to drink alone tonight.

Furthermore, Subaru prefers to not drink, as he didn't really like alcohol, and Rem has an extremely low alcohol tolerance for an Oni, thus they have never accepted Halibel's invitations.

Halibel: "Damn, I'm so sad."

In the end, nobody joined in to drink with Halibel, and he shook his whiskers in disappointment. Although his murmuring wasn't supposed to be a cue or anything, Tia, having finished destroying her grains of rice, tilted her head as she said, "What?" as she continued,

Tia: "What is this about? I'm stuffed, and I want to go to bed right about now."

Rem: "You can't. You worked the whole day, so you're probably covered in sweat. —So you have to take a bath."

Tia: "…If it's like bathing in a river or a lake, then fine I'll do it."

Rem: "No! Let's go to the bath-house!"

Rem leans forward, and she enthusiastically tried to convince Tia, who was uninterested. Her energy makes Tia's eyes widen, and she asks Subaru and Halibel for help. However, unfortunately—

Subaru: "—The bath-house is pretty nice."

Halibel: "Sure is."

Nobody was on Tia's side.

3

—About the "bath-houses" of this world", they're pretty straightforward, and are quite literally public baths.

A bath tub lies in a wide space, and the water stored inside of it heats up with the use of a magic stone at the bottom of the tub. The structure of the bath-house was extremely simple, except for the fact that it used special tools.

At first, Subaru was surprised by bath-houses with how common they were.

Subaru: “Well, in manga I’ve read that in ancient times there were already baths during Roman period. The existence of bath-houses isn’t all that strange in comparison to that.”

Plus, even ninjas finally showed up in Kararagi Wafuu culture. He definitely wouldn’t be surprised by stuff like bathtubs and daikon radish.

Subaru: “I’m gonna act very surprised if I find a Japanese mascot.”

Halibel: “What have you been mumbling about?”

Then, a ninja soaking right next to him in the bathtub spoke. The ninja soaked in the bath all the way up to his head. His whole body was wet, including his fearless face, and his hair was sticking together.

Now he truly was a wet dog. With just his body and appearance, he could no longer find any similarities to when he was dry.

Subaru: “So I’ve been thinking about different world people, it’s a pain living in a combined culture with all the differences races have. Once you get out of a bath, sometimes you’ll have someone’s fallen hair all over your body.”

Halibel: “You just have to pour hot water on yourself before you get out. Or do you have some sort of interesting idea?”

Subaru: “Let’s see. …Use the drain around the edge of the bathtub, control the flow of the hot water with a magic stone, and let the water run. Set a net for to catch the fallen hair that’ll get inside, and the hot water that passes through will come back.”

Halibel: “Hmmm? Can you draw a picture for that? I don’t really get it."

It was kind of summer-ish. Halibel didn't really care too much about his pool based proposal as he looked up in the bathtub contentedly moaning, "Oh yeahhh." However, he didn't blame him.

Everyone reverts to a naked beast once they soak in warm bath. Which has nothing to do with the worries Subaru had about differences between races.

—Right now, he just wanted to soak in the motherly warmth of this bathtub.

Subaru: "Which is why I'd like to ignore the voice I can hear over the wall…"

Tia: "Hey, hey! Isn't this cool?! Wow, oh my, I've never seen anything like it!"

Halibel: "Oh, Su-san, that's probably not possible. See, look over there."

Subaru was covering his face with a towel, but he heard a familiar high-pitched screech and was tapped on the shoulder by Halibel from the side, he couldn't ignore it anymore. He takes off the towel, and once he looked in the direction Halibel pointed at, he saw a tall wall—in bath-houses, the men's bath and the women's bath are separated. There was a wall separating them.

Often times, for some reason the baths are connected at the top of the wall, so—

Tia: "Oh! There they are! Hey, you two! Isn't it amazing how the bath feels so nice?"

Subaru: "…"

Tia had crept up to the small hole at the top of ceiling and the wall, seeming to have climbed up the wall. She peeked through the hole, and their eyes met. She was nude, waving her hand innocently, but fortunately the wall was hiding the parts below her chest.

But still, her wet hair and the curves of her exposed nape and shoulders were quite charming, and to tell the truth, it was alluring. Also, the people at the men's bath were startled when they were suddenly peeked at by a heavenly beautiful woman.

???: "Kyaaa!!"

They weren't really shrill shrieks, but rough shrieks that resounded throughout the men's bath.

There were people who fell over, people who ran into the dressing room, and people who dove into the bath. Tia looks down at everyone running in confusion, and it makes her blink in surprise.

Tia; Don't really get what's going on, but it does feel nice seeing males running away…"

Subaru: "Like anyone cares about your fetishes! Get the hell down from there!"

Tia: "Aww, but I have such a nice view from here. Oh yeaaah. Are there any differences between this bath and that bath? Can I check it out for a bit?"

Subaru: "You idi…!"

Without any hesitation, Tia climbs over the wall and tries to join the men's bath. He tried to stop her immediately, but unfortunately he could not reach the top of the wall from the bathtub.

Something happened immediately after Subaru gave up and decided to overlook Tia's reckless actions, when the people in the men's bath held their breath.

There was a high-pitched, tremendous scraping sound, and then Tia was no longer seen on the top of the wall. However, she didn't climb over. She had disappeared into the women's bath. And then immediately after that, there were successive sounds of large bodies falling onto the water, causing grand explosions in the bath-house.

Rem: "—Everyone, my dearest apologies for all the trouble. Please continue to enjoy the bath."

Once the sound of the water completely disappeared, those polite words were forwarded from the women's bath to the men's bath. It was obvious who said those words.

Subaru: "Rem?"

Rem: "Subaru-kun, I'm sorry. I was in the middle of washing my body at the washing place…but it's fine now."

Subaru: "Oh, good call. But anyways…"

It seems Rem had fixed the situation over at the women's bath. He felt like praising his wife for her clutch assistance, but there was something else on his mind.

That was—

Subaru: "That sounded like the nostalgic sound of chains, huh…"

Rem: "It's for self protection."

Subaru: "But this is a bathhouse, and Rem should be naked…"

Rem: "It's for self protection."

Her stubborn replies denied Subaru from any further questioning. Plus, since Subaru wasn't at the scene over the wall, he had no way of confirming it. The case was closed. It was unsolved.

Halibel: "Rem-chan sure is impressive."

Then, Halibel, who floated in the bathtub with his tray and sake and acted unconcerned the whole time, let out those carefree thoughts, and he was licking the sake with his red face covered by his hair

Once that he finished, after getting out of the bath, they went to the bath-house entrance to meet up with the two people who were at the women's bath.

The bath-house entrance had a space that was like a lounge, and apart from the dressing room, visitors could relax as much as they wanted there. Most of the time it'd become a place where old people meet, and they'd wait patiently for visitors who entered the bath to get out.

There was one dead tired woman slovenly lying down on a couch in that space—

Rem: "Apparently it was her first time at a bath-house, so she went too nuts and felt dizzy after staying in too long."

Subaru: "So that's why she using my special seat. I can tell that it's her first time, though."

As he grumbled, Subaru saw Tia, who was lying down while moaning "Oooh" and "Ahhh", receiving a lap pillow from Rem. Her white skin glowed so much that at first glance you could tell she had a head rush. Had she been standing up with a serious face right now, she would've certainly looked charming.

Although, by lying down in a sad, exposed state, men lose interest in hitting on her.

Subaru: "Wow, you even borrowed a fan for this girl."

Rem: "If she falls over on the way back, she'd get covered in mud after all that cleaning."

Subaru: "Sounds better than trying to maintain her beauty…all right, hand me the fan. I'll fan her. Whoosh…whoosh whoosh… whoosh whoosh whoosh!"

Tia: "Ooooooo…that feels so grooood."

Subaru takes the fan from Rem, who had been gently fanning her, and then he creates a storm. Bathing in that storm, Tia seemed to be enjoying it, although she was still groggy.

However, soon enough, his arms couldn't take it anymore. His fanning slows down, and stops.

Tia: "Come ooon, can't you fan me more?"

Subaru: “Don’t be so spoiled. Besides, Rem’s lap is mine. And the fan is borrowed. Who do you think you are, a princess?”

Tia: “So annoying…”

Tia grimaces at Subaru’s point, and he takes the fan away from him. After that, while Tia started fanning herself, Subaru looked at the wrist of her right hand.

Subaru: “What’s that? A friendship bracelet?”

Tia: “Don’t know what a friendship bracelet is, but Hal gave it to me. He told me to put it on. Is it a charm?”

Rem: “A charm, huh. It’s a bit surprising to see Halibel-sama give Tia-sama a gift.”

Subaru: “Well, it can’t be Hal-san trying to put the moves on Tia…”

She pouted, and she looked beautiful fanning herself quickly, but she also looked childish. Halibel’s true motive was unknown, and there may be no particular reason behind his actions, but all he had to investigate and cool down.

He was warmed up now, so he was going to finish his business and leave before he caught a cold.

Subaru: “All right, it’s time for the last bath-house ritual. You’re coming, too.”

Tia: “Ritual…?”

Rem: “Yes, a ritual. If you don’t do it, it’d defeat the purpose of coming to the bath-house.”

Subaru and Rem, the married couple, confidently replied to Tia, who gave a dubious look. The firmness of their tones confused Tia, further increasing the surprise of the one who showed up afterwards.

The one who came was Halibel—however, the hair on his dry head was fluffy, and he looked like a completely different person, despite them being familiar with how he looked.

Tia: “You’re the mutt, right?”

Halibel: “Yeah, it’s me. Also, here, take this. Gotta drink it before it warms up, or else it’d be a waste.”

Tia: “W-Wait a second…what’s this? A beast’s milk?”

Halibel: “Watch how you put it!”

What Halibel brought over in his hands was a white liquid in a bottle—what Tia said wasn’t wrong, but put in a more tasteful way it would be:

Subaru: “It’s milk for when you get out of the bath…it’s a universal ritual!”

One could call it “all worlds do it”, and it wouldn’t be an exaggeration. Or at least, if the stylistic beauty was common between the two worlds Subaru knew, you could call it a ceremony passed across worlds.

Strictly speaking, this wasn’t cow milk, and it wasn’t fruit milk either, which would have been ideal. However, there at least was a skill to keep bottled milk cold, and it would be best not to expect more than that.

Subaru: “Uncork the bottle! Put your hand on your hip! Then drink up!”

While Subaru enthusiastically explained the steps, he performed the ritual.

Cold milk goes through his throat, flowing into his warm stomach. That refreshing feeling-the strong counter for his body that warmed up inside from the bath, that is the best part of bath-houses.

Rem: “Mm!”

Shouting cutely, Rem also drinks milk like Subaru. Then so did Halibel, along with other people who got out of the bath.

Tia: “Ahaha! Y-Your face! A mustache! It’s making a mustache!”

Subaru: “It’s part of what makes this beautiful!”

Tia: “Lame! So lame! You look like an idiot!”

Developing a white mustache after getting milk around your mouth was like proof that the ritual was a success.

Incidentally, it was hard for Halibel to get milk around his mouth because of its structure. After Rem sneakily finished drinking, she looked back and gently wiped her mouth without letting anyone see.

Dubiously gazing at the three of them, Tia uncorks the bottle with a suspicious look. Then, after she took a light sniff of the smell, she put her hand on her hip, and she drank—

Tia: “—It’s so good!”

Then, a white mustache developed around her mouth, and she said that as her eyes shined.

4

The four of them were walking back in their yukatas as the refreshing night wind blew.

Tia: “Bath-houses aren’t as bad as I thought. Oh, just so you know, that’s just because I was surprised.”

Halibel: “It’s not like I’m listening anyway.”

It was Tia, who walked with light steps, and Halibel going home. Tia was humming happily, perhaps because she had enjoyed her experience at the bath-house a lot.

Although she was off key and it sounded like there was no melody, it was the same thing Subaru had heard just yesterday. Since she was singing the same thing, it didn’t seem like she was singing randomly.

Halibel: “What song is that?”

Tia: “Hmm? A nameless song. If I had to name it…”

Tia puts her finger on her lip, and she went into deep thought for a moment.

And then—

Tia: “It’d be the “Die Song”!”

Subaru: “Pick a better name!!”

The words were just too dangerous, so Subaru reflexively butted in from the back. That makes Tia irritatedly say “What’s wrong with it?” as she clicked her tongue.

Rem: “Subaru-kun’s right. It’s such a lovely song, after all.”

Tia: “This again…it’s not like you’d ever going to disagree with your male partner anyway, Rem.”

Rem: “Yes, that’s right. I pretty much agree with everything Subaru-kun says. Sometimes I do disagree, though.”

Tia: “Hey! So I had this realization…I don’t think I like Rem’s bossiness!”

Overwhelmed by something that was neither stress nor praise, Tia runs away with her head between her hands. Rem was the one who took over the humming for Tia.

Having heard it once, Rem somehow starts humming the same song.

Tia: “…Not quite. That’s not it, haha…hahaha.”

Rem: “Hmm, well I didn’t catch it very well. Tia-sama, please let me hear it again.”

Tia: “You wanna hear it that badly? Really? Well, I guess I have no choice.”

Pleased with Rem, who gave a low bow, Tia starts to hum the song once again. Had they not know that it was the “Die Song”, it would just sound like an enchanting song with a nice voice.

Subaru and Rem naturally start to speak less. Halibel also walked the street without saying anything.

There was only Tia’s humming in the quiet street at night.

Stars in the sky, and below it, the light of the paper lanterns dimly lighting the street red. Considering only that, it looked very mystical, like a moment in a dream—.

Rem: “Subaru-kun?”

Subaru: “Yeah?”

Because he was immersed in the atmosphere, his response to Rem was a little late.

Rem smiles slightly, understanding how Subaru felt, and her face turned red as she said,

Rem: “I was just thinking…”

Subaru: “About what?”

Rem: “If only this moment could last longer for our child to see it…”

Rem says that with a gentle smile, and she rubbed her stomach softly. Her gesture and words make Subaru feel really embarrassed, and he couldn’t put his feelings into words.

Subaru: “…”

He simply gently held onto Rem’s free hand, combining their warmth, and they went home.

And that’s how the night went.

—The days went on slowly. Without any time to stop, like water flowing.

They were busy, noisy days.

Ever since the night Subaru met with the strange neighbors at the tenement house, the days were eventful in a good way, and hardly any of the things he was anxious about happened.

It somehow became a habit for Tia and Halibel to accompany Subaru and Rem at the dining table in the morning, and they'd spend time together until work while talking about their plans for the day.

Tia: "They need me, or else crooks will be on the loose. Even Clane said so."

Rem: "Tia is as reliable as expected. I'm very thankful. Looks like you might get more food!"

Tia: "This is where you give me more! You don't mean "might get more", you will give me more!"

Tia decided on doing "bounty hunting" as her job after getting a taste of success with her first job. It seemed that it really was Tia's calling, and from what they'd been told, her arrest rate was quite something.

Jobs handled at Clane's employment agency are recognized by the town—because of this, a lot of the jobs are highly beneficial to Banan town. Inevitably, Tia's efforts were making the town more safe.

Halibel: "Put yourself in my shoes as someone who has to go with her. I haven't been able to take a lovely nap with the sun out for so many days. My internal body clock is going to get messed up at this rate."

Rem: "Isn't this a sign that you're getting closer to being a proper citizen?"

Subaru: “Rem’s right. Suck it up and follow Tia around. I’m sure you’ll even lose some of that stomach fat of yours that you’ve been worrying about.”

As a married couple, Subaru and Rem soothe Halibel, who took a barrage of criticism while frowning. Seeing that interaction out of the corner of her eye, Tia happily drinks her miso soup as she raised her bowl and said, “More please!”

Subaru frequently went to the Magoji palace at noon, even after the defined period of time.

He succeeded at obtaining the steady job that he’d dreamed of without any problems. This was all thanks to Riften and the landlady recognizing Subaru’s abilities, and it was the reward for living up to their expectations.

However, if there was one thing that was different from what he’d expected—

Subaru: “—All right, today let’s review the basics of making youfuku(Western-style clothes).”

???: “Yeeees, Subaru-chan.”

Subaru: “Good answer! However, I’m the Sensei now. Call me Sensei, okay?”

???: “You got it, Subaru-chan Sensei.”

Subaru was shrugging his shoulders as he smiled wryly at the playful women.

Subaru was officially hired at the Magoji palace, but her was no longer just a servant, he was also acted as a teacher in a little “class for lessons”.

The classroom was one of Magoji palace’s tatami rooms. In it, you’d mainly learn about sowing, Subaru’s speciality, and a version of fashion related western-style clothing-stuff you’d call embroidery. Even in Kararagi, where Wafuu culture was popular, it was hard for it to take root, even with fashion culture from other countries coming over. In this place, someone with the knowledge and the skills becomes a teacher, and people would get the help they have always wanted with the western-style clothes women usually wore.

Most of the students were female coworkers working at the palace and bourgeoisie wives around the same age. Once in a while there'd be young women who would study the basics and planned on doing a job related to it in the future, but these were the kind of people who came, more or less.

If there had to be name for Subaru's job, you'd call it a cultural lecturer, the parallel universe version.

Riften: "I thought I told you that I have high hopes for your femininity."

Subaru: "Well, I don't have any complaints. I don't, but this is one of those things you're into, isn't it?"

Riften: "What a terrible misunderstanding. I just wanted to see my beloved girls in something other than wafuu clothing. I'm just trying to make that small wish come true, that's all."

Subaru: "For some reason you keep denying you're into cougars…"

Incidentally, Subaru's lessons are mostly popular, and they were talking about increasing his lessons from three times a week to four times a week. If the knowledge from Subaru's world was helpful at all, he'd like to use this cultural school as an excuse to spread it to others.

At night, after Subaru's work ended at the palace, he said goodbye to the ladies and the gatekeeper, who he was familiar with, and he went to the tenement house—no, he went to Temple Elementary School to see Rem.

Ever since he found out that Rem was pregnant, he always made sure to walk home with Rem. Otherwise, he wouldn't know if something happened along the way, and it'd be too late after something did happen.

Subaru: "A stranger might suddenly attack for an unjust reason, after all.”

Tia: “What? I don’t get it, why did you look at my face when you said that? You got a problem, Su?”

In front of Temple Elementary School, which bathed in the sun, Subaru and Tia came across each other at a street, and they exchanged those words as they both grimaced.

Subaru going to meet Rem was a natural thing to do as a husband. However, Tia frequently going to Temple Elementary School to meet Rem sort of ruined the married couple’s time together.

That alone showed that she was attached to Rem, and sometimes it’d be too much.

Subaru: “Also, it doesn’t feel right when you call me Su.”

Tia: “What a pain. Hal calls you that, so there shouldn’t be a problem with me calling you it, too. Besides, I’m only here for Rem, you’re not needed.”

Tia pouted and acted intimidating, and Subaru also pouted at her. This was better than her calling them by their sex by saying stuff like “males”, but the arrogance of her responses wasn’t any different how it was in the beginning.

Subaru: “Then I’m going to tell Rem and you’ll get less food.”

Tia: “Y-You coward. You’re so heartless…!”

Still, their relationship was way more relaxed than before, just because they found a way to make her think twice.

Rem: “Subaru-kun, Tia-sama, thanks for waiting. …You two didn’t fight, did you?”

Subaru: “We did” [Tia: “Of course we did.”

Plus, the thing they both felt the strongest about was Rem smiling.

Given that people have time, everyone eats dinner together at night after coming home, and that even includes Halibel, who always goes off somewhere.

It seemed Tia was uninterested in the reward for her bounty hunting, and ever since she earned enough money to pay off the tenement house reparations with her first job, and all of her rewards were handled by Rem.

Rem: “So, when all your work goes well, you can treat yourself. When it doesn’t, spend wisely.”

Tia: “I can’t just live large everyday with all the money I have?”

Rem: “If you do that, you’ll forget to appreciate how special it is, and most importantly, you’d hurt Subaru-kun’s pride as the breadwinner. This is my prudence as a great wife.”

Subaru: “But I’d be pleased if you don’t tell anyone about this great wife’s prudence !”

He forgave her since Rem looked cute apologizing with her tongue stuck out. It was also for the sake of his own pride, though.

Moving on, Tia worked hard to understand Rem’s point as she nodded and went, “Uh-huh”. Their relationship was a strange thing; Tia was the one who looked the most mature, but inside, she was like a child—she acted like a wolf girl. Rem interacted with Tia, who didn’t act how she looked, affectionately, like how a mother or an older sister would.

Viewing her as a mother, this could be practice for the child. However, if Subaru viewed her as an older sister, that would be complicated and it’d make him feel like he was walking on thin ice.

Halibel: “Su-san, what’s wrong?”

Seeing Subaru go into deep thought, Halibel, who was the only one drinking alcohol, tilts his head and asks him a question. In response, Subaru says, “No” as he tilted his head and continued,

Subaru: “It’s nothing. I was just thinking about how nice it’d be if we got treated tomorrow.”

Rem: “Halibel-sama would really have to go out on a limb for that. After all, Halibel-sama is the reason why we can’t be treated in the first place.”

Tia: “Really? Then I should spank him and make him work!”

Halibel: “Don’t you think you’re treating me too cruelly?”

And so, that’s how the night went the exact opposite way the morning did with loud laugher at the dining table.

After they finished eating, they went to the bath-house, Rem watched over Tia, who acted a bit more responsibly than last time, Subaru and Halibel took their time enjoying the bath, and they went home after enjoying milk upon getting out of the bath.

Tia’s humming resounded throughout the street at night. Lately, it has been like a duet with Rem. In a way, listening to that added elegance to the time they spent going home, and Subaru loved it.

Their precious, busy, noisy time went on slowly.

6

Tia: “Wooow, it takes a lot more time for a child to be born than I thought.”

Tia puts her arms behind the back of her head, and she said that in a carefree tone.

She was on the way home from Temple Elementary School walking with Subaru and Rem on the street during the evening, which became a daily thing. She was looking at Rem’s stomach.

Rem was slightly smiling in a kimono—and her stomach was big enough to recognize it from afar.

Subaru: “Taking a glance, it’s probably been about 6 months… perhaps? So like in the middle stage of pregnancy.”

Tia: “Middle stage? Still only halfway there?! Wow, animals would never take this long.”

Subaru: “I’m not an animal! I’m a human! It takes quite a long time.”

Tia brings up a ridiculous example, Subaru lightly flicked her forehead, and she groaned while her forehead was being pushed. After that, she took a side glance at Rem and said,

Tia: “Isn’t it rough having your stomach so big? It doesn’t look like you could jump or hop.”

Rem: “I can’t deny that it is rough. Often times it’s difficult sticking out my chest, and there’s no way I could jump or hop, so I’ll let you do it, Tia-sama.”

Tia: “If you insist. I’m good at jumping and hopping anyways.”

While Tia got carried away, full of herself, Subaru broke into a smile with that interaction.

They’ve had a baby for about 6 months now—meaning, they’ve been neighbors with Tia for 3 months. Although they were worried at first, it was a completely stable life now.

Rem wasn’t in the stable period of pregnancy, but they were able to deal with Tia’s temper pretty well now.

Tia: “I wonder if it’s going to be a male or a female.”

Rem: “Whether it’s a boy or a girl, it’ll probably be naughty like Subaru-kun. But it’s acting up a lot in my stomach, so I think it might be a girl.”

Subaru: “If it’s acting up, wouldn’t that mean it’s a boy?”

Rem: “—? Would it?”

According to Rem’s self-diagnosis, apparently the baby is a girl. The way she came to that judgement made Subaru look dubious, but Rem tilted her head, and even Tia had a question mark above her because of Subaru.

In this world, people might think that girls are naughty.

Now that he thought about it, it did seem like a lot of the girls he got involved with in this world were active. —That's when his thought was interrupted.

Subaru: "Well, people are delighted when their first is a girl. Back at my home town, they say 'First Princess, then Taro', meaning it's best to first have a girl and then a boy."

Rem: "First Princess, then Taro?"

Subaru: "Princess is the girl, while Taro is the boy. It means the first is a princess, and the second is the eldest son. If I remember correctly, it means girls don't cry as much or something like that."

Kids being hard to take care of is common knowledge, and it's even been engraved in Subaru's limited knowledge. Obviously he's never had any real experience with it, but at any rate, it's a lot of work to take care of babies when they're highly prone to crying—he was already being lectured a lot by his female coworkers at the palace.

Subaru: "By studying the fundamentals of childcare with our first being a girl, it will be easier to deal with the second one. It's like the wisdom of my ancestors, or more like advice they came up with from personal experience."

Rem: "I see. …So I have to give birth to a girl first no matter what."

Subaru: "You don't have to put weird pressure on yourself because of what I said, even if it is a boy."

With a wry smile, Subaru scratches his cheek. To Subaru's side, it was unclear how seriously Rem took him, and she said,

Rem: "For Subaru-kun, do your best to be a…be a girl."

She was saying this to the child inside of her. However, he's heard that the gender of a baby is determined the moment fertilization happens, so Rem was all too late to speak to it.

Subaru: "If you're a boy, just come out healthy already. Cry all you want. If we learn the hard parts early, it might be easier later."

Rem: “Oh, that’s right. First it has to come out healthy…yeah, that’s what’s most important.”

Subaru: “Yep, that’s what’s most important…Oh, it moved.”

The baby responded to Subaru, who touched Rem’s stomach and talked to it while stroking it. The new life inside of Rem was already focused on turning and pushing.

Subaru really felt like it was a boy, but—

Subaru: “Maybe that’s because I’m thinking too much about after it’s born.”

Thinking rationally, he’d have the easiest time preparing if he knew whether it was a boy or a girl before it was born. The kind of choices he had for play equipment would be settled, and that’d go for clothes too, of course.

Before he had a kid, that’s actually what Subaru thought, but strangely enough, now he thinks otherwise.

He felt like the things that were unknown until it’s born were like blessings invoked by the baby.

Tia: “Still, about 6 months to go? Hmm, that sure is a long wait.”

Rem: “I’m sure that time will go by before we even know it. Would you prefer it be faster?”

Tia: “I don’t mind…It’s just that, at this rate, I’ll never get a clue for the light sphere.”

Rem: “…”

The words Tia spoke while she pouted and glared at the sunset—hearing “light sphere” made Subaru’s cheeks stiffen, and Rem also lost her breath for a moment.

light sphere-that’s what Tia was looking for, and it was the very thing that started this life.

Tia did not hesitate to say that Rem stole it for sure. However the baby got in the way of forcing information out of her, she was let off the hook until childbirth, and they became good neighbors.

However, Tia really hadn't talked about the light sphere since the first few days, and she wasn't acting suspicious of Rem. Hence why the matter was kept in the very back of her mind.

She couldn't hide her shock from Tia still remembering it and going after it.

Subaru: "…In any case, suck it up until these 6 months are over. That was the deal."

Tia: "Yes yes, I know that. 6 months…6 months, eh…"

Strictly speaking, a pregnancy period is about 10 months—if this is the 6th month, then there has to be 4 months left. Subaru still not pointing out that she was off by 2 months showed how he hoped to postpone 'that' moment.

It was not the same as when they had a terrible meeting. Tia was now an irreplaceable friend.

Tia: "If Rem gets pregnant again right after you're born, I'm going to be very troubled."

Tia talked to Rem—no, she talked to the baby while saying those things.

She wouldn't hurt Rem while she had a baby. Tia was so attached to these days that she laughed off her own rule that she had made. Subaru felt that it'd be nice if that was the case.

Rem: "Subaru-kun…"

Subaru: "Man, Rem, I'm not sure what to do when you make such a determined look…"

Rem looked at Subaru with watery, serious eyes as she firmly clenched her fist, making him knit his brows. Were her cheeks red because of determination? Or were they red because of the sunset?

In any case, he shrunk back when Rem implicitly showed her determination to have a second child. Of course, Subaru was also in favor of having another so that the child would have a younger sibling, but family finances were a big problem.

They had their first one pretty haphazardly, so he wanted to be more careful with the second one.

Subaru: “But if Tia has a change of heart…well, I don’t think that’ll happen anyways.”

Rem: “Maybe if we keep having kids non-stop until we die…”

Subaru: “That idea kind of sounds like a horror!”

In response to Rem seriously making scary plans, Subaru took her hand and guided her downstairs. Rem follows his natural guidance, and Tia was waiting at the bottom, as she went down the stairs a little quicker.

Going home in the evening, the usual affectionate time. 4 days left—this might be the last of these times; it was a fleeting scene that made him feel regretful.

—Somehow that evanescence made Subaru’s heart-ache as he squinted at the bright setting sun.

Halibel: “Oh. You must be beat. You worked all day again.”

When they came back to the tenement house, they saw Halibel smoking his kiseru sitting on a bench.

Lately, Halibel has tended to skip out on going to work with Tia. It seemed he was taking advantage of Tia being used to her job now, and so the “Eternal Playboy” made his comeback.

In other words, he was headed towards becoming a bum. Naturally, the three of them treated him coldly now.

Tia: “How lucky you are, yet again. Even though you’re a mutt, you can't be a watchdog when you're staggering all over the place."

Subaru: "Does the food taste good when you don't work?"

Halibel: "Wooow, a storm of verbal abuse. That's not nice. Rem-chan, say something about this."

Rem: "Let's see. …I think food tastes the best when you're fulfilled with work."

Halibel: "It's just the way you put it that's gentle. You're just as hurtful as Subaru!"

Halibel gets struck by Subaru, Tia, and then Rem with finishing blows, and he leaned back as he surrendered. After that, he slowly brought his bent body back into its original posture and said,

Halibel: "Yes, lately I haven't been working and have been lazing around, but today was a bit different."

Tia: "A bit different, and yet it seems your laziness hasn't gotten any better."

Halibel: "Let's not talk about that. Also, I've done all these things for you today, so I'd like you to take that into account."

Hearing Halibel's statement, Tia pointed at herself with a blank look. Once Halibel calmly nodded, he pointed the tip of his kiseru towards the tenement house—towards the entrance to Tia's room.

Halibel: "Come on, Su-san, reveal it."

Subaru: "You act as if I'm an accomplice for your schemes, but you haven't told me anything, either…oh?"

After the calming instruction, Subaru opened the sliding door to Tia's room. Once he took a look inside, the scenery made his eyes open wide. Inside, there was—

Rem: "Wow. Flowers, sweets…and even kimonos. Are these gifts?"

Rem, who viewed the Room like Subaru did, put her hands together, and she was impressed as her eyes sparkled.

As implied by Rem's words, Tia's room had a total make-over. This room, which Subaru and Rem previously lived in, had the minimum amount of furniture and was quite bland, even after the marks from Tia's rage were repaired.

And now, flowers were placed here and in the room, as well as kimonos and candy boxes on top of the tatami mats; it was full of all kinds of gifts.

Subaru: "For someone like Halibel-san, these touches are quite nice."

Halibel: "Hehehe, what do you think? See me in a new light now, right? That's what I'd like to say, but these gifts aren't really from me. These are gifts from the townspeople."

Receiving praiseful words from Subaru, Halibel quickly gives away the truth. It was too thoughtful for someone like Halibel, so he was convinced when he was told that he didn't do all this, but to tell the truth, he was shocked.

The people of Banan town gifted the owner of room—that is, they gifted Tia.

Halibel: "About Tia's work, I did say that her arrest-rate is impressive, right? But the employment agency job isn't the only job where Tia-chan is helping with all sorts of things."

Rem: "She has a job on top of her employment agency one?"

Halibel: "It's more like a helper sort of thing. She frequently goes around doing favors…they piled up, and this is how they've repaid her."

Listening to Halibel give an explanation with his arms folded, Subaru and Rem looked at each other, showing that neither of them knew about all this.

Strangely enough, this is exactly what they had thought about. There were many times when people in town said hi to Tia in a very friendly way when they were on their way back from places like Temple Elementary School or the bath-house. Subaru thought that this was because of her achievements with her employment agency job, but that wasn't the case.

Tia had been deepening her exchanges with the townspeople without Subaru and Rem knowing about it.

Subaru and Rem were comprehending the situation, whereas Tia was silent in front of the presents she was given. Her cheeks were red, and she was just playing with her hair with her finger to show her confusion.

Without knowing what was this feeling welling up inside, as if it was too much to handle.

Rem: "Let's have a feast tonight. We have all this food, after all."

Tia: "Rem…"

Rem: "These presents are for Tia-sama. We can't let it go to waste. I may not be able to finish it all myself, so will you help me?"

Tia's eyes shook as she heard Rem's proposal. Then, after pondering for a little bit, Tia nodded deeply at Rem without saying anything.

Seeing her nod, Rem rolls up her sleeves—and so began the preparations for the feast.

7

Even though it was a feast, there was no clear thing they were celebrating.

But still, if they were having this feast for something, it would be—

Rem: "—To celebrate Tia-sama becoming a member of the town."

Then, Rem tells Subaru that with a smile, and this was enough to convince him.

Celebrating becoming a member of the town—for Subaru and Rem, having the people around them kindly helping them out because they knew about their child was like proof that they were recognized by the town.

If something similar happened to Tia, that truly would be wonderful.

“…”

On top of the dining table, each and everyone one of the plates were empty.

Only four people were having a feast, but it was still a feast. Rem had put in her full effort, and she attacked with an amount of food worthy of her reputation. However, Tia faced all of it head-on, and with Subaru and Halibel’s help, amazingly managed to finish it off.

And so, she gave in to the fullness of her big stomach, and she was now breathing in her sleep.

Subaru: “She becomes a cow as soon as she sleeps after eating. And now her beauty is ruined.”

Halibel: “Oh, Su-san, I’m surprised you’re saying this when your wife is right next to you.”

Subaru: “I’m always praising Rem 100 times as much as that. Besides, I have no intentions of harming Tia. Tia is like…hm … She’s like a little sister.”

Judging off their appearances, it wasn’t clear who was older. However, by comparing their behavior and common sense, a whole audience would agree that Subaru was older than Tia.

In fact, neither Rem nor Halibel disagreed, and they just made gentle looks upon hearing Subaru’s statement.

Halibel: “But I don’t think she fell asleep just because she got full. She secretly took some sips of that.”

Subaru: “Some sips…oh.”

As Halibel chuckled, he pointed at somewhere behind Tia's butt while she lay down—hidden in the hem of her dress was an awfully expensive bottle of alcohol.

This was probably one of her gifts as well. Although, Subaru and the others did come to the decision to not let Tia drink since it'd be risky.

Halibel: "Continuing to hide something just because you've already began doing it…children find it intriguing. Eventually, it turned out like this."

Subaru: "…But you were still wrong to let it happen while knowing about it."

Halibel: "It's so cute how she sleeps right after having a taste of it. If she caused ruckus everywhere because of this, I would've had to take responsibility, but that didn't happen."

Subaru frowned when Halibel judged that everything turned out alright in the end. However, when he looked at Tia's calm sleeping face, he started to feel that he was wrong to be mad.

Even if Tia got drunk off alcohol, would she would use violence on Subaru, like she did before, and get back her "light sphere" even if it meant taking Rem's life away?—It was very hard for him to imagine her doing that.

Halibel: "Um, about the light sphere…"

Subaru: "—! Learned something?"

Halibel: "I frequently went around investigating. Did you think I was just lazing around?"

Halibel opens one of his slit eyes, and he gave a wink that meant the opposite of what it normally would mean. Seeing him do that, Subaru raises his eyebrows in surprise as he said,

Subaru: "Yeah, I thought you were just fooling around…now I think better of you!"

Rem: “Yes, I see you in a much better light now! Impressive, Halibel-sama!”

Halibel: “Here I was thinking about how skilled you guys are at acting normal as married couple…”

Giving a wry smile, Halibel scratches his own black-haired head. After that, in a low tone he said,

Halibel: “Sorry to get your hopes up. I haven’t heard anything about what exactly this light sphere is or where it’s at. The situation is still the same. I’m sorry.”

Subaru: “Sigh…”

Halibel: “Can you hold in your sighs? Also, if I haven’t heard anything about the light sphere, isn’t that enough to give us some nice information? Such that even the existence of it is fishy.”

Rem: “So you’re suspecting Tia-sama made everything up?”

Hearing Halibel’s words, Rem’s voice tenses up, and she says that in a bit of a criticizing manner. Subaru also felt disgusted by his assumption, although not as much as Rem.

Tia truly was determined to get her light sphere back. Hence why she was constantly checking for it on the way home today—there’s no way she was lying and making stuff up.

Halibel: “There’s also the possibility that she just can’t think that it could be anyone else. Tia-chan isn’t normal. Su-san, Rem-chan, you must know that, right?”

“…”

However, Halibel makes that assertion to the two of them who denied his hypothesis with emotional arguments.

Perhaps he calmly saw the truth objectively because these were the views of shinobis. Or maybe Subaru and Rem were simply too soft on Tia and they were just looking away from reality.

Halibel: “Once Rem-chan gives birth…”

This was the first time Halibel put the time they had left into clear words. The inescapable reality was coming closer. It was the time when a decision would be made, as well as the time to make a choice.

Will it be up to Subaru, Rem, or Tia?

Subaru: “There’s no need to give an answer right away.”

Halibel: “Maybe. —But an answer will have to be given eventually.”

As Subaru replied, Halibel quietly said that with his head down. Subaru becomes silent and says nothing in response to is words, and when Rem slowly stood up,

Rem: “I can’t let Tia-sama catch a cold.”

Subaru: “Oh, I’ll do it.”

Subaru takes out a blanket instead of Rem, who was near the closet. In the last few days, nights have been remarkably chilly. Of course, Rem wanted Tia to be especially taken care of.

Rem: “Tia-sama, I will be moving the alcohol. Would you like the futon to be spread out?”

Rem steps up to Tia as she slept, and she talked to her affectionately. And then, she collects the bottle of alcohol Tia hid in her hem, and she started to loosen the sash of her dress so that she didn’t have trouble sleeping.

Suddenly, Rem’s hands were caught in white fingertips.

Rem: “Tia-sama?”

It was the same old way she called out her name. Rem, who was looking straight at Tia’s sleeping face, was the only one who was able to tell that something was wrong.

Subaru, who was carrying the blanket, did not notice it and neither did Halibel, who smoked his kiseru at the window.

—A trickle of tears was slowly rolling down Tia's cheeks.

Tia: "Give it…back…"

A frail, low murmur came from Tia's thin lips.

Rem says "What?" as she tried to hear that voice melting in the ephemera atmosphere, and then she brought her ears closer—

Tia: "—Give back…me."

That moment, a wind blew.

Subaru: "Ah?!"

Subaru screams, and he immediately unfolded the blanket he was holding. Rem was blown away into him. Unable to withstand the impact, he gets blown away to the back. Subaru somehow forcefully wraps Rem in the blanket, and he crash into the kitchen with his back.

The cooking utensils make a loud noise as they fell onto the floor, and the food left in the pot gets thrown out.

Subaru: "Ka…ha…"

While the pain disturbed Subaru's breathing, he looked forward with his eyes wide open, wondering what just happened.

He saw the room that changed within just a few seconds—the dining table and the tatami mats flew off, and the magic gem lights hanging from the ceiling were violently turning on and off. There was an opening in the middle of the room, as if a beast had torn into it with its nails. Standing before it was Tia, whose wide dress waved in the wind as she shed tears.

Wind and a bite attack—it was more than enough to remind him of the attack that had happened that one night.

Subaru: “Tia—!”

Subaru cries that. However, it didn’t reach Tia as she continued to shed tears endlessly while she held her head. Her eyes looked confused, and she was muttering something.

Tia: “My arms…my legs…my…body…where is it? Where did it go…?”

Her steps were unsteady, her eyes made it seem like she was dreaming, but the danger was so clear—

Halibel: “…”

So, a shinobi had to deal with such danger in a way a shinobi would.

Halibel evaded the first wind by clinging onto the ceiling. It wasn’t clear how someone tall like him accomplished that. However, after Halibel escaped danger, he got off the ceiling, and he free fell down onto Tia’s head, dealing a blow to her.

What hit her was a fist axe, where he put his big hands together. It was such a powerful hit that it could’ve smashed a large tree. The force he struck with had a chance to kill Tia if it hit her, as she was frail. Tia, shedding tears, dodged it, and she kicked up the broken dining table, repelling Halibel, who dropped down.

In this small room, Halibel, jumping around lightly as a tall man, and Tia, who was trying to get the upper hand, were clashing with magic.

It was the return of that night. Although the location was different, the situation was the same.

Tia’s invisible bite attacks could not reach Halibel because of the kunai he threw. However, the aftermath had serious effects on its surroundings, and the tenement house got cut up again and again, destroying it.

Halibel: “This isn’t good! Su-san and Rem-chan are going to get crushed!”

Perceiving the collapse of the tenement house as dangerous, Halibel screams and steps hard on the floor. Then, the tatami mats just barely left on the floor sprung up from below one by one. Tia, who was on top of one, gets sent flying by the unexpected impact, and she was being blown out of the tenement house.

Turning over tatami mats—that is what Halibel pulled off, although it wasn’t clear how he did it.

Subaru: “—!”

The moment Subaru realized that, he gave a jolt to his stiff lower half of his body, and he stood up. Inside his arms there was Rem, who was wrapped in a blanket. While holding onto her, he dashed out the back of the tenement house.

Subaru: “Rem, are you alright?! Rem?!”

When Subaru started to feel how cold the air felt, he realized that his whole body was wet with cold sweat. He ignored how nasty it was and called Rem’s name as he held her in his arms.

Rem: “Subaru…-ku…”

Subaru: “Rem!”

Rem called Subaru’s name as she wheezed. Subaru screeches because of it, and he slowly unfolded the blanket to check if she was injured.

From what he could see, there were no injuries. His blood ran cold when he was inside of Tia’s wind up close. Had something gone wrong, Rem might have been cut into along with the space. It was a miracle that she just ended up getting blown away—

Rem: “What about…Tia-sama…”

Subaru: “Take it easy! Tia…Halibel-sama is doing something about Tia now! What’s more important right now is you. How’s your body…"

Rem: "I'm…fine…ku?! Ah…ahh!"

Subaru: "Rem?!"

Rem tried to smile bravely, but her body bent with an agonized look on her face. That makes Subaru's eyes widen, and then Rem held onto her stomach before his eyes, suffering.

The situation indicated the worst case scenario.

Subaru: "—!!"

Subaru hits his head, almost going into a panic, and he lifted Rem again with the blanket. There were still signs of Halibel and Tia clashing at the other side of the tenement house.

However, this wasn't the time for that. It wasn't, and yet…

Subaru: "Tia! Halibel! Stop! That's enough!!"

He ran to the front and yelled at the two clashing people to stop fighting. Hearing that, Tia slowly looked his way while Halibel stayed cautious.

Both of them had the same person in their eyes, and he didn't know why they felt so moved.

Regardless, the madness in Tia's eyes settled down, and Halibel really was no longer preparing for combat.

Tia: "Huh…?"

Tia let out a stunned and dumbfounded gasp, and when he looked at Subaru and the others, her surroundings made her think back. She thought back about the marks of destruction, Rem suffering, Subaru looking desperate, and Halibel fighting.

Tia: "Huh…?"

Tia just kept letting that out, looking like she didn't know what had happened. Halibel quickly ran up to Subaru and Rem without paying attention to Tia.

Halibel: “How’s Rem-chan?”

Subaru: “She’s holding onto her stomach and it looks like she’s in pain! We have to get her to the doctor as soon as possible…”

Halibel: “I’ll carry her. It’ll be faster that way. Su-san, you hurry, too.”

Halibel immediately picked up Rem along with the blanket, as if snatching her, and he jumped across the street with an extremely light leap, going off to get the old family magic user.

Subaru sees Halibel jumping towards the moon, and he hurries after him.

Tia: “Wai…Wait…”

A shaky voice called out to him from behind. Subaru stops for a moment, and then he looked back.

He saw Tia standing alone, reaching her hand out for his back. She wasn’t close enough to reach. She just had the will to try to stop him.

Tia: “I…”

Subaru: “…”

Subaru couldn’t find the words to speak to Tia, who didn’t finish her sentence.

He gave in to his impatience. —Actually, he was probably feeling irritated as well. He had no time to stop moving. He had to run to Rem as soon as possible.

The frustration makes Subaru’s feet move, and he starts running. Leaving Tia behind.

Tia: “…”

He felt like Tia's hoarse voice faintly reached his earlobes. However, Subaru didn't stop, and he didn't tell Tia to follow him, either.

Was he angry at her? Of course, that was one reason.

Was she afraid of her? Of course, that was another reason.

However, the biggest reason he ran away is because he was scared of speaking to Tia, as he didn't know what to say.

???: "Your wife is fine. She's calmed down. …That was pretty dangerous for both the mother and the child."

In the clinic he ran into, the old magic user said that after finishing the treatment, which took a few hours.

Hearing the calmness of Rem's breathing as she lay down on the bed, Subaru felt relief from the bottom of his heart, and words were not enough to express his gratitude towards Halibel and the old magic user.

And then, he went next to Rem as she slept, and he decided to wait as long as it'd take for her to wake up.

Even if Halibel returned to the tenement house and tells him that Tia isn't there, even if the old magic user tells him to a take rest, he was going to wait as long as it'd take for Rem to open her eyes.

Rem: "Subaru…-kun…?"

Rem woke up, he hears her voice, and he hugged her while shedding tears, confirming that she was okay.

Peace within his heart was restored at last, and after that, they faced reality.

—Tia never returned to the tenement house again.

And so, the noisy, fun life of the strange neighbors at the tenement house met its end.

The three months after that went by within a blink of an eye.

—The predicted date for Rem to give birth was coming closer and closer.

Chapter 5:
10 Months

1

Rem: “Thank you very much for your help again. I must be going now, Doctor.”

???: “Take care of yourself as best as you can. The baby might be born at any time, after all. If you get carried here like last time, I may or may not be available.”

Rem: “Yes, I’ll take your words to heart.”

???: “Now go already.”

Rem bows, and the old magic user waved her goodbye while holding onto his blunt attitude.

At a glance, it did seem like a perfunctory response, but now that they knew the old magic user for a long time, the true intention of his blunt attitude was clear. Since there was sharpness in his words, you could tell that his skills and the care for his patients were genuine.

This relieved Subaru, and he didn’t mind bringing Rem to the healing magic user.

Subaru: “Still, my heart was pounding like a drum. Like the doctor said, the baby really can be born at any moment…”

Rem: “Jeez, you can’t be like that, Subaru-kun. If you’re always so nervous, your body won’t be able to take it when the time comes. Keep it in check, and prepare yourself calmly.”

Subaru: “R-Right, keep things in moderation and act calm.”

With her hand on her mouth, Rem giggles at Subaru, who was so nervous that his legs and arms made it apparent it while he walked. Rem’s stomach was now undoubtedly big, and she was approaching the last month of pregnancy.

There was a time when the mother and the child were in serious danger, but fortunately they were able to recover and the baby inside grew normally.

Without a doubt, that was all possible because of Rem's strong will and Subaru's constant support.

Ever since that night, Subaru has been even more devoted to Rem, and he did his best to support her by her side. His coworkers and friends said that he was great for it, but that wasn't true.

Doing something like this was just natural once you considered the fear and confusion he'd experienced that night, in that moment.

Just imagining the fear of possibly losing Rem and their child made his blood run cold.

Rem: "Thanks to you, I've been feeling so relaxed. I'm not sure if I I'll be able to live the way I did before after being cared for so much by my husband and giving birth to our child."

Subaru: "Right now, you have an important job of raising the baby with your stomach as the cradle. Until that's finished, leave all the little tasks to me. If something bothers you, don't take care of it yourself, be hard on me and teach me, like you always have."

Rem: "Okaaay."

Listening to Subaru's dramatic orders, Rem nods, acting playfully again.

Just like Rem said, Subaru has been doing most of the jobs in the house instead of her. Subaru's responsibility was to do as much cooking, laundry, and cleaning as possible.

Of course, at first he did make a lot of mistakes and it was clear that he was unskilled and lacked knowledge, but he was able to pull through with Rem's guidance and help from his female coworkers when he was having trouble.

And so now Subaru has attained house-husband skills that were good enough to Rem.

Subaru: “It’s all thanks to Rem being an excellent teacher.”

Rem: “No no. Subaru-kun’s already a fast learner and you’re good with your hands so it was fun to teach you. I’m sure that you’re suited for tasks at home, too.”

Subaru: “I just never had many opportunities to try them. I actually think I am, too.”

He just never had any opportunities. He knew that he had a high aptitude for things like cooking, laundry, and cleaning. At this point, it’s been proven that he has a high aptitude for being a husband on top of his sewing skills.

A group of Kararagi housewifes had even surrounded him unexpectedly and confirmed that he was doing fine.

Subaru: “I wonder what we should have tonight. Rem, what would you like to eat?”

Rem: “Let’s see…I’d like to eat something sour.”

Subaru: “That’s a really classic request for a pregnant woman. Are you sure that you want to eat something sour?”

Rem: “Well, I was craving for it when I got pregnant, but not so much anymore. It’s why I snuck in a lot of sour food back then.”

Subaru: “The cats out of the bag with that shocking truth—!”

There were many times when they’d have sour fruits or vinegared food. That being said, at the time even Rem wasn’t aware that she was pregnant, so he was still a bit puzzled.

Subaru: “I’ve heard that morning sickness gets terrible and you start craving sour food. With that considered, you haven’t had much morning sickness.”

Rem: “Now that you mention it, that might be true. Maybe it’s the works of me really wanting to avoid showing myself being weak with you around.”

Subaru: “You’ve got strong nerves of steel. I’m just glad that we weren’t too late…”

It was discovered that Rem was pregnant when she lost consciousness and was taken to the healing magic user. If she’d never lost consciousness and kept everything inside, they might’ve never noticed that she was pregnant until her stomach became unnaturally large.

Rem: “And I’m sure I would’ve done everything I could to not have you think that I got fat, hiding how big my stomach was.”

Subaru: “And I’m sure I would’ve kept being fooled so easily. That really just isn’t okay…”

Come to think of it, it’s a good thing they had figured it out while they could still recover from mistakes. And on the night that sparked the realization there was—

Subaru: “…”

Naturally and unavoidably, his memory approaches that night.

That made Subaru’s expression turn sour, but it was something unavoidable. In the memories of the time he spent in Banan town, she was there in those three months, no matter where he looked.

In the funnest, loudest days that were still vivid in his memory, there was Tia.

Rem: “Tia-sama…”

Subaru: “She’s nowhere to be found. I put up a notice at Clane’s, and Hal-san’s searching for her too, but he’s found nothing.”

Hearing Rem’s melancholic murmuring, Subaru speaks quickly in response. This showed that he didn’t want to talk about Tia anymore if possible. However, Rem shook her head at his request as she said,

Rem: “Subaru-kun, are you mad at Tia-sama?”

Subaru: “—. Yes, of course I am. Do you know how much danger you were in? You and the baby were in serious danger, and she’s the one at fault.”

Rem: “…”

Subaru: “And she even got the hell out before I could give her a piece of my mind, let alone hear her apologize. How could I not be mad after all that?”

—Ever since the final night, Tia completely disappeared from the town.

Subaru’s last memory of Tia was him running to the clinic, leaving her behind and watching her cower like a child.

When he came back to the tenement house, which was on the verge of collapsing, after confirming that Rem was fine, Tia had already disappeared from the area. Afterwards, even Halibel helped out and they looked all over the town, but in the end they never found out a trace of her as months three passed by.

Wondering where Tia ran off to, wondering where did that strange neighbor go—

All while never being allowed to see her as something more than a neighbor.

Rem: “If you ran into her and she apologized, would you forgive her?”

Subaru: “…Would you?”

Rem: “I definitely would. I love Tia-sama, after all.”

Subaru: “…”

Rem’s soft words were understandable. She’d forgiven Tia from the bottom of her heart.

Rem said the reason was that she loved Tia.

Subaru had nothing to say once she told him that. Even Subaru probably felt the same way as Rem did. He cared about Tia. He considered her a friend.

And yet, the unpleasant feeling Subaru felt inside was still there, and he didn't forgive Tia.

Subaru felt the same way as Rem did and shared the same memories with her. Perhaps he didn't forgive because of their difference in tolerance. Or maybe there was a different reason—

Subaru "…"

While talking, Subaru and Rem went back home.

Currently, they weren't living at the tenement house from before, but at a house near the town area through the courtesy of Riften. The tenement house had collapsed from the damage of that night. It never got rebuilt, and the spot was now a vacant lot of the tenement house.

Knowing that they'd lost their house, Riften was the one who put in a good word for them. He really did feel bad about depending on him all the time, but them having a baby made him forget about restraining himself.

The temporary residence was unexpectedly comfortable, and it was far more considerate of Rem's condition than the cramped tenement house. Perhaps this was also a result of Riften's thoughtfulness.

Rem: "But I feel it's still a bit too big for just the two of us."

So said Rem as she slowly sat down in the living room. Unlike the tenement house, which was pretty much one room as it was just divided, this house had more than enough of everything.

But even if they had a living room, a bedroom, and private room for each of them—

Subaru: “It’s probably a room for the child for when it’s born. This is Riften-san we’re talking about. I can see him thinking that far ahead.”

Rem: “You have a lot faith in Riften-sama, huh.”

Subaru: “He’s helped us out so much, after all. I’m not gonna lose trust in him just because he’s got a thing for cougars. I’ve got tons of favors I have to repay.”

Rem: “Yeah, me too. I need to repay the people at Temple Elementary School and the magic user doctor. And there’s also Halibel-sama…”

Subaru: “Hal-san, huh.”

Hearing Halibel’s name, Subaru knitted his brows as he put luggage in the closet.

Ever since the tenement collapsed and they started living in completely different places, they had much fewer chances to meet with Halibel. The days when they’d see each other like a family were over, and it seemed Halibel wasn’t a playboy anymore and was doing his best to fulfill his duty as a shinobi.

Subaru: “He must feel responsible for what happened to you.”

Rem: “Well…it wasn’t even Halibel-sama’s fault though.”

Subaru: “I mean, still. Tia suddenly changing…if there was something that triggered that, it had to have been the alcohol. He must feel down as the person that let it happen.”

Halibel especially was someone who’d jokingly say that he’d answer with his life if any problems ever came up. Even Subaru didn’t know if he blamed himself so much for him to do such a thing.

Honestly, it’s not like he blamed Halibel and wished that he’d stopped Tia before she poured herself alcohol. In reality, even Subaru wasn’t so childish that he’d blame him by telling him that, but it wouldn’t be strange if Halibel was frustrated with himself for it.

Thus, Halibel has been committed to finding where Tia ran off to.

Subaru: "…Rem, I'm gonna go shopping. Do you want anything?"

No matter what they did, talking about that night always made them feel depressed. Rem feeling down isn't good for the baby. To avoid this, Subaru forced the topic to change.

His thoughtfulness should've been obvious to Rem, but she shook her head as she said,

Rem: "No, I'm fine. And you don't have to ask everyday. I'm not so selfish that I'd ask for this and that."

Subaru: "But with how you are right now, I want you to be selfish more than anyone, y'know?"

Rem: "In that case, I want you to stay with me forever."

Subaru: "I'm guessing this is what you came up with after perfecting the delivery."

Subaru smiles wryly at Rem's cute pestering, and he stood up once he was ready to go shopping. He thought about having sour food for tonight's dinner, as Rem had requested.

Although it sounded like a joke, she probably had told him since she really did want to have it.

Subaru: "Okay, Rem, I'm leaving now. Behave and sit tight, alright?"

Rem: "Both the baby and I will behave."

After that interaction, Subaru left the house to go shopping. He headed towards the town area—however, he wasn't going straight to the grocery store. He was going to Clane's employment agency.

2

Clane: "Unfortunately, I have no idea where Tia-chan is. Sorry."

Clane, giving a reply that was now routine, bowed his head to Subaru, who showed up here on a regular basis. Subaru shook his head, letting him know that he didn't have to act apologetic.

This also had become a completely normal exchange.

Clane: "Everyone's worried about that girl. This goes without saying, but she was loved."

Subaru: "She was really skilled, right? Not that I still have any doubts or anything."

Clane: "She was the best. A girl her age having bounty hunting as her calling isn't something that should be told to everyone, though. Anyway, I'll keep searching."

Subaru: "I'm counting on you."

The missing person poster posted on the wall-the personal description on the request form was even edited by Subaru, and it captured Tia's traits pretty well. But her beauty that defied common sense still wasn't written on it.

Needless to say, Tia was so beautiful that one would think that she wasn't from this world.

Subaru: "The pain from my nose being smashed begs to differ, though."

Clane: "Nose being smashed?"

Subaru: "Nothing. Just talking to myself."

Clane waves his hand at Subaru, and he leaves the employment agency. He was genuinely worried about Tia in his own way. He was feeling more and more on edge.

It was as if he was the only one in the world who cared about Tia.

Subaru: "Ugh. This is ridiculous. It's not the time to be saying stuff like this. …I'll buy some green onions and forget about it."

Brushing off his sadness, Subaru bought some green onions, or rather, green omions displayed on the greengrocer. He places them into the bag and starts constructing tonight's menu inside his head.

Subaru: "I first bought green onions, so it should be the main ingredient…Actually, green onions are pretty flexible, so even if they aren't the focus of the meal, things will come together just fine."

With Rem and the ladies' guidance, Subaru had mastered plenty of recipes. He picks the best out of the many good bargains displayed at the shopping district.

Lemom, tometo, cabage, cooking sake, fish, eggs, rice, soy sauce, Tia, wheat flour—.

Subaru: "—Tia?"

While carefully selecting ingredients, a shadow appeared in Subaru's vision for just a moment, and he gasped. If he had he looked away thinking that he took her for someone else, her milky white hair would've disappeared into the crowd.

Although he saw it for just a moment, he was still sure of it. That was Tia's hair.

Subaru: "Tia! Wait, hey, wait—!"

That moment, Subaru yelled, and he started running frantically

Subaru slips through a gap in the crowd of people, and he ran after her desperately as she became distant. Tia moved smoothly, as if there was no one in her way, whereas Subaru bumped into other people.

But still, the distance between someone who walks and someone who runs closes eventually. Suddenly, Subaru loses sight of Tia's head in the surging crowd, and he looked everywhere while panicking—he saw the hem of her dress disappear into an alley.

Subaru: "Tia—!"

While praying that his eyes weren't deceiving him, Subaru tumbled into the alley. Then, after he kicked the hard ground and ran, he saw someone standing in the dark passageway.

She had a slender, delicate back, and she was pretty tall for a girl. That short, shoulder-length milky white hair couldn't belong to anyone else.

Subaru: "Hah…hah…Tia, I've been looking for you. Why'd you run away?"

Tia: "…"

Tia did not respond to Subaru's question. However, she had no intentions of running away anymore. Subaru understood that, so he dropped his luggage onto the ground while regaining his breath.

And then, he walks up to Tia as she stood in the darkness, and reached for her shoulder.

Subaru: "Come on, I know it's hard for us to see each other. But at least look my way."

Holding onto her shoulder dressed in black, Subaru spoke to Tia in a somewhat blunt manner. The unpleasantness of the trouble from that night blackened out the happiness from seeing her.

If she at least had an expression that made it look like she was going through rough times, maybe he could be more honest.

While hoping for that, Subaru turned her around and—

Tia: "—Die."

He was hit by a violent wind of bloodlust head on.

3

Halibel: "Su-san! Are you here?!"

Rem: "Halibel-sama?!"

The door to the house gets thrown open, and Rem gasps in surprise upon hearing a voice that came in. And then she saw that it was a black haired wolf man that entered the house—it was Halibel.

It was a face Rem hadn't seen for a whole month. However, although it was the first time in a while that they'd seen each other, there wasn't a welcoming atmosphere. Halibel looked around the house as he said,

Halibel: "Rem-chan, I know it's been a while, but this is an emergency. Where's Su-san?"

Rem: "Subaru-kun is out shopping for dinner. He should be coming back very soon…"

Halibel: "Agh, so we missed each other! This is terrible! Not good, this isn't good…"

Halibe scratches his head and he couldn't calm down, making him sound antsy. Rem senses that he was acting unusual, and she stood up while holding onto her baby belly as she said,

Rem: "Halibel-sama, what happened? If it's something that has to do with Subaru-kun, please tell me."

Halibel: "Ah, Rem-chan, you really shouldn't push yourself too hard. I could've been more clear, but telling you straight up that Su-san's in danger would be…or wait, maybe I could just tell you?"

Rem: "Halibel-sama?"

Halibel: "Rem-chan, I told you this before, right? Do you remember? Because of my nose, I know that there might be someone going after Su-san."

Halibel's question makes Rem's eyes widen. Although it wasn't entirely correct, most of the parts were accurate perceptions.

Someone might be going after Subaru—that's what Rem told Halibel after guessing what Tia's goal was when she tried to harm her and Subaru.

She told him about the miasma surrounding Subaru—that is, the possibility of having the witch's scent.

Rem: "Yes, I did say. that However, that's irrelevant…and Tia-sama's actually going for me, not Subaru, and that's also probably a misunderstanding…"

Halibel: "No, that's not quite right. It wasn't a misunderstanding, and it was relevant. Dang it, I'm not being clear again. Right, we were mistaken. We were "wrong"."

Rem: "Wrong? Wrong…about what…?"

Halibel: "About who the culprit really is, and about who Tia-chan really is."

Rem gasps at the unexpected statement. When Halibel opened his eyes, which were usually closed like slit-eyes, there was heavy regret in his revealed black pupils as he said,

Halibel: "It's my mistake. I have no excuses. It's a total failure. I miscalculated everything. Because of that, we might have a dangerous situation on our hands."

Rem: "I-I don't get it, Halibel-sama. Please explain everything from the top."

Halibel: "—It all started approximately one year ago. Thequest for Zarestia's bed was the beginning."

Halibel listens to Rem's question, and the details he talked about were like a bolt from the blue yet again.

Zarestia—Rem also remembered that name.

It was one of the four powerful great spirits, known as The Four Great Spirits; an entity that lived in "Zarestia's Bed" located in the west side of Kararagi.

But as for what that quest started—

Halibel: "Zarestia's bed is a famous place wind blows, killing anyone near it. At first, the investigation team application was brushed off as a reckless challenge for daredevils, but…”

Rem: “But?”

Halibel: “Who knows if it was a miracle or something, but there’s one person who managed to return alive. If it had just been a survivor, then the story would’ve ended as someone who barely escaped death, but…”

Judging from the way Halibel recited the story, she guessed that it didn’t end there.

And then she also guessed what Halibel was trying to confirm just earlier when he was feeling frantic. The moment Rem connected the dots in her mind, her eyes opened wide in terror.

Halibel: “The girl who survived was someone seeking revenge and she sought Zarestia’s power out of hatred for the Witch Cult.”

4

—A wind blew.

And it was probably sharp enough to easily shred Subaru’s body into bits and pieces.

Or maybe being cut up by that wind and turning into bright red meat was Subaru’s punishment as someone who turned his back on everything.

Or at least, that’s what he thought in that moment.

Tia: “—What are you spacing out for? Are you stupid?!”

Subaru: “Whoa?!”

He gets grabbed by the scruff of his neck, and he was flung back at once without being able to resist. Then, he bounced on the ground, and he rolled, rolled, and rolled without defending himself. And then, when Subaru looked in front of him while grimacing at the pain, he saw that the one who flung him was—

Subaru: “T-Tia, is that you?”

Tia: “Not like there could be any other beauties here right now other than myself. …Well, that’s what I’d like to say, but I’m not so sure if I could.”

Bending forward lightly, Tia turns just her head back—both that rough tone and the way she treated Subaru rudely were just like her, no doubt about it.

And as for what Tia’s statement meant, he’d find out immediately with the scene right before his eyes.

Subaru: “…”

Standing in front of Tia, who threw Subaru, was another Tia.

Two Tias with the same face and the same appearance were facing each other. Their looks were completely identical. The one difference between them was their dresses; they were clearly different in that one was black and one was white.

The Tia dressed in black tried to kill Subaru, while the one dressed in white protected him.

In other words—

Subaru: “Black Tia is an enemy, and white Tia is an ally—!”

Tia: “You aren’t wrong, but I don’t like the way you put it!”

Hearing Subaru shout with his face lying on the ground, white Tia stepped forward immediately as she muffled her voice. She shot her thin body like a bullet and came at the opponent who had the same face as her.

Using the power of her beast-like body, white Tia mercilessly strikes black Tia’s face with her hand—that instant, black Tia put a smile on her incomprehensible, demonic, beautiful face.

Black Tia: “—Die.”

White Tia: “—!”

White Tia avoids the bite attack by quickly jumping up. However, the invisible attacks went after white Tia, shot into the sky one after another. White Tia kicks the wall, jumps diagonally, like jumping in a triangular motion, and she dodged, dodged and dodged.

White Tia: “Why you…! You’re persistent!”

Even if she jumped up walls, Kararagi buildings were short in general. White Tia quickly landed on top of the alley and angrily swung her arm at the ground. That moment, white Tia struck down with an attack similar to black Tia’s bite attack—however, it was clearly weak; white Tia’s wasn’t as good as hers.

Black Tia dodges it by quickly jumping away, as if it was inevitable.

White Tia: “Damn it! You’re me, and yet you’re stronger—!”

Black Tia: “—Die.”

Black Tia did nothing but speak bloodthirsty words to white Tia, who was furious with rage.

However, the difference in strength was showing in their few attacks. If they kept fighting like this one on one, eventually white Tia would be at a disadvantage.

Even Subaru knew that as someone who almost got into danger just by watching. Therefore—

Subaru: “—Look at me, fake Tia!”

Black Tia: “…”

Subaru gets up, and he was close to the wall—he jumped at his hand bag that had been blown away onto the ground by the wind, and he was throwing things that were in it.

However, unfortunately the first thing that went flying parabolically was a green omion. The long, green vegetable spun, lost momentum, and fell to the ground before it reached black Tia.

That pointless resistance makes black Tia turn her attention towards Subaru. Above him, white Tia was also staring at Subaru, wondering what he was doing.

Still, this was fine. This was fine.

He wasn't hoping to damage her or anything. He had no weapons, after all. If he could at least create a situation where it was a superficial 2 on 1, if he could at least make up for white Tia's misses—

Subaru: "…"

Black Tia: "Goo…oo…"

Just from being stared at, Subaru felt his mind freeze as it creaked.

Black Tia's eyes were empty. There was nothing you could classify as emotion, and nothing you could classify as will. In them was darkness—nothing but jet-black bloodlust that embodied it.

Bloodlust, and that's it. As scary as it was, black Tia had nothing but bloodlust.

So, black Tia's actions were the very definition of simple. The best actions just to kill were simple. And at this very moment, she didn't want white Tia's blood, but Subaru's.

Black Tia: "Damn…you…"

Sensing death being wished upon him, Subaru swung his arm as he resisted the fear entangling his body. However, his resistance was all for naught in the end. The bottle he held onto couldn't do much. It didn't hit black Tia; it felt onto the ground before him and broke loudly. Everything spilled out.

—That moment, black Tia's expression changed.

Black Tia: "—?!"

Subaru: "What?"

Suddenly, black Tia opened her eyes and stared at the bottle that fell before her. There was a broken bottle—a bottle of cooking sake just rolling and spilling out everything.

Subaru: “It’s just alcohol, you know?”

Black Tia: “…”

Black Tia couldn’t respond to Subaru’s dumbfoundment. Her cheeks stiffen. She covered her face with her hands, stepped back, and she was letting out a groan full of pain.

Black Tia was so afraid of that abomination-so afraid of the alcohol that it felt like her heart was being torn apart.

White Tia: “—Now’s my chance!!”

Swooping down from the building’s roof, Tia strikes with a dynamic kick.

Black Tia, being defenseless, eats a direct hit from the kick, and she was blown away with a rough somersault. She rolls, crashes into the wall, and ended up sprawling on the ground in the alley.

Subaru: “Did that do it?!”

White Tia: “Hah! When she suddenly stopped focusing, though I don’t know why she did, her fate was sealed! Now I will achieve retribution with my own hands…ew?!”

Subaru cheered and white Tia spoke triumphantly at the same time. White Tia was going to go after black Tia, who collapsed, but she suddenly stopped and screamed.

White Tia opened her eyes wide at the alcohol right behind her that soaked her feet.

Tia: “~~?! What?! What’s this?! Ew…ewww!!”

Subaru: “Not you too! What’s the big deal?! It’s just alcohol…”

White Tia was showing the same reaction, or maybe an even stronger rejection, that black Tia had. Judging from that unusual situation, Subaru understood that their rejection towards alcohol was not just a matter of disliking it.

However, before Subaru could investigate the matter, something unbelievable happened.

Black Tia: “Goo…ooo…”

Subaru: “Huh? Her face is disfigured…no, it’s blurry…?”

Black Tia groaned and slowly got up—her looks slowly fell apart, and they were coming off. Under it, there was a face that didn’t look like Tia at all. The harshness of her eyes was similar, but her unhealthy eye bags were what stood out more.

She had a pale face, and her hair color went from milky white to dark brown. Even her body shrunk; it was as if a spell had been casted on her, transforming her.

Subaru: “Hey…!”

That alone was enough to shock him quite a bit, however something even more shocking made Subaru’s eyes widen.

—He saw two shining protruding objects sticking out on the kneeling girl’s head.

Subaru: “Horns…? So you’re…an Oni?”

Black Tia: “…”

That was the conclusion Subaru came to after seeing the two horns sticking out on her forehead. A former member/descendant of the Oni race, like Rem. Although the woman seemed anguished over the conclusion, she let out a sharp sigh in vexation.

Black Tia: “—Die! Die! Die!”

Wrapped in a storm of overflowing bloodlust, Subaru immediately protected his face with his hands as he felt the pressure. However, she still focused on satisfying her bloodlust, and she spreaded her arms left and right, conjuring wind.

Buildings to the left and right of the alley were gouged by the wind she conjured making them collapse. Half of the buildings' supports were gone, and the buildings collapsed instantly. The alley was going to be buried soon.

Subaru: "Shit! Hey, Tia…ahh, damn it!"

Tia: "…What…what…what is this? It's on me…eek…"

Right after the buildings collapsed, Subaru called Tia's name. However, Tia was still shocked from having breathed in the smell of alcohol. Subaru was forced to carry her slender body, and he ran back.

Suabru: "Gaaaah—!"

Despite the collapsing noises nearing him and his back aching, Subaru ran straight through with all his energy. And right after he got out of the cramped alley, the destruction was over, and the alley was completely buried in scrap wood.

There were clouds of dust in the wind, and people in the main street rushed over to see what all the big commotion was all about. They immediately reached out for Subaru and Tia, who collapsed at the alley entrance.

Subaru: "She's…"

With help, Subaru stands up, and he looks back at the alley crushed by the destruction. Nobody other than Subaru and Tia rushed out to this alley. However, it was highly unlikely for the girl to have gotten stuck and crushed in the destruction in the first place.

She got away. The mysterious girl who could produce the same horn as Rem and had the same face as Tia.

Subaru: "Who…the heck…was that girl…?"

With his sleeve, Subaru wiped his face dirty with dust and sweat, and he muttered that while panting lightly. The girl who got away wasn't going to give him the answer to his question.

If there were someone else who'd give Subaru an answer—

Subaru: "—I can count on you, right? Tia."

Tia: "…Whatever."

Tia, having finally recovered from the shock of the alcohol, replied unwillingly with a sour look.

Hearing a reply characteristic of her, Subaru let out a wry smile of inappropriate relief.

5

Rem: "—Subaru-kun! Thank goodness you're alright!"

Subaru: "Woah, careful!"

Subaru arrives home, and he quickly caught Rem, who jumped at him at the entranceway. Even if she jumped at him with such force, hugging his wife was still a piece of cake.

That being said, he did want her to keep her expression of love in moderation since she was in the last month of pregnancy.

Subaru: "Rem, I'm glad you're happy to see me home, but if you keep this up, my lifespan will be shortened every time I get back. Think about the baby a bit more."

Rem: "I-I'm sorry. It's just that I heard you were in danger and…"

Subaru: "You heard that I was in danger? From who?"

Although Subaru talked to Rem kindly, he grimaced at her reply. The news got around to her too quickly. It has been only about an hour since Subaru got in danger. She shouldn't be informed about the news.

In fact, Subaru had planned on telling her about it after calming down.

Halibel: “From me, Su-san.”

Subaru: “…So you were here, Hal-san, No wonder she found out about it so quickly.”

His suspicions vanished after Halibel showed himself in the corridor. As a shinobi, Halibel could know what the whole town is doing through adequate means. Subaru suspected that he’d have his clones lurk all around the town whenever push came to shove.

Subaru: “But don’t worry Rem by telling her so quick. This is a very important time.”

Halibel: “Sorry about that, but it was unexpected for me, too. I didn’t expect Su-san to get attacked at this exact time. You should tell her that you’re alright, since she found out that you got attacked. Don’t you feel bad for Rem-chan?”

Rem: “Subaru-kun, please don’t blame Halibel-sama. Halibel-sama stopped me when I panicked and tried to run over.”

Halibel: “Yep yep.”

Halibel made an expression that showed he was backing up Rem. Instead of detesting his behavior, for a while Subaru felt like he wasn’t being himself, and he missed the timing to go off on him.

Besides, this wasn’t the time to be angry. Rem has the best gift of all, after all.

Subaru: “Honestly, right now I have a bunch of things I wanna talk about, like about what happened…”

Rem Yes. Please tell us. We were very worried.”

Subaru: “But not yet. First, I have someone I want you to see.”

Rem, who had gotten ready to listen, had a question mark above her upon hearing Subaru’s statement. Subaru smiles at her, turns around to the sliding door behind him, and spoke.

Subaru: “How long are you going to hide? Come in.”

???: “…”

At first, there was no response at all to Subaru. However, after a few moments of silence, the person nervously showed their face, probably because they couldn’t handle the tension. The one who slowly showed her head beside the sliding door was a girl who’d disappeared 3 months ago—

Rem: “—Tia…-sama?”

Tia: “Long…time…no see…”

Rem: “Tia-sama!”

Realizing that it’s Tia, Rem jumps at her with a emotional look. Amazed by her energy, Tia panics and catches her, just like the catch from earlier.

Then, when Tia slowly let Rem down at the entranceway.

Tia: “B-Be…Be more careful! Have you forgotten that you’re pregnant?! If I’d stepped aside, it would’ve been terrible!”

Rem: “I had faith that you wouldn’t do that.”

Tia: “M-Mmm…mmmm…”

Tia let out a groan as she bit her lip in vexation over Rem’s affectionate look. After that, she suddenly let out a sigh of defeat and looked down at Rem’s stomach, which was right next to her.

And her stomach was far larger than what Tia remembered.

Tia: “…It’s about to be born, huh.”

Rem: “Yes. Our deadline with Tia-sama is coming.”

Tia: “…”

Rem joked around in anticipation that Tia had already completely forgotten about the deadline. And, in fact, her anticipation was correct.

There’s no way Tia could kill Rem. Plus—

Tia: “Rem, about that, I have something to tell you.”

Rem: “You…need to tell me something?”

Tia: “You, as well as Su and Hal.”

Tia said that not just to Rem, but to Subaru, who was next to her, and Halibel, who was in the corridor, as well. With a little anxiety showing on her serious face, she said,

Tia: “I…I finally figured out what I have to do. I want to have a good talk about that with you guys.”

6

The four of them move to the living room of the temporary Natsuki house, and they each gathered at a desk, something that hasn’t happened in a while.

And so, for the first time in three months, everyone gathered in one room—however, this wasn’t going to be a fun, noisy dinner.

This was a necessary meeting to discuss more important matters.

Tia: “I…”

Tia, sitting straight with her hands on her lap, was the first one to speak. Although she wasn’t sure how to continue, she said,

Tia: “I…for retribution…no, to get my stolen light sphere back, I came to you guys. You remember that, right?”

Subaru: “Yep, I do. You gave us a real bad time in the beginning, after all.”

Rem: “Yes, that’s when you attacked me and Subaru-kun in the streets at night.”

Subaru and Rem answer Tia, who sought a confirmation. However, half of their reply was right, while the other half was wrong; Subaru was right, while Rem made a mistake.

He thought it was far too obvious, and there was nothing he'd confirmed directly, but—

Subaru: "Rem, Tia isn't the one who attacked us in the streets on that night. Tia only beat me up at the tenement house."

Rem: "What? But that would mean…"

Halibel: "Yeah, that's the first misunderstanding…I was also far too careless."

It was Halibel who nodded instead of Rem, as she was confused. It seemed Halibel had quickly realized the truth of this misunderstanding, being the one who actually fought with the attacker that night.

—He'd realized that on that night, it was black Tia who attacked Subaru and Rem on their way home, and that they never came across the offender again up until today.

Subaru: "Black Tia is called black Tia for convenience, and her face looks just like Tia's. And it's not just her face, that goes for her appearance too-everything. That's why there was a misunderstanding. Tia didn't deny it, either."

Tia: "I really did beat up Su, and even I had no idea there was someone out there with the same face as me."

Hearing Subaru's statement, Tia gave something that sounded like an excuse as she looked away.

Of course, this wasn't all on Tia. If they'd talked to Tia more to confirm the truth, they would've immediately noticed the inconsistency.

That never happened because they ran away from seriously facing the issue of the girl from that night, using their fear of ruining their relationship with Tia as an excuse.

Halibel: “It’s not Su-san’s fault. I should’ve caught on faster with that “Shinigami” name.”

Seeing Subaru hang his head, Halibel said that with his unlit kiseru in his mouth. He wasn’t acting himself today; his ears were bent, as if he was feeling down.

Subaru: “So…”Shinigami” was a hint?”

Halibel: “Not a hint, but the answer. —Sure, there’s no one here that goes by the nickname “Shinigami”. However, there is the most famous “Shinigami”. That was the missing piece to the puzzle.”

Subaru: “The most famous “Shinigami”……”

Halibel: “…”The Most Beautiful Shinigami”.”

Halibel said that as if he was mentioning someone revered.

The words he put together didn’t make sense to Subaru. Still, Rem, looking at Tia with her eyes opened wide, moved her lips with a surprised look.

Rem: ““The Most Beautiful Shinigami”, Zarestia…”

Subaru: “Zarestia? Zarestia…wait a second…”

He’d heard the name before. As Subaru began saying that, the scene of the memory came back to him vividly. He’d heard of it a few months ago at Clane’s employment agency.

Before he was referred to his job at Magoji palace, Subaru happened to find an application—the details written on it were “A Search For Zarestia’s Bed”. It was an application for challenging a great spirit.

In other words, the name of the great spirit that lived in that bed was—

Subaru: “Zarestia, the Great Spirit.”

Halibel: “—That’s Tia-chan’s real name.”

Halibel's level voice went over Subaru's that sounded like it was forced out of his lips.

The conclusion was way too out of the blue. Even if this was the truth, even the false name was too simple to begin with. They should've laughed about it, and yet nobody in the living room was laughing.

Tia, the one pointed out to be a great spirit, wasn't laughing, either. She simply let out a sad sigh as she said,

Tia: "I will say this now. I, as you guys have pointed out, am Zarestia."

Rem: "Tia-sama…"

Tia: "However, I'm not all of Zarestia. I'm half…no, not even half. I'm merely a part."

Subaru: "What do you mean by that?"

Tia, putting her hand to her chest, admitted that she was a great spirit. However, there were a lot of parts missing in her explanation that followed, so Subaru threw a question back at her in confusion.

Rem was the one who dealt with the mind-boggling parts of Tia's explanation.

Rem: "It's related to the story about the investigation team Halibel-sama talked about, isn't it?"

Subaru: "Investigation team…the application one? But Clane said that it was a failure."

Tia: "A failure? Was it really? Those guys that snuck into my bed and stole what's most important to me…they stole the light sphere so easily!"

Tia, raising her voice, firmly and emotionally denied Subaru's statement.

Light sphere-that's the name of the thing Tia kept insisting that it'd been stolen, and she went after Rem for it.

Rem had no idea what the light sphere was, and even the very existence of it had been suspicious to her. And now, that finally would be a true key.

Subaru: “So what is this light sphere really? What are you looking for?”

Tia: “It’s my source of power. It’s a contained stone that stores my power.”

Subaru: “Stone? A stone…wait, but if you’re a spirit, then…”

Hearing Tia’s lacking explanation, the answer starts to form in Subaru’s head. A stone that is necessary in order to remain in the world for spirits who form their bodies by using mana—

Subaru: “—So a Yorishiro! A Yorishiro is needed so that a spirit could remain in this world! That’s what the light sphere is!”

Now sure of it, Subaru shouted as he snapped his fingers.

Mana is necessary in order for a spirit to materialize and act. If it’s a great spirit, a vast amount of mana is needed. A Yorishiro, something that’s needed to store it, is exactly what Tia’s light sphere is.

Subaru: “That got stolen…So that’s why Tia came to get it back.”

Rem: “But how’s that related to me? I…well…I have no idea what the light gem is. I didn’t know we were close to the place Tia-sama had lived in, either…”

Despite being told about what the light sphere really is, Rem’s doubt deepened even further. However, unlike Rem, who knitted her brows in confusion, the conditions to guess the answer were satisfied for Subaru.

He remembered when black Tia’s looks came off and a changed person showed up in the attack from earlier.

Since Subaru now knew what the light gem and Tia were, the unclear meaning of that scene lead to a guess forming in his head.

If that girl who showed up in the end is the one who stole Tia's light gem, then—

Subaru: "—Black Tia had horns. They were Oni horns."

Rem: "Oni…horns? Could that mean…"

Subaru: "It's why Tia said that she'd sniffed out Rem with her nose at first with a smug look on her face. Tia mistook Rem's blood…she mistook her Oni blood for another Oni and found her."

Tia: "That's how it is. …I can't believe myself. That was pathetic."

Rem finds out the truth, and her eyes opened wide.

The complicated circumstances surrounding Tia introduced that girl to Subaru and Rem. And then that misunderstanding dragging on caused all the encounters that had happened up to this day.

They couldn't jump to a conclusion and blame Tia for it, calling her a troublemaker. Not if they didn't know just how desperate Tia was, as she'd lost something that made up more than half of who she was.

Subaru: "So basically, the light sphere, Zarestia's Yorishiro…that was stolen, and if we punish that Oni girl, the problem will be solved…Oh, but wait…"

Right before reaching a conclusion, Subaru tilted his head thinking that something was off. Although his guess was pretty close to the truth, one important part was missing an explanation.

Tia going after Subaru and Rem was a mistake by her, but why did black Tia attack them first—?

Halibel: "About that, I have one more piece of information I'd like to provide."

Subaru: "I can only feel like it's something bad since you're telling us now."

Halibel: "I hate to break it to you, but you're not going to like what you're about to hear."

Seeing Subaru with an uncomfortable look on his face, Halibel scratched his head as he gave a wry smile.

Halibel: "So, about the girl who stole something important to Tia-chan, while I was sneaking around behind the scenes, I kinda learned about the detailed circumstances"

Subaru: "I take it you told Rem about this on top of investigation team thing in private, right?"

Rem: "I-I only heard about this just now. I'm not hiding anything from you. It's already far too clear who matters the most to me between Halibel-sama and Subaru-kun!"

Halibel: "That…makes me sad, but I'm moving on. It'll be quick."

This was also going to be news to Rem, who'd been informed about this and that before she came home. After Subaru nodded at Halibel's statement, he said "Go ahead" as he urged him to continue.

Halibel: "It's about the light gem. The girl who stole it joined in on the great spirit bed quest to obtain that…But she wasn't in it for the light gem as much as she was for the great spirit's power."

Subaru: "She wanted the power of a great spirit? Dang, that's so reckless…for what purpose?"

Halibel: "Revenge, probably. —Revenge on the Witch Cult, the ones who burned her home."

Subaru: "The Witch Cult…!"

The words Subaru had avoided up to this point came up, making him tremble.

Although the group wasn't directly involved, they were directly connected to Subaru's worst memories. Not only that, but he had extremely mixed feelings after hearing that the girl viewed the witch cult as enemies.

Desiring the power of a great spirit to get revenge on the witch cult, she easily got her hands on the light sphere. Using the light sphere in a certain way, she sought revenge on the witch cult—

Subaru: "—Ah"

Then, after thinking it over this much, he hit the answer to his previous question.

The offender's goal is to get revenge on The Witch Cult; she wanted the light sphere only for the power to do that. And then, having obtained the power, she looked for the Witch Cult and found the witch's scent in Banan town.

Her target for revenge, the one she was actually going after on that night was—

Subaru: "—So it was me."

Halibel: "The avenger went for Su-san, whereas Tia-chan went for Rem-chan. We didn't know that, so all these complicated misunderstandings happened."

Halibel's conclusion cleared the doubt Subaru had in his mind, just like that.

A mixup in targets, and thinking that the two culprits were one person. That is what complicated all these problems and created an incomprehensible situation.

Subaru: "I knew things were getting mixed up. But with this, it all makes sense."

Subaru accepted the revealed truth, and he put words together as he cleared his mind.

He felt sympathy for the offending woman because of the Witch Cult, her target for revenge.

Subaru: “But it’s a mistake for the offender to go after me. Her hatred for the Witch Cult…I get it. But killing me won’t help her get over her grudge. Stealing Tia’s light gem also does nothing.”

Halibel: “There’s just something about the way you put it, but you’re right. While I do feel bad for her, we’re gonna punish her and get the light sphere back. For anything else that happens, we’ll just let the situation play itself out.”

Subaru: “I imagine that’s what we’ll have to do”

Subaru also nodded and agreed with Halibel’s conclusion.

Even with all of his questions answered, he never gave up on arriving at a conclusion. Rem’s safety and Tia’s feelings were more important to him than the wish of an avenger whose name he didn’t even know. In fact, now that the situation was clear, he wanted to come to a solution without any hard feelings.

Subaru: “If that happens, we can all…”

—After everything’s taken care of, we can all eat dinner together, just like old times.

Tia: “—That’s not possible.”

His outlook was interrupted and denied by Tia, who stood up.

The cold obstinance of Tia’s words brought everyone’s attention towards her.

When she crossed her arms as she saw their eyes on her, she looked away from all of them as she said,

Tia: “I’m sorry. I can’t do it. Once I get my light sphere back, I have to return to my nest. I can’t live with you guys. Nothing can change that.”

Rem: “But…why? I…Wait, if you’re worried about what happened before, it’s alright! I know about your circumstances now. So..”

Tia: “That’s not it, Rem. I’m an entity that can’t coexist with you all.”

Tia shook her head disapprovingly at Rem, who stopped sitting straight and pleaded with her. Neither Rem nor Subaru could tell what were the true intentions of her attitude, as she seemed distressed.

However—

Halibel: “Suspecting that Tia-chan is Zarestia, there’s one part that just doesn’t make sense. It’s the one thing that doesn’t make sense. It’s inconsistent.”

Halibel, crossing his thick arms, said that while squinting his slit-eyes even more than usual. Irritated by his suggestive way of speaking, Subaru got very angry.

Subaru: “What are you trying to say, Hallibel? Don’t beat around the bush. Spit it out.”

Halibel: “…Zariestia is a “Shinigami”, a murderous great spirit. Anyone who enters her hideout gets killed indiscriminately. Even all the anecdotes out there are stories about murder. So, what’s that have to say about Tia?”

Rem: “Well…the stories told are just messed up, I mean, they have to be, right?”

Hearing Halibel’s remarks, Rem shows a rare scene of her flaring up irritatedly. Even Subaru felt the same way as Rem. But—

Tia: “They aren’t messed up. Right now, I am the one who’s messed up.”

Rem: “Tia-sama!”

Tia: “Hal’s right, I’m a spirit that’s only good for killing…no, it’s not that I’m only good for killing; I’m a spirit that only thinks about killing. That’s how I became this trash that got most of her power stolen, left with nothing but the thought of killing.”

During those days, there were many times when Tia would say dangerous things. He never thought that they were her true feelings, but every now and then she did show that sort of great spirit part of her on her vicious face. —But now, all she had left in her was envy.

Tia: “If I get the light sphere back, I will go back to being a spirit that can only think about killing. I’ll have to kill Rem, Su, Hal, the townspeople, everyone. So, I can’t live with you all. So, this is the end. This is it.”

Rem: “No…Tia-sama, can’t we…Can’t we…do something about it?”

Tia: “…”

Tia shook her head at Rem, who clung to her. Rem, becoming teary-eyed, looks back at Subaru and Halibel. However, Subaru had no words for her sorrow. Halibel had his eyes closed and was grinding on the kiseru in his mouth with his teeth, feeling sorry for his own powerlessness.

No one could do something for Tia. And even if Tia were to give up on the light gem, the avenger is already set on going after Subaru.

And so—

Tia: “I will get the light sphere back. I won’t give up, no matter what.”

Rem: “…Ah”

With Tia’s very determined declaration, Rem grew weak and sank down on the spot. Tia looks down in a bit of a sad way, and she closed her eyes tight.

After that, she gently put her hand to Rem’s large stomach as she said,

Tia: “—Sorry to have kept you waiting.”

She says those few words as she rubbed Rem’s stomach. That was the only thing she did. An action that meant nothing at all—right after he had that thought, Rem’s expression changed.

Rem put her hand on her own stomach, and she quietly let out a "Huh" in a broken voice.

Rem: "Wh-What…What did you just do…Tia-sama…?"

Tia: "Time's up, Rem. That's it for our promise. …Although, maybe there never was any promise, since this was my mistake."

Tia murmurs self-deprecatingly, and Rem slowly crouched down in front of her. Seeing her hold onto her stomach that had been rubbed by Tia, Subaru jumps at Rem with a pale face.

Subaru: "Rem? Rem, are you alright?! Hey, Tia, what did you do to Rem?!"

Tia: "I just rubbed it. It's the truth. But, now that the shackles for Rem's mind are off, the child has realized that everything's ready."

Although nobody had known about Tia's involvement, even Subaru understood what had just happened.

Composure fades from Rem's facial expression, and she starts to breath a bit heavily. Her face clearly enduring pain and her holding onto her own baby belly meant that—

Subaru: "—She's going into labor!"

Tia: "Until the child is born, I can't lay a hand on her. That was our promise."

Subaru's eyes open wide, realizing that the time has finally come. In front of him, Tia tilted her head at Rem as she said,

Tia: "Becase we had that promise, I delayed this moment for as long as I could. …Both the mother and the child were way too stubborn."

Rem: "Tia…-sama…"

Rem tried to stop Tia, who started to step back with a smile. However, her stomach pain didn't let her, and Tia distanced herself without her fingers ever reaching her.

Tia, who jumped back lightly, opens the sliding door, and then she ran out to the garden.

Subaru: “Tia!”

Tia: “I’ll deal with my unfinished business myself. —If I fail, Hal-san, you know what to do.”

Tia looked back in the middle of the garden and said that with a smile on her face.

Hearing what sounded like one’s last words, Halibel curled his laps, as he was trusted with the matters to follow when his name was called.

Halibel: “It makes no sense for you to take a battle when you know you have slim chances of winning. You didn’t say anything about wanting help, either. Is this the pride of a great spirit or something?”

Tia: “It’s nothing big like that. —I’m strong, and I don’t plan on losing.”

Tia responded to Halibel’s comments like that with a refreshing smile.

After that, Tia finally looked at Subaru, and then at Rem.

Subaru: “How should I put this…This isn’t very like you.”

Rem: “Tia-sama…”

Tia: “About that day…well…I’m sorry. That was my fault.”

Tia awkwardly apologized to Rem while scratching her cheek with her finger. She said nothing more than that, and yet she looked even more nervous than when she revealed the truth about herself.

And then, after saying that, Tia added one comment with a bright expression.

Tia: “A kid! Give birth to an energetic one. A very energetic one.”

Right after Tia said that, a wind surrounded her. It was not a raging wind; it gently wrapped Tia, who was in the middle of the garden, and it urged her towards the sky.

They had no time to stop her. Tia got on the wind, and she rose at once. And then, Rem reached her hand out for Tia-for her friend as she faded away, and she desperately strained his voice.

It wouldn't reach her. Neither her voice nor her hand reached Tila while she faded into the sky approaching night.

Rem: "Tia…-sama…"

Subaru: "Tia—!!"

Subaru called Tia's name as she faded into the sky instead of Rem, whose voice died as it cracked.

Still, Tia didn't look back. She didn't stop, either.

Then, Tia steadily went up in the sky, going out of their sights.

"…"

The wind blowing against the garden, against the house, against Subaru and the others, died out. This meant that Tia went far away. So far away that she couldn't be interfered with at all.

Subaru: "Damn it…! That fool!"

Rem: "Subaru…-ku…"

Subaru: "I know! Rem, I know how you…feel…but…"

I want to chase Tia. He understood those feelings of hers so much that it hurt.

However, there was something more important to deal with right now. He had bring Rem to the clinic.

Rem: "—Ah…ku…"

When that crossed his mind, serious pain went across Rem's face.

Subaru, with both of his hands, lifted Rem, who panted because of the endless waves of the pain of birth.

Subaru: “Hal-san! Please take care of all that stuff!”

Halibel: “Got it, leave it to me.”

It was an unspecific instruction that was far too vague. However, Halibel accepted it without putting in any objection, and he disappeared as if melding into the shadows.

He needed to tell the old magic user about the situation before bringing Rem to the clinic. On top of that, there were mountains of things he wanted Halibel to do.

Subaru: “Rem, I’ll take you to the clinic as soon as possible. Please trust me with…both of your lives.”

Rem: “…”

Rem nods deeply in Subaru’s arms, and then he slowly stepped outside.

Under the variegated sky approaching night mixed with blue and orange, Subaru ran as fast as he could with his pregnant wife in his arms.

Now…just for now he thought only about Rem and ran and ran along the road to the clinic.

—Without realizing that, in a sense, this was another form of running away.

Interlude: Death Anniversary

1

—What erupted when she found that women were flames of unbearable rage.

Before the avenger became an avenger, she had lived in a village where “strays” gathered.

Onis are a race species. Rumors have it that their scarce kind created a hidden village somewhere, barely scraping by, but that was not the case for her. When she was born, it was a child and her parent, and after her mother died, she had nothing but her own life.

The place this girl arrived at was a village where “strays” gathered.

Demi-humans with baggage and people who committed crime and left human villages lived there; not many decent people lived there. Because of that, she didn’t get rejected, as she was a high and proud Oni, and was accepted as a member of the village, allowed to live on.

As someone that had never lived with anyone other than her mother, life at the village was full of confusing things. Although the villagers were not good people, everyone had their own circumstances and anguish to deal with. Nobody intentionally acted cold to her.

Once time went by, even she was able to make friends before long. She was no longer confused with life at the village, had a set way she went about her days, and accepted these ordinary but peaceful times.

The girl went ahead and thought that this was like a sort of blessing. She had never seen what a blessing actually is. It might’ve been a misunderstanding. But still, she was glad.

—It was when she had these sort of thoughts that they all disappeared in a scene of flames

The village she was familiar with was engulfed in flames, cruelly burning down.

The neighbor who would always greet her, the young man who taught her how to grow crops, the elderly who was kind to her now, someone of the same sex that she'd talked to for the first time just yesterday, the man she'd been talking with frequently as of late-everyone burned.

She survived only because she got lucky.

But did she really get lucky? Could it be that she'd survived because she didn't have the best luck?

She brings out her horn, and it releases abominable power. Mana running through her body, she goes on a rampage to get rid of those who casted flames on the village. However, it wasn't enough.

She gets overpowered by sheer numbers, and her body burns in flames. They loudly laugh at her for screaming from the pain and despair, and she gets crushed by their feet.

???: "Not too baaaad I'd saaay. That's the kind of glare that I like."

She heard a shrill voice nearby.

They stood next to her, and she poured something disgusting into her while she was down on the ground. It wasn't her body that rejected it; her soul rejected it. She let out a shriek. They wouldn't listen. Something slipped into her ears and was going into her body. Her insides get violated with moisture.

???: "Work's all done! Now, bastard, what do you like about me?"

The voice of a crazy, insane woman who wasn't okay in the head goes inside her ears, and it wouldn't go away.

It wouldn't go away. It just wouldn't. She gets tormented endlessly by the fear of going crazy at any moment. It was only when the villages, flames, and those people were gone that it finally disappeared.

But, her nose was still trying to find out where they went so that she could go after them. The thing that was poured into her-the shock that violently went through her sniffs out their location.

???: "—I will…punish them."

She swears that in the face of the scorched village and became an avenger.

Now that she was an avenger, she needed the power she lacked in order to do an avenger's job.

To obtain it, she did something rash that put her life in danger. She snuck into a great spirit's nest, a place people went to impelled by their own insanity, just like she was.

—She wanted the power to kill them, the power to punish them-the power to slaughter them.

The blowing wind was turning her party into a pool of blood like a blade. Using a corpse as a shield, the avenger ventured inside. Whenever the shield became ineffective, she used a different corpse. She repeated that.

Before she knew it, the wind started sounding like a song to the avenger

The great spirit's nest lies deep within the cave. Somehow, the cave played the sound of mother nature along with the wind coming from its deepest part, and the song playing really wrung the heart.

The avenger was enchanted by the wind's song, and she moved further in while being in a trance.

She wanted power. She wanted to hear the rest of the song. This cave had everything the avenger wanted.

And then, when the avenger reached the deepest part of it, she heard a voice.

???: “—I want to…kill everyone.”

—She remembered replying “I do too” to that voice.

2

???: “I want to kill. I want to kill. I want to kill. I want to kill. I want to kill.”

The power the avenger took in was endlessly pouring that intention into her.

Originally, it should have been a thirst for death that would make you go crazy, a torrent of bloodthirst, an impulse to destroy—however, it went well with the avenger’s wish; it was even like a pleasant singing voice.

Thus, the avenger demonstrated her power for retribution with joy.

She absolutely destroyed those who got caught by her sense of smell. There was nothing left of them. They couldn’t even be buried in a grave. It was the same as disappearing without a trace.

And so, the avenger achieved retribution again and again, until finally she’d reached a large town.

On the street at night, the avenger went after the “lingering scent” that her nose strongly reacted to, and she ran through an alley with an insane smile on her face. Her destination was close-right nearby.

This was her biggest target thus far. Maybe this was the target for the avenger—she got excited over the possibility that this might be the one who had that scornful laugh.

A black wind blows. Whenever that spreaded, people would recede out of fear. The target didn't sense her with the wind. She waits at the end of the path the target walks on, looking forward to their face twitching in fear.

"…"

An enemy with an extremely unpleasant, strong miasma appeared in front of the avenger. She saw their face, but unfortunately, it wasn't familiar to her. Doesn't matter. She was still going to kill them.

With that sole thought on her mind, the avenger adds bloodlust to the wind, and starts to bite her target whole—

???: "…"

A girl next to the enemy getting close to them caught her attention.

Somehow, at a glance, the avenger realized that this was a girl who had the same blood flowing through her as she did.

For a moment, she's taken aback by the girl standing to protect the enemy beside her. And then, once the avenger's stiffness was gone, thick, dark anger violently ate away her mind.

What is the she doing there? That man is an enemy who should be punished.

Why is someone of the same position, same blood, and same race with that man without punishing him?

???: "—What…are you doing."

In anger, her voice comes out.

It was not an intent to kill that came out, but a question.

Hearing that question, the girl did not choose to protect the avenger, but the frightened enemy, so her answer was clear.

The neighbor, the young one, the elderly, the person of the same sex…—The man who had hoped to bond…

She was going to protect the enemy that burned her happiness? Someone of the same blood, loving a man so happily?

In that case—

???: “—Die.”

—Killing this girl will increase her self-esteem.

3

And so, after experiencing failure twice, the avenger now had the right to face retribution for the third time.

???: “Damn…it…”

It was a white clothed woman who let out a cry of pain, hit the wall, and collapsed.

That forced voice sounded familiar. Of course it did. Inside the avenger’s cranium, a voice was still endlessly telling her to kill. The voices were the same.

The voice…was the same. And yet, it was too fragile. It desired something else. They weren’t in agreement. That’s why it was repelled.

This wasn’t the power the avenger wanted. It was something foreign, and it was too fragile.

Humbly saying that it wanted to become one would’ve been fine, but it was too fragile to do something like loudly tell her to obey.

???: “—Die.”

Thus, she demonstrated her power. She completely beat up the entity and reached for its core.

???: “Ah…oo…aah…”

Lifted by the collar, the woman moaned with her body. She squirmed and tried to escape from her arms, but she wouldn't let go. Then, the woman's existence slowly, slowly turned into light dust, and it was taken in by the avenger.

Originally, the woman's existence had been a part of the power the avenger took in. She held down the entity that had parted from her once before, making it hers for good this time.

???: "—e…m"

It sounded like the girl said someone's name the moment she disappeared. However, the avenger didn't hear it, and she gets scattered by the blowing wind, vanishing.

The nuisance was gone, and her power was complete. She wasn't missing anything anymore.

???: "—Die."

Now all that's left is to achieve retribution. An avenger carrying out her revenge. With that woman's death.

???: "…"

That woman is the one who's wrong. That woman is crazy for protecting the enemy that ought to be punished.

The enemy with the scent of the witch, and her abominable kind that got close to him.

Kill both of them. Both of them have to be killed. Kill. Kill, kill them.

Killing is the only thing that can comfort her for what she'd lost. This will be atonement.

—This isn't hatred; it's a duty. Because of this sense of duty, that woman must die!

Chapter 6: The Last Month of Pregnancy

1

The old magic user looked at Rem, who was brought into the clinic, and made a very unpleasant look with his pale face.

Doctor: “Is it really possible for the breaks to be this short right off the bat? What’s going on?!”

Rem: “…Hau”

The old magic user put his hand on Rem’s stomach as she breathed with difficulty, and he mentions how short the intervals of pain were. The old magic user clicked his tongue at Subaru, who was only confused by his point, and said,

Doctor: “Normally, the breaks between the pain during birth are long. It’s a sign that the baby will be born, though the pace will pick up little by little. But, your wife’s reactions are odd. Hey! Go call her over!”

The old magic user raises his voice in the middle of his explanation, and he shouts at the helper to call over the midwife. Meanwhile, the old magic user left the room in a hurry, and tension was starting to fill up the whole clinic.

Rem: “Subaru…-kun…”

Subaru: “Rem! Rem, are you alright…of course you aren’t. Damnit, ahhh, damnit, I’ll be here for you.”

Subaru gets angry at himself for being unable to say anything useful, and he spoke to Rem as he held her hand. Rem held his hand back so tight that it made him feel pain, but it wasn’t nearly as much as the amount of pain she was feeling.

Subaru seriously thought to himself, if crushing his hand would comfort Rem, then she can go ahead and do it.

Rem: “I won’t…do that. It’s my husband’s precious hand, after all…”

Reading Subaru’s inner thoughts, Rem slightly smiled. The way she was clearly pretending to be tough made Subaru choke up.

Subaru was the one who had to do everything he could-say everything he could—to comfort Rem. So, why was Subaru being taken care of by Rem?

Rem: “Tia…-sama…”

Subaru: “…Rem, don’t think about Tia right now. Focus on yourself.”

Rem: “That’s…not it. …Tia-sama said this before, right? That the baby inside my belly is trying to come out now because…the shackles of my mind…have been removed…”

Subaru: “She did…say that…”

Hearing Rem saying that falteringly, Subaru looks back on what Tia had said just before she bid her farewell.

The deadline of the promised made between Rem and Tia—until the child is born, Tia wouldn’t do anything to Rem and would quietly watch for any slip-ups.

It was actually a pointless promise and a misunderstanding by Tia, though.

Rem: “Then, the promise became pointless, and so now…the baby is finally coming out…”

Subaru: “…You might not believe me on this, but that’s just a coincidence. The events just happened to occur at the same time. It’s nothing to stress out about.”

It may be possible for one’s condition to be affected by the mind. However, it’s quite unlikely for that to even affect the timing of birth. It is true that Rem giving birth happened later than the magic user had predicted.

However, giving birth isn't so simple that you could just repress it through sheer will.

Rem: "It…it does stress me out. Because…I…"

Subaru: "I? What is it? Tell me anything. Right now, I'll listen to anything you have to say."

Rem: "…I…was scared. I was scared of the child…being born."

Rem held Subaru's hand tight, extremely tight, and said that while tearing up.

When Subaru's breath was taken away by her words, Rem closed her eyes tight again, and she continued to shed tears.

Rem: "I was so happy that you were glad that we have a baby. I really was. I was really happy. But, I was really scared. Because…"

Subaru: "…"

Rem: "Because…I…I wasn't able to be a good child…when I was one myself. I let…my parents down…and the villagers…thought I was a…hopeless child…"

Uncontrollable tears trickle down rapidly from Rem's eyes. And Subaru couldn't even wipe them away, as he was captivated by the beautiful, sparkling teardrops.

She was unable to be a good kid. That regret binded Rem's mind with anxiety.

Rem: "Despite all that, I have a child…and I was so worried, I couldn't stop being worried. Being a good child…a good little sister! I couldn't be either of those…and I wondered…could I really be a…parent…?"

Subaru: "Rem…"

Rem: “I didn’t…want to part with Tia-sama. I thought that, if there hadn’t been a deadline, we would have spent our days at the tenement house like that forever…and ever…But, I was wrong.”

Rem shakes her head disapprovingly and reveals the piled up inner thoughts she had kept hidden.

As if she was punishing herself for being far too sinful.

Rem: “I was… scared of becoming a parent. I was scared of… meeting face to face with the child. I was actually scared this whole time. I thought I couldn’t be a good parent!”

Subaru: “…”

Rem: “Because, I’ve always…disappointed all the…precious people…around me…”

Rem breathes heavily, and her face is red from agitation and grief. Using the hand that wasn’t holding onto Subaru’s, Rem wipes her face that had tears trickling down on it, and then covered it with her arm.

Rem’s heartbreaking outburst hits Subaru, and it was tearing his heart into shreds.

It was a very intense, a very natural, and a very sad outburst.

Subaru: “…”

Subaru swallows his saliva, and choosing his next words throws his brain into chaos.

What should he say? He didn’t know the answer. “Sorry for making you worry”? “Sorry for not picking up on your worries?” Criticize her by saying “Don’t be so pathetic”? None of them seemed correct.

Because Rem revealed what she felt deep down. She made up her mind to reveal that she was hated and disappointed others.

That’s right. Rem said that she has always disappointed those who were precious to her. She confessed after she decided to make Subaru reveal his own true feelings.

And so, after that confession, what did he think? Was he actually disappointed by Rem?

Subaru: “Rem”

Rem: “…”

Rem, who had her name called for a moment, shakes with her face covered. Birth pains and probably disappointment with herself were tormenting her chest. Her mind was a mess, no doubt about it.

Subaru was also worrying about what to say in this situation, right here right now.

So, Subaru held Rem’s hand, and with his other hand, patted her head as he said,

Subaru: “I understand how you feel. …I really do.”

Rem: “Subaru…-kun…?”

Rem slowly raised her arms, as if she was surprised by the gentleness of Subaru’s tone. Just how pathetic did Subaru look in her eyes?

Rem’s worry truly was the same as Subaru’s, as if they were mirroring each other.

Subaru: “You see, I… …I’m the same way. No, I was even worse. I wasn’t able to be a good kid. I couldn’t…look my dad…or my mom in the face, either…”

Rem: “…”

Subaru: “They were such great parents. My dad and my mom really were the greatest parents in the world. They loved each other, were nice to me…told me that they loved me…”

Just like Rem did, Subaru started talking about himself as the tears trickled down.

He's lived with Rem for a year and a half, and was summoned to this world just under 2 years ago. In all that time, Subaru had never spoken about his past to anyone—not even once.

Because it was related to the memories Subaru never wanted to reveal. And they were in this precious place that was so wonderful and beautiful to Subaru that he was scared to even touch it.

Subaru looked up to his parents. …From the bottom of his heart, he felt sorry that he had to be their child.

His parents were so kind, strict, gave him joy, sadness, anger, gifts, and yet their failure of a son couldn't give anything back. It was truly pathetic.

How could Natsuki Subaru, someone who was raised by such good parents and still couldn't be a good son, become a parent? That's what he was afraid of this whole time…

Subaru: "But, I can't…show you that I am. I…I brought you with me. I'm the one who brought you with me. I wanted to give you everything I had to make you happy. I told myself that I had to do it…"

That's why he hid his anxiety and eagerly waited for this day to come. He worked hard at his job, devoted himself to supporting Rem, and tried his best to be a good husband.

Believing that if he tried to be good husband, in the future he could become a good father too.

Subaru: "But, it wasn't that simple. Of course it wasn't. I'm going to be a someone's parent, you know. I can't just get the right answers by thinking logically. So, I'm still…"

At the last minute, he threw everything out there, as if to repent his ignorance of Rem's anxiety.

Subaru and Rem both knew that neither of them were perfect. And they were afraid of whether they'd be able to fulfill their responsibilities as parents for the child that was on the way.

They were scared. So scared. And they were even scared of confessing that they were scared, but…

Rem: "Subaru…-kun…do you regret it?"

After listening to his confession, Rem broke the silence by asking Subaru a question. Subaru impulsively lifted his head, and he looked straight at Rem's eyes that were right there.

Her light blue eyes were switching between despair and grief and were staring at Subaru. Inside her baby belly, there was their child. Labor pains have already started, and birth was just around the corner.

With all that happening, she had this confession. …Did he want this child to be born?

Subaru: "…"

Subaru knew that Rem's eyes were asking him that, and he rubbed his eyes hard.

He wasn't clear enough. Subaru made it this far regretting his lack of clarity, regretting his lack of action, running away from the problems before him and going to the more comfortable path—to the less painful path.

He made it this far by running away from his parents, running away from reality, running away from initiating into this world, running away from his promise that he made, running away from those who were precious to him, and running away from the fear of losing what he had.

Did he run and run and run and come this far, just to lose everything?

Subaru: "That's not…it. Rem, I don't regret it. I…I've been saved."

Rem: "Subaru-kun…"

Subaru: “I’ve always been running. I threw away everything and ran away with you…But, when I heard that we had a child, I was happy, and that’s when I was saved. Even after running and running with my back turned, there was something I could have. And that was…our child.”

He was worried. He couldn’t lie. Subaru, as someone who couldn’t look at his parents in the face, always had a fear of becoming a parent. He still does. It wasn’t gone. It probably would never go away.

But, at the same time, Subaru knew something. He knew the love of the best role model parents in the whole world.

Subaru: “I was a…terrible son. I wasn’t able to be a good kid. But, I had the best parents in the whole world. I know I had the best parents, and I know I was the worst child ever too. So, no matter what happens, I’ll love our child.”

Rem: “…”

Subaru: “My parents loved a hopeless failure like me. I know that. I do. …That’s why I’ll be able to love my own child—love my family.”

In Subaru’s mind, he saw their smiles—copying his father and his mother, he smiled. He threw his chest out with confidence, bragged that he knew the best role-models, and was proud.

Natsuki Subaru was raised by the world’s best parents—the world’s best role models—for 17 years.

Rem: “…”

After Subaru declared that with a smile, Rem was speechless. Her teary eyes open wide, her red face becomes even more red, and her facial expression slowly changes.

The overflowing tears turned into just one teardrop, and with a slight smile Rem said,

Rem: “…You’re fanatical like an Oni.”

Then, with the same smile from that one moment, she said an awfully nostalgic line to Subaru.

Did Subaru nod back at that smile with the same smile he had on that day?

Then came…

Doctor: "…The midwife's here. Birth preparations will begin. Get out. Go pray."

The old magic user came back to the clinic room with a middle-aged woman. Subaru thought the timing was too perfect, but the old magic user had his usual sour look, so he couldn't tell what he was thinking.

Anyhow, it was time. Subaru looked back at Rem, and took her hand once again as he said,

Subaru: "Rem, all these feelings I've let out are the truth. Please believe me."

Rem: "…I'll…always…believe Subaru-kun."

Subaru: "Ohh, that's right."

The helper who came in quickly brings in the necessary tools into the room. The midwife gives instructions for what to do with them, and the old magic user jerked his chin at Subaru with a stern look. He was telling him to get out.

Subaru: "I can't stay for its birth?"

Doctor: "You really think men staying here would be helpful? Everyone I've called over are woman, including the midwife and the helper. I'm here just in case, but in this situation even I'm just a figurehead."

The old magic user snorted to drop him a hint that he didn't need to do anything. He felt like his continuously blunt attitude was telling him that he trying to be more helpful than needed.

Subaru: “Doctor, please take care of Rem.”

Doctor: “Tell that to the midwife.”

He was waved at perfunctorily, and he gave a wry smile. After that, now was when he let go of Rem’s hand as he said,

Subaru: “Rem, I’ll be waiting. …My wife and kid are in your hands.”

Rem: “Yes, your Rem’s got this, Subaru-kun. …About Tia-sama…”

Subaru: “I know.”

Hearing the words she added on with a smile, Subaru nodded to indicate that she didn’t have to continue. Rem sees that, and after she closed her eyes approvingly, starts to breath heavily.

A fight only Rem could face was going to begin.

???: “Get out!”

The midwife speaks to him, and Subaru was forced to leave the clinic room. When he was about to leave the room, he heard Rem’s cries of pain. Her long, long fight was beginning.

The truth is that Subaru wanted to watch over her fight outside the clinic room too, but…

Halibel: “…Su-san”

Just as Subaru appeared at the aisle, Halibel spoke to him. He’d been planning this and that after he informed the clinic that Rem was going into labor.

He was also the one person who understood the situation besides Subaru and Rem.

Halibel: “How’s Rem-chan?”

Subaru: “She’s at the stage where birth really begins. They said that men will get in the way and kicked me out. …I really am useless in situations like these.”

Halibel: “That includes me too. It’s Rem’s job and her job only. Also, we’ve got our own things we need to do. …Su-san, you know that too, don’t you?”

Subaru gave a wry smile, and then said “Yeah” to reassure Halibel, who lowered the tone of his voice.

With the expression Halibel had, and above all, with what had happened just before, he could imagine what he was talking about.

Subaru: “The person who stole Tia’s power is coming to town to kill me. What about Tia…”

Halibel: “Look at this.”

To answer Subaru’s question, Halibel took out something from his kimono’s sleeve. At first, this thing knitted with black thread looked like something you’d wear around your arm. …Then, he had an idea.

Subaru: “That good luck bracelet is something you gave to Tia.”

Halibel: “Good luck bracelets are magic items because of the black braiding. I’ll be skipping the details on how it’s made, but two of these make a whole magical item, and if something ever happens to the owner…”

As Halibel spoke, he shook the black braids. It snapped while he did it.

Subaru: “Which means that Tia…”

Halibel: “She lost a fight she picked herself. Even she knew that she had a low chance of winning. She realized it when she was about to leave it up to me to finish the job. What a ridiculous girl.”

Halibel put the snapped braids into his pocket and laughed loudly with his fangs showing. It probably seemed sad somehow because he was mourning Tia in his own way.

And so, he took out his kiseru instead of the black beads, put it to his mouth, and lit it.

Halibel: “I’m going to take care of Tia-chan’s request. Su-san…”

Subaru: “I know.”

Subaru interrupted Halibel and answered. Just like how he did when he to Rem.

Subaru’s eyes lit up with determination and readiness, and then said this.

Subaru: “…There’s no running away anymore.”

2

Halibel: “About that girl…let’s call her ‘the enemy’. About the enemy, she was outside of the town. I sort of tried getting a hit on her, but that wasn’t a good idea. Doing it half-heartedly would just lead to more death.”

That was Halibel’s opinion as he lit his kiseru. After that, Subaru racked his brains with a serious look, and he tilted his head as he said, “A hit”?

Subaru: “By “a hit”, do you mean that you got in a fight? You fought?”“

Halibel: “If I did, don’t you think I would’ve gotten hurt? By I, I meant my team. Or in your words, I used a Shinobi squad.”

Subaru: “So Shinobi squads do exist! You really are a leader! You said they didn’t exist!”

Halibel: “A Shinobi can’t leak his secrets, you know? Nothing wrong with that, is there?”

Halibel tells Subaru, who wouldn’t let the issue go, to calm down as he put his hand on his forehead.

In this situation, he didn’t have the time to ask about hidden shinobi villages in Kararagi in detail. The information Halibel gathered and a plan were what were important…

Halibel She looks just like Tia-chan, but her skin is clearly black. We can stop her by attacking with a bunch of stalling tactics, but that won't work for long. What should we do?"

Subaru: "What would you do? Do you have some sort of idea in mind?"

Halibel: "The simplest method would be to confine you outside town and then accomplish our goal."

Halibel put up his finger and presented the most reliable and simple plan possible. However, before Subaru could say something, Halibel bent the finger he had held up as he said,

Halibel: "But, that's not an option. I wouldn't want to lose a friend, and I'd feel terrible if I let Rem-chan's husband die and left her child on the way without a parent. Plus, it goes against my promise with Tia-chan."

Subaru: "You sure do have a strong sense of duty. For a playboy, that is."

Halibel: "You can't play without rules. So, an "eternal playboy" also has to stick to the rules that go with playing."

Halibel responded to Subaru's joke with a joke of his own, and he shrugged. That gesture makes Subaru break into a smile, and he slapped his cheeks out of relief that he didn't have to worry about being sacrificed for now.

Subaru: "Let's discuss a little more. …What do you know about Zarestia?"

Halibel: "I told you most of it at the house. She's said to be one of the Four Great Spirits, a murdering spirit, a "phantom slasher", "the most beautiful shinigami", and she always sleeping in her nest in the west side of Kararagi. Sometimes she cuts up those who come into her bed. …Also, she might have an old song."

Subaru: “An old…song?”

When he raised an eyebrow at the unexpected word, Halibel said “Yes” as he nodded deeply.

Halibel: “I don’t know the details, but those who know it will recognize it. If I remember correctly, what was it again…it’s like a lullaby.”

Subaru: “The song of the wind? The lullaby of the wind?”

Halibel, Oh, that’s it. Su-san, I’m surprised you knew. Even though you’re not even a Kararagian.”

Subaru: “Well, of course I do. What kind of people do you think I’m surrounded with everyday at work?”

Subaru responded to Halibel, who acted impressed, and inside he was grateful—grateful for the nosiness of the ladies he worked with at the Magoji palace. Those ladies were the ones who taught Subaru, as he was going to become a dad soon, from general housework to babysitting. Among the things he learned, there was a song called the lullaby of the wind.

It was something that sung the story of when people defeated a certain large beast during ancient times.

Subaru: “…Hal-san, you mentioned stalling tactics, right? How long can we stop her for?”

Halibel: “…With sacrifices, half a day. Without sacrifices, 6 hours.”

Although Halibel hesitated for a moment, he looked into Subaru eyes and gave that answer. He did it because, right now, there was strong determination in Subaru’s eyes.

He thought about the lullaby of the wind, all of his enemies, Tia, and then came up with one idea.

He was going to need time, money, and help.

And then there also was…

Subaru: “…I’ll have to go around with my head down, ready to live to return favors for the rest of my life!!”

3

She waves her hand, conjuring wind. A slaughterous wind that cut up everything and turned things into dust.

???: “…Die.”

A brief order, then quick execution. In less than a second, the bite attack flew and devoured the sky.

A flash went through the sky, and steel was repelled by the wind that was following it. Throws delayed her, attacking her from all directions non-stop. It was depressing. The wind repelled the steel. No matter how many times she was attacked, it didn’t matter.

???: “…Die.”

She attacked her opponent who threw steel with wind. The effect was unclear. This was one of the flaws with the wind; the flurry of wind would turn into fangs and fade away after opening a space. She had to see the result for herself.

However, it was currently night time. The surrounding enemies were elusive and innately skilled at lurking in the darkness.

???: “…Die.”

It was impossible to tell if any of the flurries of wind caught the black shadow. Even if they hit, they didn’t even let out cries of pain and act shamelessly when they died. They were horrible enemies in every way.

???: “Kill kill kill kill kill kill kill.”

I hear a voice in my head. I know. I feel the same way. I want to kill everything.

But before that, I have to kill someone. There’s an enemy who needs to be punished. I sense their presence with my nose. I know where they are, but the dark shadows are getting in the way.

???: "…"

Suddenly, in her vision of hatred, she saw the black shadows move altogether. Her eyes opened wide, wondering what this was all about, and then all the presences surrounding her started to disappear, as if the wind had scattered them.

They withdrew. Suddenly. Without any changes in the situation. She thinks about what happened, about what they were doing. Her instincts were telling her to take this lucky chance to go towards the witch scent. However, if this is a trap or a plot, jumping into this would be the the height of stupidity. What are you thinking? You have the power to scatter them now.

The differing conclusions in her mind and her heart collide with each other. I want to kill them. I should kill them carefully. While they kept fighting each other, she came to the conclusion that she should settle down…

???: "…"

The next moment, she was disgusted by a foul, strong stench.

Her eyes opened wide, and the stench that reached her via the wind makes her nose react. Without a doubt, this wafting stench, which slipped into her nose even if she didn't want it to, was an evil scent, the witch's scent, a miasma that needed to be punished…

The smell was quickly getting stronger, her senses and instincts cheer her on, and so she blasted the ground with the bottom of her foot.

???: "Kill! Kill! Kill! Kill! Kill! Kill!"

???: "…Die die die die die die!}

The cheer in her skull and her own cheer overlap. She jumped on the ground lightly and went after her target. She went into town, smashed roof tiles, jumped over buildings, and went deeper and deeper until finally—

Subaru: "…About your face…"

She landed with her limbs and looked up. In front of her, there was a man standing in a blue dress. A stench that pierced her sense of smell and disgusted her nose and mind.

The face with the witch's scent that she'd seen before—the evil face that had cowered in fear and trembled as it was hunted was smiling in a very provocative manner.

And then…

Subaru: "…It's cuter when you smile. Almost as cute as my wife and my child."

???: "…Die!!"

She was greeted with a spiteful smile, and her bloodlust makes her strike. The wind goes straight towards the man standing upright, and it scraped off his existence from the earth along with his stench…or at least, it should have.

Halibel: "Unfortunately, I won't let you do that."

???: "…"

With that flat voice, all of the flurries of wind came to nothing. The winds were shot down by steel thrown from the darkness. Wind arose where the enemy wasn't, and the man opened his arms, unharmed. It was like he was saying that he was the one who did this.

???: "…Diee!"

Inexcusable. She conjured even more wind, let her increase in bloodlust control her, and struck with her power.

She produces a blast. The ground was gouged out roundly, as if to draw a circle in the middle of the explosion. However, the man wasn't inside of the damage. Neither was the demi-human who interfered with by throwing things.

She looked up. She stepped onto the roof tiles, and on top of the building, there was a man. He was being carried by a demi-human on his shoulder, and he was trying to run.

…I won't let you get away. I want to kill you. Like I'd let you get away. I want to kill you.

???: "…Die!"

She chased after the stench and the demi-human running away while the night approached dawn, jumping and running through the streets. It becomes wind, she attacks with wind, swirls wind, rides wind, and—

???: "…!"

Inside the wind, a different smell was mixed with the stench. And her body was having a strong reaction to it. This was a person's smell, and a strong one at that. There were a lot of people. A premise…she sees a premise down there. The man and the demi-human fled into it. Peoples' presences…a stench that has another stench.

She was very hesitant about going in. But, the man was in there. Retribution was in there…

Subaru: "…I can return by"

???: "…!!"

After that inaudible utterance, her instincts went wild from the stench that became tremendously strong. Her cautiousness was blown away along with her reason. When she stepped in, she jumped towards the sky and looked for the demi-human running through the garden.

She aimed at him and the man he was carrying on his shoulders and attacked with absolutely unavoidable wind from all sides.

Halibel: "Sorry, Su-san!"

Sensing that the inescape wind coming close, the demi-human yelled right before it trapped them. He grabbed onto the body of the man on his shoulders and threw him as hard as he could. The man’s body went through a gap in the wind and escaped its cutting range. …However, that wasn’t going to happen for the demi-human that was left behind.

???: “…Die!”

The wind cruelly cuts up the demi-human who closed his fingers and was left inside. The demi-human died. She starts to feel joy from killing him, and at the same time, realizes that this wasn’t over yet.

The man had been thrown into the sky. She jumped towards it and opened her arms.

Let’s tear his body limb from limb, take his remains, and bring them to her. Let’s teach this woman who gave birth and snuggled up to the sinful enemy a lesson.

This is revenge. This is retribution. This is atonement for their blood.

…This is revenge for having the happiness that I was never able to have!

???: “…D”

Subaru: “Now…!!”

When her hatred and joy crossed each other and she tried to strike with “death”, the source of the stench shouted.

Subaru: “Ready…gooo!!”

Right after that, she sensed that something was being thrown at her from all directions—at the edge of her vision, she saw something that looked like an unfolded cloth. It was thrown at her.

???: “…”

Think. The stench is right before me. I can reach him and kill him.

But, if I prioritize that, the thrown unfolded cloth will reach me. I can still get away from it. I can conjure wind, get on it, and foil the enemy's plan.

???: "…"

That's right. No need to panic. Do what's safe. There's no need to go with the enemy's plan…

???: "Kill kill kill kill kill kill kill"

Control the thirst for death that keeps echoing in your head, and you'll get out of this situation.

Listen to me, just this once. If you do, you'll be able to quench your thirst—

???: "…I want to kill. But, I can't."

???: "…?!"

???: "…Because I don't want Rem to hate me."

Something inside her said that in the same voice that was telling her to kill.

Her hands and legs freeze. She couldn't move. She couldn't run or kill.

???: "…Dieeeeeee!!"

???: "…Ahh, I can't get enough of that scream."

When she heard a very cruel voice, her body was also hit by something that she was unable to dodge. It was the wet cloth. It wrapped around her. It wasn't attacking her. It just wrapped around her over and over.

Water…I'm wet. It's not water. This has a sharp smell.

???: "…! ! ……! ! …!!"

Then, she screamed as if her skull was breaking, and the rejection threw her brain into chaos. The entity that should’ve been shut inside went wild; it couldn’t take it anymore, and it tried to come out and escape.

???: “…”

Her head was aching. Her skull was being torn apart violently from the inside. It was strange pain that went beyond her imagination. She had never experienced this sort of pain. She had never experienced this sort of suffering. She had never imagined this sort of pain. No, no, no, no…I don’t want to die.

It comes off. It came off; the power that made up her body fell apart. She lost the figure that had been the basis for her body—the figure that made her look formidable to demonstrate power—as if melting like ice.

Her body shrunk. Her hair color changed. She went from having inhumane beauty to being an ugly village girl. She went from having eccentric power to being a mere incomplete Oni.

And so, she even lost her power to get revenge, was abandoned by her bloodlust, and…

???: “I”

Halibel: “…I’m sorry. I’m sorry.”

She hears the voice of a demi-human that should have been cut up earlier. She shook off the cloth that was on her. She could now see the black shadows jumping at her.

A small blade stabbed a part of her body—the center of her chest.

…That was the end.

4

In the palace’s garden, he was looking down on a girl that had collapsed.

She had a light brown pigtails and an ordinary but charming face.

However, she was so pale that it looked like she could faint at any moment, ruining it, and she had awful bags under her eyes.

Halibel: “Her wounds are fatal, and she was hit with a curse that made her unable to get away. …Now, she’s done for.”

Next to Subaru, there was Halibel looking down on a girl, half-naked without his kimono on. Listening to his statement, Subaru knitted his brow and tilted his head as he asked, “A curse?”

Halibel: “I told you before, didn’t I? I’m an expert on magic…Killing with curses is my trump card. Stuff like my fur and nails are fused into the kunai I have, so if it gets stolen, it will cast a curse.”

Subaru: “What the hell, that’s really dangerous. Is it even okay for you to tell me about this?”

Halibel: “It’s totally fine. If you expose it to people, I’ll just make you completely disappear.”

Subaru: “That sure is a crazy way to deal with it.”

Halibel acted relaxed, but Subaru couldn’t hide the chills he had from his killing scheme.

Sorcery is said to be one of the arts in this world that are branches of magic. Since sorcery is an art that specializes in taking someone’s life, there is a rule that the caster must touch his/her opponent, and even Subaru has had experience with this before. Sorcery is very hard to use because of this, but Halibel has solved it by mixing in parts of himself with his weapon.

Halibel: “On the first night we met, the kunai stabbed her. Her movement slowed down because it was effective. Even while harnessing a great spirit’s power, you can’t stop the curse from working.”

Subaru: “So she came to kill me before she would die?”

Halibel: “It might be why she rushed things. Honestly, I don’t know myself.”

Shrugging his shoulders, Halibel took his kiseru out of his belly band, and put it in his mouth. It seemed that he had no intentions of being involved with what was going to happen now. He was being both kind and strict.

Subaru took a deep breath, and then looked into the face of the girl who was on the verge of death.

???: "…"

Slowly, her eyes opened, as if she had felt his presence. They were light blue eyes. That common feature made Subaru feel some unnecessary guilt. However, he didn't stop.

Subaru: "It was…It was a mistake for you to go after me. I have nothing to do with the Witch Cult. But, I can see why you still couldn't stop."

???: "…"

Subaru: "I won't ask you to forgive me. I'd like to, but there'd be no use in asking. I won't tell you to not hate me, so go ahead and hate me. But, I'd like you to hate just me."

He didn't want her to hate his child that was being born, and of course, not Rem, either. That also went for Halibel and the other people who helped him out.

In this situation, it was Natsuki Subaru who thought about killing her, made a plan, and carried it out.

It was Natsuki Subaru who wished to kill her; it was him who filled her with hatred until the very end.

Subaru: "My name is Natsuki Subaru. That is the name of the man who killed you."

???: "…"

Subaru: "I'm sorry. I'm very sorry. Even though I told you that you didn't have to forgive me…I'm sorry for apologizing."

Ideally, he would listen to no complaints if possible, the dying girl would be left with no regrets, and he'd take her life. However, that didn't happen, and Subaru was being a helpless wimp faced with death.

"Death" is scary. "Death" is not salvation. Subaru knew that.

Subaru knew "Death" better than anyone in this world, so he felt very bad for the girl.

Subaru: "I have a child on the way. Rem is doing her best. I'm going to be a father. So, I couldn't die. I'm sorry. That's why I killed you."

They were nothing but selfish excuses. And if their views became so conflicted that they decided to kill each other, there would be no time to understand one another.

Subaru's words weren't going to comfort her or enlighten her.

In response to Subaru's words, the girl stopped her distressed breathing for a moment and said,

???: "I…"

Subaru: "…"

???: "I…hate…that…girl."

The girl said that in a voice full of hatred as if she was coughing up blood—as if she was looking into heaven from hell.

Subaru immediately realized that she was talking about Rem. He realized it, but that realization made things inconsistent. She she should have been going after the witch's scent. That's how they came up with the plan to use Subaru as a bait. All of her hatred should've been directed towards Subaru.

???: "That girl…has…everything…I want…everything…"

Subaru: "That's…"

???: "I was going to…with him…and yet…I…"

Tears flow from the girl's eyes. Her eyes were no longer looking at Subaru, or at anywhere in this world.

They were looking somewhere else—they were looking at a scene with happiness that she yearned for so much, enough to tear her heart out and drive her to get revenge.

Happiness that she was supposed to have too. She had that taken away from her, became an avenger, and now she was going to die.

What she held onto at the very end were her hatred and jealousy towards Rem, who had the same blood in her veins and reached a kind of life that was different from the one she had…No, it was probably envy.

Subaru: "What's your name?"

???: "…"

Subaru: "What is…your name?"

He asked, crouching down and moving his face close. To his side, Halibel tried to stop him, but Subaru prevented him from doing so with his hand. The girl no longer had the energy to do something to Subaru as he got close.

He listened to the girl's last spark of life that was running out even in this moment.

???: "…ese"

Subaru: "Reese"

Subaru picked up the name he was quickly told, and said that. He didn't have the time to confirm if he was correct.

???:……"

Light fades away from the girl's eyes. The girl envied Rem, cursed her fate, and breathed her last.

He saw that with his own eyes. …No, it was Natsuki Subaru who put an end to her.

He'd never forget her name. Subaru would never forget the fact the girl had once lived—that Reese had once lived. He sacrificed Reese to protect himself; to protect his family; to protect his life.

And he would never tell anyone what this girl Reese had truly wished for. Subaru, who was hated by her, was going to carry that to his grave.

So that neither Rem nor the child on the way would ever find out about it.

Subaru: "…It's over."

Halibel: "Yeah. It wasn't done in a very satisfying way, though."

Upon hearing Subaru's statement mixed with a sigh, Halibel responded while giving out smoke. He helped out with everything for this plan. Because of that, Subaru bowed his head to Halibel.

Subaru: "Thanks for going with my selfish, uncertain plan. I really appreciate it."

Halibel: "I was the one who made the final call, and we got her just like you planned, so I have no complaints. The Substitution that I hadn't done in a while worked. It all went fairly well."

He had said that he wasn't very good at Substitution, but in the very end, it worked out.

After Halibel let Subaru get away from the girl's max firepower, he used Substitution and survived by pulling a classic: "switching with a log.

Subaru: "That sure showed the finesse of a ninja. …Also"

Halibel wasn't the only one who helped out with this plan. He had the help of many others.

Looking around, this was the Magoji palace—after preparing a trap, he used the premise to guarantee the necessary space. And that was not the only thing he used; he used people and money too.

To prove it, there was Riften Magoji standing on the veranda of the palace. While touching his mustache, he bowed deeply to Subaru and said,

Riften: “I’m glad that things went according to plan without any problems.”

Subaru: “I sincerely apologize for the trouble I’ve caused you, Master…”

Riften: ““Culture School” has only just begun. You still have to guide all these women with your feminine abilities. It’s an essential investment. I love investments, you see.”

He had asked Riften, who chuckled, to supply the alcohol that was absolutely necessary for the plan on top of providing a place for it. He had used Riften’s name, as he was a brave warrior, to literally gather strong alcohol from the town and get them to bring it all into the palace.

Subaru: “The lullaby hint, and Tia being poor with alcohol. And then there was the overreaction to the cooking alcohol.”

Those things led to the inference that Zarestia isn’t fond of alcohol. The old anecdotes of an entity with extremely strong power drinking excessively and being slain were endless.

The lullaby also had details related to that. If there really were existences running rampant in this world that are like the ones in the legends, then it wouldn’t necessarily be wrong to act out those legends.

A blanket with a large amount of alcohol was actually thrown at the Zarestia that was captured in Reese, and she came out after her body was soaked in alcohol.

With Riften’s wealth and reputation and the traditions of the ladies at the palace, he won. Afterwards, the people who helped him with the alcohol soaking plan…

Subaru: "…Clane's employment agency."

Clane: "After you said "Avenging Tia", I had to come too. Also, everyone loved that girl."

Said Clane, in armor—not an apron—with his large arms folded. He and a lot of other non-regular employees came rushing over when they heard about avenging Tia.

If the plan fails, there will be an all out war with a being that has a Great Spirit level of power. Even though they had declined at first like that, many people did this for Tia.

Clane: "And if push came to shove, Halibel would've done something."

Halibel: "What the heck? You expect way too much from me."

"Give me a break, man" Halibel said as he shook his head at Clane, who scratched the nose on his lizard face. That behavior makes soft smiles go all around.

He had seen a harsh ending. However, having no victims other than the girl was the best conclusion among all the ones he thought of. It was the best one where he didn't lose anything.

So, all that's left was…

Halibel: "…The final payback, huh."

Subaru looked up, and Halibel knocked the ash off his kiseru. Riften firmly sat down at the veranda and picked up the weapons that Clane and the others deployed.

A wind slowly comes down towards the palace's garden covered with tension, battle preparations, and caution.

Milky white hair, a pure white dress, and a face that had reached inhumane beauty via the hands of God. She had a rude side, which didn't go with the way she looked, and childish parts about her and was surprisingly friendly and sentimental.

It was the girl that had the title of a great spirit, which didn't suit her at all, who everyone here knew.

???: "…"

Overwhelmed by the presence coming closer, Subaru stopped his feet from stepping back.

In his mind, he decided that he wouldn't run away. Believing that If he gets away from her—away from Tia…

…He'd also get away from those boisterous, noisy days of happiness.

5

Long, long ago before the world—before witches and dragons became this and that…

I was always free. I enjoyed my freedom without having anyone get in my way.

I conjured wind, spread fires, whirled up water, and dug up dirt, doing whatever I wanted.

Everyone approved of me. Everyone asked all these favors of me, who lived freely. I felt nice and they were well-mannered, so I did their favors.

I conjured wind, spread fires, whirled up water, and dug up dirt, doing what they had asked for.

After that, everyone was happy. Everyone praised me. Everyone smiled.

So, my mood got better and better, and I did everyone favors. Of course, sometimes I'd miss being free so much that I wouldn't do their favors, but in most cases, I still helped everyone out whenever I wasn't sleeping.

Eventually, everyone started bringing things whenever they asked me for favors.

They were things like vegetables, animal meat, sparkly gems, and burnished kimonos; they were all these sort of things that had "value".

I wasn't really hungry, nor did I have any interest in gems, and the cloth had some unnecessary fur on it so I wasn't happy with the things they brought.

But, I appreciated their thoughts, so I decided to work hard.

I conjured wind, spread fire, whirled up water, and dug up dirt. That's what I loved to do. By doing what I loved, everyone was happy. So, I did it over and over again.

However, eventually everyone's favors started to get weird.

Even though they were asking for favors, they kept bringing things with them. Before, I was happy doing what I wanted with fire, water, and dirt, but now I was being told what to do.

I loved being free. I loved doing what I wanted.

But, I liked being praised by everyone, and I also liked getting attention.

So, I reluctantly did everyone's favors. I conjured water, spread fire, whirled up water, and dug up dirt where they wanted me to.

Afterwards, everyone was happy again. My mood improved, and I forgave them.

Then, a lot of their favors were asking me to do what they told me.

Eventually…eventually it happened when I was getting used to doing what people told me to.

This favor was really weird.

They didn’t need wind. They didn’t need water. They didn’t need dirt. What they wanted was fire.

I didn’t like it. I wanted to start with wind. I didn’t want to use just wind. I loved being free. For a very long time, I have always started with wind.

I didn’t like how they weren’t letting me do that. I said “No”, refusing to do their favor.

When I did that, everyone left. I was left alone.

I was free. I thought to act freely like before, without caring about anyone. But, it was lonely being free. When everyone’s gone, I feel lonely, I thought.

I went to see everyone. I said, “If fire’s what they want, I’ll give it to them.”

Everyone was happy. I decided to bring fire, just like everyone asked for. However, fire isn’t the only thing I conjured; I snuck in wind. I wanted wind with the spreading of fire, and wind was the one thing I had to have. Wind was my symbol of freedom.

There was no water. There was no dirt. There were only wind and fire. Everything became bright red.

I was glad that everyone was pleased.

After pleasing everyone, they called me over and treated me warmly.

I didn’t really have any interest in food, dancing, or gifts. But, it felt nice having everyone treat me warmly. Also, the water that wasn’t actually water was amazing.

Water that became hot when you drank it. Water that had a weird smell. The more you drank it, the more you wanted another.

I was having a blast, and drank water as recommended by everyone. I drank lots, got sleepy, and then fell asleep at a place that wasn’t my nest for the first time.

…When I woke up, my limbs were gone, and my neck was about to get cut off.

I had always been free. I had always, always been free. I enjoyed my freedom.

Where did my hand that grew fire go? Where did my tail that whirled up water go? Where did my feet that dug up dirt go? Where did my freedom go?

When everyone heard my voice, they yelled with angry looks on their faces. They were yelling.

You tell me that fire burned the country, but I don't understand. You tell me that wind made it spread, but I don't care. You shout at me for not putting out the fire with water and dirt, but I don't get it.

Where did my freedom go? Why are people mad at me?

I said, "I want my limbs back." Nobody listened to me. Instead, I was showered with water that smelled weird. It was the water that put me to sleep.

The water was on fire. My body was burning. "Hot, hot, hot!" I screamed.

Everyone was happy about it. Everyone was happy that I was burning, like how they were happy when I did what I'd always do.

I didn't have the hands to spread fire. I didn't have the tail to grow water. I didn't have the feet to dig up dirt.

…But, I had the head to conjure wind. I had a mouth. I had a tongue. I had fangs.

Give me back my freedom. Give back me. …Don’t laugh at me. I’ll kill you.

My mind was dyed pitch black. I killed everyone besides myself. I killed everyone—everyone who was happy, everyone who was crying, and everyone who was mad.

I killed everyone…I killed them and slaughtered them, but I still wanted to kill people.

Even though pleasant things happened, I wanted to kill. Even though sad things happened, I wanted to kill. Even if there were things that angered me, I wanted to kill. Even if there were things that bothered me, I wanted to kill. When I became sleepy, I wanted to kill. After I woke up from a dream, I wanted to kill. After wind blew, I wanted to kill. After the sun set, I wanted to kill.

Kill kill kill kill kill kill kill kill.

I want to kill everything. My bloodlust was everything to me.

I was free. So, I wanted to freely kill everything. I will kill.

I’m free. The last ones I killed called me a “Shinigami”.

I’m free. Back when everyone was smiling, they told me I was “beautiful”.

I’m free. Freer than anyone. I am the “Most Beautiful Shinigami”.

…I am the “Most Beautiful Shinigami”, Zarestia.

…I’m free. I want to kill everything. I want to kill.

“Death” is what Natsuki Subaru was feeling.

His instincts understood that what had manifested before him was an entity that brought along deep “death” with her.

Subaru: “…”

Subaru was scared of death. He was scared of it more than anything. Many people feel the same way. But, for Subaru, “death” didn’t have the same meaning as it did for others.

“Death” meant the end. However, for Subaru, “death” wasn’t the end.

…It was the beginning of hell.

Subaru: “Since you’re in a white dress, should I assume that you are the Tia we know?”

The girl dressed in white lands while conjuring wind in the middle of the palace garden. She definitely looked like the Tia Subaru knew. Her appearance was exactly the same. The same went for her clothes; the white dress—for some reason, it was black when she became one with Reese, so it was easy to recognize the difference.

Subaru: “I would appreciate it if you’d tell me which one you are right now. Depending on your answer…”

Tia: “Depending on my answer what? What’ll you do, Su?”

Subaru: “…”

He called his name. A nickname he got used to hearing. He couldn’t believe that she’d call him that in an affectionate way—no, maybe she was calling him that with affection in her own way.

Subaru was called by that nickname, and he blinked.

Tia: “What’s up with that dumbfounded look? Could you not get charmed just because I’m cute?”

Subaru: “…I only care about wife. If my child is a girl, then I’ll be only care about my wife and my daughter.”

Tia: “Hah! Well said! Also…I see there’s quite a lot of people here.”

Tia’s lips curled as they had an exchange of banter, and she slowly looked at all the people that had gathered for this battle. They were all very familiar faces to her.

Surely Tia also knew that they were here to save her.

Tia: “Hal and the other males working hard late at night, huh. Apparently, grown men are idiots.”

Halibel: “You’re gonna make me depressed by being that harsh. Adults gotta stay up late like idiots every now and then, you know?”

Tia: “Ohhh, so did anything come out of staying up late?”

Halibel: “Actually, that’s what we want to ask you. Tia-chan, how’d it go?”

When Tia was asked that question, she held out her arms and gently opened and closed her palms. And then, when she went “Mm” as if purring like a cat, she said,

Tia: “…I got my light sphere back. I got me back. It’s like the great spirit Zarestia has been completely revived here.”

Subaru: “Completely revived…But you’re…”

Once Tia returns back to normal, she won’t be able to control her bloodlust anymore. She certainly did say that.

However, even after regaining the power that had been taken away from her, the Tia before them wasn’t causing any havoc that they had been worrying about. Perhaps she was the same girl with a slight attitude from before.

In that case, maybe the things Tia said would happen weren’t going to happen after all.

Tia: “Stop, Su. You shouldn’t get your hopes up.”

But, Tia shook her head at Subaru’s hopes with a stern look. When Subaru held his breath unintentionally, she sighed and said,

Tia: “Immediately thinking of things that sound nice is something that males do. But, it’s not happening. I told you, didn’t I? You guys are the reason why I got my light sphere back. I’m grateful for that.”

Subaru: “Then…”

Tia: “Yeah, I’m grateful. …I’m grateful, so I want to kill.”

Subaru: “…”

Bloodlust intense enough to give one the chills filled the whole palace, went outside the premise, and then swallowed half of the town. The smell of “death” was felt so much by his skin that, for a moment, he had the illusion that his vision might’ve been covered by a black mist.

After it sunk its claws into his soul, he understood that it came from Tia, who was standing still before him.

Tia: “This is who I am. This is who Zarestia is—the great spirit that only kills.”

Subaru: “T-Tia…Even so…”

Tia: “You’re still not letting it go? You’re still saying this to me?”

Subaru was overwhelmed by bloodlust, had his throat caught by fear, and his heart went out of control. Even so, he wouldn’t let go. As if irritated by it, Tia kicked dirt at him.

If Tia acts, there will be total war. But, would it even be total war? Wouldn’t it just be a one-sided slaughter fest? That’s how stronger the abnormal power felt to him.

Tia: “This…weird water…alcohol, was it? I remember now. I… hated…this stuff.”

Subaru: “…”

Tia: “A long time ago…I was forced to drink this…and my head was cut off when I was sleeping. My limbs were cut off too. This was thrown on my face, I was put on fire…After that, I always wanted to kill.”

Tia voiced her grudges to Subaru and the others, expressing just how cruelly she had been treated, revealing the reason why she hated the alcohol that became trump card for victory.

However, she still had a smile on her face. There wasn’t any anger on it. There wasn’t any resentment either.

There was only bloodlust with her smile that came from the heart.

Tia: “I want to kill everything. Whether I’m smiling, angry, crying, frustrated, in agony, or happy. Whether it be bitter or delicious. Whether it feel great or bad. Whether it be cold, hot, sweet, sour. Whether it be at night, in the morning, or in the afternoon. Whether it be a child, an adult, an old person, a baby, a man, a woman, a dog, a cat, or a wolf.”

Every feelings, every emotion, every situation, every time, every target, every being—everything was connected to bloodlust for Tia.

Tia: “I want to kill. I want to kill everything. That’s the kind of creature I am.”

Subaru: “Then…What about…us?”

Tia: “…”

Upon hearing Subaru’s forced out question, Tia directed her silent murderous intent towards him. She just looked at him. An action that small had murderous intent. The embodiment of bloodlust—a being that has every conclusion lead to bloodlust.

There were no lies on that billboard. Tia was trying to kill Subaru and the others. Even though she wasn’t killing them, she was trying to. Even though she didn’t want to kill them, she wanted to kill.

Tia: “I…”

Tia tried to say something. Words full of bloodlust come out.

Clane and his employees took defensive postures, Halibel put his hand in his pocket, and Subaru quietly clenched his fists.

And then…

Tia: “…I”

7

…Inside the clinic, there were intense energy and the spasms of a life.

Doctor: “Push down…!”

Rem: “Oo…ooooo…!!”

She tightly clenched her teeth and grasped the rail of the bed propping her up with all her strength. The iron rail squeaked and clear fingerprints were left on it. Still, the pain didn’t go away. She couldn’t hide from it.

The feeling of her insides being pushed out and the pain from a life struggling bash her consciousness again and again. Rem had never experienced pain like this in her whole life.

Rem: “Goo…eeee…!”

…Actually, with the time length considered, this was more intense than any other pain she’s ever experienced.

Even if she concentrated on her forehead, she could not feel her horn coming out. Right now, the Oni Rem was completely dead.

As if she had put all of her life force into the baby in her belly.

Rem: “…”

Rem’s horn has made her suffer a lot, and at the same time, has been beneficial.

Being an Oni has made Rem go through cruel, painful things. As she has confessed to Subaru, she wasn't able to be a good kid. To her parents, she was a failure of a daughter. …To her sister, she was a bad little sister until the very end.

It has also caused her to never think that she was given blessings and not benefits.

Whenever was tormented by pain, suffering, or powerlessness, she would realize that she was an Oni, that she Oni blood—that she had power. Once she could no longer feel that for the first time, she realized that she was blessed.

Blessed by being an Oni. By being born as her parents' child. By being her sister's little sister.

She met Subaru, got married, had a kid, and in this moment when it was being born, realized it for the first time.

Surely, her parents too, had felt…

Rem: "…Oo…Ahhh! Ooooo!!"

Breaks from the the pain become shorter and shorter, and now the pain was swarming her non-stop. Every time it felt like she was going to lose consciousness, the dull pain shook her awake. It happened again and again.

And Rem couldn't hear the midwife desperately cheering her on. She couldn't hear anything.

???: "…?! Hey, do you realize where you are?! Looking like that…"

Rem: "…?"

Rem felt a strange, surprising presence, and she opened her eyes. In her field of vision blurred by tears, she did not see the midwife looking at Rem with an earnest expression.

The midwife was was sinking down next to the legs of the bed. Instead, the one right next to Rem looking into her face was…

Rem: “Tia…-sama…?”

Tia: “Sorry to do this at a time like this, Rem. Also, I said we wouldn’t see each other anymore, but I was wrong. This…this will really be the last time.”

In her open eyes, she saw Tia smile lonesomely. It was Tia’s smile that Rem has seen many times…and yet, dark thoughts seemed to be appearing and disappearing.

Bloodlust…It was bloodlust. There was bloodlust in Tia’s smile. It wasn’t a fake smile, but there was bloodlust.

Tia: “This is the real me. So, I can’t be with you guys. I…When I see you struggling, I just want to kill.”

Rem: “…”

Tia’s words had apologeticness, sincerity, and bloodlust. It made total sense.

She understood what she was saying. Tia’s true feelings and her nature were always in conflict. She couldn’t live with her. That’s the kind of existence she is.

Rem: “You got yourself back…”

Tia: “…Yeah, I did. It’s all thanks to Su and Hal’s hard work. I want to kill.”

Tia played with her hair in an embarrassed manner, and she voiced her murderous intent while blushing.

Seeing her friend like that, Rem closed her eyes. A tear ran down her cheek.

Rem: “Tia-sama, I’m going to be a mom.”

Tia: “Yeah, I know.”

Rem: “Tia-sama, I…love Subaru-kun.”

Tia: “Yeah, I know that too.”

Rem: “Tia-sama…I…love you too.”

Tia: “…”

Rem: “So, I can’t…live with you.”

Even though she loved her, she couldn’t be with her. Her being unable to associate with others was an insurmountable mall. There was someone Rem loved and prioritized over Tia.

Rem: “…”

It was after she told her feelings that Rem noticed how Tia looked for the first time. Tia, who had run over in a white dress, had someone in her arms. It was a senseless girl who wasn’t breathing.

Someone’s dead body…A girl’s dead body. She somehow knew who it was and…

Tia: “I will bring her with me. I killed her. My other half…the fake me wanted to become one and loved me, so I killed her.”

Rem: “…Tia-sama, did you…come to kill me?”

Tia: “I…”

Tia going back to normal meant that Subaru made things work out somehow. Subaru wasn’t here. Only Tia, who wanted to slaughter everything, came back.

Logically thinking about it, this was a hopeless situation. It wouldn’t be surprising if Rem was heartbroken and sobbed as she begged for her life.

However, Rem didn’t do that, and she knew there was no need to.

…The days she spent together with Tia wouldn’t let her.

Tia: “I…”

Tia says an incomplete sentence once again.

Tia's milky white hair shook, and, with Rem in her clear eyes, she broke into a smile as she said,

Tia: "…I…love you guys…so I won't kill you."

8

It was dawn when he arrived at the clinic after running from the palace without any breaks.

Subaru: "H-How is Rem?!"

Doctor: "Still in the middle of fighting. Why are you guys barging in with stupid looks on your faces? You're just going to get in the way. Don't enter the waiting room either. Go wait outside!"

The old magic user acted so cold towards Subaru who was out of breath and checked if his wife was alright.

Although, that was understandable; because of Subaru and Halibel's negligence, they had an unexpected intruder at the scene of the child birth. Taboo things must have happened one after another in terms of professionalism for the one responsible for the clinic and watching the child birth.

Halibel: "But man, more than half a day…Giving birth to a child is no easy task."

Said Halibel, sinking down onto the waiting room chair and giving a long sigh. Influenced by seeing him relaxing, Clane and the others who accompanied him also all sat down. The ones who intruded included almost all of the people who had been at the palace; there wasn't nearly enough room in the clinic.

In the end, more than half of them left the building, falling over on the way out, then they waited for morning and the baby's first cry.

Of course, Subaru was waiting inside the waiting room, but he really couldn't settle down. He was just impatiently and restlessly walking around.

Halibel. Su-san, I understand how you feel, but shouldn't you calm down a little bit?"

Subaru: "…I get what you're saying. But, sorry, Even though it's pathetic, I just can't stay still. If I don't move, it feels like I'm suffocating."

Halibel: "Makes sense. Well, I just wanted to say that. I did say I understand how you feel, but this is isn't something I can't understand. Your worries are none of my business. It was just painful to watch, that's all."

Although it sounded really irresponsible, he tried to get his mind off things even if it was just for a little while, and he appreciated the thought.

However, Subaru used up all the relief he got from Halibel in mere seconds, and once again started to wander around. Halibel gives a wry smile.

Halibel: "At times like these, men can only watch in silence…No matter how many times I go through it, it's still rough."

Halibel bit on his unlit kiseru, said just that, and went silent this time.

Deep inside, he agreed with his words. At times like these, men could only wait in silence. He looked up at the ceiling and continued to wish with his whole soul, like he was praying.

An awfully stale wish. A wish anyone would make too if they were put in this situation.

Subaru: "Please, God, Buddha, Christ, Jehovah, Mohammed, Angra Mainyu…"

It didn't matter if it was a good god or an if it was an evil god. Even call a devil's name if you feel inclined to do so.

Subaru called the names of every supernatural existence he knew of, and prayed.

Subaru: “…Tia, please.”

And lastly, he prayed with a name that was neither a god’s name nor a great spirit’s name, but his friend’s.

I pray…

Subaru: “…That both the mother and the child are all right.”

It was right after he gave a prayer when there was a disruptive change in the atmosphere.

Inside the clinic, a voice—the first cry of a bawling rang out, going through the clinic room door.

Subaru impulsively lifted his face, and Halibel also rose from his chair. Everyone who had been sleeping jumped to their feet one by one, and they waited eagerly for the clinic room door to open.

Halibel: “Have you decided on a name?”

Halibel asked that to Subaru, who was standing still and raising and lowering his head.

After that, Subaru pulled himself together and said,

Subaru: “Y-Yeah, I got one. I have one. If it’s a girl, Spica.”

The “Subaru” in Natsuki Subaru is a name of a star. It’s what his parents named him as they prayed. Imitating them, he’d name the child after a star while praying that he’d become a father who’d live up to his parents.

The door to the clinic room slowly opens. Beyond it, he saw Rem holding the baby…

Subaru: “If it’s a boy…”

Epilogue: Anniversary

1

Rem: “…Rigel”

When the child had its named called by a gentle voice, it slowly stood up.

It was a child with light blue hair, and eyes that had the same color as its hair. It was turning six years old and was still at the peak of its adorableness…but the sharpness of its eyes didn’t make the future look too bright.

Natsuki Rigel—that was the name of this child, a fitting leading character for the ending of this story.

Rem: “Rigel, where are you? It’s time to go to Temple Elementary”

Rigel: “Mom, I’m right here. I’m already ready.”

When he responded to the voice that came from inside the house, a woman with long blue hair appeared all of a sudden. The lovely, beautiful woman suddenly smiled as she stared at Rigel, who was standing in the garden.

Rem: “Oh, you got ready quickly today. Good boy.”

Rigel: “Unlike Dad, I don’t want to trouble you.”

Rem: “Hmph, don’t say that, Rigel. You shouldn’t bad-mouth your dad. Besides, I’m into taking care of your dad, so I don’t mind. Hahh, it makes me so happy; I think the second one is coming now…”

Rigel: “Could you not?! That’s not funny!”

Listening to Rigel’s voice crack, the woman—Rem, the mother, giggled. She had a baby belly, and inside of it there was Rigel’s little brother/little sister in the making.

Although he was honestly anxious about having a sibling being born, Rigel had high hopes. Surely it'll be a cute little sister. No doubt about it. I vote for a little sister.

Rem: “So, even if it ends up being a little brother, don't bully him, and be his friend, okay?”

Rigel: “Well, that won't be a problem if you do your best to give birth to a little sister.”

Rem: “Oh, my. You really do seem to resemble someone…”

Dealing with Rigel's sass, Rem put her to her forehead as if to say that this was unfortunate.

It's true that in the neighborhood Rigel was known to have a smart mouth. He was so quick-witted that you wouldn't believe he was a 6 years old, and it was acknowledged by the kids in the neighborhood.

However, Rigel knew that some other people had a big influence on this situation; he knew things were like this mainly because of his father and his workplace.

Rem: “It's great that I got my maternity and parental leaves approved as suggested by your dad, but now that I don't have work, I'm very bored…”

Rigel: “What are you saying with that baby bell of yours? You should just do housework.”

Although Rem sighed with boredom, Rigel had nothing but respect for his mother's boldness.

This may not be her first childbirth, but how could a pregnant woman be this calm her second time? Rigel wanted to go around the whole town bragging about it, but his father was already doing that, so he held back.

Rem: “It was quite rough when I had you. This isn't so bad in comparison.”

Rigel: “Was it really that rough?”

Rem: “Yep, it sure was. It was a breech delivery, and I almost died.”

Rigel: “It was that rough?!”

Rem: “It was rough. Your dad and Uncle Halibel almost died too.”

Rigel: “They were going to die?!”

Rem: “They weren’t the only ones. Had it taken a little longer, the whole town of Banan might’ve gotten annihilated…”

Rigel: “Just how difficult was my birth?!”

Rigel was told that his own birth put the town in danger, and it surprised him. I can’t possibly imagine this happening, but is it going to be a difficult birth like that when my sister is born?

Rigel: “Will I stay alive and meet my sister…?”

In his mind he promises to use the Substitution Halibel taught him on his father to sacrifice him if push comes to shove.

In any case, while they were having that conversation, the bell tower rang.

Rigel: “Ah, dang it. I’m actually going to be late!”

Rem: “That’s not good. Here, bring this bento. Also, Dad forgot to bring his bento, so give this to him please.”

Rigel: “Alright…”

Rigel takes the two packages and knits his brows at the difference between the two. One was kid sized. He could see that. That one’s his. But, what was up with how grand the other one was?

Rem: “They’re the same.”

Rigel: “Are they now?!”

Rem: “I packed the same amount of love in each. For you to worry about such a thing…Rigel, you’re still such a baby, huh. Your sister’s going to be disappointed with you.”

Rigel: “Why am I always at fault?!”

Rigel pouted at what Rem said, and after that he put the two packages into his bag.

Then he waved at his mother, started to leave the house, and…

Rem: “…Rigel.”

Upon hearing his mom’s voice, he stopped and turned around. His mom gently waved while smiling and said,

Rem: “Take care.”

Rigel: “I’m off!”

After having that exchange, Natsuki Rigel started running to Temple Elementary.

2

???: “You sure are energetic again today, Rigel.” [???: “Ri-chan, good morning.” [???: “Good morning, Rigel.”

Rigel: “Good morning! Good morning! Good moooorning!”

Running towards downtown, Rigel was spoken to from every direction. To Rigel, this was the town he was born and raised in; the environment he was familiar with. But if he were to say that this was something totally natural, his classmates at temple elementary school would be surprised, so apparently he was just a little strange.

Rigel: “Mom and Dad seem to have done a lot of things…”

He’d overheard the adults conversate as if they were talking about an amusing story. His mom and dad may have been involved in a serious event that shook Banan town.

Rigel honestly thought that it was fake. Would his mother, someone who acts reserved other than with his dad, really get involved in a serious event like that? As for his dad, it would not be surprising if an uproar was centered around him.

While having such thoughts, Rigel…

???: "…Oh, Rigel. Come here."

He hears a voice that didn't sound like it was greeting him. Rigel stops upon hearing that familiar tone of voice, and turns around. Then, right behind him, there was not a black wall…but a person in a black kimono.

Rigel: "Uncle Halibel!"

Halibel: "Ohh ohh, long time no see eh, Rigel. Have you been well? Have you been skipping your training?"

Rigel: "No I haven't! In fact, I wanna go onto the next training already! How about you, Uncle? Why have you been gone from town for so long?"

Rigel had his hair tousled by him, and broke into a broad smile from the rough way he handled his hair.

Halibel was his parents' friend, and to Rigel he was like an uncle. Though he may not look like it, he works as a shinobi and jokes that he's always finding those who bring the seeds of trouble into Kararagi city-state, purging them behind the scenes, assassinating.

Still, he really was like a shinobi, and he was secretly giving training.

Halibel: "You're pretty good at this. So good that you should even follow my footsteps if Rem-chan lets you."

Rigel: "Like, following your footsteps to being an "eternal playboy"? No way. I'm going to support Mom and my sister and get a job that I can be proud of as a family head."

Halibel: “I feel like I’ve heard this before, and what about your dad?”

Rigel: “Dad’s a man. He’s old enough to wipe his own butt. He’ll be fine.”

Halibel: “Dahahahaha! What the hell, Su-san has no respect going for him!”

After shrugging his shoulders, Halibel bursted into laughter while covering his face. Then, once Halibel’s momentary laughter settled down, he said,

Halibel: “Hee…hee…A-Anyways, I’m gonna go see Rem-chan. I’m on break for a while, so I’d like to be there to see your little brother/little sister being born if possible.”

Rigel: “It’s a little sister.”

Halibel: “Hm?”

Rigel: “It’s going to be a little sister.”

Halibel: “Y-Yeah, right…”

Overwhelmed by an alarming sense of intimidation, Halibel nodded dubiously in response to Rigel’s comment. And then, he put his kiseru to his mouth, and lit it as he gave out smoke.

Halibel: “You’re going to Temple Elementary now, right? Take care. When you get back, I’ll train you.”

Rigel: “It’s a promise! Lie, and I’ll make you swallow 1000 needles!”

Halibel: “Ohh, how scary. A Su-san type of phrase. I’m so scared.”

Rigel: “You’ll be swallowing them from the bottom!”

Halibel: “Does that kind of stuff even happen?!”

Halibel shrieked and laughed loudly upon hearing Rigel’s reminder, and he left as he waved goodbye.

He was ecstatic to have met him again unexpectedly, but now he had very little time left. Was he going to have enough time to give his dad his bento? He wouldn't care if not giving it would just mean that his dad would suffer, but he didn't want to make his mom sad. It was a dilemma.

So, as a solution…

Rigel: "…Be sneaky about it."

Rigel concentrated on his forehead, jumped very high, and went over the streets.

3

Jumping high and bathing in the wind in the sky felt good.

Inside the horn grown on his forehead, mana gathered from the atmosphere, filling his body with strength. In this state, Rigel felt like he was wrapped in a sense of almightiness, and that he could do anything.

However, since his mom would make a lonely look whenever he grew his horn, he tried to avoid doing this as much as possible. Of course, using it in an emergency like this was different, though.

Rem: "I'm sorry…that you could only grow one horn…"

His mom had said that once when she was patting Rigel's head while he was pretending to be asleep. Rigel couldn't understand why she was apologizing for that. Judging from the way she had said it, it seemed having one horn wasn't enough, but wouldn't 5 or 6 of them look lame?

He thought there was a nice balance with having one horn in the middle of his forehead, and that it looked cool.

Rigel: "Well, it's not like I can look cool anyway with how much my face looks like dad's."

Rigel steps on the roof tiles, being careful not to break them, and hops over the town.

His dad's workplace is called the "Banan Culture Promotion Group", which was in the east side of town, and it seems they plan all sorts of festival and events, and it is up to them to pump life into the town, or something like that. Apparently, it used to be a "Culture School" that his dad had worked at, but he didn't know any details about it.

Anyways, his dad's workplace was annoying all year round, and it was tiring to explain to his friends that it was "a job that spreaded the ritual where you hit Onis with beans" whenever they asked him about it.

That being said, it was true that he was supporting the household with his earnings. Thinking that this was the time as a son to thank his efforts for the family, he focused on bringing the bento and…

???: "…Hey, you there."

Rigel: "Ooe?!"

He was called out to while jumping in the air and it freaked him out. Rigel looks right beside him, sees that someone is there, and was taken aback.

It was a very beautiful person. Milky white hair, a pure white dress, eyes attractive enough to leave you unable to speak.

???: "Wow, I can already guess whose kid is this. Isn't that something?"

Rigel: "Wh…ugya!"

Rigel, surprised by the beautiful faced getting near him and smiling broadly, lost his balance in the air. He lost control, and at this rate, was going to hit the ground.

???: "Careful. You should stop jumping around if you're incapable."

Rigel: "Ah"

He was grabbed by the neck, and was forced to stop. Then the person swooped down at once while holding onto Rigel—they silently landed at an empty street.

Rigel: “U-Umm…”

After landing, the woman and Rigel faced each other while she held him up. Rigel was stared at by a beautiful person he’d never seen before that smelled nice, and it made him nervous.

Seeing Rigel act like that, the woman sighed contentedly and said,

???: “I really enjoyed that. Yep, that’s a face that says you want to kill.”

Rigel: “What’s that supposed to mean?!”

???: “Ohh, just like Su. I guess that should be expected. Given that your face looks that similar to his.”

The woman laughed foolishly and let go of Rigel, freeing him. While timidly looking at the woman, Rigel had no idea how to respond and had a question mark above his head.

Since she talked about his face, she’s most likely someone Dad knows. A lot of the people Dad knows are weirdos, but this woman in front of me is pretty fine woman. A beauty. No, but still…

???: “Hey, don’t get mesmerized just because I’m cute.”

Rigel: “No matter how much of a beauty you are, I have my little sister, so…”

???: “Oh, okay then. So you’ve got a girl in mind…wait, little sister?! Won’t karma get you for that?!”

Karma…wonder what that means. I don’t understand complicated things. I’m just a kid, after all.

???: “Karma is when you have to live your life in a way that can never be changed. You’ll understand soon enough. Anyways…”

Rigel: “Anyways?”

???: “You’re Rigel, aren’t you? Su and Rem’s kid. Right?”

Rigel: “Uh, if by Su you mean Natsuki Subaru, then yes.”

The woman mentioned Rigel’s mom and dad’s names, and he nodded while being careful of her. The woman seemed very friendly. He also had a hunch that there was something else about her that was off putting, but he ignored it for now.

It was probably one of those hunches that wouldn’t be worth worrying about after Rigel interacted with her.

???: “…I’m surprised. You’re an interesting one.”

Rigel: “Isn’t that your karma? I don’t really get it, though”

???: “Aha, you got me. Well done. …You’re the hero that slayed a monster.”

The woman smiled and exaggerated that he had slayed a monster. If this girl was a monster, then the world must be a pretty peaceful place.

???: “And so, I offer this as a reward for the hero that has slain the monster.”

Rigel: “…? What’s this?”

What the woman held out to him was something like a bracelet made with white thread. The woman made a devious look and went “hehehe” in response to Rigel’s reaction of tilting his head.

???: “This is a small gift. I actually said I was going to give you my light sphere, but that’s hard to do. So, I’m giving you a special white, not black, binding made by myself.”

Rigel: “What do you mean?”

???: “If something ever happens, I’ll come rushing over to save you. That’s what the tool is for. It’s an amazing treasure. What do you think?”

“Come rushing over”, she says, but what can this slender girl even do if she does come?

Those were Rigel’s thoughts, forgetting about how he had been saved from jumping in Oni form. There was also the gift, but…

Rigel: “Mom said not to accept things from strangers, so…”

???: “Huh?! …Y-You’re turning down my gift? I-I’ll kill you, you know?”

Rigel: “That’s a threat!”

The woman starts tearing up slightly, says something dangerous, and Rigel screeched at her.

This girl was wack. She looked way older than him, but was talking like one of his classmates. Or maybe something closer would be…a little sister. It was like he was talking to a little sister.

Plus, he knew that she had no ill intentions. Looking at her eyes, he could tell. She stared at Rigel so seriously that it felt uncomfortable, and she was putting words together.

???: “But…I…love you. I want to kill you, though.”

Rigel: “…I have a little sister, so…”

???: “You already said that earlier! Besides, she shouldn’t even be born yet!”

She says that to Rigel, and rejected her for almost mesmerizing him for a bit. The women stamped her feet and tore her hair out, maybe because she was irritated by that, and said,

???: “Fine. Fine. F-I-N-E! If you insist, then FINE! I was actually going to leave, but not anymore! I’m going to talk about this with Su!”

Rigel: “With dad? I don’t mind, but Dad’s quite a pain in the butt.”

???: “I know. So is your mom. Let’s go, Rigel.”

The woman said just that, and then started to walk. However, she was going in the wrong direction to get to his dad’s workplace.

Rigel: “It’s this way.”

???: “I-I knew thaaat. Aren’t you being kind of bratty? Just how involved do you think I was with your birth? The town almost got destroyed, you know?”

Rigel: “Seriously, what the heck happened on the day I was born?!”

When Rigel felt like this was a story that he had just heard about from his mother, he loudly threw a question. After hearing that, the woman put her finger to her lips and said,

???: “It’d take a looong time to tell you the story. Longer than the time it’ll take to get to your dad.”

Rigel: “Then just come to our home. I’m sure Mom would welcome you.”

???: “…”

When Rigel put his hands behind his head and told the woman that, her eyes widened. After that, she chuckled and said,

???: “O-Of course she would. I bought that house with the goodbye presents that I earned, after all!”

Rigel: “What are you to my family…You haven’t even told me your name.”

Tia: “My name? Oh, I’m Tia. I’m…hm…”

The girl that seemed to be deeply involved with a bunch of stuff in the Natsuki family—Tia was messing with Rigel. However, he didn’t mind it, and he was charmed by Tia’s smile as she looked back.

Tia, with her broad smile, cheerfully said, Tia: “…I’m like…a part of your family.”

She finally said those words, and they both slowly moved towards his dad’s workplace, standing side by side.

Before she knew it, the girl started humming in a good mood, and it sounded like something Rigel had heard before.

Rigel: “…”

It was a lullaby his mom had put together long ago, before he was even born.

She had said that the name of the song was “Tia”.

…So, well, I guess I’ll accept the fact that she said she’s family.

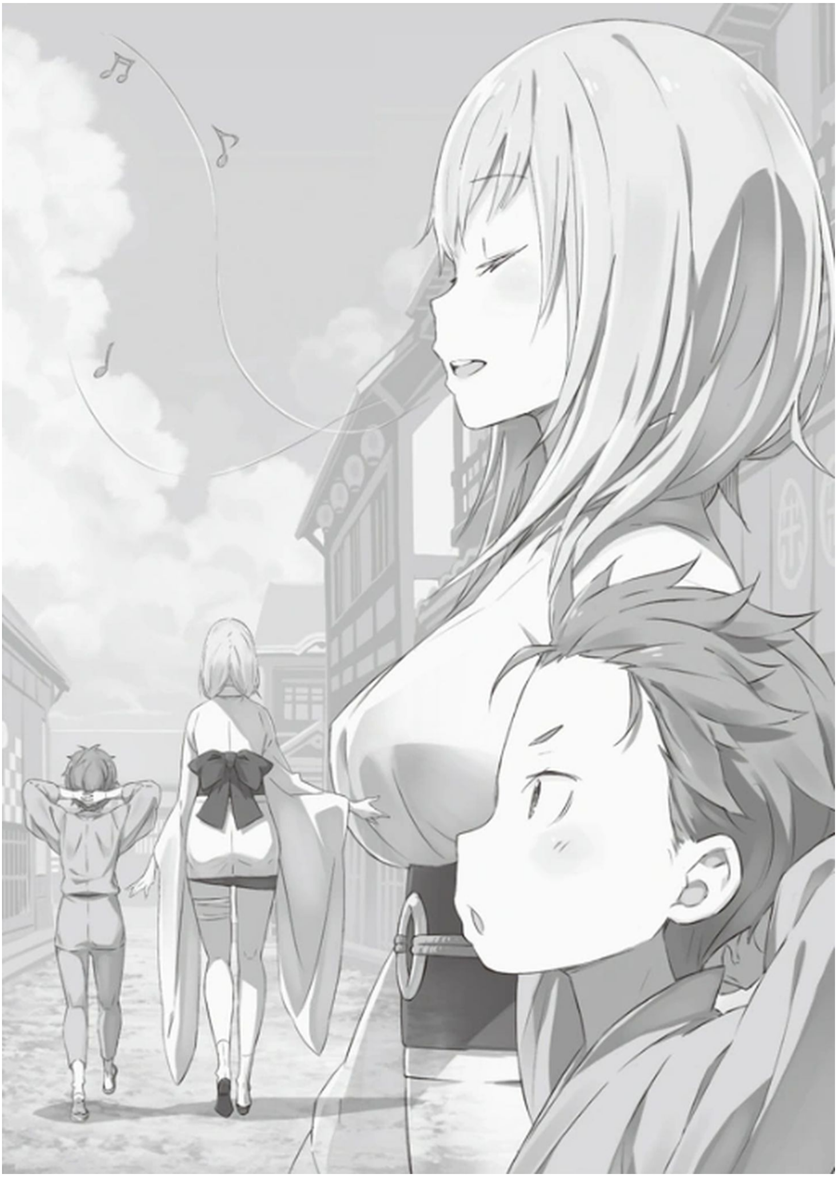
A light blue sky, a town that looked ordinary in every way—the scenery of a family’s ordinary life.

That common, irreplaceable happiness definitely existed in one corner of the world.

There were things that were lost, things that were abandoned, places that were ran away from, memories that couldn’t be forgotten even if they tried…

Despite having all these feelings, they would still live in this world that went on.

…And that was also an ending for one of the loves of a lost boy that wandered into another world.



Apocolypse Girls

Prologue:
Beloved Warmth

—A raging storm of pallid snow shrouded her vision, and she was unable to see even a few meters ahead.

Thunderous and obstreperous was the wind, while the snow, howling as it blew, felt cold to the touch.

Feeling a cold so intense that it seemed like her bare skin would peel and flake away, she pressed forth, leaving prints in the snow one step after the other. The footprints she had trodden into the snow quickly vanished, so she was even unsure of which direction she had come from. Was it from the fore? Was it from the rear? Was she marching onwards? Was she retreating backwards?

—Was she still alive? Was she already dead? Uncertain, is what she was.

???: "…"

Loosening her lips at the foolish musing, she continued atop the frozen snow, assailed by the blizzard.

The snow accumulating on the ground was a rather peculiar thing, as what fluttered down from the heavens was a soft powder snow, but the moment it adhered to the surface of the ground, it would glaciate, assuming the form of a fatal weapon. Without shoes, her bare feet were torn to shreds, while the sensation of the blood flowing from their soles vaguely reminded her of the pulsations of her own life.

In the depths of the wintry chill, useless thoughts crossed her mind one after the other.

Things like when she had last eaten, what the leftovers she had a considerable while ago actually tasted like, the cute girl that veered away when they escaped from the slavers, the vulgar slaver who tried to lay his hands on the merchandise, and her very self, which even now seemed on the brink of vanishing.

???: “…”

All of those could be classified as nothing more than inconsequential thoughts.

Everything, including the matter of her very being, was inconsequential in the face of the chill she felt in that moment.

Cold, cold, cold, cold, cold. Even if she chanted it as a malediction, cold it remained.

The cold was something that robbed people of their ability to think like a human. It was not as though she had ever been one to think about things in a rational manner, yet that effect had become increasingly obvious.

To live or to die, when in a situation where the problem was narrowed down to those two extremities, humans were not so different from beasts. Rather, in the sense of unswerving dedication to life, beasts possessed a single-mindedness that humans could not emulate.

In that case, were she to become a beast, would it then become easier for her to live—

???: “Woof, woof, woof…”

Her lips, a faint hue of red yet lingering, made a husky voice mimicking the barks of a hound.

Any semblance of meaning it bore naught. This was nothing more than another link in the unending chain of useless thoughts. —Nay, there had indeed been meaning to it.

???: “—Hk! Finally found ye, blasted guttersnipe!”

???: “Ah…”

Amidst the howling of the snowstorm, she heard the voice of a man with a thick accent. Subsequently, a strike to her slender shoulders caused her body to topple over sideways atop the snow. Her whole body was embraced by the icy snow, and the sensation of her blood turning to ice made her cheek stiffen.

When she glanced over, she beheld a man of great stature standing just beside her.

‘Twas a visage bearing the mark of recognition within her memories. That was but a matter of course.

Large Man: “Did ye think ye’d steal me wares and scuttle away, damned thief…!”

Speaking those words, the keeper of the shop, from whom she had stolen, seized the tresses of her black hair and hoisted her aloft. In the midst of this raging snowstorm, it was a marvel that he had managed to pursue the fleeing damsel to such a distant place.

Should that be deemed an admirable ambition for commerce? Or a dismal vindictiveness? Perhaps both?

It was mentioned earlier that the cold could steal one’s ability to think like a human, yet it also stole something else. Composure and compassion; in other words, the very thing known as humanity.

The man, who had lost his very humanity, would go to the utmost limits of perseverance to exact retribution upon the thief, similarly bereft of that very thing.

He was an adult and she was a child. To begin with, there was a disparity in physique. Seized by the hair and hefted aloft, her feet could not be planted firm on the snow. Then, the man’s fist plunged right into the middle of her body, suspended as it was.

Over and over again, he hit her. Without any escape from the force of the blows, her bones grated against each other. For a time, her urine would probably be tainted with the hue of blood. Pondering as such, she continued to avert her attention away from the pain.

Large Man: “Haa, haa…”

Before long, the man ran out of breath from hitting her over and over, and released his grasp on her hair. Her body, languid and weak, fell atop the snow. She was weary, lacking any strength whatsoever.

Then, slowly covering her motionless body, the man draped himself over her.

Young Girl: “…”

Amidst the gale of snow, she could feel the man’s heavy breathing. Her own respiration was also noisy, however, her ears were of no avail. Only, one of the senses from the five she possessed yet persisted. That was why, she could feel it.

The man’s hand traced her slender and hollow ribs, groping her body.

Her body had thinned to the extent that it seemed to have no gender, but even so, it would make a sufficient meal within this extreme cold. Of course, “meal” was merely a figure of speech. This too, was just another link in the unending chain of useless thoughts.

Having stolen, should she just be grateful of the fact that she had not been immediately killed? Should she lament the fact that she was still living through a fate worse than death?

In the midst of the sensations that could be described as neither pleasant nor unpleasant, she slowly closed her eyes.

Large Man: “—?”

Suddenly, somehow, her outstretched fingers had caught a grasp of something. Not a piece of frozen snow, nay, held within her fingers was a certain hardness, with a rather smooth surface, akin to a shard of glass.

Immediately, she realized it was what she had stolen from the shop, the bottle of alcohol that had been the impetus of her pursuit.

It was not as though she had yearned to drink the strong liquor, yet such a thing lent itself well to an exchange with someone who did crave it. Moreover, it was infamous for blazing all too easily, a kind by the name of fire brandy, if her memory served her right.

Somehow, it seemed like it had fallen to the snow and shattered when she had been hit. She fiddled with a jagged shard of the liquor bottle in her hand, pondering. And knowing full well that it was a useless thought, still she ruminated upon it.

Large Man: “Guph…”

Young Girl: “—?”

In that moment, a strange sound melded in with the man’s heavy respiration, and she tilted her head.

Right before her, the man widened his eyes, baring his yellow stained teeth with mouth gaped open. From his mouth, dark blood spilled forth, and she unconsciously turned her head away.

Then, wondering what had happened, while the malodor of blood dominated her nostrils—

Young Girl: “—Ah.”

A sudden heat surged and spread through her lower half, drenching her in warmth.

Slowly, she lowered her gaze. The man’s large body shielded her from the furious winds of the hailstorm. Thanks to that, she could acutely discern what had occurred with her own black irises.

—The man’s abdomen had been torn open, his overflowing blood, his viscera, had spilled out from his waist.

Large Man: “…”

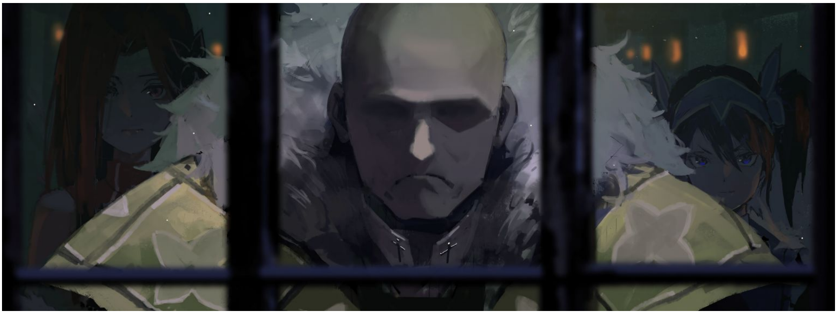
Within the extreme cold, it gave forth a great heat, enough to generate steam and provide her frozen body with warmth. Moving before her thoughts had time to settle, the glass shard grasped in her hand had ripped through the man’s belly.

There existed no words that could describe the unfathomable deep emotions she felt upon realizing that fact.

Was it because she had violated a taboo? Was it because she was piling up sin after sin? Was it because she had taken the life of another with her own hands? Neither was it wholly due to any of those things, nor was it not due at all.

Only, only, in the midst of this shivering cold, she pondered to herself.

—This very warmth is the truest feeling of being alive; so she thought, just like a beast.



Chapter 1:
The Featherrun Sisters

1

—At first glance, Holosseo Featherrun was a man who appeared to be more dead than alive.

It was not as though he was unnaturally thin. If anything, his cheeks were rather plump, and looking upon him in his entirety, one could observe a superfluity of flesh adorning his frame.

That was not to say that the amount of flesh on one's body was directly fastened to their vitality, yet still, whether one was obese or emaciated was a good indicator to readily discern how wealthy or destitute they may be.

It was easy for the impoverished to die, while the rich would assuredly live on.

Only that unwritten rule had remained unbroken. In that sense, it seemed like it would be difficult for Holosseo to die.

Despite this, the primary reason he still gave off the impression of a dead man was likely due to his eyes, in which naught was reflected.

Holosseo: "Now, from this moment onwards, you are property of Featherrun."

Staring with those hollow eye sockets, those dark, abyssal chasms, he hurled such words towards the other party.

It was not as if they had been empty since his birth. No doubt, some foul torture had been inflicted upon him, gouging his eyeballs out.

The painful white scars that remained around his eye sockets stood testament to that fact.

???: "…"

It was said that the impression someone gave off was largely determined by the eyes. In fact, there was little information to be gleaned from a face that concealed its eyes, and it was difficult to commit such a face to memory.

Holosseo looked like he was either around thirty years old or nearing decrepitude, so his age could not determined based on outward appearances. Although, it could have just been that the beholder took no interest in the age of others.

Holosseo: "What is your name?"

???: "…"

Holosseo: "Featherrun is asking you a question. Answer. What is your name?"

???: "…Ah, were you asking me?"

It was a harsh voice, akin to the hurried scurrying of a spider across the corners of a prison cell.

Upon the realization that the voice was asking for her name, the young girl gave a faint smile and stroked her own hair. And, upon her slender wrists, the shackles and chains clanged, producing an ear-piercing note.

Across the iron bars, Holosseo's hollow eyes were evaluating the young girl. It was a strange tale. —After all, his assessment should have already been finished.

That was because she was the commodity of a slaver, and Holosseo was the buyer thereof.

Young Girl: "…"

Looking closely, there were two figures accompanying behind Holosseo's meager frame. They were a pair that made Holosseo, a man rather short for an adult male, appear to stand at the average height.

Two maidens, one of tall stature and red tresses, the other of small build and blue locks, both garbed in dresses that matched the hue of their own hair, silently bowed their heads as they stood behind Holosseo.

With just that, the relationship between Holosseo and those girls was made as plain as day.

That is to say, that of a master and his slaves— a dynamic where Holosseo was lord, and the young maidens his tools.

As the young girl absentmindedly gazed upon those visitors—

Holosseo: "—Answer. Answer to Featherrun."

Posing the question once more, that husky voice bore no emotion.

Bereft of frustration or suspicion, it was an utterly neutral query.

Though she had not intended to do so, her eyebrows rose in surprise upon witnessing that response.

This was the slave trade. Customers who purchased such wares were naturally arrogant. It was a place where those without value were given worth and traded as such, so it was natural that such a nature was fostered within the buyers.

Young Girl: "…"

The young girl, ruminating on such thoughts, felt a sting upon her skin.

It was not that Holosseo's heart had been roused with irritation, but rather, that the stinging emotions of the petite maiden standing behind him had pierced into her.

Together with a sensation akin to being punctured, the young girl felt a sweet ache in her abdomen. Relaxing her lips at the sense of titillating pleasure, the young girl took a short breath as she stifled her urges.

Whatever the case, naught could be satisfied while she remained locked up in the gaol, bound by shackles.

Therefore—

Young Girl: "—It's Elsa."

Holosseo: "…"

Young Girl: "A mere commodity, Elsa. —Please, I shall be in your care 'til the last drops of my life are spent, right?"

Adorned upon her face a beautiful smile, the young girl in the gaol — Elsa, tilted her head as her shackles clanged.

Beholding her provocative greeting, the aura of the two maidens changed their hue.

Nevertheless, Holosseo, their lord, quietly spoke,

Holosseo: "—From now on, you are a member of the Featherruns."

And thus, his heavy, burdensome reply had been spoken, and not a single word more.

2

Upon the map that dared to depict the world in its entirety, one could find inscribed the names of four large countries.

First was the Dragon Kingdom of Lugunica, second the Sacred Vollachian Empire, third the Kararagi City-States, and finally, fourth was the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko.

Those great countries, numbering four, were collectively known as the Four Great Countries.

Each of the great countries struggled with their own unique problems, yet among them, the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko was infamous for its particularly harsh environment; most of the land was encrusted with permafrost, and throughout the whole year, snow never ceased its fall.

For the majority of its citizens, the highest priority for survival in the relentless wintry chill was to demonstrate their faith towards the Spirits that held dominion over arcane forces. The basis for that was a deep sense of gratitude and reverence to the one that continuously protected the unforgiving realm of the Holy Kingdom along with its people, the Sacred Beast, Odglass.

Thus in such a realm as Gusteko, there were several conditions that needed to be met for areas in which people could survive.

If those conditions were not fulfilled, it would end up being quite easy for people to reach an everlasting slumber within the snow; it was imperative for the region to be considered Hallowed Land.

—In the sprawling, icy tundras of Gusteko, Hallowed Land stood as havens untouched by the harsh extremities of ice and snow.

Within the cities of Gusteko, all constructed atop Hallowed Land, people found a way to survive while also dealing with the constant build up of snow, even if only just barely.

In other words, Hallowed Land was something absolutely indispensable to the lives of the people of Gusteko.

So precious were they, that they could not be upheld without management of the Church of the Holy King, which safeguarded the Holy Kingdom—

Elsa: “—I’m surprised. So this place is Hallowed Land?”

Therefore, when she saw that the mansion she had been brought to was located upon Hallowed Land residing within a frozen ravine, Elsa felt a faint sense of astonishment.

During the journey in the dragon carriage, the windows, from which the outside could be peered, had been draped with curtains, making it impossible to glean the circumstances. Hence, though it was unclear which route she had been brought from, it was satisfactory to accept it.

A single mansion was hogging this Hallowed Land all to itself, a sight that harmed the sense of reality of all who bore witness to it.

Before her, the mansion occupying the Hallowed Land could be described as a grand estate. However, Hallowed Land intrinsically had enough power to protect a whole city from the waves of cold. Though it may have been described as a grand estate, to use those grounds for the protection of a single mansion was a luxurious extravagance beyond imagination.

In the first place, the very existence of Hallowed Land was of immense value, and they were strictly managed in amount and location by the ones who governed the Holy Kingdom, the Church of the Holy King.

Therefore, the sight which Elsa currently beheld was one that could never truly exist.

As an exception to that unwritten rule, this space was unabashedly exploiting the power of the Hallowed Land.

Thanks to that, within the surrounding area of the mansion there was sufficient greenery for one to name it a garden, and nature seldom seen in the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko was being cultivated.

Indeed, this could certainly be called an “extraordinary” environment.

Elsa: “So, this is the true power of Featherrun?”

Along the road, she had heard about the extraordinary nature of “Featherrun” many times. Thus beholding its wonder, Elsa murmured in admiration.

The very next moment, a cold blade was affixed to the back of Elsa’s white neck.

Elsa: "—Oh?"

???: "…Do not belittle our esteemed Father."

Warning Elsa in her surprised state, was a hoarse voice akin to that of a crone.

It was the blue-haired young maiden who did utter those words, standing near Elsa's back. With tails of hair bound on each side of her head, she was garbed in a stunning blue dress, matching the hue of her hair. Her unripe beauty, lying on the boundary between young maiden and lady, was adorned with cosmetics, enhancing her immoral charm.

She had been prepared to have such a beautiful appearance, but alas, as her gaze was fixed upon Elsa, her eyes widened to the extent that it seemed her eyeballs would pop out, and her tongue stuck out like a hound, rendering her loveliness void.

However, what dealt the most harm to her lovely impression was the crooked weapon clasped within her slender arms— deadly in nature with blades tarnished to a red tinted hue of brown, was a large pair of shears.

The blades of those shears were fastened to Elsa's slender neck, ensnaring it from both sides. It was no empty threat, for should the strength of their grasp be increased, Elsa's head would surely bid a sorrowful farewell to her torso.

Her nostrils were stricken with a scent of rusted iron; She pondered whether that scent was intrinsic to the great shears, or if time had simply stained them so.

Though, faced with a situation in which her life was held in the balance, Elsa did not hesitate to tilt her head.

Elsa: "Something like belittling Father, that's a misunderstanding. What happened just now was… it was… I wonder, what was it?"

Girl: "…That's something for you to decide, isn't it?"

Elsa: "Well, then it wasn't belittling. That alone is certain."

With the blades yet ensnaring her neck, Elsa returned a response that did not quite fit the mood, causing the girl of blue hair to contort her cheeks. Her face reflected both her displeasure and discomfort as they were.

The look in her eyes was an unsettling one, a foreboding that she might clasp those mighty shears shut, but—

???: “Stop this, Dorothea. Do you intend to bring disgrace upon Father?”

Girl: “—Hk”

Upon hearing that voice, the maiden froze, immediately retracting the blades of her great shears. That instant, Elsa once again was parted from the tangential sensation of death, and stroked her own neck, which had been caught between the blades just before.

???: “Is it necessary to form such an unstable relationship immediately upon having met? Grow up.”

With that, the interaction between Elsa and the girl— Dorothea, was interrupted by the voice of a red-haired woman, who, opening the large door of the mansion, had made her appearance. A face that Elsa had also caught sight of back at the slave market.

The beautiful locks that reached down to her waist were blood red, and as before, she was adorned in a dress of the same hue. She was around twenty years in age, and possessed beauty that gave off a sharp, graceful impression.

As the woman gazed back and forth between the two standing in the garden, she shifted a stern look towards Dorothea.

Red-Haired Woman: “Dorothea, we spoke of this previously, did we not? Starting today, you are an elder sister. Your time as the youngest is thus concluded. That is why you must do things properly.”

Dorothea: “…B-Bu-But, Sithonia. Th-This girl…”

Red-Haired Woman: “This girl, what about her?”

Dorothea: “…Gr, grr, grrr!”

Whilst stomping her feet in anger, Dorothea stared with a face on the verge of tears at the woman of red locks— Sithonia, the person she had called so. Tears gradually emerged within those eyes, and unable to be held back, they began to overflow.

Dorothea’s manner at present appeared to be emotionally unstable, causing Sithonia to sigh as if she was at a complete loss. Giving a sidelong glance to that exchange between sisters, Elsa shifted the gaze of her black irises towards the mansion.

Elsa: “…”

As they all stood in the garden before the mansion, towards Elsa and the other two— nay, to be precise, not towards the other two, but just towards Elsa, several gazes were turned.

She did not know their exact number and positions. Regardless, she could tell that she was being watched.

Sithonia: “You… Elsa, was it? Is there something wrong with the mansion?”

Elsa: “No, I just thought I was being watched. It feels a tad like I’m being welcomed. I’m overjoyed.”

Sithonia: “—. Those girls, have you noticed their gazes?”

Elsa: “Yes.”

As Sithonia’s expression shifted into one of surprise, Elsa nodded, seemingly unbothered.

For a long time now, she had been alert to the vigilance of others.

Rather than gazes, it was something more like indicators or scents. By merely living, countless indicators would hang over the bodies of humans. Elsa was just a little talented at smelling those as they were emitted by people. It was simply a matter of that, and nothing more.

Sithonia: “There is more to you than simply being an exemplary specimen, it would seem.”

Elsa: “I’m fine with anything that may be planned for me, but, I wonder, may I give my greetings to the girls inside?”

Sithonia: “Of course, you can rest assured. There is just one thing I ought to tell you in advance. —Including Dorothea and myself, everyone in the mansion shall become your elder sisters.”

Elsa: “—Elder sisters.”

Upon hearing Sithonia’s odd assertion, Elsa tilted her head.

However, upon Sithonia’s face was worn an expression of utmost seriousness. Furthermore, as Dorothea stood behind Elsa with tears in her eyes, she made no effort to deny that comment, nodding her head as she sobbed.

Rather than discipline, perhaps it ought to be called a result of domestication.

As Elsa harbored such an impression, Sithonia continued with “Understood?”,

Sithonia: “Here, you shall be the youngest sister. We are the Featherrun Sisters, with you as the youngest sister right at the bottom.”

Elsa: “But, isn’t this girl around the same age as me?”

With a jerk of her chin, Elsa gestured to Dorothea behind her.

It was difficult to tell due to her height and make-up, but Dorothea was around fourteen or fifteen years of age. This year, Elsa would be fifteen years old; probably? Given that approximation, there would not have been a large gap in their ages.

Rather, in terms of age, Elsa would be the older sister, but—

Sithonia: “—Your real age is of no consequence. This is about the number of years one has spent after becoming a Featherrun.”

Elsa: “…Is that so? Understood.”

Spoken to in a firm, clear tone that was difficult to refute, Elsa did not persist.

It was easy to converse with Sithonia, and Elsa could tell that she was showing a good amount of consideration towards her. But, she was nonetheless a member of these so-called “Featherrun Sisters”.

No matter the group, there would assuredly be rules unique to it. That was the case for the slaves who were the merchandise of slavers, as well as for orphans who lurked in the cold alleys.

—Even if it was the Featherrun Sisters, the same idea would apply.

Sithonia: “For the time being, it shall be a few days before Father returns. Until then, you shall learn how to live in this mansion. Have you readied your heart?”

Elsa: “Have I readied my heart? How kind of you to ask.”

Sithonia: “Kind?”

Elsa: “After living in slavery for so long, I’ve completely forgotten what it’s like to be treated as a human.”

Nodding at Sithonia’s words, Elsa reflected on half of her whole life thus far.

Come to think of it, she had loitered around a considerable amount. Her position, too, had varied from runaway, to orphan, to slave, so she would likely immediately grow accustomed to being one of the Featherrun Sisters as well.

The primary factor that had allowed Elsa to continue to survive in such aberrant environments was undoubtedly her adaptability.

Sithonia: “…Yes. That shall do fine. No matter the case, you shall become our little sister before long.”

Elsa: “—?”

As some traces of tragic courage revealed themselves in Sithonia's mutter, Elsa tilted her head.

Be that as it may, Elsa felt no reason or need to probe any further.

No matter how their title was altered, a slave would remain a slave.

After all, whether she was a Featherrun Sister or whatever else, Elsa would remain Elsa.

3

—In the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko, the existence of slaves was an open secret.

Officially, the state religion of the Holy Kingdom, the Gustekan Church, advocated that all lives were equal, preaching that there existed no difference in the value between individual people.

Albeit in reality, it was inevitable for there to be disparity between the rich and poor, for if there were those who abounded in wealth, there would certainly also be those who were famished. At the terminus of that unavoidable reality, there of course existed slaves in order to reduce the number of mouths to feed, and to guarantee a labor force.

The fact that Elsa had ended up a slave also stemmed from the adversity that was so commonplace in the Holy Kingdom.

She no longer possessed any recollection of her parents, but, for better or for worse, they were likely just ordinary people. Neither would they have loved their child particularly strongly, nor would they have vehemently shunned her. Merely, if their living circumstances had become difficult, they would have had no other choice but to sell her off in order to protect themselves.

Elsa harbored no intention of disparaging those parents of hers as heartless.

Only, after being sold off to a slaver for the first time, Elsa's personal history had been filled with many ups and downs.

At the outset, the tale began with a mass escape from her first slaver. The origin of this escape sequence was not Elsa, but the actions of an older, senior slave.

This older slave had already been planning the escape for quite some time. Strangely enough, the plan was executed directly after Elsa was taken into possession of the slaver, and transported to the base.

Unfortunately, the older slave who had devised the plan died by an arrow to the head, but Elsa, who was still healthy after having only just been sold off, splendidly succeeded in breaking away from the pursuing slaver.

Afterwards, she snuck into a nearby town and mixed in with the children who were living there under no roof, starting life as an orphan on the frigid streets. She ended up doing plenty of horrible things, including murder.

By doing so, she gained notoriety, and thus she naturally caught the attention of a certain group who preyed on such people, which led to the curtain rising on Elsa's life as a slave for the second time.

Considering how the first time had ended almost instantly, it felt somewhat like the first time she was actually living as a slave. However, this too did not last long. —It seemed that Elsa's physical appearance corresponded to the vulgar desires of men.

A buyer immediately took interest, and Elsa was sold off to the fellow who desired her as a slave. From there, she got up to no good and lost her master as a result, which was a pattern that only continued to repeat as she returned to life as a slave.

Amidst those repetitions, nasty rumors began to spread, and soon, Elsa no longer had any interested buyers. Before long, her slaver started to trouble over what to do with her, and ultimately began to consider a more typical disposal—

Elsa: "—And, that was around when I received an invitation to join the Featherrun Sisters."

???: “…”

Thus, having given a broad recount of her life up to that point, Elsa blew out the flame of the candle near her hand. Catching her breath, she looked up, and then proceeded to incline her head.

Elsa: “—? Is something the matter?”

???: “…I am surprised, you were burdened with far more than I had initially thought.”

Indeed, the one who had given an answer with carefully chosen words was Sithonia, seated around the same table as Elsa. A candle was present in front of her as well, its red flame flickering as it swayed.

Shown into the Featherrun Mansion, she was introduced to the sisters inside as she told her life story. The story of the events that had led Elsa to this point had just been told a moment prior.

In some ways, it was difficult, but she also thought that in some ways it had been quite fun.

Elsa: “That’s why, I think it’s a tad unexpected that you all view it as sorrowful.”

???: “—Kuku. If you think that it wasn’t sorrowful, then you’re quite the cheerful little sister.”

???: “—Albeit, she may be a girl who fits in just perfectly with the Featherrun Sisters. Kuku.”

In response to Elsa’s murmur, there were two smiles that coincided.

At the edge of the same table, two young girls who looked as similar as two peas in a pod sat side-by-side in a large chair. The two were identical from their facial features to their physique, with the only thing setting them apart being the difference in their respective gold and silver hair— as expected, they were each wearing dresses that matched the color of their hair, adorning them in a beautiful manner.

Elsa: “I had been curious about this, but the fact that you’ve spoken means that you aren’t just dolls, right? I wonder, are the two of you going to introduce yourselves any time soon?”

???: “Kuku, you’re a strange girl. —This girl is Hildea. She’s Saria’s little sister.”

???: “—This girl is Saria. She’s Hildea’s older sister. Nice to meet you. Kuku.”

Elsa: “Quite the confusingly similar introductions.”

As the two of them introduced each other, Elsa knit her well-shapen brow.

With their roundabout manner of speech, it seemed that the one with golden hair was Saria, and that the silver-haired one was the younger sister, Hildea. However, following the established rules of the Featherrun Sisters, both of them would be older sisters to Elsa.

As expected, they were all around the same age, yet she found it vexing to be treated as the youngest.

Sithonia: “As you can see, Saria and Hildea are twins who were taken in together. The two of us also went through a great deal before coming here… however, they were rescued here by Father.”

Elsa: “Rescued. Indeed, ah yes that must be.”

Sithonia: “—?”

Elsa: “This is just a supposition, Sithonia, but, did you perhaps also go through alot?”

Asked a question that caught on to the way she had ended her words, Sithonia’s expression slightly clouded over. Then, witnessing that, Saria and Hildea placed their hands together and exclaimed “Wow!” with delight,

Saria: “Did you see that just now, Hildea?”

Hildea: “Indeed, I saw it, Saria.”

Saria: “This Sithonia of ours, she was completely led around the nose by the youngest sister at the bottom.”

Hildea: “Even though she’s the eldest sister at the top, this Sithonia of ours truly is lacking in dignity.”

Sithonia: “Both of you, speak not in such a manner.”

Saria & Hildea: “Wah, scary!”

Being teased by the twins, Sithonia glared at them with sharp eyes. However, without showing any concern over that warning, the twins grinned as they brought cups of black tea from the table to each other’s lips, feeding each other. It was intimate, but that method of drinking seemed to be quite difficult to enact.

Sithonia: “Do not interfere with the things those two do together. That is the trick to getting along with them.”

Elsa: “Thank you for taking all this trouble for me. You’re quite the worrywart, now aren’t you?”

Sithonia: “When the number of unique younger sisters only ever increases, it will always prove to be tough on the elder sister.”

Wearing an expression fraught with weighty anxiety, the young and beautiful Sithonia placed her hand over her forehead.

Dorothea was a violent one, and the twin siblings of Saria and Hildea bore no hesitation to tease their elder sister. It was likely difficult to be an elder sister of all of them. Elsa thought that at least she would not do anything to become a burden on her.

Elsa: “By the way, will you answer my question from earlier, I wonder?”

Sithonia: “…Please do not also be one to trouble me.”

Elsa: “Oh my. I failed right away.”

Her plans crushed in exactly one second, Elsa reflected on her own conduct.

Elsa: “Then, may I alter my question? The Featherrun Sisters, now was it? How many people are there in total? In other words, those who will become my so-called family…”

Sithonia: “Including you, we sisters number six in total… there yet remains one person you still have not met. Currently, she is outside the mansion performing her duties, but she will return before long, so you will meet her soon.”

Elsa: “Six sisters… quite the large family, isn’t it? So then that plus Father, would be our family?”

Sithonia: “Indeed. —That, is our family.”

At Elsa’s query, Sithonia nodded with a gentle tone. And it was not only her, having heard their conversation from the side, Saria and Hildea also did the same thing.

The Featherrun Sisters. —The girls, gathered for a variety of reasons, had become sisters under the custody of Holosseo, and it did seem like they were satisfied with their life here.

Here, with the secret days they spent in this concealed plot of Hallowed Land.

Elsa: “I wonder if I’ll be able to fit in. My, I’ve come to feel apprehensive.”

Sithonia: “…You believe you will be unable to get along with us?”

Elsa: “Ah, that’s not what I meant. It’s just, a normal life, so-to-speak… I’ve never experienced such a thing, so I don’t know how I’d deal with something like a family.”

She had not had any siblings, so her family would have just been her parents, but that was a relationship for which she harbored neither recollections nor emotional attachment, and furthermore, it had been severed from the other side.

After being sold, even just the mere act of living was tough, so she was completely divorced from any notions of a tranquil life.

Elsa: “When I think about that, I wonder where exactly a peaceful day-to-day life would be for me?”

Sithonia: “…”

Elsa: “Sithonia?”

Elsa harbored pure curiosity, and upon her cheek softly was placed the hand of Sithonia. Gazing back at her in wonder, what emerged within those irises was an intricate, mysterious emotion.

It was an emotion that Elsa had never really seen before. If she had to describe it, perhaps it was something close to sorrow?

Saria: “My oh my, I suppose Sithonia’s the type to get like that right away, after all.”

Hildea: “She’s like that despite being the eldest, unable to bear the adversities of the world. My my.”

Witnessing Sithonia’s behavior from the side, the shrill laughs of the twins resounded as if they were lightly making fun of her. However, with nary a glance to the pair, Sithonia heaved a sigh with her eyes still fixed on Elsa,

Sithonia: “Worry not, Elsa. If it is here, if you are here, you can have both a day-to-day life, and a family. After all, the things you were unable to have until now, are all present here for you.”

Elsa: “…I see. I’m looking forward to it.”

Sithonia’s words, bereft of malice, prompted a faint smile to emerge on Elsa’s visage. Taking those words in, Sithonia lightly murmured “Alright”,

Sithonia: “Pardon me for asking about all these things. With that settled, we must help you to become more familiar with the mansion, Elsa. Without further delay, I will also be having you help out with the family’s work.”

Elsa: “The family’s work… that has quite the nice ring to it. What exactly do we do?”

Sithonia: “I mentioned it earlier, did I not? Nobody but us sisters and Father live here. We do not even have servants such as butlers or maids. Of course, neither do we have slaves. That is why—”

Speaking those words, Sithonia stood up and spread out her arms. That gesture was not merely pointing out the fireplace lounge. It was indicating something larger, the entire mansion.

Seeing that Elsa had understood that, Sithonia flashed a smile.

Sithonia: “That is why, all the everyday tasks and mansion housework is divided between us sisters.”

Elsa: “…”

Sithonia: “You were also once a slave, so you must know how to cook and clean, correct? Please demonstrate your talents. As fellow sisters, let us help each other out.”

Gazing at the white hand proffered by Sithonia, Elsa recalled the extensive facilities of the mansion of which she had received a light tour.

And then—

Elsa: “Though, I’m quite bad at such things, so I’m sure I’ll be an inconvenience.”

With that, she evasively declined the eldest’s invitation.

4

The environs of the mansion, that ought to be called the Featherrun Estate, were overflowing with greenery unbecoming of Gusteko.

It was common knowledge that villages and settlements in this country were constructed upon Hallowed Land, but the vast majority of residences were nonetheless surrounded by unmelting snow, so it was a rare occurrence to see any color other than white.

For this place to be an exception to that, was it because the quality of the Hallowed Land was high, or was it perhaps influenced by the fact that this mansion was the only construction on this plot; which of the two was it?

Elsa: “Or perhaps, is it neither of those, I wonder? What do you think?”

???: “…”

With malevolent shears thrust before her neck, Elsa calmly posed such a question.

They were located in the front yard of the Featherrun Estate, a garden that particularly stood out even amidst the Hallowed Land brimming with greenery. The grass and hedges were neatly trimmed, and there were a considerable amount of vibrant flowers of differing hues all around.

She had immediately been taken right into the mansion, unable to get a proper look at the garden, so she had went back just for the sake of it, but—

Elsa: “It seems like I’m not welcome.”

Saying that, Elsa gazed at Dorothea, who was glaring back at her through the gap in the shears.

Dorothea, who had arrived at the garden first, had not made any efforts to conceal her hostility towards Elsa, such had been the case ever since their first meeting. Even though Elsa did not discriminate between any of the other sisters, this was awfully harsh reception.

For what reason she was being detested so much, she truly had no clue as to why.

Dorothea: “…Why, are you here?”

Elsa: “You say the strangest things. You were the one who brought me here. And, wasn’t that on Father’s orders, too?”

Dorothea: “…That’s not what I’m talking about!!”

Dorothea howled in frustration, and that instant, the tip of her shears lightly cut into Elsa’s white neck. There was a stinging pain, and Dorothea let out a soft “—Ah”.

Then, she averted her gaze, and began to hold her own blue-haired head,

Dorothea: “Wro-Wrong, you’ve got it wrong… I, I didn’t mean to harm you, the momentum just…”

Elsa: “…Ah, a little blood spilled out. Well, I don’t really mind.”

Dorothea: “N-No…!! Y-Your body’s already, Father’s property, so…”

Dropping her shears on the spot, Dorothea’s face went pale. Her eyes darted about, and then, lifting her head as if she had realized something, she unsteadily approached Elsa.

Then, she placed her lips to Elsa’s neck, and began to lick the wound.

Elsa: “…I’m not really into this kind of thing, though.”

Dorothea: “Mm, mhh… if I lick, your wound… it’ll heal, it’ll heal right away, so…”

Clinging to Elsa’s neck in a trance, Dorothea was frantic to atone for her blunder. And since Elsa did not particularly feel the need to shake her off, Elsa allowed her to do as she pleased.

Instead, Elsa gazed towards the prudently maintained garden once more.

No matter how hallowed this land was, it would not bestow any special power upon the vegetation. It merely provided an environment such that they could keep on living. Since a garden would not be able to maintain itself, there must have been someone who tended to it.

Elsa: “Dorothea, are you the one who takes care of this place?”

Dorothea: “…Ah, yeah. This area’s… been entrusted to me, after all.”

In addition to the already ticklish sensation of being licked, the air exhaled when Dorothea spoke enhanced the ticklishness even further. Elsa slightly drew back her body, and then, for some reason, patted Dorothea on the head.

The azure locks, tied into twintails, were like silk as Elsa ran her fingers through them. This also went for Sithonia and the twins, but including Dorothea, the beauty of these girls was not merely confined to their facial features. They were so thoroughly packed with beauty that extended to their hair, skin, nails, and teeth.

Elsa: "—You're pretty."

Dorothea: "…Hyup."

Elsa: "Oh my."

The very instant Elsa expressed her honest impressions, Dorothea's body tensed up, and she leapt backwards. Elsa found it unfortunate that the soft sensation had left her, as Dorothea stared at her in shock.

Her expression was as if she had come across a Hollow on the street in the middle of the night.

Elsa: "If not that, then maybe it's the face of finding a Zodda bug in the corner of your room."

Dorothea: "…Are you making fun of me?"

Elsa: "No? I wonder why this always happens. Even though I talk to people in earnest, I'm often told such things. They tell me to not make fun of them, or to not mess with them. Perhaps I was impolite?"

Placing a hand to her own cheek, Elsa lamented the difficulty she faced in interacting with people. Then, touching her neck, she ascertained the lingering sensation of Dorothea's lips, and the condition of the faint wound.

Elsa: "It seems like the blood's stopped. Thank you… if I said that in this situation, would it be odd?"

Dorothea: "…Why, did you come here?"

Elsa: "I was going around in circles, I guess. It's just, I wanted to see the garden, so I came outside. So much effort has gone into caring for this flower bed, and yet I'd not had the time to get a good look at it."

No apology was given for the wound, and neither did Elsa desire one. Engaging in the necessary conversation, Elsa crouched down before the blooming flowers, and gently laid her fingers upon a petal.

She had not been very conscious of it, but seldom had she touched flowers like this.

While the slavers and buyers were affluent in their own ways, they were not so sentimental as to take effort to decorate the scenery of their homes with flowers. Much less, in places where the hands of slaves could reach.

Dorothea: "…Do you, not see flowers often?"

Elsa: "Yes, that's right. They aren't something I've ever seen much of."

Picking up her great shears, Dorothea stood beside Elsa with a slightly laudable attitude. That she did not also squat down served as a sign of her wariness, but Elsa did not mind much.

Towards that side profile of Elsa's, Dorothea inquired in a hoarse, crone-like voice.

Dorothea: "…What of Sithonia? She should be looking after you."

Elsa: "She was, but, I was probably too much for her to handle. See, you know how there's that thing about dividing the mansion's housework, such as cleaning, between everyone? The thing is, I don't really have much talent for that…"

Dorothea: "…You don't have talent?"

Elsa: "Cleaning and laundry aren't my strong suits. Cooking, too… I suppose that could be influenced by my life of being satisfied with whatever was edible. I’m not particular about how things taste.”

That she had done a half-hearted job due to it being tiresome, was not the case in the slightest. Since Elsa was also aware that she had been purchased, she was earnest about trying to fit in with her contemporaries.

However, if results were bound to follow just because one was serious about something, then words such as “meritocracy” would have never come to be in this world.

Hence, the areas in which Elsa had tried to help out fell into a ruinous state greater than they had been before she had assisted, so an exasperated Sithonia had told her that she was being put on the bench.

Elsa: “That said, it would still be bad to do nothing, right? That’s why, with the will to look for work on my own, I’ve been searching for my calling.”

Dorothea: “…Don’t tell me, is that why you came here?”

Elsa: “Indeed. I have decent experience with handling blades so I thought I might be of use—”

Dorothea: “…Stop.”

Receiving quite a strong rejection, Elsa caught her breath with an “Eh”.

Elsa promptly looked up at Dorothea, and cast back at her was a gaze brimming with a sense of hatred. Perhaps she had been irritated by someone encroaching on her territory?

Elsa: “I’m sorry if I took you by surprise. But, if I can just give it a go one time…”

Dorothea: “…Absolutely not. This place belongs to me. It’s the job that was bestowed upon me, so…”

Elsa: “But…”

Dorothea: “…Quit it already!”

As soon as she tried to persist, Dorothea’s emotions erupted once more.

Spinning around the great shears in her hands, she aimed for Elsa’s neck— nay, her collar, and once Elsa was caught by it, she was hurled a great distance back.

Widening her eyes at the raw strength unthinkable of the petite Dorothea, Elsa tumbled across the lawn. The sensation of greenery and the smell of grass, was a far cry from the frigidity of coarse snow.

This was no place to be thinking about such incongruous things. As Elsa laid face upward upon the lawn, above her leapt Dorothea, who began to rapidly descend towards her.

She did so with such vigorous intention to pierce straight into Elsa’s chest using her great shears—

Dorothea: “Someone like you…!!”

Elsa: “…”

In response to the approaching loathing and murderous intent, Elsa gently narrowed her black eyes.

Then, the moment Dorothea’s onslaught was about to befall Elsa— the great shears were grabbed by an interloping hand that had lightly reached out from the side.

Dorothea: “Ah…”

???: “Shut it with those “Ah”s! What are you, little miss stupid or something?!”

A light gasp escaped Dorothea’s throat, only to be drowned out by the angered bellow that followed directly afterwards.

Swung about in her entirety by the firm grasp on her arm, Dorothea’s figure disappeared from Elsa’s field of view. Then, the vanished Dorothea was slammed down right next to Elsa— no, she was slowly lowered.

The two of them now laid side by side upon the grass.

???: “Really now! Your short temper is unmanageable, Dorothea! With this sorta thing, we won’t even be able to trust you to tend to the flowers. The delicate blossoms would end up scattered in a huge mess!”

Dorothea: “…”

Within the vision of the collapsed pair, an upside-down face could be seen. That was the person who had flung Dorothea up, curbing her act of murder just before it was carried out.

And, to Elsa, the figure of that person was—

Elsa: “…A child?”

???: “—. You’re the new little sis, so I’ll let this first time slide. But, there won’t be a second time. I’ll have you know that being treated like a kid is the thing that I absolutely hate the most.”

Saying that as she grabbed Elsa’s sprawled out body and heaved it up by force, was a young girl who was only about as tall as Elsa’s chest level.

Her short, green hair was adorned with many ornaments, and she looked at Elsa with strong, round eyes. Based on her might, and the fact that she was here at this Featherrun Estate, her identity was evident.

Elsa: “I suppose you are the final member of the Featherrun Sisters?”

???: “You’re damn right! I’m the second daughter of the Featherrun Sisters, Ornea Featherrun. Your admirable elder sister. Make sure to never forget your feelings of veneration.”

Placing a hand on her waist, Ornea’s breathing grew fervent as she introduced herself before Elsa. No matter how one looked at it, she was at most eleven or twelve years old; but regardless, an elder sister who was clearly younger had appeared.

Be that as it may, it was precisely as she had been told earlier. Among the Featherrun Sisters, sisterly relationships were determined by the order of entry. Elsa's position as the youngest sister would not change.

Elsa: "Yes, it's a pleasure to meet you, Elder Sister Ornea. I am Elsa… though I suppose that I would be going by Elsa Featherrun now."

Ornea: "Mhm, it's good that you're straightforward. It might be tough, but I wonder if I could teach you a thing or two directly? But, there's something I need to tell you before any of that."

Elsa: "—?"

Ornea: "For now, you're not a Featherrun. —Not yet."

Shaking Elsa's proffered hand, Ornea nodded in high spirits. However, she pulled on Elsa's hand just a little bit harder, and added that on in a soft, quiet voice.

Elsa held her breath as she heard that whisper, and Ornea smiled as if forgetting her attitude from a moment prior, before turning her face towards the collapsed Dorothea.

Ornea: "Dorothea! How long do you plan on lying down there?! You know you're right in front of our youngest sister! Are you gonna behave like a spoiled brat forever, never acting like a proper elder sister?!"

Dorothea: "—Hk, b-but, Ornea…"

Ornea: "It's your own fault for getting slapped around by me! First of all, how are you going to face Father after trying to kill your younger sister half a day after meeting her?!"

Dorothea: "…Sniffle."

Rebuked by Ornea, Dorothea found herself with tears welling up in her eyes, unable to bear it. The moment Ornea saw this, her expression grew stiff with an "Ah…".

Ornea: "W-Wait, Dorothea, don't you cry now! Don't cry, okay? I don't know what to do when a little sis cries! So, don't cry…"

Dorothea: "Hnghh, ngh… WAAAAHHHHH!"

Ornea: "Eek!! She's cryyyying!!"

As tears began to stream down Dorothea's face, Ornea panicked. Since she was merely hovering her hand around her in a hurried manner, Ornea could not console Dorothea.

The girl of childish appearance panicked, and the other girl wept with the hoarse voice of a crone. Amidst that hopelessly unnatural situation, Elsa slowly squatted down.

Then, upon the cheek of Dorothea, face disheveled with tears, she gently placed her hand.

Dorothea: "…Ah."

Elsa: "Don't cry now, everything will be alright. Nobody is blaming you. If I, who was on the receiving end of those shears, sees it that way, wouldn't that go for everybody else as well?"

Dorothea: "…"

Elsa: "Or perhaps, can you not bear it? Though, you are supposed to be my elder sister."

Hearing Elsa's words, Dorothea's eyes opened wide; firmly clenching her teeth, she broke away from the hand touching her cheeks. Then, vigorously standing back up,

Dorothea: "…Wh-Who said I was crying?"

Ornea: "Nah, you were definitely crying… Mfghmfhhhh!"

Elsa: "We needn't say anything uncalled for now."

As Ornea tried to spoil Dorothea's show of courage, Elsa covered her mouth to stop her from continuing. Fortunately, that slip of the tongue seemed to have not reached Dorothea, so she went back to pick up her great shears, and clasping the huge blades together, she gave a curt "…Well, I'll get back to work now".

Elsa: "I see. Apologies for disrupting you. Do your best in your work now."

Dorothea: "…I, um, forgive you, for earlier."

Elsa: "Oh my."

Leaving behind those words with her back turned, face unseen, Dorothea passed through the garden with lumbering, large strides. Likely, she was headed to tend to flowers somewhere Elsa and Ornea could not see.

Seeing her off, Elsa took a small breath. And, thereupon—

Ornea: "—So, how long do you plan on silencing me?"

Elsa: "Ah, my apologies. You seemed like you would give numerous unnecessary comments, so I got a bit carried away there."

Ornea: "I don't think you can speak for others, though! Really now! Damn youngest sister!"

Slipping out from under Elsa's hand on her mouth, Ornea fixedly glared at her.

As expected, her childish appearance inhibited others from gleaning an accurate impression of her. However, she herself had said that she was the second daughter after Sithonia.

Elsa: "From what I've heard, you had an errand… no, a duty, and had been outside attending to it."

Ornea: "Mhm, I finished dealing with it and now finally returned. I've been looking forward to meeting you ever since I heard about you from Father and Sithonia, but…"

Elsa: "—?"

Ornea: "Yet again, there's another little sis who's taller than I am…"

Hanging her head in dejection, Ornea was disheartened by the height difference between Elsa and herself.

Looking over Ornea's head, Elsa turned her eyes to the direction she had come from— towards the outer portion of the Featherrun Estate, where the entrance to a small cavern was connected.

Going out from the snowfield, and through the cavern, would bring one to the recesses where this Hallowed Land laid. In other words, if she could make it through that cavern, the outside world would be waiting for her.

Ornea: "You can't."

Elsa: "…"

Ornea: "Don't think of doing anything stupid, Elsa. Take this as a warning from me. Any reckless actions will only end up digging your own grave."

Perhaps having sensed something within Elsa's gaze, Ornea cautioned her.

Receiving that advice from her short elder sister, Elsa shrugged her shoulders. Then, explaining her gaze with "You've misunderstood",

Elsa: "I'm not thinking of trying to do anything. Neither heedless actions, nor assisting with work."

Ornea: "So you aren't even going to try to help out with work… what is Sithonia even doing right now anyway? She's supposed to be the caretaker. Neglecting her younger sisters…"

Elsa: "I suppose she might be tidying up the devastation of the mansion I made in the name of helping out."

Ornea: "Then, you've gotta feel some remorse for what you've done!"

Hearing Elsa’s unashamed response, Ornea’s expression shifted into one of anger. Then, she grabbed Elsa by the hand, and forcibly began to walk towards the mansion.

Ornea: “Listen up. Now that I’ve returned, I’m gonna hammer what’s known as a rigid lifestyle right into you. Sithonia may have resigned part way through, but I won’t do anything of the sort!”

Elsa: “I see. I understand. I’m looking forward to it.”

Ornea: “Khkhkh, I’m the one who’s looking forward to seeing how long you can keep up that calm demeanor!”

With a confident smile, Ornea dragged Elsa into the mansion. Unable to go against that brute strength, Elsa, for some reason, looked towards the garden, towards the entrance to the cavern, and,

Elsa: “I truly am looking forward to it.”

So she muttered, licking her red lips.

5

Ornea: “I can’t handle her! This girl I tell you, what the heck is wrong with her?! I’ve never ever seen anyone so bad at living! She’s just like a beast!”

So shouted Ornea, at her wits’ end, the moment they all took their seats around the large table for dinner.

With the sweet facial features of a little girl, Ornea’s white forehead was engraved with deep wrinkles, accurately depicting the severity of her mental distress.

Elsa: “You mustn’t fret too much, Ornea. It’ll be okay, I’m sure a path will open up if we continue.”

Ornea: “Are you really the one saying that to me right now?!”

Elsa: “—?”

Beholding Ornea’s exasperated expression, Elsa tilted her head in confusion. As the second daughter hung her head upon seeing Elsa's response, the eldest daughter, seated at the same table, showed appreciation for her efforts with a wry smile.

Sithonia: "I understand Ornea's feelings. After all, I was also… surprised, by a variety of things."

Ornea: "Quite the reserved phrasing you got there! To me it felt like heaven and earth were flipped upside down!"

Ornea's lamentations only caused Sithonia's strained smile to deepen.

And while all of that was happening, the twins Saria and Hildea came out from the kitchen pushing a trolley upon which dinner was set. The two walked side by side as they pushed the trolley, and it actually appeared to be rather difficult for them.

Saria: "Kuku, we're far more used to doing this than it looks."

Hildea: "We were far more inefficient before, but after practicing over and over, we can do it quite freely. Kuku."

Elsa: "Though, that just sounds like it really was as difficult as I imagined at first."

It was splendid that they had overcome that, but it also sounded like something that had no real need to be overcome.

With nary a glance back at Elsa's tactless riposte, Saria and Hildea began to place the supper that they had made upon the table.

Saria: "Hildea made the main course today."

Hildea: "Saria prepared the appetizers today."

Saria: "Tomorrow, it will be your and Ornea's turn. I'll be looking forward to it."

Hildea: "I'm looking forward to it. To see your and Ornea's cooking tomorrow."

Ornea: “N-Nooooooooo! I wanna do it by myseeelf—!!”

At the mix of anticipation and provocation from the twins, Ornea responded in despair. Elsa, being treated as the primary cause of that despair, found it upsetting, but having said that, neither did she not have even a smidgen of confidence.

At the very least, without doing anything superfluous, it would be best for her to just wash the tableware and whatnot in the corner of the kitchen.

???: “…I’m back, Sithonia.”

Sithonia: “Ah, welcome home, Dorothea. First of all, let us clean the dirt off of your arms and legs.”

During that interaction, Sithonia brought Dorothea, having returned from gardening, to the washroom. Given that she also wore her blue dress while working, the manner in which Dorothea had gotten dirty was quite something.

Elsa: “Speaking of which, is it correct to think that our dresses are to Father’s tastes?”

Ornea: “Hm? Ah, that. Rather than it being to Father’s tastes, it’s a custom of the Featherruns. The Featherrun Sisters are to wear dresses. It’s that sorta unwritten rule.”

Elsa: “—. I see. I guess that’s fine then.”

While responding, Elsa looked down at the black dress she was wearing— without sleeves, it was an article of clothing that kept its splendor to a minimum.

Aside from Elsa, the other sisters were all clad in dresses that matched their respective features. Perhaps it was their doctrine to match the color of hair and dress, as it remained consistent throughout all of them.

Using a mansion hidden within Hallowed Land in order to buy up “problematic” slaves like Elsa, granting them clothes and a decent life, was Holosseo Featherrun a philanthropist, perhaps?

Elsa: “Fufu.”

Thinking such things in an insincere manner, Elsa’s lips curved into a smile.

With those abyssal, hollow eye sockets, there was no possibility for that man to be a virtuous human brimming with compassion. It was undeniable that he had gathered Elsa, along with the other sisters, with a certain objective in mind.

At present, Elsa did not know his objective, but— at the very least, she understood that she had been purchased in order to slot into the role of one of the Featherrun Sisters.

Sithonia: “—Sorry to keep you waiting. Everybody, take your seats.”

After some time had passed since supper had been put on the table, Sithonia returned with Dorothea, the latter having washed her arms and legs. Receiving that addressment, Ornea and the twins, who had been acting boisterously up until then, shut their mouths.

Then, everybody took their assigned seats with their supper before them. The head of the table was unoccupied, and in order from there, were seated Sithonia, Ornea, Saria, Hildea, Dorothea, and finally, Elsa.

Sithonia: “We thank thee, our Motherly Great Spirit, residing atop the highest peak of the Sacred Mountain. For today, you once again grant us sustenance, allow us to spend time together with our family, and to sleep in tranquility.”

Elsa: “…”

Closing her eyes and putting her hands together, Sithonia spun words of gratitude towards the empty sky.

Elsa knit her brows, wondering what was going on, but since Dorothea glared at her with sharp eyes from the other side of the table, she also put her hands together for the time being, and cast her eyes downwards.

Sithonia: “Though it may be meager, tonight we offer a prayer of gratitude towards your benevolence. May you bestow your grand love upon the Holy Kingdom evermore. —So be the Silver Affection.”

Elsa: “—So be the Silver Affection.”

Together with Sithonia’s prayer, the sisters all spoke in unison at the end. A moment belated, Elsa also repeated those words of prayer.

Sithonia: “Well then, let us enjoy this meal. Saria’s soup looks just as delicious as ever.”

Erasing the sublime atmosphere of the prayer, Sithonia proclaimed the commencement of mealtime. Then, each of the sisters began to eat as they pleased.

Finally granted permission, Elsa was also about to get started on her food, but,

Elsa: “Before that, about those words of prayer just now…”

Sithonia: “Ah, you are not familiar, are you Elsa? That was a ritual prayer of the Gustekan Church. Words of gratitude towards the Sacred Beast, Odglass-sama, who grants us sustenance each and every day… Our Father is in charge of an important duty in the Church of the Holy King. That is why…”

Ornea: “We’re also affiliated with the Church of the Holy King. Thanks to that, we can live in this warm house, eat warm food and wear warm clothes. Being thankful’s only natural.”

While pouring soup down her throat, Ornea interrupted Sithonia’s words and declared so. She seemed to be a bit of a glutton, and so, eating up bread and meat in quick succession, she continued to quickly fill up her tiny body.

Ornea: “Mrghh! Oi, seems like you really want to ask just where in my body all of this is going.”

Elsa: “And just where in that small body of yours is all of that going?”

Ornea: “Hey, you actually went and said it!”

Even while shouting in anger, Ornea’s hand did not stop shoveling food into her mouth.

Before mealtime, too, back when she was trying to teach Elsa a variety of things, she had been moving her small body around at full exertion. She was likely using a considerable amount of stamina just to live.

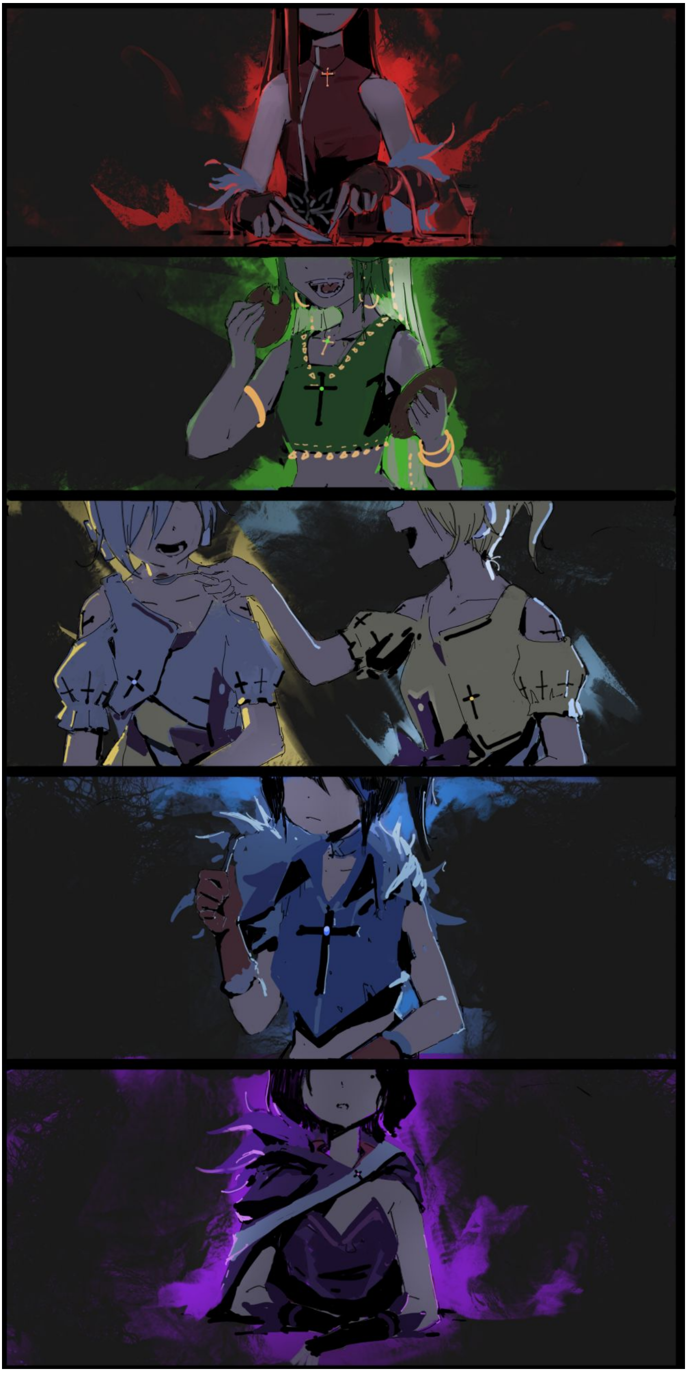
Elsa: “…”

Sithonia chided Ornea’s behavior, all the while Saria and Hildea fed their respective suppers to one another, similar to how they had done with their black tea earlier. Dorothea stirred restlessly in her seat as she ate, but upon noticing Elsa’s gaze, she abruptly turned a grim stare to her.

It was a terribly boisterous, frantic, and restless dining table.

However—

Elsa: “I suppose this is what’s known as a family meal.”



Getting a vague feeling that she was intruding on a scene alien to herself, Elsa muttered so. Hearing that, the other sisters all stopped simultaneously.

They pointed their eyes of various colors towards Elsa, and displayed their respective reactions.

Though the emotions spread across were mysterious and complex, the overall reactions were comprised of smiles.

Sithonia: “I’m glad you could understand, Elsa. This, is a family dining table. One shared by us, the Feathrrun Sisters.”

Elsa: “I see… In that case, I’ll do my best to grow accustomed to it. For the time being…”

Sithonia: “For the time being?”

Elsa: “—I guess I’ll focus on a tidier manner of eating.”

Saying that, Elsa looked down at her hands— with no recognizable trace left of the food that had initially been set on the table, she looked at the wretched mess she had made of the dining table.

Ornea: “Why’s that?! How’d it end up like that?! Are you a beast?!”

Dorothea: “…Did a stray dog come and lay waste only to Elsa’s supper?”

Saria: “Kuku, it may look like that, but no such thing happened. Right, Hildea?”

Hildea: “Yes, there’s no way such a thing could have happened. Right, Saria? Kuku.”

Exposed to the eyes of her sisters, who all seemed like they were seeing something utterly unbelievable, Elsa frowned in a sullen manner.

She had not particularly intended on ravaging her meal, and it had just naturally ended up this way. She had probably been born with a catastrophic lack of talent for keeping things tidy.

Sithonia: “Apprehensive to cleaning, laundry, and cooking. And finally, to think that even your ability to eat your own food is dubious at best… aha.”

Elsa: “Sithonia?”

Sithonia: “Aha, fufufu!! How peculiar. You are a peculiar one, Elsa, ahahahaha!”

Watching over that disaster, Sithonia burst out into laughter with a reaction delayed from the other four. Seeing that reaction from the one who had given off a peaceful impression, Elsa was a bit surprised.

However, she did not feel bad as Sithonia laughed like that.

Ornea: “Though, I don’t see this as any laughing matter. I’m at a total loss in regards to where to start teaching her from.”

Folding her short arms, Ornea admonished her so. However, her meek hue from earlier had grown faint, and in its place emerged something akin to a smile.

The twins and Dorothea, too, mixed into the gentle atmosphere with their looks. Albeit somewhat mismatched, amicable emotions had come together; that first act would now—

???: “—O Daughters of mine.”

Everyone: “…”

An unexpected voice resounded, and the sisters all lifted their heads as if snapping up. Then, all of them leaped out of their chairs in unison, and kneeled down to prostrate themselves on the floor of the dining hall.

Once again, as all the sisters other than herself performed those actions, Elsa remained alone gazing in dumbfoundment— the very next moment, Elsa was grabbed by the back of her head, and forced to bow on the floor by brute strength.

After a hard sound resounded alongside a spike of pain, she realized that her forehead had been knocked into the floor. The one who had done that was Ornea, who was supposed to have been a distance between herself and Hildea.

Just how much raw strength was housed in those dainty arms; Elsa could not resist their power in the slightest. And then, before Ornea could remove her slender arms, a voice called down upon them.

???: “All are present. Here in the presence of Featherrun.”

Sithonia: “—. Father, you have returned early. Please excuse our failure to welcome your return…”

???: “It matters not. You are all property of Featherrun.”

Due to being forced into the floor, Elsa could not see the face of the person speaking. But, this voice that sounded like that of dead man’s was present in her recollections. —It was Holosseo.

The man who had purchased Elsa from a slaver, and was referred to as Father by the sisters of this mansion. To Elsa, too, he was a person who ought to be called by such a title.

Holosseo had returned, and the sisters received his arrival in such a way. —Such an act was a bit of a warped way to welcome someone. After all, Ornea’s hand was trembling.

Her arm, pinning Elsa’s head down to the floor, had been trembling to a sorrowful extent. That was not because she was funneling power into it, but a result of her sentiments of dread.

Elsa: “…”

Twisting her neck, still groveling on her hands and knees, Elsa faced the fore.

At the entrance of the dining hall, Holosseo was standing with the support of his legs, which were akin to withered trees, and the only one to speak to him, down on one knee, was Sithonia. Upon her visage, too, were strong signs of tension. Only, tension was all that it amounted to, and it appeared as a hue wholly different to that of Ornea's dread.

Sithnoia: "If you have returned, Father, that means…"

Holosseo: "The provisions for the ritual have been arranged in advance. Bring the vessel to the divine chapel."

Sithonia: "—Yes."

Standing up from her deep bow, Sithonia then looked towards Elsa. Catching sight of the hollow hue dwelling in those irises, Elsa understood.

The "vessel" mentioned a moment prior, was in reference to none other than Elsa.

Ornea: "Don't resist."

As that was spoken into her ear, her pressed down body was hoisted up. Ornea, the one who had done that, effortlessly shouldered Elsa with one of her arms, and stood up.

After Ornea, Saria, Hildea, and Dorothea also stood up. The sisters followed behind Holosseo as he began to walk, and they exited the dining hall while leaving supper as it was.

He was headed for the divine chapel. —In that place, some sort of ritual would take place.

Elsa: "Ritual, hm…"

Among those who bought slaves, there were some who would attempt to satisfy their abnormal desires by feigning a ritual. Buyers were free to do as they pleased with their slaves, so that was not a huge problem.

The issue was, she found it utterly unthinkable that the objective of Holosseo's ritual would be akin to the likes of such boorish lust. In that case, what exactly would happen to Elsa?

Sithonia: “After this, you will become one of the Featherrun Sisters.”

These were the words given to her by Sithonia. They were concise, and a response that did not serve to answer her question.

However, she did not have the leeway to express discontent with that reply. When she was first brought into the divine chapel, her nostrils were assailed by a filthy malodor that permeated the room, one that could not be eliminated, regardless of the room having been cleaned.

Even if not it were not Elsa here, all who lived in this unsparing Holy Kingdom of Gusteko would have been able to identify the essence of that stench. —The putrid odor of death.

The traces of the dead would turn to malodor, lingering in a manner akin to bitter hatred. Just how many people had met their demise in this divine chapel, was a number far greater than she could ever imagine.

Dorothea: “…Almost everyone dies. So surely, you will too…”

Following right behind Elsa, Dorothea muttered in a subdued tone.

Whether that was a warning or simply a verdict of death, Elsa knew not; but from the way it had been phrased, it seemed that her chances of survival were at least greater than zero.

Elsa: “What separates those who survive and those who perish? Is there maybe a trick to surviving, I wonder?”

Dorothea: “…”

Saria: “Kuku, did you hear that, Hildea?”

Hildea: “Yes, I heard it, Saria. Kuku.”

As Dorothea was left speechless, Saria and Hildea sneered at Elsa’s avarice in her place. But, the pair, having regained a bit of leeway from the dining hall, chirped “Listen listen” in unison, Saria: “Elsa’s about to confront the ritual, and it seems she wants to know the trick to surviving.”

Hildea: “The reason why Hildea was alright, the reason why Saria and the others lived, it seems she wants to hear them.”

The pair called out to the other sisters, and spread the news that Elsa sought an answer.

With that news in mind, Sithonia, Ornea, the twins, and Dorothea, each moved their lips,

Sithonia: “Tranquility.”
Ornea: “Animalistic desire.”
Saria & Hildea: “Compassion and resentment.”
Dorothea: “The thirst of love.”

Indeed, each of them suggested their respective reasons for having survived.

Listening to all of them, Elsa smiled. Smiling, she accepted all of her sisters’ encouragement.

Elsa: “—Thank you. Well then, I’ll do my best to survive.”

As Elsa boasted in a carefree tone, the sisters no longer spoke any further words.

In the center of the divine chapel, was present an altar to which the putrid odor of death clung. Standing next to it, Holosseo’s unhealthy body was clad in vestment, carrying a short, dark-bladed sword in one hand.

Even for Elsa, who had been passed around a great deal of buyers, everything from this point on would be a first.

In an abnormal environment that threatened even her life, Elsa’s body trembled. Faced with the overwhelming fate looming before her eyes, it was naught more than pure ecstasy that had caused her to tremble.

As her whole body trembled, the young girl murmured.

Elsa: “—Ahh, what a thrill.”

Chapter 2:
Holosseo Featherrun

1

When she thought to dodge, she could easily dodge.

However, she felt no real inclination to do so, and thus basked from the head down in a spray of fresh blood. The viscous, warm sensation of blood, it tasted akin to an illusion of clinging tightly to life.

???: “But, it’s quite the strange thing, isn’t it?”

???: “Ah, kahh…”

???: “The one who vomits out life, is the one who ends up nearing their death.”

The huge man before her eyes groaned, and from his mouth spilled out copious amounts of blood. Naturally, not wanting to bask in that regurgitated blood, Elsa leaped a great deal back.

With that rhythm, she pulled out the knife that had pierced the man’s chest, causing an even greater amount of blood to spray out. That served as the finishing blow, and after the man’s body fell forward onto the ground, it spasmed a bit before coming to a stop.

If a human's two vitals of head and heart were pierced, any show of resistance would thus be rendered infeasible.

???: "Elsa, I'm finished over here. How are things on your end?"

Elsa: "Yes. I'm also—"

It happened the moment she tried to respond to the voice from the adjacent room, and had turned her back to the corpse.

???: "—Grufh!!"

The fallen corpse sprung back up, and drove a spear hand right into Elsa's back.

Without missing its target, it bore into Elsa's slim back, obliterating her heart as it perforated through to the front side of her chest, unrelentingly pulverizing her entrails.

A magnificent counterattack. The counterstrike from the man, hovering on the boundary between life and death, had certainly pierced through the ebony-clad young girl's life.

—However, that would have only held true if the girl was a mere human.

Elsa: "…How amazing. You really tried your best."

???: "Goh?!"

Alongside light commendation, the man's visage was kicked up from below. At a glance, that appeared to have been the result of a back kick from the girl whose chest had been impaled. The man's eccentric, mollusk-like body was punted up by the maw, and before his eyes, the girl turned around, her black hair fluttering. Then, raising the blade right above the man,

Elsa: "Apologies for messing up. I've yet to grow accustomed to this sort of work."

The downward cleave of the blade sliced the man open from his chest down to his abdomen in one fell swoop. 'Twas an attack far too gruesome to be called a mere slashing, and with it, vast amounts of gore and viscera poured out of the open wound.

Thus, alongside the arrival of that fatal wound, the curtain finally fell on the counteroffensive of the man who had been teetering on the brink of death. Once she ascertained the death of the man, fallen on his back as he was, Elsa slowly squatted down next to him.

Then, looking down at the wound that had been hollowed out in her own chest, she caressed the mouth of the wound from the top. Assailed by the oozing pain, she felt chills run down her back.

More; as she subconsciously sought out more pain, she tried to bore further into the wound with her finger—

???: "Idiot! Don't play with your wound! You'll stop it from closing back up!"

Elsa: "Ouch…"

Taking a fist to the back of her head alongside the angered bellow, Elsa turned around in disappointment. And, flashing her ire in response to that gaze, Ornea stood dauntingly.

Comparing Elsa's wound with the corpse of the fallen man, she shrugged her shoulders and said, "Good grief".

Ornea: "I entrusted this to you because you said you could handle it, but… you were damn negligent! If not that, either you were playing around, or got caught in the opponent's trap… either way, you can't be doing that!"

Elsa: "I wonder now, did you get everything done properly on your side, Ornea?"

Ornea: "Of course I did! Just who the heck do you think I am?! I killed each of them with a single blow! Quick enough as to not give 'em any chances to counterattack! Be amazed!"

Elsa: "Woah, I'm amazed."

Ornea: "That's not enough amazement!"

To always be envigored with anger no matter what anybody said to her was Ornea's nature, but there was likely no falsehood in her words.

That not a single drop of blood had found itself upon that green dress of hers, spoke to the excellence of her skills. By herself, Ornea had dealt with the over-twenty guards here in this mansion. Compared to that, Elsa's opponent had been just one man—regardless of him being the main target, the difference in their results was evident.

Ornea: "…How's the wound on your chest? Can you move?"

Elsa: "Yes, I think I'm alright. The pain feels like I might die when I move, but I'm fine."

Ornea: "Don't say that it's fine, then! Geez, even though you're still getting acclimated, you go and do nothing but reckless things! Get on! I'll carry you home!"

Since resisting would only serve as a waste of energy, Elsa obliged and got on her tiny elder sister's back. The pair were about to take their leave from this barbaric scene. However, before that—

Ornea: "Elsa, you've forgotten something. Leave one of those behind."

Elsa: "Huh? …Ah, yes of course. I almost forgot."

As Ornea's words sparked her memory, Elsa reached into her dress, and took out a single flower. So deeply purple as it was, terribly alluring was the manner in which it blossomed within Elsa's hands.

Taking that flower, she tossed it to rest on top of the collapsed man.

That was, unmistakably—

Elsa: "—The mark of the Featherrun Sisters."

The reason why the man and his guards had all died. In order to make that known, this flower served as a signature.

With a final glance towards the flower petals as they became soaked in blood, Elsa and Ornea departed.

They would not hold on to any unnecessary emotions outside of their work. That too, was a law of the Featherrun Sisters.

2

Sithonia: “Nevertheless, it always surprises me just how much Elsa has grown.”

Presenting them with freshly brewed black tea, Sithonia congratulated the return of Elsa and Ornea.

Enjoying the aromatic vapor of the black tea, her body was tinged with warmth as she sipped it. As she gained more opportunities to head outside, she was keenly reminded of the value of these vital plots known as Hallowed Land.

The frigid snow robbed people of all kinds of things.

It absconded with their emotions, their sensations, their relations, and finally, their lives. Considering that even brigands could show mercy on occasion, there were truly no words to describe that cruel iciness.

Elsa: “The snow is ruthlessly coldhearted, I wonder, would that not be a good joke?”

Sithonia: “…”

Elsa: “Oh my, was it not humorous? I did have a bit of confidence in it, though.”

As her joke was met with silence, Elsa licked her lips in disappointment. With a wry smile to her youngest sister’s demeanor, Sithonia shifted her eyes to Ornea, who was in delirium gorging on the cake served alongside the tea. Without even a glance towards the black tea, Ornea stuffed her rosy cheeks with the serving of teacake, diligently working with a single minded focus to replenish her stamina.

Ornea: “Mnngh? …Mhgnhh. What is it, Sithonia? Why’re you staring at me.”

Sithonia: “Giving a report on the mission is the responsibility of the elder sister, correct? And, I have yet to receive any proper report. Do not tell me that you have forgotten about it, have you?”

Ornea: “Ghogh, ehogff! Of, of course not. Just now, I was thinking that I’d better keep silent to not disrupt the conversation between you and Elsa, Sithonia. By no means is it the case that I’d lost myself to this teacake.”

Coughing violently with her reddened face, Ornea attempted to cover up her lapse in memory. Then, before Sithnoia’s lukewarm eyes, she prefaced with an “Ahem”, and,

Ornea: “As for the mission, me and Elsa completed it without any trouble. Pastor Cerid Mortis, who terrorized the populace with a selfish interpretation of the Holy Church’s dogma, met his demise, and his collaborators were also silenced across the board. There were no issues… Except for Elsa, who carelessly got her dress all torn up!”

Sithonia: “Though, it also ought to have been your duty to supervise her?”

Ornea: “What’s with all this harsh treatment towards me?!”

Lamenting her hopeless situation, Ornea capitulated. Heaving a sigh at her younger sister’s excuses, Sithonia then glanced towards Elsa and her torn dress, before narrowing her eyes.

Sithonia: “From the way it is torn… it seems you underwent quite a gruesome attack from your opponent.”

Elsa: “Yes. It came from the back and went all the way through and out the front of my chest. Even so, it’s incredible that this body was still able to immediately recuperate nonetheless.”

Sithonia: “—. You must not over-rely on it. We may be close to immortality, but we are by no means unkillable.”

Sithonia reached out her hand, and softly touched where Elsa's chest had been ripped open. The wound underneath the tear in the clothes had already healed, but Elsa obediently nodded.

For all things, one must never over-rely. In regards to this body, there were still many aspects that were unknown to Elsa.

Ornea: "And for that, the very best thing you can do has gotta be training. So, shall we head to the basement, Elsa?!"

Having finished the teacake that had been divided into nine slices on the plate all by herself, Ornea roused herself with crumbs yet stuck to her cheeks. Seeing the vigor of her standing up, Sithonia sighed, and Elsa got up with an "Indeed".

Elsa: "You're quite the instructor, aren't you now? I'll abide by what you see fit, Ornea."

Ornea: "Hmph. Khfufu, have you finally started to feel some reverence for me? There, there, in that case I'll patiently teach you like a good big sis. I'll show you how we Featherrun Sisters do things!"

Swinging her short arms around with vigor, Ornea exited the dining hall in high spirits. When Elsa tried to follow behind her, Sithonia abruptly pinched her dress.

Eyes concealing slight anguish were directed towards Elsa, and,

Elsa: "What's the matter?"

Sithonia: "—. No, it is nothing. Apologies for keeping you."

Elsa: "Is that so? I guess that's fine, then."

Sithonia's behavior had been teeming with significance, so it could not have been that it was just nothing. But, if she said it was nothing, then Elsa determined there would be no use in pressing further.

Sithonia released her grip on the dress, and Elsa proceeded forward to follow behind Ornea.

Ornea: “What’d Sithonia say to you?”

Elsa: “Who knows? Nothing in particular… I suppose she might have found it lonely to be left there all by herself.”

Elsa tilted her head as she recalled Sithonia’s expression upon their departure, to which Ornea laughed a humored “Kakaka”, before opening the basement door. —Within, a vast subterranean space stretched out.

That space, appearing to be a natural limestone cavern, was primarily used for the Featherrun Sisters to train for their duties. Unlike the interior of the mansion or the garden, this was a place that would bother nobody if damaged or sullied, and was thus used quite frequently.

Had it not been such a location, the Featherrun Sisters would have not been able to use it for training. After all, no ordinary level of martial arts training could have ever reduced it to the ghastly scene it had become.

Ornea: “—Hey, you’re too slow, Elsa!”

Accompanying the words hurled at her in a relaxed manner, a powerful blow connected.

As Ornea tread firmly with a smile on her face, she cast forth a chain with a weight attached to the end. —With a combination of throwing and batting, the weapon known as the kusari-fundo functioned as a powerful assassination tool.

However, when unleashed by superhuman strength surpassing all conventional norms, the damage would not be confined to just that.

Elsa: “Grghh…hk!”

Unable to evade the incoming weight, Elsa’s right arm was grazed, causing it to be blown off the shoulder. Losing an arm as blood poured out, Elsa’s stance crumbled, prompting Ornea to pounce on her.

Elsa quickly transferred her knife over to her left hand, and aimed it at Ornea's face. She thrust it with the intent to gouge out the opponent's eyeball, but it was easily dodged with a quick tilt of the head.

Then, Ornea closed in on Elsa to a distance where they would be able to feel the breaths of one another,

Ornea: "This'll hurt a little, so grit your teeth!"

The sound of chains clangored, and Elsa's body was flipped over in a mighty upheaval.

The reason being, her legs, torso, and neck had become entangled in Ornea's kusari-fundo, tearing down her stance by sheer force. And, Ornea's herculean strength would not let things end with the mere collapse of her opponent.

Elsa: "—Hk."

The moment Ornea funneled strength into her arm, Elsa's body, caught in the chains, was wrung and torn to shreds. Her neck broken, her legs broken, and her waist constricted down to be as thin as an arm, Elsa crumbled.

By all standards, that was far too brutal, a gruesome death that would make anybody want to avert their gaze—.

Ornea: "And, that's what it'd be like. So, why don't you stop saying cute things such as wanting to play with me when I get serious."

Elsa: "…Ah, uu."

Sprawled out across the ground, Elsa groaned as she teetered on the verge of death; beside her, Ornea crouched down.

Despite having torn Elsa limb from limb with her slender arms, Ornea did not seem to be particularly worried. After all, she harbored no feelings of guilt for having personally done such a thing to her youngest sister.

That was because Elsa's mangled body was, slowly but surely, repairing itself.

Elsa: "…"

Her lacerated legs, rended neck, and strangulated torso, all gradually regained their original form. Bones creaking, flesh was restored while spurting out blood; as her wounds closed up, her innards were mended.

A regenerative power beyond human understanding, and transcendent vitality that could quite possibly even reverse the state of death. This was the new body of Elsa Featherrun, now a fully fledged Featherrun Sister.

Elsa: "…It's my own body… but it's quite… the strange thing."

In a coughing fit, expelling all the blood from her throat, Elsa ascertained the condition of her body.

The pain had already evanesced, and the sensation of her limbs was unchanged from their usual state. In all likelihood, her crumpled up organs would have also returned to perfect condition.

Elsa: "—This, is the power of a Curse Doll."

Ornea: "We're forbidden from talking about this secret art. Don't recklessly go telling people about it, yeah?"

Elsa: "Telling people…? Just where in our lives would we have the chance to carelessly leak it to somebody?"

Ornea: "Well when you put it that way, I guess you're right."

At Elsa's simple question, Ornea nodded with an expression as if to say "You've got me there". The mood turning somewhat amusing, the two began to laugh together.

Just a few dozen seconds earlier, the sisters had been locked in a fierce duel in a manner that seemed like they were fighting for their lives. The sight of them giggling together like typical young girls would have been nothing but eerie to the eyes of an outsider.

However, for the two people involved, those emotions were natural.

After laughing for some time, Ornea suddenly narrowed her eyes,

Ornea: “Elsa, you sorta resemble me.”

Elsa: “—? I think that means there’s something wrong with your eyes.”

Ornea: “Don’t be saying that while staring so intently to compare our heights! I’m not talking about looks, something that’s more on the inside, like nature, maybe, anyway I’m talking about that sorta thing!”

Elsa: “That’s a bit vague…”

Ornea: “Shut your damn mouth!”

Flaring up at Elsa’s quick retort, Ornea continued with an “Anyhow!”. Playing with the kusari-fundo in her hands that had maimed Elsa’s body,

Ornea: “When one is turned into a Curse Doll, in most cases, that alteration will fracture their heart. That’s the reason behind Saria and Hildea’s extreme eagerness for physical contact, and Dorothea’s emotional instability.”

Elsa: “Is Dorothea’s voice also a side effect of becoming a Curse Doll?”

Ornea: “That was there from the start. I dunno why… It can’t have been anything good.”

After giving an answer with a distant look in her eyes, Ornea then peered into Elsa’s eyes with a “Got it?”.

Ornea: “Compared to our other sisters, you and I are well adapted to these circumstances. There’ll be many more opportunities to be recruited for missions like today. That’s why, we’ve gotta be careful.”

Elsa: “Careful?”

Ornea: “Ultimately, the ones keeping us alive are Father, and the Gustekan Church that Father abides by, gotta be careful with ‘em.”

Listening to Ornea’s quiet words, Elsa softly repeated the phrase “Gustekan Church”.

—The majority of people in the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko placed their faith in the Gustekan Church.

A religious state that worshiped the Sacred Beast Odglass, and the Holy King appointed by that Great Spirit, as the pinnacle of sanctity. Such was the reality of the situation in this land of perpetual winter, the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko.

In harsh environments that befell all indiscriminately, everyday life was pushed to such an extreme that the hearts of men needed something on which to cling, lest they cease to persist. As a result of such circumstances, what laid at the terminus of people’s search for salvation would be entities sundered from the likes of humans— in Gusteko, that manifested in the form of faith towards Spirits.

And, purchased by Holosseo Featherrun, and ushered in as his adoptive daughter, it seemed Elsa had become a member of this Church of the Holy King without even having realized it herself.

In addition, she belonged to a hidden sector, one that must never be revealed to the outside world.

Elsa: “The Featherrun Sisters…”

Ornea: “With Father at the helm, we’re a unit that serves the interests of the Church to maintain order. That’s the duty of us sisters, an indispensable role in the cleansing of the Holy Kingdom.”

Had that been a statement imbued with guilt or cynicism, Elsa would have likely revised her evaluation of Ornea.

However, as Ornea uttered those words, her attitude was void of lamentation towards her position. She had accepted her role, her fate, and had adapted to this environment.

I see; at last she had been able to understand.

The meaning behind Ornea’s statement that Elsa resembled herself, at last she understood.

Ornea: “No matter how you slice it, our job is killing people. It takes a lot to become a Curse Doll, and the work that follows really puts your heart to the test. —Hey, Elsa. You know, I can’t bear to let our other sisters do jobs they don’t wanna do.”

Elsa: “…”

Ornea: “All of them are girls who’ve gone through tough times. It’s dumb to try and compare, so none of us brag about our misfortunes. But, as long as they’re here, their hearts can be at peace. In tranquility, without fear of getting hurt… That’s why, I wanna let ‘em continue on with that life.”

Elsa: “…For that purpose, you continue to take the short end of the stick?”

Ornea: “That’s why, I’ve got high hopes for you.”

After wearing a commendable expression on her face, Ornea thereupon smiled at Elsa. As she smiled, expectations for Elsa only continued to dwell within her narrowed eyes.

Ornea: “From what I can see, even when considering that you’re a Curse Doll, you’re clearly adapting well to this duty. That’s why, while also noting that it might be a bit early, I had you accompany me on my mission.”

Elsa: “I see… so as a successor, or probably as a partner?”

Ornea: “Once I get you trained, the two of us can continue to fulfill the duties of the Featherrun Sisters. If we do that… then Sithonia and everyone else should be able to keep living with their hearts at rest.”

That was a declaration of Ornea’s resolve.

Elsa did not know just how long she had been living this way as the second daughter of the Featherrun Sisters. But, therein was revealed the anguish of all Ornea’s days until now.

The sole aspiration she had discovered amidst such a life, was to grant peace to her sisters' hearts. —Hence, performing the duties of the Featherrun Sisters was the meaning in Ornea's existence.

Elsa: "How pitifully lovely. Even though you're this…"

Ornea: "This… this what?! Don't tell me you were about to say "this small"?!"

Elsa: "I hadn't said it, though…"

Ornea: "Your eyes said it loud and clear! You're absolutely lacking in respect towards your elder sister! Really now!"

Pouting her reddened face, Ornea gazed down at Elsa, the latter sitting on the ground.

In the time that they had conversed, Elsa's body had completed its restoration. To compensate for all the blood she had lost, pulsations of hematopoiesis could be felt within her body. The principle was unclear. However, since it was convenient, that did not matter to her.

Ornea: "How many people you think could manage something like that, I wonder?"

Elsa: "—?"

Ornea: "It's nothing. More importantly, pick a weapon. If you can't master a weapon that suits you, then no matter how tough we may be, we won't stand a chance against the fearless veterans who've fought countless battles."

Elsa: "Will we ever trade blows with such opponents?"

Ornea: "It's not impossible… There are times when we'll need to face Temple Knights too, after all."

Listening to Ornea's awe-inspiring words, Elsa gazed at the weapon rack mounted to the wall.

This training ground for the sisters was fashioned with many installations to serve that purpose. That included the environment which they were free to tarnish as they pleased, as well as the provision of countless weapons.

Among those weapons, Elsa, as if being guided to it, picked out a baleful dagger,

Elsa: “—As I thought, blades really do feel the most familiar in my hands.”

3

—Exactly as Ornea had hoped, Elsa had favorably adapted to her role as a Curse Doll, and as a Featherrun Sister.

???: “—Gather, Featherruns.”

The deathly voice of Holosseo signaled the arrival of work for the Featherrun Sisters.

The sisters bore no means to refuse Holosseo’s words. As a seemingly unspoken rule between a Curse Doll and their maker, that was an insurmountable wall.

Holosseo: “Sithonia, Ornea, come forth.”

On any given mission— following directives from elites ranked even higher than Holosseo in the Church of the Holy King, Holosseo would appoint the ones most suitable among the sisters who had gathered.

In such instances, the ones most often called upon were, naturally, the eldest and second daughters. An overwhelming amount of the time, it was Sithonia and Ornea. Sometimes, Saria and Hildea would also tag along, and that went for the greenhorn Elsa as well, though she was a world of difference away from the top two.

However, in Elsa’s cases, she was frequently taken along on Ornea’s request to accompany her on her missions. Just as she had mentioned in the underground, Ornea had high hopes for Elsa’s aptitude as a Featherrun Sister. Through her actions, she had proved that those were her true feelings, bereft of falsehood.

Elsa could not determine whether that meant the frequency of enemies emerging against the Gustekan Church was high or low.

Elsa: “Well, I suppose it’s much better than being neglected due to there being no enemies at all.”

And, Elsa’s thoughts included sentiments towards the fact that, outside of when he came to order the sisters on these missions, she never saw Holosseo at the mansion.

Unless it was an emergency, Holosseo would not sojourn at the mansion. In other words, this grand estate was only inhabited by Elsa and her other sisters most of the time.

Elsa: “So, I think it would save us time in our daily cleaning if we closed down the parts of the mansion that nobody uses, but what do you think?”

???: “…”

Elsa: “It’s silly to keep on thoroughly cleaning rooms that nobody even goes to. Well, I’m unable to perform such meticulous work, so it’s not like any time would actually be saved for myself.”

???: “…You’re being noisy.”

Elsa: “Oh my.”

Calling out to the back that was carefully proceeding forward, she was then scolded by its owner, who had halted their step.

Turning around to face Elsa, who had instinctively closed her mouth, Dorothea wore a displeasured expression. With her favored great shears held in one hand, her acute gaze stabbed into Elsa.

Dorothea: “…Why are you following me?”

Elsa: “If you ask me why, I guess my only response would be because I have time off. Even if I wanted to take a nap, I already overslept, so I’m not really tired. But on the other hand, it’s probably unhealthy to just absently-mindedly do nothing, right?”

Dorothea: “…Then work!”

Elsa: “Sithonia got fed up with me. She says I can’t be trusted with housework in the mansion.”

Elsa’s lack of talent, which rampaged across all kinds of domestic chores, absolutely decimated Sithonia’s theory of education; as Sithonia was in charge of the property, she issued a decree that forbade Elsa from engaging in any tasks.

Hence, as long as Elsa was in the mansion, her position was decided on being a parasite who laid down as she watched her other sisters work.

Dorothea: “…You don’t have any doubts about that?”

Elsa: “It’s up to destiny to decide what we are and aren’t cut out for. Even if I complain, nothing would come of it. Ah, of course, I do find it vexing, you know? That’s why…”

Dorothea: “…That’s why?”

Elsa: “For all the work I can’t do at the mansion, I intend to endeavor in my duties, get it?”

In most cases, she was just a bonus on top of Ornea, but she would not cut corners in her duties.

She had not thought much about it, but this service to the Church—the act of killing people, was not something that Elsa had any particular reluctance to. She was suited for it. At least more than she was to domestic chores.

However, hearing those words from Elsa, Dorothea’s expression shifted. It had not simply become pregnant with ire towards Elsa, but rather—

Elsa: “You’re getting mad in quite the strange way, aren’t you? Are you perhaps angry at yourself?”

Dorothea: “—Hk.”

Elsa: “Apologies, I just perceived that sort of scent. I could detect it before as well, but I’ve been particularly good at picking up on it since getting this body. —After all, people emit all sorts of scents as they live their lives.”

For indignation, for sorrow, and for delight, there existed scents of indignation, of sorrow, and of delight.

Though they may not have strictly been smells, Elsa’s nose was capable of discerning them with a high level of precision. It perceived not only the emotions of people, but was also alert to changes in atmosphere.

The fact that Elsa had survived until today was in no small part thanks to being saved by this sense.

Elsa: “That’s why, deception won’t work on me.”

Dorothea: “…S-So, what are you trying to say?”

Elsa: “—? Nothing in particular? It’s just, I thought it, so I said it. If you don’t want to talk about it, you don’t have to, and if you do want to tell me, feel free to do so. As I’m sure you’re aware, I am quite free at the moment.”

Dorothea: “…”

Without showing diffidence, Elsa spoke as she opened the door to a nearby room.

The modest guest room was equipped with minimal furniture, so Elsa sat down in one of the chairs, turned around back towards the door, and tilted her head.

Peering inside from the entrance, Dorothea was taken aback by Elsa’s attitude, but eventually, she entered the room at a slow pace and sat down in front of Elsa.

And then—

Dorothea: “…I don’t get called out on missions, after all.”

Having placed her great shears upon her lap, Dorothea muttered regarding her own position.

Listening to that comment, Elsa slightly raised her eyebrows. Then, narrowing her eyes as if mulling it over for a bit,

Elsa: “Now that you mention it, it does certainly feel that way.”

Dorothea: “…Had you not noticed?”

Elsa: “Something like the number of times we get summoned isn’t something I can grasp through smell. And though I’m not proud of this, I have rather poor memory. Even Father’s face is a bit of a haze, since I don’t see him frequently.”

On top of seldom appearing at the estate, they did not spend much time together even when he did turn up, so Holosseo’s face within Elsa’s mind was quite fuzzy.

If she were told to draw a portrait of him, it did not seem like she would be able to draw anything specific save for those two conspicuous cavities— the abyssal sockets, shorn of eyeballs.

And, listening to Elsa’s candid thoughts,

Dorothea: “…Do not belittle our esteemed Father.”

Elsa: “…”

The unclasped blades of the great shears ensnared Elsa’s white neck in a show of force.

Getting a whiff of the frigid fragrance of rust, Elsa thought back to the time this sort of thing had happened before. And, that had happened just after she had been brought to the mansion for the first time.

Elsa: “Come to think of it, weren’t you angry about the same thing back then too?”

Dorothea: “…You really don’t reflect on your actions, do you?”

Elsa: “I’m the type that doesn’t look back on the past, I wonder if that might be a cool way to cover up the fact that I have poor memory? What do you think?”

Dorothea: “—Hk.”

Perhaps due to that response not being to her liking, the pressure of the shears intensified a degree further, lightly cutting into Elsa’s neck. There was a faint sensation of blood flowing, but no trepidation found residency in Elsa’s eyes.

And, that was not because she underestimated the possibility of her head being lopped off.

Elsa: “Unlike back then, I don’t think I’ll die even if you cut my head off?”

Dorothea: “…No matter how much of a Curse Doll you are, regeneration has its limits.”

Elsa: “Ah, that’s indeed what it seems like. Sithonia also told me that. But still, I don’t think I’d die just from having my head cut off… And even supposing I did…”

Dorothea: “…Supposing you did?”

Elsa: “If you killed your little sister on a whim, wouldn’t Father get mad at you?”

Dorothea: “…”

Of course, those fears and apprehensions would have also been present within Dorothea. Holding her breath in frustration, she slowly withdrew her great shears. Gently, she touched the wound torn open by the shears. The drops of blood moistened her fingers, but the wound in question had already closed up, and was no longer anywhere to be found.

Dorothea: “…Your healing, is fast.”

Elsa: “It’s the same for Ornea, isn’t it? Is yours different?”

As Elsa tilted her head, Dorothea pursed her lips and did not answer. Picking up on the scent of shameful emotions slightly leaking out, Elsa shrugged her shoulders.

Elsa: “Come to think of it, you seem to like Father a considerable amount.”

Dorothea: “…You’re able to tell?”

Elsa: “Out of all the sisters, you’re the one who says esteemed Father, esteemed Father the most. I’d figure it out even if I didn’t want to. Ah, “even if I didn’t want to” is just a figure of speech. I don’t have any particularly negative feelings on the matter.”

Dorothea: “…That’s because, Father chose me.”

Lying prone as she hugged her knees, Dorothea muttered in a feeble manner. Then, she softly placed her fingers upon her own throat. — Upon the throat that produced a hoarse, crone-like voice.

Dorothea: “…It’s a strange voice, isn’t it?”

Elsa: “It is quite distinct. Since it differs from the impression given by your appearance, I was a bit surprised.”

Dorothea: “…I crushed it myself… I drank boiling water.”

As if the memories from that moment had not faded, discord and despair filled Dorothea’s eyes.

Drinking boiling water. Just how agonizing that was, was something that even Elsa, lacking in the ability to visualize things, could imagine. It could not be simply expressed as pain, it was likely the anguish of hell.

Her tongue and gums were hideously scalded, her throat and esophagus were torn to shreds. The burns solidified in a crooked form, and the young girl’s throat would have been transformed into a disastrous state that could not be healed.

And, that she herself had desired it, was the truth behind Dorothea’s husky voice.

Dorothea: “…Whenever I was hit, or wounded, they liked it when I cried out in a shrill voice.”

Before Elsa could even ask why she had done such a thing, Dorothea responded with haste. Hearing that answer, Elsa immediately understood with an “Ah”.

Elsa: “There certainly are quite a lot of owners who enjoy the crying voices of children. I also have such memories.”

Dorothea: “…You, too?”

Elsa: “Indeed. But then again, I never really cried much so it seemed like they didn’t like me. I guess I’m quite lacking in charm. I’ve always been like that.”

Even if there were times when she was purchased from her slavers, in most cases, things generally ended with Elsa being unable to satisfy the buyer’s wants. Each time that happened, the slaver seemed to be at a complete loss regarding what to do about the returned Elsa, but as for that, this mansion now seemed quite comfortable for her.

This was the first time she had ever remained in one place for so long.

Elsa: “In that sense, I suppose this could even be said to be my very first home.”

Dorothea: “…”

Elsa: “Is something the matter?”

Dorothea: “…That, is Father’s kindness.”

Turning her face away, Dorothea sharply muttered. Within Elsa’s mind, Holosseo and the word “kindness” were quite divorced from each other, but she would not touch upon that here.

If there was one thing that she had taken away from the conversation until now—

Elsa: “Dorothea, you destroyed your own throat. And because of that, you were thrown out… then afterwards, you were picked up by Father? You’re grateful for that.”

Dorothea: “…That’s why, I want to be useful to Father. But…”

Elsa: “Even though the reason you met Father was destroying your throat, it’s ironic for your ruined throat to be the reason why you can’t be useful to him. Which way would have been better, I wonder?”

Likely, that worry endlessly continued to repeat within Dorothea’s mind.

Without needing to be told, Elsa knew that Dorothea cursed her throat, only capable of producing a hoarse voice. However, it was also the truth that if not for that, Holosseo would have never been able to add her to the Featherrun Sisters. In that case—

Elsa: “Even with that throat, I think it would be more constructive to think of ways to be useful.”

Dorothea: “…To be useful, even with this throat?”

Elsa: “Indeed. That’s right… if speaking will make you appear strange, why not take on missions that do not require speaking? If you just remove your voice, then I think your appearance is just right, Dorothea.”

Dorothea: “…Just right.”

Elsa: “Isn’t it just ideal to throw an opponent off their guard?”

With her blue hair tied into twintails, the appearance of the short Dorothhea was as lovely as an angel.

The husky voice that greatly betrayed that impression was the source of her inferiority complex, but then she just ought to conceal it in front of people who would dislike it.

A sweet little girl with no voice; she could easily keep up appearances of such a kind.

Elsa: “I’ll say this now, but while there are requests for girls who will cry out in a shrill voice, there are also requests for girls who will not make a sound no matter what is done to them.”

Dorothea: “…You.”

Elsa: “No matter what it is, there’s a way to make use of it, right? And you can give up at any time.”

An ability that could adapt to any place, and to anything, such a thing was far more rare. Most people would have no choice but to make use of what they had, and accomplish everything at extremities of ingenuity.

It was merely a matter of Elsa having Elsa’s own strengths, and Dorothea having Dorothea’s own strengths.

Elsa: “Even if you can’t do things like Sithonia or Ornea, it doesn’t mean that you have no worth. I think you’d definitely be able to live more comfortably if you don’t get a mistaken idea there.”

Dorothea: “…”

Elsa: “Well, I quite like the garden you tend to, so I don’t mind how things currently are.”

Added on right at the end, were Elsa’s honest feelings towards Dorothea.

Hearing that, Dorothea widened her eyes in surprise, and after keeping silent for a bit,

Dorothea: “…I had thought, that you were surely an idiot.”

Elsa: “That’s quite upsetting. It’s just that I’m not very good at thinking. It’s also true that I’m better at taking action than thinking.”

Dorothea: “…That’s why I thought you were an idiot… No, I’ll revise it. I don’t like you, but you’re not an idiot.”

Shaking her head, Dorothea gave such an evaluation of Elsa.

Standing up with her great shears in hand, she headed to the door to exit the guest room.

Her steps appeared to be lighter than they had been before the preceding conversation.

Dorothea: “…Thank you.”

Elsa: “—?”

Dorothea: “…Idiot.”

Not understanding the meaning of those thankful words, the confused Elsa was left with a disparaging comment. Watching that back as it exited the guest room, Elsa was left in the chamber by herself.

Elsa: “Thank you, hmm… Fufu, it’s been a while since anybody has given me their thanks.”

Even if she searched through her recollections, no memories of being told thank you by somebody easily rose to the surface. Thinking that to be a sign of her droughtful life, Elsa smiled with faint melancholy.

To receive gratitude in regards to discussing one’s troubles was truly like an exchange between sisters.

Thinking about such things, Elsa let out a small gush.

Certainly, if she could experience such feelings, then she might as well give her thanks to Holosseo.

4

???: “It seems like you said something to that girl. Thank you, Elsa.”

Elsa: “Oh my, that’s a second time now.”

???: “—?”

Elsa: “Nothing, just talking to myself. Please forget about it.”

Ignorant to the meaning of that response, Sithonia widened her eyes, to which Elsa waved her hand.

She had just recently thought that it had been a long while since anybody told her thanks, so she was surprised that it had happened a second time without much of an interval between.

Unable to share in Elsa's surprise, Sithonia continued with "No matter",

Sithonia: "I always lose my bearings when I talk to you, so I have given up trying to understand everything."

Elsa: "Indeed, I think that's a good idea. After all, nobody is capable of fully understanding someone else."

Sithonia: "I did not intend on engaging in such an intellectual discussion, though…"

Elsa: "Oh my, is that so?"

As Elsa expressed disappointment in her expectations having been betrayed again, Sithonia sighed. Then, she continued, "I was referring to Dorothea".

Sithonia: "In the time that myself and Ornea were not present, you spoke to that girl, correct? For a long time now, I had known that she was regretful about not being sent out on missions, however…"

Elsa: "Just because you're the eldest daughter doesn't mean that you can understand everything. Besides, all I did was just make the appropriate interjections in my talk with Dorothea. "

Sithonia: "Thanks to those appropriate interjections, it seems that girl has taken on more of a constructive outlook."

Rather than out of modesty, Elsa truly had no awareness that she had been providing advice. Sithonia understood that, and went even further to extend her gratitude.

According to what Sithonia was saying, when she and Ornea returned from their mission and were greeted by Dorothea, it seemed like she had sought counsel regarding duties that even she could fulfill. If speaking would arouse suspicion, perhaps she could participate in duties where she would not have to do so; she must have enquired so.

Sithonia: “Though, she had tried to conceal who exactly had suggested that idea to her.”

Elsa: “…Ah, I see. In that case, wasn’t there also a possibility that it wasn’t me?”

Sithonia: “If it was not you, it would have been Saria or Hildea, correct? However, those two would not give advice to Dorothea… nor to any of the sisters, at that. They are satisfied with their connections existing solely between the two of them.”

That slightly thorny phrasing was proof that Sithonia was at a bit of a loss with what to do about those twins. Perhaps having also realized that she had used rather strong words, Sithonia’s cheeks slightly stiffened, and she continued with “Anyhow”,

Sithonia: “I think that Dorothea’s eagerness to participate in missions is a good sign for her… Though, Ornea might not be too happy about it.”

Elsa: “I suppose that’s right. Ornea wants to do everything on her own, after all.”

Sithonia: “…I shall make no comment.”

As Elsa spoke of a slightly misconstrued version of Ornea’s thoughts, Sithonia decided against touching upon it.

That being the case, it seemed like Sithonia had not been told Ornea’s true intentions, but it also seemed like she had her own way of guessing what her younger sisters were thinking.

Elsa: “So then? If that was the only reason you stopped me, I shall be going now.”

Sithonia: “Do you have any urgent matters?”

Elsa: “Ornea has returned, right? If so, I want to get in some practice underground.”

A fight to the death between sisters— nay, a fight to destruction, was the quickest method to amass more skill with this body.

For that purpose, practicing with Ornea, who would demolish her without holding back, was that from which Elsa could gain the most. Even if she trained by herself, she would immediately get tired of it.

Sithonia: “…How fervent. However, before that.”

Elsa: “—?”

Sithonia: “There is something I want to give you, Elsa. Will you accept it?”

As she said that, Sithonia gently presented something to Elsa.

It was a small pouch that could fit in one’s palm. Its opening was bound with a string, and inside was placed something small and round, a faintly sweet fragrance adrift.

Sithonia: “It is something akin to a handmade talisman. A gift from me. I give them to all the sisters… and finally, I was able to get one ready for you as well.”

Elsa: “A talisman… is it something related to the Church of the Holy King?”

Sithonia: “No, I simply made it because I wanted to give it to you. I suppose you could view it as proof of our sisterhood.”

Sithonia smiled bashfully, and taking the charm from her hands, Elsa closely examined it. Although she claimed it was handmade, it was crafted by Sithonia, who was skilled at housework, thus ensuring it lacked the usual imperfections of handmade items.

It was light. Likely it would not serve as an obstruction if she kept it in a pocket. While she ascertained the feeling of the talisman in her palm, Elsa abruptly smiled at Sithonia.

Elsa: “I wonder, does this mean I’m finally considered as one of the sisters?”

Sithonia: “It is nothing so presumptuous… The moment that Father deemed you acceptable was the moment you became one of the Featherrun Sisters.”

Slightly casting her eyes down, Sithonia answered so, causing Elsa to furrow her eyebrows.

Sithonia’s words rang in a somewhat negative manner. However, rather than signifying that she did not want to accept Elsa as a sister, that was—

Elsa: “Do you happen to have some reservations about the Feathrrun Sisters?”

Sithonia: “—. Really, what an intuitive girl you are.”

Elsa: “I wonder, is that meant to be a compliment? It doesn’t really feel like I’m being commended, though.”

Sithonia: “In the sense of you always picking up on the things I do not want you to notice, I suppose so.”

After a brief exhale, Sithonia loosened her lips. It seemed to be taking a long-term perspective, accepting the truth, but compared to before, it appeared brighter.

Sithonia: “Elsa… the kind of Featherrun Sisters that Father desires, are surely girls like you.”

That was a statement lacking in envy, one that felt akin to pity.

That was why, as if it was rushing out of her mouth, Elsa blurted out a question.

Elsa: “Sithonia, are you not grateful to Father?”

Sithonia: “—I am grateful. There is no doubt as to that.”

That reply was so fast that it seemed like she had prepared it in advance. Only, bringing that up would be far too ill-natured, even Elsa thought so.

Elsa: “Everyone has all sorts of things on their mind… I wonder, does that go for Saria and Hildea as well?”

Sithonia, Ornea, and Dorothea all had their own outlooks on the Featherrun Sisters, and on Holosseo Featherrun’s way of being.

Having heard them without needing to ask, Elsa thought to herself.

Elsa: “Since I don’t really have any thoughts on these things, I get the feeling that maybe I’m the weird one.”

Sithonia: “…That is why, I believe you are the one most suited to the Featherrun Sisters.”

Although, she found it upsetting to be told so by Sithonia in such an exasperated manner.

5

In such a vein, the days went by slowly.

They were not days divorced from pain and bloodshed. It was a time that could by no means be called quiet. However, for Elsa, who for a long time had spent every day desperate just to survive, there was nothing stopping her from saying that the majority of her time spent at the Featherrun Mansion was peaceful.

That included the exasperated reaction to her devastating lack of ability for housework from Sithonia.

That included the torment of being torn limb from limb in her training with Ornea.

That included interfering with the inefficient teamwork of the twins, Saria and Hildea.

That included doggedly receiving threats from those great shears when incurring the displeasure of Dorothea.

For Elsa, absolutely all of them were first time experiences. So, unexpectedly, Elsa might have been thinking that it would be nice for that time to go on for longer.

Time that was peaceful to an abominable extent, and monotonous to the point of being lovely.

However, steadily did the footfall of ruin draw near, unwilling to permit Elsa's escape.

That alone was as though to declare it a fate ever incorrigible.

—On that day, too, Holosseo visited the mansion, as he usually did, to make selections for the next mission.

Holosseo: "Sithonia and Ornea. —Dorothea, come forth."

Dorothea: "…Hk, yes."

If anything was out of the ordinary, it was that not only had the names of the eldest and second daughters been called on that day, but also that of the fifth daughter, who had a dear love for her father. Faced with that reality, the fifth daughter must have been greatly delighted.

It was unclear just how much Elsa's advice had contributed to that nomination of Dorothea. Only, seeing how overjoyed Dorothea was at being selected, that seemed to be a trivial matter.

Elsa: "Though, I suppose you would be quite angry?"

Ornea: "…Seeing her like that, I'm not so cold-hearted that I'd say anything unnecessary."

Gazing over as Dorothea frolicked in high spirits, Ornea snorted at Elsa's question.

Even Ornea, who did not approve of her sisters participating in missions, understood that Dorothea had been eager to work for the sake of Holosseo. If Ornea was capable of denying that joy, then she would not have even been making considerations for her sisters in the first place.

Holosseo: “Saria and Hildea. You are assigned to a separate matter.”

Saria: “My oh my, why yes of course.”

Hildea: “We shall comply indeed, my oh my.”

Ignoring the conversation between Elsa and Ornea, Holosseo continued and ordered Saria and Hildea on a job. As the twins respectfully kneeled and accepted, Elsa raised her eyebrows with an “Oh my”.

The fact that five sisters had each been assigned respective missions meant—

Elsa: “I’ll be the only one remaining at the mansion… this, fills me with quite a bit of anxiety.”

Ornea: “You’re saying that on your own?! Don’t actually burn the mansion to the ground before we get back, you hear me?!”

Elsa: “Were you anticipating that? In that case…”

Ornea: “Don’t! Actually! Do it! You hear me?!”

With that reminder from Ornea, Elsa shrugged her shoulders with a half-hearted “Understood”.

However, the fact of the matter was that this was the first time Elsa would be by herself in the mansion. Thinking about it normally, it would be extremely careless to let a girl risen from slavery occupy such a magnificent manse on her own, but it did not seem like Holosseo and his colleagues thought that way.

Of course, at this point, although there was not even the slightest of conceptions that Elsa might steal something valuable and run away.

Sithonia: “Elsa, I believe it will be tough, but I am leaving things in your care.”

Elsa: “You’re telling me to be docile, correct? For the time being, I’ll try to just sleep through as much of it as I can.”

Sithonia: “…I find it quite regrettable that that seems to be the wisest course of action.”

With a wry smile, Sithonia softly stroked Elsa’s black hair. Then, she looked down to the pouch hanging at her chest— looking at the charm identical to the one she had given to Elsa,

Sithonia: “Well then, we shall be going now. Upon thee as well, so be the Silver Affection.”

Elsa: “Indeed. So be the Silver Affection.”

Her hand lightly fiddling inside her pocket, Elsa responded so to Sithonia’s words. And having received that, Sithonia gave a reassured smile and headed out to complete her mission.

Ornea, the twins, and Dorothea too, followed behind the eldest daughter—

Dorothea: “…Elsa.”

Elsa: “Oh my, I’m glad your dearest wish could come true. Do take care as you go on your way.”

Dorothea: “…I’ll, be going now.”

Upon departure, Dorothea gave a small wave of her hand, perhaps as proof of her gratitude.

Even if she did not know her true intentions behind that, Elsa received it with pleasure as she saw her sisters off. With this, she would now be all by herself in this vast mansion.

Elsa: “With that in mind, I feel a teensy bit nervous, but…”

Holosseo: “—O Daughter of Featherrun.”

Elsa: “…”

As Elsa felt shame from those thoughts, a voice akin to a dead man called out from behind her.

When she turned around, standing there was Holosseo. Staring into those hollow eye sockets, Elsa narrowed her eyes, feeling as though she was being accused of mischief.

To merely divulge the necessary information with few words, and assign missions to the sisters, was Holosseo's job. Once that was completed, he would leave the mansion with the sisters as they headed for their mission, and if not, he would always be gone before they knew it. However, today alone, he stayed at the mansion.

For what purpose that had been for, the following words of the cadaverous man would immediately make clear.

Holosseo: "Elsa, for you, too, there exists a duty."

Elsa: "—? Something separate from Sithonia and the rest? That would be…"

Holosseo: "Of course, for the sake of Featherrun. —For the sake, of the Featherrun Sisters."

A reply that directly went straight to the answer was not something that satisfied Elsa's inclination to enjoy the conversation. Though since she was a bit dense, that was actually quite helpful.

Either way, it seemed like Elsa's plan of slothful cravings whilst remaining at the mansion had faced a setback.

She did not mind that being the case, but she was curious about Holosseo's true motives.

Elsa: "Taking the trouble to clear the rest of the sisters out of the mansion… what are you requesting, of me alone?"

Holosseo: "That is a given."

With that brief statement, Holosseo turned his face to Elsa.

No reflection of Elsa was borne in his lightless eyes. However, Elsa could certainly feel it. The gaze Holosseo was directing towards her — nay, that was something closer to hopes or expectations.

The man who obeyed the Gustekan Church, and had his daughters kill people; the man who lived in a manner befitting a dead man with nary a drop of fortune remaining; just what hopes did he see within Elsa?

Holosseo: “—To bring the Feathrrun Sisters, to completion.”

Holosseo’s words seemed to be yearning, pregnant with a faint ardor, and they caused Elsa to tilt her head. Upon her white neck and shoulders, long, black hair gently ran down.

6

—The closing of the curtains on those peaceful days had arrived shockingly abruptly.

???: “—Hk!!”

That wail of lamentation was sorrowful to the point of rending the hearts of all who heard it.

The emotions charged therein belonged to a seemingly youthful maiden, however, the sound that rang out was akin to the husky voice of a crone, one that had been worn out over a long period—henceforth, everyone was privy as to who the owner of the voice was.

???: “Dorothea?! Did something happen?!”

Having just stepped back into the mansion, a shriek struck Sithonia’s eardrums, prompting her to rush to the scene.

The scream rang out of the divine chapel present on the estate. With her devout faith— or rather, with her particularly strong feelings towards the adoptive father who had picked her up, Dorothea always went to the divine chapel after returning from outside to offer a prayer.

This time was no different. Having completed the mission without a hitch, Dorothea felt a certain sort of way about it, now thinking to the future quite proactively. Then, to deal with and report on those emotions of hers, she had headed for the divine chapel. That was—

Sithonia: "—Ah."

Opening the large door of the divine chapel, Sithonia's eyes widened as she stepped inside.

Lagging behind Sithonia, the pair of Saria and Hildea, who had returned to the mansion just a little earlier, and Ornea arrived at the scene. Before them, too, was the sight that had left Sithonia speechless.

Saria: "My oh my."

Hildea: "My my."

Ornea: "This's…!"

Even the twins cracked no jokes, and Ornea's throat froze over. Sithonia was also unable to move from her position right away. That was how devastating of a sight it was.

Deep within the divine chapel, Dorothea was kneeling before the altar, clinging to something. —Leaning against the altar, the contents of his body spilled out onto the floor, was Holosseo, his final breath long passed.

Holosseo Featherrun had died there in cold blood.

Dorothea: "Father… hk, Fatheerrr… wh-why, how…!"

Sobbing, Dorothea clung to his remains without paying mind to the blood staining her. But, no matter how desperately she called out, no will remained in Holosseo's body.

Clear to the eyes of anyone, Holosseo was completely deceased. If this was a body of a Featherrun Sister, there might have been a chance for resuscitation, but—

Ornea: "—Father isn't a Curse Doll. To the end, he was only a doll maker."

Dorothea: "…Hk."

In place of the motionless Sithonia, Ornea was the one to step to the front. With the smallest body of all the sisters, she embraced the wailing Dorothea from behind.

Receiving the embrace alongside those bitter words, Dorothea's throat clogged up. Once again confronting the hard-to-swallow sight before her eyes, Dorothea looked down at her hands.

At the hands that, to a pitifully earnest extent, had been trying to return all that had fallen out back into her father's body.

Saria: "Even so, just what might have happened during the time Hildea and I weren't present?"

Hildea: "I wonder how such a thing could have happened during the time Saria and I weren't present?"

Overlapping their hands, the twins nestled close together and voiced a natural question.

While the sisters were away on their missions, just what had occurred at this mansion, how did it lead to Holosseo being lost in this tragedy, what in the world was the genesis of Dorothea lamenting like this—

Dorothea: "…There's only one thing… it could be."

Ornea: "Dorothea? Ah! Oi, wait a sec, Dorothea!"

Wringing that out like a hex, Dorothea abruptly stood up and shook free from Ornea. Without listening to her elder sister's detaining words, she began her advance with her bloodstained dress. Overpowered by that menacing demeanor, Sithonia made way for her, and she lumbered back to the mansion without hesitation.

Eyes blazing with detestation, the destination she strode towards was a certain room within the estate.

What that room was, all the sisters who lived in this manion knew.

Dorothea: "…Elsahh!"

Kicking open the door as if to demolish it, Dorothea peered inside as deep resentment seeped out from her. Her lovely facial features sullied with malice, Dorothea's gaze pierced both the bed, and the figure of the girl whose name had been called, slowly sitting up as she lay upon it.

Elsa: "Huahh… Dorothea? You've returned? That was quick."

Dorothea: "…"

Elsa: "…To come and see me before you even change clothes, I'm quite surprised."

Tilting her head, Elsa looked Dorothea up and down as she spoke.

Had she mistaken the blood of Holosseo on Dorothea as her having just finished her mission? Whatever the case, it mattered not to Dorothea at the present moment.

Sithonia: "Dorothea!"

Thereupon, the sisters who had lagged a moment behind in exiting the divine chapel caught up. Seeing the two, Dorothea and Elsa, facing off within the room, they all gasped.

Then, as Sithonia grabbed the shoulders of the imposing Dorothea from behind,

Sithonia: "Dorothea! And Elsa too, calm down!"

Elsa: "This is quite the intense and heavy atmosphere. Also, I'm fully intent on remaining calm."

Sithonia: "Elsa! Say not such—"

Superfluous things; Sithonia had been unable to finish her sentence.

Before she could, the sharp blades of the great shears swiveled up, severing Sithonia's arm off from a bit below the shoulder while it was grabbing Dorothea by the shoulder.

Sithonia: "—Eh?"

Dorothea: "…Get out of my way."

At the abrupt show of violence, Sithonia herself, her arm having been severed, did not understand what had happened.

A beat later, blood sprayed out, and as it covered her cheek, Dorothea coldly muttered those words. Sithonia's body shook violently as it collapsed backwards, and Ornea immediately moved to support her body.

Her white arm had fallen down and rolled across the ground, truly just like that of a doll's.

Sithonia: "Ah, AHHHHHH!!"

Ornea: "—Hk! Dorothea, just what the hell do you think you're doing?!!"

As Sithonia shrieked at the belated arrival of pain, Ornea bellowed while supporting her body. She grabbed the fallen arm of Sithonia with one hand, and immediately pressed it back against the open wound.

Since Sithonia had received the abilities of a Curse Doll, her arm would likely reconnect right away. It was something that also happened quite often in training. However, this was a separate matter. A world of difference existed between the two.

In a conflict that did not serve as training, a younger sister cutting off her elder sister's arm was an occurrence that ought not have ever taken shape.

However, without lending an ear to Ornea's appeals, Dorothea remained with her glare trained on Elsa. Then, with the hand opposite to the one holding the great shears, she threw something.

A sound was made as it slid across the floor, and seeing that, everyone's expressions, save for Sithonia, changed.

After all, it was the curved blade that was Elsa's favored weapon—

Dorothea: "…Explain… yourself."

Elsa: “…”

Dorothea: “…Why, was that pierced into Father’s body?”

Within the question from the husky voice, could be inferred the utmost effort to not charge it with any emotions.

Suppressing the urges to pounce at her even at this very moment, Dorothea awaited Elsa’s response.

None but Elsa had been present at the mansion, the weapon that had killed Holosseo had been her favored curved blade, and considering that she had little loyalty towards Father, all the undeniable circumstantial evidence had been assembled, and yet.

And yet, Dorothea awaited Elsa’s response. Then—

Elsa: “—Hm, I wonder why that is. Do you happen to have a clue?”

Dorothea: “ELSAAAAA…!!!”

Hearing Elsa’s usual manner of detached response, Dorothea erupted with indignation.

With a scream steeped with loathing, Dorothea brandished her great shears and closed in on Elsa. With the opened blades, she would clasp down on Elsa’s neck, and send her head flying.

Flicking up the curved blade by her feet with her toes, Elsa took it into her hand and slashed away the incoming attack. The crash of metal against metal disrupted the atmosphere in the room, and the sisters confronted each other head on.

Elsa: “Though, Dorothea, I don’t have any intention of going at it with you…”

Dorothea: “Shut up!! Shut up shut up shut up SHUT UUUUUP…!!”

Along with each of Dorothea’s bellows, the closing of the blades ripped Elsa’s room asunder. The ruthless cutting edge devastated the room, and the bed, the furnishings, and everything else were blown away.

Of course, the interior of the room was not the only thing to receive damage. As Elsa used her single knife to trade blows with Dorothea in a tango of blades, countless wounds were carved upon her body, causing blood to spurt out.

Her skin was gouged in a manner painful to behold, and depending on the wound, some had even reached down to the bone. As her blood spilled, she had her hands full with putting up a resistance, narrowly escaping being sliced asunder.

Despite that, Elsa—

Elsa: “Fufu, ahahahaha!”

Within the room that was not particularly spacious, Elsa trampled the space by kicking off the floor, walls, and ceiling to fly around it as she laughed.

Shedding blood, bearing unsightly wounds, Elsa roared with laughter nonetheless.

Dorothea: “—Hk!”

The cheeks of Dorothea stiffened as she swung her great shears about, the ripple of laughter striking her ears.

Dorothea was the one applying pressure, and the one who held the upper hand. Elsa stood on pure defense, without returning any counterattacks, with no choice but to get hewn up.

From anybody’s perspective, Dorothea’s advantage was not wavering. Even so, even though she did not allow for even a single counterattack, why was it that Dorothea felt as if her heart was being driven into a corner?

Dorothea: “How dare you…”

Do that to Father; Dorothea invigorated her heart with such notions, and attempted to swing her blades toward Elsa.

But, the moment she tried to firmly clasp down on the handles of the great shears, it happened.

Elsa: "—Ah, you mustn't, Dorothea. It isn't good to lie to yourself."

Dorothea: "…"

Elsa: "Aren't you putting in too much strength there?"

Elsa, who had been driven into a corner until then, slipped past the great shears and closed in on Dorothea. As the voice whispered directly into her ear, all the hairs on Dorothea's body stood on edge.

Then, the blade held aloft made its mad dash for Dorothea's nape—

Ornea: "Not happening!"

Elsa: "—Hk."

As a brilliant melody of shrill metal resounded, the kusari-fundo slithered like a snake as it commenced its onslaught. Firmly ramming into Elsa's temple, the young girl of black hair was sent flying with tremendous vigor.

Basking in an attack bereft of restraint, Elsa's body was blown straight to the side. Her slender body smashed through the window, flying outside the mansion.

Ornea: "Tsk! Such impudent movements! You flew out on your own didn't you?!"

Chasing after Elsa as she unexpectedly flew out, Ornea jumped out from the partially destroyed window. Lagging a moment behind, Dorothea similarly followed suit, jumping down from the window.

Sithonia: "B-Both of you, help chase Elsa…"

Left behind in the disastrous scene, Sithonia, sunken down to the floor, issued an order to the motionless twins.

While trying to reconnect her severed arm, Sithonia, her breathing heavy, turned her attention to the shattered window— to the battle that still raged on outside.

Sithonia: "Bring Elsa back alive. At this rate, she will be killed."

Saria: “But but, would that really be such a bad thing?”

Hildea: “Considering what Elsa has done, it can’t be helped. This sort of thing.”

Sithonia: “Enough…! Now go!”

At Sithonia’s command, Saria and Hilden expressed their disapproval. But, as Sithonia’s strong appeal superseded that refusal, the twins exchanged glances, and bitterly obeyed with an “Understoo~d”.

Pinching the hems of each other’s dresses, Saria and Hildea also descended from the window. In such a manner, Sithonia was left alone in the ruinous state of the room, and as she stood up by the window,

Sithonia: “Elsa, why…”

In a voice that amounted to one bereft of sound, she spilled a question that amounted to one bereft of query.

—With no answer given to Sithonia’s musings, the bout of death between the Feathrrun Sisters danced on.

Having leapt out from the mansion, the dress-clad maidens dashed through the well-maintained gardens as they each brandished their own baleful armaments; unfolding was a scramble to rob one another of life.

Dorothea: “ELSAAAAAAAA!!”

Elsa: “I can hear you even if you don’t shout in such a loud voice.”

At that screaming, hoarse weeping of a crone, none could go without feeling a visceral revulsion. This was due to an instinctive sense of aversion towards decline rooted in the very foundation of human nature.

The angel-like appearance of the maiden who had evoked such an impression, now wore an expression akin to a ghoul, a figure slashing with its great shears as if it were a deity of death; it was truly like a poorly crafted caricature that attempted to cram in all the good and evil in this world.

However, the battle continued as a fragment of reality, and with each swing of her great shears, Dorothea scythed down the garden that she had painstakingly tended to, blowing away the flowers, ravaging the whole location.

Ornea: “Can you calm down already, Dorothea?! Don’t rush out on your own! Elsa’s…”

Dorothea: “Shut up, Ornea! You coward! I’ll be the one to avenge Father’s death!”

Ornea: “Nghh…!”

Cursing at Ornea as she tried to provide cover, Dorothea refused the support as she swung her shears. Parrying those great shears with her curved blade, Elsa averted fatal wounds as she headed for the entrance of the Hallowed Land.

The Hallowed Land that surrounded the Featherrun Estate, to the cavern that connected it to the outside world—

Saria: “You can’t, Elsa. That’s not allo~wed.”

Hildea: “We won’t let you go, as per Sithonia’s orders.”

However, as to block Elsa’s path, Saria and Hildea, holding the hems of the other’s dresses, stood in the way. The twins passed their bodies within their Plenilune Cirque— in the center of a blade in the form of an enormous ring, and glared at Elsa from within, adopting lunge stances.

Elsa: “Though, it just looks like it would be hard to move like that…”

Saria: “Hildea and I don’t need your concern.”

Hildea: “Didn’t we tell you? We’ve been practicing, Saria and I.”

Synchronizing their breathing, the twins thrust their Plenilune

Cirque towards Elsa as she approached them. The amount of space that it took up was in itself a weakness, but their skill in maneuvering the Plenilune Cirque along with their might in doing so was immense.

Stopping the blow of the curved blade with minimal movement, they moved their meager body weights to unleash a heavy blow from the blade. Deeming it infeasible to surmount it from head on, Elsa jumped back a great distance— ensnaring her legs was a chain that had been cast out.

Ornea: “This, goddamn stupid IDIOOOOT—!!!”

Her legs caught by the chain, Elsa’s body was hoisted up in a tremendous manner.

Just where in her short arms and small figure did all that strength come from? Ornea’s fighting style was intense, and just as had been done to Elsa many times before, her body was easily jostled about. Slammed into a rock face with ferocious vigor, Elsa’s body was relentlessly scraped down by the rocky surface.

Her blood sprayed, her flesh was gouged, and her viscera spilled out. With a sensation that even the contents of her head were spilling out from a crack that had formed, Elsa felt an illusion as if her mass was dramatically decreasing— no, as reality would have it, she was directly undergoing the experience of herself waning.

If things continued like this, and she were slammed into the ground unable to do a thing, she would become unable to launch any counterattacks.

Hence, Elsa made her decision right away.

Elsa: “…”

Taking a full swing with the knife that barely still remained in her right hand, she severed off the right leg that had been caught in the chains; with the sacrifice of her leg, she broke free from the binding of chains.

Maintaining that immense vigor, her body was sent flying. Elsa cleared the garden, and was headed for the rear garden of the estate. If escaping through the cavern was infeasible, Elsa had no choice but to go with Plan B.

That was—

Elsa: "—The water well."

The bottom of this deep water well was not spring water, but was connected to an underground vein of water. The water in the well was cold, and the vein itself was probably dark and narrow, but it should be possible to slip through.

Though, she had certainly never expected that she would actually end up using it.

Elsa: "Ah, that hurts."

Falling on the gravel of the rear garden, Elsa hummed to herself as her skin scraped off.

Copious amounts of blood gushed out from her right leg, and it was more difficult to locate anywhere on her skin that had not been wounded. Regardless of having reached such a state, any notions of giving up were nonexistent within Elsa.

Prowling on all fours, she commanded her arms and legs as a beast would in order to reach the water well. It was a move unforeseen by Ornea and the rest, thus their pursuit had been unable to catch up.

However, Dorothea stood as the lone exception to this, blazing with deep red hatred toward Elsa.

Dorothea: "ELSAAAAAAAA!!"

Right when she was one step away from the water well, a blow from Dorothea perforated Elsa from directly above; the great shears impaled her slender torso, pinning her to the ground.

That instant, Elsa twisted her body, spinning around so that the great shears piercing her body would tear her up. The sharpness of the shears shredded up her flesh and innards, parting her upper and lower body from each other.

Dorothea: "—Hk."

Even Dorothea's eyes widened in surprise at the nature of violence in Elsa's conduct. And, with Dorothea's movements having come to a complete stop, Elsa swung the curved blade in her right hand towards her.

The sinister edge of the curved blade utilized its weight and momentum to cleanly chop the head off of that slender neck.

Elsa's body had been split between top and bottom, and Dorothea's head had bidden a farewell to her torso. —As that wretched spectacle of blood was birthed, the conflict between the two sisters came to a close as they visibly brought destined death upon each other.

Riding the vigor of having gyrated her body, Elsa proceeded to descend down into the water well. Witnessing that, Dorothea's chopped-off head wore an anguished expression as it rolled down onto the ground.

A second later, when the sound of splashing water reached the surface, Ornea and the twins reached the back garden.

Ornea: "Nghaa…! Dorothea! Don't you fall asleep yet! I'm gonna attach your head back now!"

Seeing the body part that had fallen, Ornea grimaced and picked up the severed head. She hurried to line it up with the wound on Dorothea's neck, and the healing abilities of the Curse Doll began to close it up.

For a moment, as Dorothea maintained a distant gaze, she regained her breath from the healing with a "Kehough".

Dorothea: "Ghagh! Gohkugh! …E, lzah, iz…"

Ornea: "Alrighty, settle down! Deep breaths! I'll let you off the hook for those rash remarks towards me just before! For the time being, you need to rest! As for Elsa…”

As Dorothea violently coughed up blood, Ornea stroked her back and looked at the water well right in front of them. Gazing down into the depths of that well were Saria and Hildea, who had likewise caught up.

Having pursued the trail of blood, the twins looked down into the water well that Elsa’s upper body had plunged into,

Saria: “As far as Saria can see, Elsa’s nowhere to be found on the water’s surface. What about Hildea?”

Hildea: “As far as Hildea can see, there’s no sign of Elsa floating there. What about Saria?”

Hearing the judgements of the pair, Ornea grit her teeth.

Leaving everything below her chest behind, Elsa had descended into the well. If it were Dorothea, Saria, or Hildea, that damage would have been fatal, but in Elsa’s case, that was yet unknown— it was largely uncertain if merely stripping her of her limbs and torso would be enough to completely thwart her ability to function.

Ornea: “At the very least, if she can operate on the same level as me…”

For it not to mean the end, even when reduced to being merely a head, was the pinnacle of ability for Curse Dolls.

Of course, once reduced to a mere head, it should be impossible to do anything even if consciousness was not lost.

Ornea: “The well should be connected to an underground vein of water, but it’d be useless to try and slip outside from there. It’s ultimately just spring water, so even without her lower half, there wouldn’t be any path for her to pass through.”

Perhaps it would be a different story if she had Ornea’s herculean strength or Saria and Hildea’s Plenilune Cirque, but the current Elsa had no means of breaking through bedrock. Ergo, this struggle was futile.

Henceforth, with full preparations, Ornea and the others hastened to the underground waterway to retrieve their youngest sister. And following the flow of the water, upon reaching its terminus, they understood.

Ornea: "…As ever, she's a frightening girl."

At the terminus of the well, Elsa was nowhere to be found. What was there, however, was a vast amount of blood, and scattered chunks of flesh. The reason for that was a passage of water so narrow that it would be impossible for a human body to get through.

However, without passing through it, Ornea and the others would have caught up, and she would have met her demise. That was why, Elsa had made herself small and passed through this narrow water escape route.

Likely, based on the size—

Dorothea: "…With just her head."

Ornea: "Even if it came to that, Elsa could still be able to move. Might've been a gamble on her part, but… in truth, if she made it out then it doesn't matter. She's tough."

Life force that exceeded all norms— in this case, rather than her talents as a Curse Doll, Ornea was praising her mental fortitude to do anything in order to survive, and then she heaved a sigh.

She had been unable to fulfill Sithonia's order. She had failed to bring Elsa back.

Ornea: "Unleash the hounds, have them pursue Elsa… Though I doubt she's dumb enough to be caught by them."

Dorothea: "Father, I will…"

Firmly gritting the teeth that had just been smashed in, Dorothea muttered in a loathsome manner, audible to all the sisters.

Each of them had their own thoughts on the matter. But, there was one sentiment consistent among them all.

—In the name of the Featherrun Sisters, the youngest sister who had gotten away must be slain.

7

Fangs stabbed into neck, slurping up blood.

The body of the opponent, which had been furiously writhing in resistance until a moment prior, thereupon was voided of all strength.

Elsa: “How charming.”

As she spoke with blood smeared all around her mouth, Elsa scrupulously sucked on her opponent’s wound.

The hound, clad in long black fur, was one that had been raised in the breeding pen of the Featherrun Estate. Looking after the animals was the duty of Saria and Hildea, but Elsa, who had displayed catastrophic capability as a caretaker, could clearly be said to have a poor affinity with them.

However, they had located the escaped Elsa in this heavy snowfall rather quickly, and to her, who no longer possessed anything but a cranium and right shoulder, they had delivered fresh blood.

But then again, the hound would have wanted to kill Elsa, and bring her back to her sisters. Since she had not been able to allow that desire to be fulfilled, she would at least sink her teeth in so as to not let its flesh go to waste.

The body of Elsa, turned into a Curse Doll, possessed such restoration and life force that generally no objection could be made to the claim that she was immortal. Be that as it may, she was reaching the limit of how much destruction she could take. In order to regenerate, the corresponding recompense was required, and so to put it broadly, eating well was important.

In that regard, it was the first time she had lost the vast majority of her body save for her arm and head like this, and she felt a light excitement at the fact that she would not die even if pushed this far. Even if she slurped up this corpse, the stomach and organs where it was supposed to reach had been left behind, so just what would end up happening?

But, as a matter of fact, Elsa's body did gradually begin to regenerate, and her freedom once lost returned.

Elsa: "…It doesn't seem like I'll be able to stick around for too long."

It was a matter of course, but if she did not get a move on, the next hound would sniff her out. She had just killed one of them, so the next hounds would be more cautious. Which of the sisters were accompanying them?

No matter how competent Elsa might be, if she clashed with her sisters in this state, it was exceedingly difficult to imagine making it out alive.

Elsa: "As expected, four on one is quite the tall task."

To begin with, Elsa's strength was absolutely no match for Ornea. In a situation where she understood she could not win against her alone, there was no way she could win against her with the other sisters in tow.

That was why, heaving a brief white exhale, Elsa stood up with her trembling bare figure.

Before she had noticed, she had restored enough of her body to have no impediments in the way of moving. Nevertheless, her clothes would not regenerate. In the midst of the zenith cold, a death by glaciation would be imminent if she did not move with haste.

The body in which a curse indeed dwelled, and the lone curved blade that had worked to the fullest to help her survive. With naught else, Elsa stepped out with bare feet amidst the snow.

To her rear, somewhere generally to her rear, was the Featherrun Estate— leaving behind all the days she spent at that Hallowed

Land, Elsa Featherrun continued to wander aimlessly through the snow.

Chapter 3:
Dorothea Featherrun

1

Oliver Zeppes was but a humble slaver.

In the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko, the slave trade was officially a prohibited market, and was by no means an occupation that operated in the light of day. But, for Oliver, to be a slaver was his calling in life.

In the cruel lands of Gusteko, there was always high demand for slaves as a labor force. Thus, most slaves went without receiving an education, and lacked any life skills outside of physical labor.

That was why Oliver believed, from the bottom of his heart, that the occupation of a slaver, facilitating fateful encounters between slave and buyer to benefit both sides, was a business that could bring happiness to many people. While strictly forbidden by the Gustekan Church, it was a job that proved better at saving those who could find no salvation in the Chrurch's teachings.

If anything, instead of the Church of the Holy King, which governed the Holy Kingdom, it was the slavers that saved more people.

That was the philosophy of Oliver Zeppes, his pride, and his conviction— endeavoring in the honest work of the slave trade, he attached prices to people as a slave trafficker.

All the while, he wished for the happiness of all people involved with the slave trade, and even greater happiness for himself.

And yet—

Oliver: "Wait wait wait wait, wait for just a bloody second a'ight! Wh-Wh-What the hell d'ye think ye're doing showing back up 'ere again?!"

The lighting of the town had fallen to dusk, and within a room illuminated by the meager flame of a candle, Oliver's face went pale, and a cold sweat ran as he shuddered.

After finishing up work for the day, he had gone out for a nice drink and had just returned to his home.

Though he did not want to brag, today he had handed over a slave to an elite, high-paying customer, and had successfully secured a firm transaction. The slave that had been purchased was a girl capable of reading and writing. If what awaited her was a merchant family, then she would be treated properly, and would likely be able to one day buy back her freedom.

As long as she had work, she would not lose her food allowance. For slaves, the rations to live from day to day were exceedingly important.

He had returned to his room whilst humming in such jovial spirits, right when he was about to jump onto his bed thinking he would probably have good dreams tonight, Oliver happened across her.

Seated on Oliver's bed, was a black-haired girl, wearing a sweet smile on her face— a commodity formerly belonging to Oliver's inventory, rife with issues, she had been naught but dead stock.

Oliver: "E-E-Elsaaa?!"

Girl: "It's been a while, hasn't it, Oliver? You reek of alcohol, have you been drinking too much, I wonder?"

As Oliver stared in shock, the young girl— Elsa, inclined her head. Seeing her bare white shoulders, her braid of black hair flowing down, Oliver's throat croaked.

Bereft of lechery, the reason for that was founded in pure dismay, likely an unpleasant dread.

All of his pleasant tipsiness had been blasted straight out the window from the impact of this reunion.

Oliver: "I-I don't ever remember ye being cautious of me drinking b'fore. But, more importantly! Answer me damn question! Fuck're ye doing 'ere?! D-Don't tell me…"

Elsa: "Fufu, what do you think the reason is?"

Oliver: "Don't be telling it like a riddle! Ahh, bloody hell, what'd I do to deserve this!"

Holding his head, Oliver cursed his own misfortune, and even cursed Elsa while he was at it. The fact that she was already beyond help by the time he cursed her, was the worst thing about this dead stock girl.

After all, Oliver had been acquainted with this girl named Elsa ever since he had been a novice slaver, right when he first entered the slave trade—

Oliver: "This marks the thirteenth time! Ye've gone 'n come back to me place now thirteen bloody times! Each time ye're bought, the buyer always meets their doom… y-ye're a plague I tell ye!"

Elsa: “I’m nothing so monstrous. Don’t give me too much credit now, Oliver.”

Oliver: “And ye’ve not even the slightest clue! This isn’t praise! Can’t ye comprehend that?!”

Bellowing at Elsa as she detachedly missed the mark, Oliver fell to his knees. This oafish interaction had helped it finally sink in. Once again, Elsa had returned to Oliver.

—As he had lamented a moment prior, Elsa was a repeat offender of returning to the slave trade after being sold off.

Usually, slaves that had been purchased would scarcely come back into the inventory of their slavers. It was not as though buyers would never request to return the merchandise, but they were mostly always turned down.

The fates of the vast majority of slaves would be decided the moment they were purchased by a buyer. All that remained was how they would live, and how they would die under custody of the buyer. —However, as with everything, there were exceptions.

For instance, if the buyer met an unexpected demise in some shape or form, and the slave then lost any reason for remaining there, they would be sold wholesale back to the slavers at a low price.

For such reasons, returning to being commodities in the form of slaves, with their tomorrows left uncertain once again, such despairing, ill-fortuned slaves did exist, but this went too far in Elsa’s case.

Oliver: “D’ye have any idea just how much hardship I’d had to go through b’cause of those bloody antics of yours…?! How many times me good name’s been slandered as purposely giving a dangerous slave to buyers to have the master killed and valuables pilfered… And just when I thought I’d finally dispelled all those blasted rumors! “

Elsa: “You were doing such cruel things? That’s no good. You should apologize.”

Oliver: “I’ve not done a smidgen of that! And yet, they all doubt me b’cause of ye!”

For Oliver, who strived to be an honest slaver, such rumors were a fatal wound. Even so, with a face of ignorance, Elsa herself had returned to Oliver after misfortune befell her buyer.

Then, with an expression displaying no shame whatsoever, she spoke.

Elsa: “I’m going to be a burden on you once again, Oliver.”

2

Oliver: “To begin wit’, to begin wit’ I tell ye, wasn’t the buyer this time one o’those big shots up at the Gustekan Church? Tha’s why, I’d thought this time would be it for sure…”

Elsa: “Yes, indeed. I don’t blame you for that, Oliver.”

Oliver: “The Church of the Holy King I tell ye, they’re the damn bastards who decide on the laws of this nation! For the most part, the people in the faction who prohibit the slave trade are the ones who be wanting ‘em the most. ‘Course, ye know, I don’t wanna be discrediting the name of the Church by treating ‘em poorly or something. So then why, whyyyy…!!”

Lying down on his bed with a ruddy face, Oliver gave into despair as he slurped down cheap liquor.

From what Elsa had heard, his dealings had gone well, so it seemed he had indulged in some top quality alcohol before returning home, but it seemed that happening upon her like this had spoiled his mood.

Elsa: “…”

As the spillage of booze soaked his collar, Oliver continued to mutter his complaints. Gazing over him, Elsa narrowed her black eyes, and loosened her lips.

Elsa had now known Oliver for around four years.

Although Elsa herself had not counted each individual time, based on what Oliver said, this was already the thirteenth time that she had returned to him. To say it was a feat made possible by her homing instincts would not necessarily be a joke.

Oliver was a man in his late twenties, characterized by his chestnut hair and delicate features, and for someone involved in the slave trade, he was more gloomy than he was rough-mannered.

In reality, Oliver was not very good at resorting to violence, so it was his loquacious nature, something that had kept him alive until today, the extraordinary eloquence of a silver tongue that served as his defining speciality.

But then again—

Oliver: "That sorta special skill's got bugger all chance of working on people who don't listen to what others say…"

Elsa: "Yes, that seems tough. People who don't listen."

Oliver: "The one I'm talking 'bout is ye! Ye've got not even the slightest understanding of irony, what'm I s'pposed to do 'bout ye now!"

And, that signature move of his, for better or for worse, had never worked on Elsa since a long time ago.

However, Elsa had faith in this boisterous, pessimistic man. That was unquestionably because he had been the sole person to offer his hand to the bloodied girl atop the snow of zenith cold.

If he had not been of a certain kind of good nature, Elsa would have definitely perished.

Elsa: "That's why, I'll choose to count on you whenever I have the chance. If you really need to blame someone then please blame yourself."

Oliver: "Ain't that a phrase ye'd usually say to a bloke receiving retribution for their wrongdoings?! Being cursed even though I do so much good, 's that just mean I'm one of the ultrarich or something?!”

Elsa: “The idea that you’d be hated just for having money; I get the feeling that is a bit biased…”

Without giving a response to Elsa’s murmur, Oliver placed his palms over his face, and groaned for a bit. And, after groaning for a decent while, slowly did he raise his body.

Then, peering at Elsa, sat beside the bed, through the corner of his eye,

Oliver: “…So, what fate b’fell the buyer this time ‘round?”

Indeed, in such a gentle tone he enquired.

That was how he had always dealt with her. After lamenting his heart out cursing his fate, Oliver would then enquire about Elsa’s situation once again; that was how he did things.

In these four years, while he was certainly put through a great deal by Elsa, Oliver would absolutely lend an ear to what Elsa had to say. That said a lot about his methods as a slaver.

That was why, in response to him, Elsa’s answer had not changed even once over these four years.

Elsa: “—It wasn’t really anything of note. The buyer simply met his misfortune.”

Oliver: “…That’d be fine then. Well, it really wouldn’t be good in the bloody slightest, though. Ahh, fuck me, I’d even gone ‘n thought they was a valuable customer ye know?!”

Elsa: “Indeed, you’d think he was a valuable customer. Among all the people who’ve purchased me until now, his place was certainly the most comfortable. That’s why, I also find it regrettable.”

As Elsa spoke of it as if it was a matter detached from herself, Oliver heaved a heavy sigh.

Oliver: “Mind if I ask ye one thing, Elsa?”

Elsa: “What might that be?”

Oliver: “Your collar’s already been removed. That in mind, why’d ye come back to me place? Don’t ye think it’d be nice to go somewhere else for once, wherever that may be?”

Elsa: “By that, do you mean some place I wish to go?”

Oliver: “Yeah, exactly, right on.”

Elsa: “Then, that’s exactly what I intend on doing. That’s why, I came back here.”

Placing her hand to her chest, Elsa spoke thus, causing Oliver to make a bitter face. Once he digested Elsa’s words, prone to sounding like a confession,

Oliver: “That don’t mean ye’ve fallen for me, now does it?”

Elsa: “You mean like sensual love between man and woman? In that case it would be a bit perverse, no? Being sold off by the person you love to somebody else, and going out of your way to return to them each time something happens… how frightening.”

Oliver: “That’s just a fraction of the fear that I feel!”

Shouting in anger once more, Oliver stood up. Gulping down what was left in his bottle, he wiped his mouth and looked up. Upon his visage, no longer did there remain any grievous hue.

Only, his eyes burning with tempestuous determination, Oliver nodded with an “Understood”, and,

Oliver: “For the time being, there’s no helping that ye ended up coming right on back. Looking at it a different way, guess I could see it as me merchandise coming back of its own accord. It’d probably be best to think this an opportunity to make some more money.”

Elsa: “Isn’t it because of those thoughts that rumors spread about you being a corrupt slave trader?”

Oliver: “I don’t wanna be hearing that shite from the primary culprit! Ye should just go live a happy life already!”

Elsa: “…”

Oliver: “Geez, just why d’ye think I work in the slave trade…?”

Placing his hand to his forehead, Oliver spoke in an exhausted manner.

From his mouth were uttered the words “Find happiness”. Those were his true feelings, bereft of falsehood, something he was always bound to say, and something she had heard many times over these four years; this Elsa knew.

Oliver Zeppes was a foolish man attempting to bring happiness to people through the slave trade.

Because he was such a man, Elsa had likely never thought to head to any slaver other than him.

Oliver: “What?”

Elsa: “Even though you have a habit of saying that, I’m wondering if you’re actually going to make me happy soon. I’m getting tired of waiting.”

Oliver: “Ye’re bloody mistaken if ye think the winds o’favor will blow just b‘cause ye wait for it?! I’ll tell ye this now, but if ye don’t put in the effort to become happy, ye’re neva gonna find it, that’s life!”

Spittle flying out as he bellowed, Oliver put his coat back on. Then, turning to face the door, Oliver looked back at Elsa on the bed, and,

Oliver: “I’m ‘bout to stay up all night and revise a sales plan, so just stay put, will ye? Ye’ve already gotten me knackered in a huge mess, so ye better not do anything unless ye absolutely need to!”

With those firm instructions, not permitting any objections, he treaded off with noisy steps. Seeing him off, Elsa shrugged her shoulders, and slid into the bed.

She had expended quite a lot in order to return here. Now she wanted to rest for a bit and recuperate. In that sense, Oliver's attitude of not prying too deep into the situation was a huge help.

Even if that was only because it was his nature to not want to get deeply involved with a hassle, it served as Elsa's salvation.

3

—Then, at the same time that Elsa had closed her eyes for a brief rest.

???: "—Here's all that I could find."

Alongside those words, something made an unpleasant, wet sound as it was thrown onto the table.

That was the carcass of an animal ripped to shreds— a hound bred at the Featherrun Estate, one that had been sent out to pursue a runaway.

Surrounding that carcass, were the sisters of the Featherrun Mansion, where Elsa had lived peacefully for a while. The five sisters, Elsa no longer included among them, came face to face in the dining hall, and looked down upon the carcass.

Ornea: "The rest of the dogs were also killed. It's no mistake to think she's escaped."

Sithonia: "Is there no doubt that she made it through the vein of water under the well?"

Ornea: "A corpse of a hound was discovered at the exit of the vein. I also tried taking the same route, so it's certainly possible to stream out from there… really now."

Having changed into a spare green dress, Ornea heaved a deep sigh.

In order to pursue the trail of their runaway youngest sister, Ornea had slipped through the water vein with the same method. —That was to say, she had reduced her body to the smallest size possible, and had passed through with the water current.

It was a gruesome endeavor, but by relying on her special traits, Ornea went through with the reckless act. Rather, the one more deserving of admiration was Elsa, who had been the first to perform that feat.

Ornea: “Unlike me, Elsa oughta be able to feel pain… and yet to nonetheless cut her own head off her torso like that, there’s no way she’s even the slightest bit sane.”

Sithonia: “But, that girl still did it. How truly becoming of a Featherrun Sister…”

???: “…She is no sister of ours.”

The loathsome conversation between Ornea and Sithonia was bisected by a displeased, husky voice.

Having declared so in a chilly manner, Dorothea glared blanky at the air. The table of the dining hall creaked as she gripped it, all the while she grumbled out her sentiments of deep resentment.

Fierce did hatred swirl in those murky eyes, the runaway Elsa their target.

Saria: “My oh my, seems Dorothea’s in quite the bad mood, Hildea.”

Hildea: “Indeed, Elsa did make a fool of her after all, Saria.”

Giggling, the twins whispered to each other as they observed Dorothea with sidelong glances. Gazing over the exchange of the two younger sisters who did not carry their own weight, Sithonia placed her hand to her forehead, and breathed a sigh.

Ornea: “Sithonia, I can guess how you’re feeling deep down, but what are you gonna do? I’ll say this now, but Father is dead. In that case, our position is…”

Sithonia: “—It would be problematic for the superiors to discover that Father has passed away.”

Sithonia bluntly cut off Ornea’s timid statement. Hearing that, Ornea’s eyes widened, as if having guessed the eldest daughter’s intentions, and nodded.

Ornea: “Roger. I’ve got no objections. In other words…”

Sithonia: “Father is, Holosseo Featherrun is alive and well. Let us proceed with that outline.”

Dorothea: “…Hk! Sithonia!”

Raising an objection to the course of action being established was Dorothea, who had been glaring at the air.

As the sole one among the sisters who had truly loved Holosseo, Dorothea could not accept the cruel conclusion being presented by the eldest and second daughters.

Dorothea: “She, killed Father…! We need to inform the superiors immediately and have the whole Church of the Holy King hunt Elsa down…”

Sithonia: “And then, what will happen once Elsa is found? Once she receives retribution for killing Father, what will become of us? What will become of the Featherrun Sisters?”

Dorothea: “…Hk!”

Sithonia: “Having lost their doll maker, the fate awaiting such obstreperous Curse Dolls is evident beyond a shadow of a doubt. The only thing in store for us, would be an eternal slumber in the vault of sacraments.”

Unbridled aberrations and all the like, were not something that just anyone could control.

Sithonia and the other sisters would be stripped of their freedom, never again would they be able to bask in the light of the sun.

Sithonia: “We cannot afford to allow Father to die. Or perhaps, you would prefer to get revenge on Elsa, and then go arm in arm as sisters as we flee from the Church of the Holy King? Do you desire a never ending life on the run?”

Dorothea: “E-Even so…”

Ornea: “Dorothea, I’ll tell you this now. —I’m in favor of Sithonia’s view. So, if you were to go against that…”

Training a gaze on the persistent Dorothea, Ornea cracked her white knuckles. As that was a declaration she was willing to resort to violence, Dorothea caught her breath.

If she were to throw down against Ornea, the strongest of the Featherrun Sisters, no matter how much Dorothea struggled, she would be squashed, unable to stand a fighting chance; the only outcome was for her views to be forced into submission.

Dorothea: “S-Saria, Hildea…”

Saria: “Are you asking Hildea and I? What a silly-billy you are, Dorothea.”

Hildea: “Of course, Saria and I are in support of Sithonia. There’s simply no helping it, even if it’s tragic.”

Dorothea’s imploring words did not resonate with twins whatsoever. Secluded away in their own world, Saria and Hildea were unperturbed by the matter of Holosseo’s death.

Only, they would find it troublesome for the Church of the Holy King to raise an objection and seal them away. They seemed to share that view with Sithonia and Ornea, and nobody suggested that they try to seek vengeance for Holosseo.

Dorothea: “…F-Father is…”

Sithonia: “We have an obligation to Father. There is no doubt about that. That is why, we shall take suitable revenge. However, that is not something for the Church of the Holy King to do. It is an act, that we shall perform.”

Sympathizing with the quivering Dorothea’s emotions, Sithonia declared so in a quiet tone.

They would plot against the Church of the Holy King and conceal

Holosseo's death. However, that would not be a slight against the creator of the Featherrun Sisters, Holosseo.

Without fail, they would deliver due retribution unto the wrongdoer, Elsa.

Ornea: "For the time being, Dorothea oughta be satisfied with that."

With the assembly of sisters having ended, Ornea spoke out to Sithonia, who remained in the dining hall.

Dorothea, Saria, and Hildea had left their seats, and the only two left in the room were the eldest and second daughters. The two who had known each other the longest would now have to decide on the course of action for Featherrun from here on out.

Holosseo was no longer among them. So for the present—

Ornea: "About getting revenge for Father, you really dead set on doing it? For the sake of Dorothea?"

Sithonia: "…What do you think, Ornea?"

Ornea: "…Well when you put it like that, I guess it's a ploy after all."

Running her fingers through her own green hair, Ornea averted her eyes, a bitter look strewn upon her face. Sithonia did not deny Ornea's words. There was no way she could have.

The dependence that the fifth daughter of the Featherrun Sisters, Dorothea, had on Holosseo, ran deep. If they did not soothe her with such words, Dorothea would not have been able to retain her sanity.

However, in reality, Sithonia had no such intentions of getting revenge for Holosseo. This was not due to coldheartedness, but rather due to prioritizing a more pragmatic issue.

Sithonia: "In order to deceive the superiors, I will need to cram as much of Father's knowledge into my memory as possible. Fortunately, I have had many chances to accompany Father on his work, but…”

Ornea: “It’s not as if you’ve seen all inside his head. Sorry. For that, I’m gonna have to leave everything up to you.”

Sithonia: “That is no problem. Only, I will be counting on you far more than ever before for the missions.”

Ornea: “I agree to that… Though, it’s a duty that I had originally wanted to share with Elsa.”

Folding her short arms, Ornea grumbled those words. Listening to that, Sithonia furrowed her well-shaped brow, and then massaged it with her fingers.

Elsa’s act of violence had been far too abrupt, and since then, all the cogs had begun to fall out of order. Just why in the world had things ended up like this?

Ornea: “Sithonia, I’ll always be on your side.”

As Sithonia was being overwhelmed by cumbrous emotions, Ornea spoke to cheer her up. Clutched in the hand of that younger sister was the proof of sisterhood Sithonia had given her.

A small pouch in which a scented stone was placed, Sithonia had given the same thing to all her sisters. —Elsa was no exception.

Sithonia: “What about that girl’s one…”

Ornea: “It wasn’t in her room or the underground water vein. With this size, she could have probably placed it in her mouth and taken it with her. Perhaps she’s even still got it.”

Sithonia: “…In that case, just what might be her intention?”

She had killed Holosseo, to whom she had a great obligation, and endured pain with fierce determination as she fought a fatal battle against Sithonia and her other elder sisters in order to make her escape, yet had not relinquished her proof of sisterhood.

Was that not already far removed from the boundary between sanity and malevolence?

Sithonia: “—. Regardless, you really do take good care of it, Ornea.”

Ornea: “Ngha! Wh-What are…”

Sithonia: “That pouch, there are traces that you have patched it up many times.”

Given that they had known each other the longest, the proof she had given to Ornea was also the oldest.

Even so, several years had passed since they had become sisters, but it could be said that their relationship was much closer than that of regular sisters.

That was why, no matter the cost, she had to prevent it from collapsing.

Ornea: “Rest assured. It’s not just you and me who have nothing else but this place to hang on to. It of course goes for Dorothea, and even Saria and Hildea as well.”

Sithonia: “…”

Ornea: “Elsa’ll probably also end up realizing before long. When she does, she’ll regret her foolish actions… or, she might even be frightened now.”

Tucking her pouch away, such a possibility came to Ornea’s mind.

Elsa, having no way of knowing the result of the meeting between the sisters, might still think that she was still being pursued even now, experiencing sleepless nights. Perhaps that was something more cruel than just plain revenge.

If she was living in fear of the night like that, it would at least be some consolation for Holosseo.

But, on the other hand, Ornea also thought thus.

Ornea: “If she was a girl capable of something so pitiful, she could've never done this sorta monstrous act…"

Sithonia: "Elsa… I really do not know what that girl is thinking. It is by no means normal to give that impression on a level comparable to Saria and Hildea."

To a greater extent than even Saria and Hildea, who secluded themselves in their own little world, Elsa lived by an incomprehensible philosophy.

Ultimately, the genesis of this situation seemed to be an unbridgeable gap between her and the other sisters.

Sithonia: "Anyway, let us think up another method to successfully convince Dorothea. For now, the utmost priority is for us to surmount this difficult situation as sisters."

Ornea: "Understood… You aren't wrong one bit, Sithonia."

Upon hearing that baseless consolation, Sithonia could be seen with a faint smile on her face. Then, Ornea left her alone in the dining hall, and left the room just like the other sisters had.

Ornea was headed for the divine chapel— the site of Holosseo's death.

To cover up Holosseo's death, his corpse had already been removed from the divine chapel. Since Dorothea had desired it, she had been entrusted with disposing of it.

That was why, beheld in Ornea's eyes, was none other than the divine chapel, blood entirely cleared away, where the putrid odor of death yet hung adrift.

Ornea: "Elsa, just what are you thinking?"

No prayer, no repentance, Ornea merely enquired so of the youngest sister not present, and nothing more.

4

Elsa: "—I'm not thinking about anything."

Biting into a slice of sweet bread lacquered with honey, Elsa gave that answer to the question.

Hearing her response, Oliver's lips greatly distorted, bags under his eyes. His features were well worth seeing, but the unhealthy bags under his eyes, and the crooked curve of his lips greatly harmed that impression.

—The scene was the next morning after Elsa had returned to Oliver, as she enjoyed breakfast together with him.

Oliver had gone out of his way to bring breakfast to the room for her, and it seemed that just as he had declared, he had entered the morning without sleep. Even Elsa could not help but feel guilty for making a full exhibition of her habit of moving around in her sleep in his room. Though, she merely felt guilty, and did not do anything in particular to deal with it.

In any case, the answer she had given at the beginning was a response to the question he had posed.

That was to say—

Elsa: "I barely just escaped and made it back here with my dear life. I'm not thinking about anything like what might happen from here on."

Oliver: "Aye, aye, indeed, of course. Just asking to be sure, ye know? Well, I was just revising all sorts of plans till morn, 'n when I settled down to think 'bout it I just realized that if I didn't check to see what ye actually intend on doing then it might all just go to fucking shite."

Elsa: "Fufu, how careless."

Oliver: "It's your bloody fault!"

Licking the honey off her fingers, Elsa smiled as Oliver shouted at her.

Of course, Elsa recognized that Oliver was working hard. Always putting in his utmost was his virtue. Be that as it may, Elsa felt not even an iota of responsibility.

Giving a sigh at that attitude of Elsa's, Oliver scratched his head with an "Anyway".

Oliver: "Like we've done till now… I won't be able to put ye on the shop display right away. Only once we've ensured that everything's been cut off with the previous buyer."

Elsa: "You're quite familiar with this."

Oliver: "This is already the thirteenth bloody time! I got me doubts that there's any slaver as well versed in reselling a returned slave as I am. The irony!"

Elsa: "What a nasty personality…"

Oliver: "Aren't ye the one who's severed ties with your masters thirteen times?!"

While they were bantering in their usual tone, Elsa bore no objections to the course of action he had devised.

Rather than having faith in his skill as a slaver, she merely had nobody else against whom to compare him. And, even Elsa could agree that it was necessary for her to stay hidden for the time being.

At least, as long as she could not get a clear read on how the Featherrun Sisters would emerge—.

Oliver: "Nevertheless, this time was definitely the longest ye've been gone…"

Elsa:"Indeed… It was around half a year, I suppose? It was a nice place."

Oliver: "I could tell. Ye've also been giving off 'bit of a different air, yeah? How should I put this, ye've quickly become much more womanly."

Gazing over Elsa as she sat with light dressing on the bed, Oliver voiced his evaluation.

In his gaze, no wicked hue of a man was present whatsoever. What was present, however, was the pure eye of a critic, the look of a slaver appraising his merchandise.

Compared to when she first met Oliver, Elsa had grown up quite a bit. Her back, arms, and legs had all grown since then, and her chest and buttocks had attained more feminine thickness. And in the days she had spent at that Featherrun Mansion, Elsa had grown into a more devilish existence.

Considering the duties of the Featherrun Sisters, an excellent physical appearance was one of their necessary qualities. The quality of one's appearance would have influence over the success of a mission. To bring out the carelessness of an opponent, it was an important weapon.

Henceforth, the Featherrun Sisters were prepared with beautiful features.

Oliver: "—. Best of luck. 'S quite troubling that ye've got no outlook to the future, but how 'bout we just take the constructive approach of it meaning that any 'n all restrictions've been cleared away. So…"

Elsa: "What should I do?"

Oliver: "As I'd said, ye won't be put up in the shop. That said, I won't restrain ye either. Feel free to take a walk around town… Though I wouldn't mind if ye disappeared like that either."

Elsa: "Please rest assured. I'll return before it gets dark out."

Of course, Elsa could at least understand Oliver's sarcasm, but she did not dwell on it. With an audible sigh, Oliver stood up and began preparing to head out.

Elsa: "Where are you going?"

Oliver: "Fortunately, the slaves I'd had in stock've all sold out. I'm gonna head to the next stocking and… I've been invited to a bit of a banquet. Gonna have meself a bit of a chat with some valued clients. Please eat as ye see fit."

As he said that, Oliver took a bag of money out from his pocket, and tossed it towards her. Once she caught it, she could tell just how much money was inside from the sensation on her palms.

It was certainly no amount of money that should be defenselessly handed to a slave.

Oliver: “Either way, not like ye’re gonna use it.”

Elsa: “I suppose so. As expected, you really do know me well.”

Oliver: “Please! Behave! Yourself!”

With anger creeping up in response to her sarcasm, Oliver lumbered away with large strides. Seeing him off, Elsa shrugged her shoulders.

Then, looking out the window, she ascertained the sensation of the small bag in her hand. Oliver had said all that, but it did really seem that staying inside all day might not be the best thing for her mentally.

Elsa: “I suppose I’ll take a stroll around town for the first time in a long while.”

5

—The Snowfield Capital of Innorandum was one of the great cities belonging to the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko.

In Gusteko, where the vast majority of the nation was encrusted in permafrost, snowfall was present to varying degrees. Innorandum was considered a region in which snow blew particularly violently within the city, and while in other cities it was possible to more or less see the ground underneath the cleared away snow, no such phenomenon existed here whatsoever.

However, Innorandum was constructed upon Hallowed Land far larger than any other city, a town of an environment existing in a state of an endless stagnation as a result of the extreme cold.

The days upon which the climate was mild would only experience a light fall of snow, so the inhabitants who had gotten used to it would often take it as a chance to head outside. Today, the weather was also in such a condition.

Elsa: “It seems that today’s warm, so there are lots of people about.”

Strolling down the snow-trodden street, Elsa exhaled a white breath as she observed the bustling crowds.

Given the rare warm weather, many street vendors were out doing business. They were only set up in spots where the sun was shining, so Elsa, charmed by the bargainous atmosphere of the food stalls, satisfied her empty stomach.

Sauce poured all over the meat skewered by a steel rod, it was a hearty meal roasted by a powerful flame. Having been attracted by the eruption of flame at the stall, Elsa had purchased several skewers and ate them as she walked around.

As she dug in, she pondered about her course for the future. For the most part, Elsa was apprehensive about what was to come, and sought some signs regarding what she should do.

Elsa: “Well, whatever happens, happens.”

But, she also abandoned those worries right away, so that did not continue for long.

As Elsa walked around in such a manner, she noticed that there were several people gazing at her. Tracing the gazes back to their origin, she discovered that the ones looking at her were a group of ordinary men.

Sniffing out that the gazes were somewhat lustful, Elsa licked the sauce off of her lips.

She had never really been concerned with such things in the past, but it seemed that her current self was extremely captivating to the eyes of the opposite sex. Was that perhaps because of her growth, or was it because of her training as a Featherrun?

Elsa: “When I take a step back to think about it, I’m currently in a position where I'm being pursued. It may have been better for me to wear a hood to conceal my face."

That reminded her that before she had set out, Oliver had set out a showy display of clothing options for Elsa, and among them had been a hooded robe. However, since it seemed to be a bit warmer today, she had carelessly disregarded that consideration.

Elsa: "It would have been faster had he just persuaded me…"

And, pushing the responsibility onto somebody else, Elsa walked towards an alleyway with a cold, glaciated floor. Proceeding down a less popular direction on her own, she found herself at a dead end, and turned around.

And then—

Elsa: "I do think it's bad manners to chase after a lone girl with a big gang. Do you perhaps have some business with me?"

As Elsa enquired so, before her stood five men who had entered the same alleyway.

From their attire, she could tell that they were not people whose occupations operated out in the light of day. Perhaps because they were surprised that Elsa had noticed them tailing her, they could not conceal their discomposure at being posed the question.

—Nay, there was a single man who was unshaken.

Man: "To think I'd be caught tailing this sorta lass, guess I've really lost me touch."

Elsa: "Is that so? I don't think it's your fault. Those other onii-sans gave you away. If I were to explain which onii-san it was, would it cause a rift in your camaraderie, I wonder?"

Man: "Ahh none o'that, your concern ain't needed. So here's the thing…"

The man who had not wavered was likely something akin to an older brother figure among the men. Bearded and of high stature, he looked down on Elsa, who was standing leisurely, from above,

Man: “Lassie, you know Oliver Zeppes, don’t you?”

Elsa: “…I wonder what the best answer would be here.”

Other Man: “Bitch, answer bro’s question! If not… gabhehh?!”

Elsa did not know how to respond to the bearded man’s question, so in an attempt to urge her on, one of the men had lost his temper, only to be struck in the jaw by the bearded man’s fist. Biting his tongue in a forceful manner, he cowered as blood spilled.

Man: “Right now, I’m talking with the lass. Know your damn place.”

Slapping his cowering subordinate on the head, the bearded man apologized to Elsa with a “Sorry about that”.

Man: “Deepest apologies for following you, and for the lack of discipline. And, I know that you’re involved with that Oliver knob, lassie. Saw you coming out from his place.”

Elsa: “Oh my, so he got hit for no reason. Poor thing.”

Man: “I beg of you. Don’t be saying that, yeah? Well then, onto more important matters… lassie, are you and Oliver the only ones dwelling there?”

Not understanding the intention behind the question, Elsa furrowed her well-shaped brow. As the bearded man witnessed her reaction, he began to rub his balding head,

Man: “It may sound a bit pathetic, but truth be told, a slave purchased from Oliver has run away. And, without any place to go, I figured that he’d be the first place she’d turn to.”

Elsa: “That’s quite the strange story. If a slave has fled from their buyer, wouldn’t they also try to flee from their slaver? For them to return would be…”

Man: “You see, Oliver’s got a bit of a reputation for taking back returning stock. The common sense of other slavers doesn't apply to him. Lassie, you should also be aware of that, yeah?"

With a single eye closed, a ghastly smile emerged on the bearded man's face. Any ordinary person would have been overwhelmed by that gaze and backed down, but unfortunately, it was but a refreshing breeze to Elsa.

Be that as it may, it was difficult to dispute the bearded man's point. It seemed that this person was well informed regarding the rumors about Oliver, so it would be meaningless to deceive him with lies.

When it came down to it, the only thing Elsa could do was—

Elsa: "I've understood the problem with Oliver. Only, there was nobody in the house other than me. Oliver's also gone out, so it's completely unattended."

Man: "Can I really believe that?"

Elsa: "If you don't believe me, why not come and take a look inside?"

This time, it was the bearded man who was surprised at Elsa's proposal. However, from Elsa's perspective, the contents of these allegations were not present in her recollections, so she felt no particular pain in her gut from being investigated.

Oliver would probably get mad if he found out that she brought people into his house while he was absent, but since she was clearing up unnecessary allegations towards him, he would not have any right to complain.

Man: "Then, how about I take you up on that offer? It's a life saver that you're so willing to help, lassie."

Elsa: "A cooperative attitude is important, after all. So, you'll have to help me out next time, right?"

Man: "You've even got some guts, I'll give you that. You're beautiful, 'n these young blokes oughta follow in your example."

As the bearded man checked with his men, “Ain’t that right lads?”, they could not do anything but affirm him in quiet voices. Though, Elsa had no way of knowing the disgrace of being beaten down, and then told to follow the example of a young girl.

Elsa: “Well, employing violence to reform someone is but a matter of course. I’ve experienced it as well.”

Man: “Heh, have you now lassie? I can’t really see that Oliver knob as the kinda guy to do such a thing, though.”

Elsa: “It happened somewhere else. My head’s even been chopped off once.”

Man: “Wahahahaha! Bloody fantastic.”

Perhaps thinking it was a joke, the bearded man slapped his knees and gave a hearty laugh.

Man: “Well then, lead the way. Don’t worry, once we can prove your words true, lassie, we’ll withdraw from there.”

Elsa: “Yes, indeed. I’m glad that you’ll be doing so. Alright, shall we go?”

With that, Elsa took the men with her, and returned to the path leading to Oliver’s house. Then, bringing the men into the house, she would prove that the slave they were looking for was not there, and would then have them be on their way.

Men: “…”

Elsa: “Oh my.”

—In Oliver’s room, they came across a white haired girl cowering on the bed.

Naturally, that was something that even Elsa had not expected. However, these men did not live in a world so naive that they would openly lend an ear to such an excuse.

Henceforth—

Elsa: "—Let's just say that we were both unlucky."

Before the bearded man could draw his dagger, his hand was pierced by a metal skewer. Pinning her opponent's arm to the wall, Elsa's long leg delivered a powerful kick to the bearded man's head.

His eyes rolling to the back of his head, the bearded man lost consciousness. Seeing their elder brother figure getting dealt with in an instant, the men were shaken in the same way they had been in the alleyway.

Elsa: "I really do feel bad about this."

Then, Elsa's display of violence plunged every last one of the men's consciousnesses into darkness.

6

Be they nobility, be they gentlemen, be they clergymen.

A talent for smiling was required in the social landscape, and it just so happened that Oliver had an innate gift for it.

Oliver: "Greetings, long time no see, eh? How's your leg been faring since then?"

???: "Work has been going swimmingly. Thanks to you, there's been no end to the incoming requests."

Oliver: "By all means, be sure to call on me whenever ye find the chance! Let's open up a bottle o'something special!"

It was natural to change the topic depending on who he was talking to, but in addition to that, Oliver even altered the nature of his smile.

Sometimes to reassure the other party, sometimes to imprudently outmaneuver the other party, sometimes to appear full of confidence; he would get deep into the hearts of each person he was speaking to.

A smile that fulfilled the desires of the other party, was the remarkable talent Oliver possessed as a slaver.

—Slave traders and flashy social gatherings, some people may get the exact opposite impressions from those terms, but like any other business, success would be determined based on how well connected one was.

Not to mention, Oliver's would only do business with people who were more wealthy than he was. Rather, it could only be called natural for him to proactively turn up at these kinds of places.

Nonetheless—

Oliver: "…I guess today's a bit of a failure."

Looking over the drinking party formally designated as a buffet, Oliver quietly whispered in his mouth.

Neither the social gathering nor stocking up had yielded any results. He had gone around talking to many of the traders he was familiar with trying to stock up on new slaves, but had been unable to find any quality candidates. Oliver's requirements were for them to shine once polished. So, stocking up for today was canceled.

On the other hand, it was difficult to say the people at the social gathering were promising business partners; at best, he was having conversations or making light small talk with familiar customers.

Gathered today were many people involved with the Gustekan Church. It was the Church of the Holy King that forbade slavery, so they were unable to openly discuss the business very much. After enjoying a moderate amount of conversation and booze, Oliver was planning to leave rather early.

Partly due to his professional sensibility as a slaver, but also because he was worried about the bomb he had left at home. He neither knew when that bomb would explode, nor what would get caught in the explosion.

Oliver: "I'm begging ye, please just behave for half a day—"

???: "—You over there."

His mind preoccupied with Elsa, Oliver's reaction to the sudden presence was delayed. Hurriedly looking back at the person who had called out to him, Oliver attempted to put on a smile—.

???: "…"

—Facing the empty eye sockets of the one standing there, Oliver caught his breath.

Oliver: "—. Ah, it's been a while. I see you haven't changed much since then."

However, that stagnation was but a moment. Oliver immediately came to his senses, and forged a smile. Then, he recalled everything he had in his mind regarding the man before his eyes. —The name of the man affiliated with the Gustekan Church.

Oliver: "Holosseo-sama, many thanks for your patronage the other day."

—Indeed, it was Holosseo. Holosseo Featherrun.

As someone involved with the Gustekan Church, he was a person who appeared to be of a befitting position. He was once a client of Oliver's, none other than the buyer of Elsa.

With Holosseo right before him, Oliver's heart permeated with confusion. Elsa had said so. That because her buyer had met his misfortune, she had returned to Oliver.

So then, why was Holosseo standing here alive and well right before Oliver?

Oliver: "May I ask how things are going? Is she serving you well?"

However, Oliver bottled up the doubts in his mind and spoke in a nonchalant manner. He was attempting to ascertain how the other party would react in response to that.

???: "…Hk."

A reaction there indeed was. However, it was not Holosseo that had displayed a strong reaction to that, but rather the young girl with blue hair and blue dress waiting beside him— he recognized this person too. This girl had also accompanied Holosseo when he had come to collect Elsa.

The young girl of lovely appearance was glaring at Oliver with a dreadfully heinous look in her eyes.

If hatred was a vehicle of heat, it would have been enough to set Oliver ablaze; that fury was violent enough to make one think so.

Holosseo: “—It is carrying out the duty of Featherrun.”

Ergo, as Holosseo continued so, his response was delayed for but a moment.

Deciphering those words as an indication of how Elsa was working, Oliver mended his emotions.

Oliver: “Well that is the most important thing. I am also relieved that it was a beneficial transaction. How about it? If you ever get another chance, please do consider using our services again…”

Holosseo: “I shall keep that in mind. —This time was a job well done.”

Leaving naught more than those words behind, Holosseo turned his back on Oliver in a curt manner.

If this was a business negotiation, then Oliver would have lamented his failure, but the interaction initiated by Holosseo just now was meant to be a leading question. By no means did he seek any further dealings with Oliver.

As proof of that, the girl accompanying him did not cease her hatred-filled gaze until the very end of the end.

Oliver: “I’d deceived ‘em right away, but…”

Just what sort of blunder had Elsa perpetrated at Holosseo’s abode? To begin with, Holosseo ought to have met his misfortune as per the story he had heard.

Even if it was with that unchanged impression of poor health and eerie, empty eye sockets, Holosseo was unmistakably alive. A clear contradiction to Elsa's testimony.

Oliver: "Ahh, and just when I thought it was already depressing enough."

If there were people hunting down Elsa's whereabouts, a necessity was borne for Oliver to also think about his future course.

This was the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko. —A land where people lived under the name of the Gustekan Church.

After all, sparks of conflict and whatnot against authorities in the Church of the Holy King were not included amidst Oliver's happy plans for the future.

7

Elsa: "Oh my, welcome home. You're back quicker than I'd thought."

Greeting Oliver as he hastily returned home after leaving the meeting early, Elsa spoke calmly.

Faced with an attitude that truly made it seem like nothing was wrong, Oliver hoped that what he had been witnessing for a moment now was just an optical illusion. However, that could have never been the case.

Merely, this young girl by the name of Elsa, was a girl capable of remaining calm amidst a wretched scene of blood.

Oliver: "Wh-Wh-Wh-Wha…"

The moment he had opened the door to his own home, his nostrils were assailed by the stench of blood, giving Oliver a premonition most unpleasant.

Though not very physically strong, Oliver did lead a life as a slaver. In this neighborhood, he could not remain completely detached from violence. The malodor of blood, though foul, was something he experienced everyday.

However, never in such copious amounts. The piled up corpses of several men too—

Elsa: “Ah, don’t get the wrong impression. I haven’t killed them. They’ve all just been knocked out.”

Oliver: “Phew, now there’s a real weight off me shoulders. I’ve got peace of mind since ye didn’t kill ‘em… is that what ye’d wanted me to say?! How’d it end up like this… in just half a day, how did it bloody end up like this?!”

The reason why Oliver had hurried back home was to question Elsa about the particulars regarding Holosseo. However, this mountain of unfamiliar men had robbed Oliver of any composure he might have had.

Anyway, he wanted problems to stop rolling into his way one after another. Oliver was but an ordinary man, and he had no choice but to deal with them one by one.

Oliver: “Elsa! Who the hell’re these blokes? Did ye pick ‘em up somewhere?”

Elsa: “Who knows? I don’t really have any clue. That’s why…”

Oliver: “That’s why?”

Elsa: “I think it would be better to ask the girl who seems like she would know.”

Saying that, Elsa gestured with her chin to a corner of the room—to the side directly opposite to where the men had been piled up. Following it, Oliver was taken aback as his eyes caught sight of what was there.

After all, sitting there whilst hugging her knees, was the figure of a white haired young girl. And, that girl bore the mark of recognition within Oliver’s memories. After all, this girl was formerly his merchandise.

Oliver: “Tatiana?! Why’re ye in a place like this…?”

Girl: “—Hk.”

Upon having her name called out, the white haired girl— Tatiana, looked up. Tears filled the young girl’s eyes, and she leapt into Oliver’s chest.

Promptly catching her light body, Oliver pat the girl on the back,

Oliver: “Ye were s’possed to’ve been taken in by House Lexant a month ago. So, what’re ye doing here…?”

Elsa: “It seems like that girl had escaped, and these people were chasing her, you know? She must have had nobody else to turn to, and so she fled to your place.”

Oliver: “These guys were after Tatiana…?”

Elsa: “As expected of the “receiver of returning stock”… I guess I’m not the only one who comes back.”

Oliver: “Ye’ve laced those words with far too much poison for it to be ironic…”

Tatiana held in his arms, Oliver turned his eyes towards the group of collapsed men. Having fainted, with eyes rolled to the backs of their heads, these men were people of whom Oliver had no recollection. Perceiving that, Elsa spoke “Hold on for a bit” to Oliver, and headed up to the second floor.

And after a little while—

Elsa: “What about this person, do you recognize him?”

And, dragged down by Elsa, was a man with a well groomed beard. As for what the man had gone through upstairs, there were bruises scattered around his visage, and through his hand was pierced a metal skewer from a food vendor.

However, even in such a battered state, Oliver could narrowly grasp the man’s characteristics.

Oliver: “Ye’re the bloke from Lexant-san’s place… so, the matter of Tatiana escaping is…”

Man: “I-It’s true… I’d been ordered to bring the girl back… but, this lassie over here done got in me way, as you can see.”

His breathing feeble, the bearded-man languidly fell to his knees. Oliver had not been very cognizant of it, but it seemed a certainty that it had been Elsa who had beaten up the bearded man and his men.

Since when did she get so strong? Meeting Oliver’s gaze, charged with such a question, Elsa merely inclined her head as if to say “?”.

Oliver: “Anyway, I’ve wrapped me head ‘round the situation. Let’s see, so Tatiana’s run away from Lexant-san, ‘n Elsa beat up the blokes who were sent to chase after her… that about right?”

Man: “…Yeah, that’s it.”

Elsa: “It would seem so.”

It was normal for Elsa to talk about matters she was directly involved in like she was a third party, but in this case there was a separate issue.

Oliver: “In that case, Tatiana… why’d ye decide to run away?”

Tatiana: “…”

Oliver: “Tatiana?”

Hearing Oliver’s question as she was held in his arms, Tatiana gave no response. —No, she could not respond.

Suspicious of this, Oliver kneeled down to align himself with the height of Tatiana’s gaze. Then, looking directly into her eyes,

Oliver: “Tatiana, take your clothes off and show me. Right this instant.”

Tatiana: “…”

Having been instructed so, Tatiana silently removed the mere white undershirt she had been wearing. In this frigid country, wearing but a single layer of clothes was already pitiful enough, but her skin exceeded that to a severe degree.

—Upon Tatiana's tan skin were carved countless wounds in places typically unseen.

Those had not been present a month ago, when she came into Oliver's stock. In other words, these wounds of hers had undoubtedly been given to her in this past month—

Oliver: "…I've been a terrible fool. A bloody failure of a slaver I am."

Thinking that the eye he'd had for these sorts of things had decayed, Oliver apologized to Tatiana, embracing her. Held in his chest, unable to bear it, sniveling tears began to stream down from Tatiana's eyes.

Oliver had tried his best to ensure the proper care so that such things would never occur. But, this was reality. His blunder had inflicted merciless wounds upon Tatiana's youthful body and mind.

The fact that she could no longer speak attested to the horrid things she had been through.

Oliver: "…I'll have this, settled."

Elsa: "—How? Oliver, just what can you do?"

Oliver: "If I bring it up, to the association…"

Lifting his head, Oliver answered the question. However, he cut his words off midway. A matter of course. Convincing others of words one did not believe in themselves was bound to prove a difficult feat.

Much less when it was this defective black-haired slave, who could keenly sniff out the lies of others.

Elsa: "I can silence all of the pursuers, but even so, you're quite cornered.”

Glancing towards the bearded man and his men, Elsa made a cynical remark about Oliver’s situation.

In reality, if Elsa had already set things up to this extent, it would not be difficult for her to silence the pursuers, that being the bearded man and his troupe. However, it was also true that it would then become a deadlock.

Tatiana’s buyer was Heiken Lexant— a descendant of a lineage that had served as leading figures in the Gustekan Church for generations; from the outset, he had never once considered engaging in equal negotiations with a slaver.

—But, it would have been impossible for Oliver to simply accept such a situation, and allow harm to befall slaves.

Oliver: “Me ways, would never forgive such a thing.”

Elsa: “—Fufu, so then what will you do?”

Taking a step forward, Elsa peered into Oliver’s face, as if testing him. In those absorbent black irises, was a certain hue of anticipation awaiting Oliver’s decision.

She was waiting for Oliver to tell her what to do. Whether that was out of goodwill, or out of obligation, or if it was on a plain whim, he knew not.

He did not know, but he certainly did not like how that prim face of hers left him completely defeated.

Oliver: “We’ve been talking all ‘bout me, but, Elsa, ye’ve got some pursuers on your tail as well.”

Elsa: “Oh my, we’re talking about me now? Moreover, pursuers…”

Oliver: “At t’night’s gathering, the man who’d purchased ye was present, accompanied by a girl. I’d considered that I might’ve mistook him, but that’d be unthinkable. Ain’t no way to forget a man who stands out like he does.”

As he said that, Oliver tapped his fingers upon his eyelids. That had likely gotten the idea about Holosseo’s lack of eyeballs across to Elsa.

Elsa: “…”

Upon hearing those words, Elsa, for the first time since returning here, expressed bafflement.

Oliver: “Elsa?”

Elsa: “…Nothing, I just thought it was a little strange, but I’ve resolved it. Also, just maybe, both of our problems could be dealt with at the same time.”

Oliver: “What’ye mean?”

Elsa’s unforseen words caused Oliver to raise his eyebrows in surprise. Before Oliver, Elsa smiled as she placed her hands together in front of her chest,

Elsa: “You want to settle things with someone who wounded their own slave. I want to have a peaceful chat with the people who are chasing me… I think we can advance those goals at the same time.”

Oliver: “…So, will ye let me hear the how?”

Gulping down his breath, Oliver would lend an ear to the proposal of Elsa, the girl in black. As she listened to Oliver’s snap judgment, Elsa’s smile grew deeper, and she nodded.

And then, while smiling, she spoke.

Elsa: “It’s simple, really. —Oliver, just sell me to that bad customer.”

8

From the very start, she had had no enthusiasm for the mission on this day.

—No, in the sense of having no enthusiasm, it was not a matter limited to just this day. Lately, Dorothea neither had enthusiasm for the missions, nor to even live her own life.

And yet, the reason why Dorothea continued to perform her duties as a Featherrun Sister, was because it was the sole means by which she could devote herself to Holosseo Featherrun, who had changed her life.

Murdered at the hands of Elsa, nevermore would she get to exchange words with Holosseo. As a benefactor to Dorothea, she was his irreplaceable foster father. —However, the Featherrun Sisters had covered up his death, and were continuing with their activities, feigning that Holosseo was still alive.

Dorothea did not think highly of this, but it was not as though she did not understand Sithonia's insistence, fearing the terminus of fate that awaited the Featherrun Sisters who had lost Holosseo's patronage. Of course, if their reputation were to be weighed against Holosseo's life, Dorothea would not even need to set them upon the plates of a scale.

However, if it was an act that came at the cost of Holosseo's prestige, she would hesitate to do anything rash or blind.

—Holosseo had been killed by Elsa, a Curse Doll whose strings were pulled by him.

Whatever reality may have been, if it became known that he was murdered by his own tool, Holosseo's prestige would plummet. Everybody would berate him with scornful laughter, forgetting his meritorious deeds, and cast his memory to the wayside.

For Dorothea, with all the love and respect for Holosseo she had, could not endure such humiliation.

Henceforth, Dorothea's life lost its color, and days passed by without meaning.

The coverup of Holosseo's death was being successfully spearheaded by Sithonia. Thanks to her efforts, the activities of the Featherrun Sisters continued unchanged.

The frequency of Dorothea being called on missions increased, as she was found useful thanks to her ephemeral appearance. Compared to before, it was ironic that the secret to success was actually refraining from running in circles trying to produce results.

Dorothea: “…”

In any case, contrary to those sentiments of Dorothea, the mission on this day came around.

The world in Dorothea’s eyes had lost all ardor and hue. —She understood that Sithonia and the other sisters did not wish to get revenge for Holosseo as desperately as she did.

To substantiate that, instead of focusing on the hunt for Elsa, Holosseo’s killer, they were allocating strength to the preservation of the Featherrun Sisters. To begin with, Dorothea’s affection towards her adoptive father was greater than anybody else’s.

None of them truly loved Holosseo. She, and she alone, was Holosseo’s daughter.

And thus, having lost both the path forward and the path back, Dorothea was transformed into naught more than a living corpse submerged in her reminiscences. A corpse who, replaying the few memories she shared with Holosseo ad nauseam, warmed her icy heart.

That was why—

???: “—It’s been a while, hasn’t it, Dorothea? Have you been well?”

Welcomed in such a manner as she arrived at the premises of her mission, vibrant color permeated her vision for the first time in a long while.

9

Heiken Lexant had actually been quite the easy man to make use of.

As a token of apology, the slaver who had sold him a slave that had run away now presented him with a beautiful black-haired slave.

Now accommodated with a slave of far higher quality than the previous one had been, the man had put too much faith in his fortune.

Coming into the possession of a beautiful and obedient slave, Heiken lost all restraint, as if to proclaim that he existed at the pinnacle of splendor in this world. On a legendary splurging spree, nearly half of the assets of House Lexant, which he had inherited, had been squandered in just a trivial amount of time.

House Lexant was a prestigious clan that held an important post in the Church of the Holy King for generations, and it had been decided that in the near future, Heiken would take up a role in the Gustekan Church. However, though the destiny of a debaucherous noble, a person who was promised such a future was bound to have many enemies.

And through this short term spending spree, they had been made to overflow.

Engrossed in shortsighted pleasure, Heiken heeded none of the warnings from those around him as he spent his days in idle amusement— ultimately, he ended up being forsaken by the Church of the Holy King.

He was regarded as a potential poison to the Gustekan Church were he to be kept alive. Those who had been deemed as such, could no longer live in the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko.

Ergo, to spell the end of Heiken Lexant's days of debaucherous indulgence—

???: "You ended up being sent here to this mansion, right?"

Gazing at Dorothea, frozen in shock right before her, Elsa smiled sweetly.

The stage was set upon the private residence of Heiken Lexant. The surroundings, a row of shelves storing many books that the manor's lord did not even feign to show interest in. Originally, House Lexant was responsible for keeping records on the sacraments of the Church of the Holy King, but in the current day, that duty had been reduced to a mere formality.

The collective work of his clan over all these years was something Heiken took no consideration of whatsoever. Hence, in selecting this place as the stage for her reunion with her sisters, Elsa begot not even the slightest hesitation.

—Indeed, the long awaited reunion, with her sisters.

Regarding the missions of the Featherrun Sisters, Elsa knew the whole picture. She understood that if she could create an existence that the Gustekan Church found troublesome, they would be deployed to the scene.

For this reason, she had leveraged the debaucherous ways of Heiken Lexant.

Dorothea: "…Wh… y?"

With a gaze honed true upon Elsa's visage, from Dorothea's throat escaped a husky voice, a nostalgic timbre upon her ears.

Preceded by her capricious turmoil, rang a voice her other emotions failed to catch up to. Listening, Elsa slowly tilted her head by a margin.

Why, it was a rather vague query. Why had she done something like this? Why had she waited for her, why, why, why—?

Elsa: "I suppose, because this was the quickest way that I'd have been able to chat with you guys."

Dorothea: "…"

Elsa: "I was desperate when I was fleeing, so I didn't know where the mansion was. That's why I haven't turned up there ever since then, right? Without any way to get in contact, I ended up selecting this sort of roundabout method. Are you surprised?"

The existence of the Featherrun Sisters was treasured, the very darkness harbored by the Church of the Holy King. Consequently, the whereabouts of the Hallowed Land in which they lived were known to none.

It was such a secret that it could not even be discovered through the use of Oliver’s personal connections. Thus, Elsa immediately gave up on searching for the Hallowed Land. After all, her objective lay not within the Hallowed Land itself, but with the sisters who lived there.

Dorothea: “…”

Still staring at Elsa, Dorothea maintained her silence. Only, from what Elsa could see of the fury stirring in her eyes, the fact that it was not hesitation towards the question was evident.

The fury stirring within Dorothea, its identity was that of clear loathing—

Dorothea: “ELSAAAAAAAA…!”

Elsa: “…Did you miss me?”

Dorothea: “—Hk!”

As soon as she inclined her head at the hostility, and uttered a statement bereft of provocatory intention, Dorothea vanished. —Nay, she had taken a low stance, aiming for Elsa as she charged her down.

From behind her azure dress, swiftly unsheathed were two long glaives. Putting them together as she charged forth, Dorothea transformed them into enormous great shears.

Having severed vast amounts of flesh and blood, these great shears possessed a cutting edge that even Elsa had once gotten a taste of. Brandishing that, Dorothea charged forth with eyes sodden by murderous intent. As Elsa basked in that malevolent hatred of the fifth daughter of the Featherrun Sisters, she leaned down and hopped off the desk.

Then, once she lightly landed on the floor with the tips of her toes —

Elsa: “I missed you too.”

Immediately after, the fissures that had already been present in the floor expanded, and the library suddenly caved in.

Dorothea: “Wha…?!!”

Elsa: “That’s why, I was thorough in my preparations for it.”

Dorothea’s voice, coated with astonishment, overlapped with the cognizant voice of Elsa.

Having lost her footing out of nowhere, Dorothea was powerless to do anything as she was enveloped by the sensation of being suspended in the air. If this had been Ornea, she would likely have been able to break through the deadlock by using her kusari-fundo somehow.

However, such a thing would be difficult with Dorothea’s great shears. —In all honesty, even though it was possible to have the Featherrun Sisters summoned, Elsa had no way of predicting who would undertake the mission.

That was why, it being Dorothea, who was unable to deal with this situation, was the result of Elsa’s luck having won out.

And thus, it being Dorothea, the least capable of talking things out, was the result of Elsa’s luck having been rotten.

Elsa: “…”

In the midst of falling to a lower floor, Elsa used one of the falling bookcases as a foothold to close in on Dorothea. She had been immobilized by the shock for but a moment, so Dorothea attempted to maneuver her body to deal with the situation, but she was too late.

Right into the center of Dorothea’s torso, came a hammering blow from the tip of Elsa’s toes. As her dainty body was blown away with a cry of pain, Dorothea was swallowed up by a waterfall of plummeting tomes.

But, her fate remained uncertain for merely an instant. With her great shears, the bookshelf lying on top of her was cleaved up and blown away as Dorothea stood up.

Dorothea: "…Come on out, Elsa! You're planning to kill me like you killed Father, isn't that right?!"

Elsa: "Though, I think you have a bit of a misunderstanding there."

Amidst the fluttering descent of shredded books, Elsa responded to the bellowing Dorothea. Slowly walking out from behind a pile of bookshelves, Elsa peered at Dorothea with her black eyes.

Within those black eyes of hers, Dorothea's body appeared as if being distorted by the heat of detestation.

Elsa: "Dorothea, I think it would be best if we both desist. I merely wanted to talk about that today, so I summoned you here. Though, to be precise, it wasn't you specifically."

Dorothea: "Both, desist…? After making full preparations to ambush me, you're saying that now?"

Elsa: "I think it also would have been rude to await you without sufficient preparations. Besides, in the case that it was you who came, it was clear that it would have ended up turning into a deadly battle of this sort."

Waving her hand, Elsa insisted that she had no intention of fighting. But, unable to secure Dorothea's reassurance with that, a corollary of her doubts only growing deeper was begotten.

Still emanating a volatile impression, Dorothea glared at Elsa,

Dorothea: "…Fine, I'll listen to whatever impertinent things you have to say. What's your intent here?"

Elsa: "I told you, didn't I? For both of us to desist, that's what I desire. I would have been fine leaving things like that, with how we parted at the mansion, but… it would seem that you are searching for me."

Pausing her words there, Elsa returned Dorothea’s gaze head on.

Elsa: “Once you found me, it’s quite difficult to imagine that things would blow over amicably.”

Dorothea: “Isn’t that only natural…?!! You, you killed Father! The sole person in this world… the person who found me, that Father! You, YOUUUUUUU…!”

After displaying an attitude of being willing to listen, once more was Dorothea engulfed by fury, losing herself to indignation.

Lamenting that, Elsa shrugged her shoulders with a “Look at that”,

Elsa: “As I thought, I won’t be able to talk to you. This is what I’d been afraid of.”

Dorothea: “Enough. I no longer consider you my younger sister… I’m gonna murder you, Elsa!”

With a brandish of her great shears, Dorothea surmounted the books amidst the rubble, and thrust towards Elsa.

The haphazard speed of the girl, her blue dress fluttering, was a sign of a willingness to have one’s own body destroyed, characteristic of those who had awakened as Curse Dolls. For Dorothea, that was particularly striking, as she showed no hesitation whatsoever to have her body crushed and pulverized.

That attested to just how much of her self-worth she placed in Holosseo’s approval.

It was testament to her attitude that, if she could be useful to Holosseo, then she cared not for whatever happened to her.

Ergo—

Dorothea: “—Ah?”

Elsa: “You can’t become Ornea, or any of the other sisters.”

Compared to her angered bellow from a moment prior, that voice had been far too faint.

Before Elsa's eyes, Dorothea's charge was thrown into disorder. Her body had lost its balance. However, that was only natural. After all, her body had been split in half at the center of her torso.

Dorothea: "…"

Unaware as to what had occurred, Dorothea's upper body was sent flying. It was around the same time that her upper and lower bodies struck the floor.

Copious amounts of blood spilling from her bisected torso, and the belated arrival of pain caused her to shriek. It was just as if the rasping voice of an old crone wrung by the neck resounded through the manor.

Elsa: "You got way too emotional."

Amidst her cries, Elsa passed in between the two halves of Dorothea, and traced the air with her finger. —Nay, it was not the air she was tracing, but a steel wire that had been strung up in the air.

The steel wire, now with a few drops of blood hanging about it, had been strung up firmly at the height of Dorothea's torso. She had charged into the steel wire all by herself, causing her body to be split in twain.

Elsa: "Ornea would have noticed. Sithonia would have withdrawn once the unexpected began to occur. I don't know what Saria and Hildea would have done, but… you completely fell for it."

Dorothea: "Ah, aahgaAHHHHHHAHHHHH…!"

Elsa: "If it was only an arm or some fingers, you would have been fine, but you can't regenerate if your torso is cut in half. Your regeneration is weak compared to mine or Ornea's, so I suppose this is the end?"

Internal organs spilling out from the cross section, Dorothea writhed on the brink of death. However, writhing only led to the loss of more blood, so she was unable to do anything.

By the time the sisters were called to this manor, Elsa had already completed the appropriate preparations to receive them. Dorothea had been completely caught in the trap that Elsa had set.

Elsa: “Didn’t I tell you? A reception bereft of sufficient preparations would have been far more disrespectful to you all.”

Dorothea: “—Ah, kuh…”

As Elsa walked towards her, Dorothea immediately attempted to swing her shears at her. But, her arm was stomped down from above, and without any lower body to brace herself with, her assault was thwarted.

Elsa then crouched down, and peered at Dorothea, who wore an expression of pure unadulterated rage, from a close proximity.

Elsa: “Though, I just hope you don’t get the wrong idea.”

Dorothea: “…Wrong idea, as in?”

Elsa: “I’m not doing any of this because I hate you guys. In fact, I quite liked you. When you received that job, I was delighted as if it pertained to me.”

With those words, Elsa continued with “That’s why”,

Elsa: “—From the bottom of my heart, I’m regretful that things turned out this way.”

Dorothea: “…”

As Elsa bid her condolences, Dorothea’s expression froze over.

Then, Dorothea bashed her forehead into the floor, a sobbing noise emerging from her throat. Averting her gaze from the pitiful weeping, Elsa suddenly came to a realization.

Having fallen over slightly further away, it was Dorothea’s lower body. Disunited from the upper body that was communicating her will, that which had been limited to mere convulsions, the nature of its quiver, shifted.

—From something bereft of meaning, bereft of intent, into a movement of something in which purpose verily dwelled.

Elsa: “This is…”

Receiving a dire sensation from that alteration, Elsa’s body grew stiff.

In an instant, the bleeding that had abated in vigor forcefully resumed, the dusky fresh blood steeping into the floor like a malediction. Elsa widened her eyes upon witnessing that sight, and the situation shifted further.

Dorothea’s overflowing blood morphed into sharp blades, launching an attack on Elsa.

Elsa: “Kuh!”

Promptly jumping out of the way, Elsa evaded the sanguine blades flying about. But, the speed and force of the blood could not be simply discerned by sight, and so chasing after the jumping Elsa, they made contact with her white skin— causing it to burst asunder.

Elsa: “Zh…!! Aghh!”

The locations where the drops of blood touched upon burst open, a high pitch scream resounding out from Elsa’s throat.

Dorothea’s blood soaked into her white skin, causing it to burst open from within. Her right arm, right leg, around half her body ripped open to shreds, Elsa collapsed following the impact.

Pain, pain, a stabbing pain ensued. Agonized by that pain, Elsa’s face was,

Dorothea: “ELSAAA!!”

And, alongside a screeching voice, the firm sensation of a heel stomped down upon her face.

Dorothea had trampled Elsa’s face down to the ground with her heel. Dorothea, who was supposed to have been split in two at her torso, bared her teeth as she looked down at Elsa with an expression of pure hatred.

Her body, which ought to have been ripped asunder, was now firmly reconnected.

As Elsa looked up at that as her face was being stepped on,

Elsa: “…Even though I split you in two, how did you stand back up?”

Dorothea: “Blood, connected with blood… I’m surprised too. By the possibilities of Curse Dolls.”

Hearing the low voice of a crone, spoken as if casting a curse, Elsa thought back to Dorothea’s sobbing from a moment prior. That had not been sobbing, but the sound of laughter.

The fury had caused Dorothea to laugh, the fury had bestowed Dorothea with new power.

That was—

Elsa: “By controlling blood, you’ve tied your torso back together… How wonderful.”

Dorothea: “You’ve got leeway… You should be able to do this sorta thing as well.”

Saying that, Dorothea slashed her own arm with her shears. From her wrist poured out a vast amount of blood, soaking into Elsa’s abdomen. Considering what had happened before, it would not be strange for this amount of blood to explode from within Elsa’s torso. However, that was not Dorothea’s objective.

Immediately after, centered around Elsa’s abdomen, Dorothea’s blood began to stir within her body.

Elsa: “Ku, ug! Ah, uuh, AHH! AHHHahhhhhh—!!”

It was visually apparent that Elsa’s body was being destroyed by blood from within. Underneath her black dress, the affront was visualized through the form of dusky blood crawling in her white skin.

It was a sensation akin to small insects swarming around within her body. In addition, the insects harbored a clear intent for torture as they contributed to Elsa’s agony, clad in sharp blades as they bustled about within her.

Assailed by the hellish anguish of myriad insects hollowing her out from within, Elsa screamed.

Elsa: “Ug, gyhgh, AHHAHhahhhhhhhhhh—!!!”

Dorothea: “How’d you like that? How’s that? How’s that, how’s that, how’s that how’s that how’s that HOW’S THAT HOW’S THAT?!”

Her vision stained bright red, her brain was unable to process even her own scream. Noises disappearing into the cacophony, everything of this world grew distant from the realm of her comprehension.

Even now, Dorothea’s heel was still firmly stepping on Elsa’s face, but both that pain and humiliation were trifling in face of the violation of the blood crawling through her body.

The situation had been flipped on its head. Looking down upon Elsa, Dorothea roared with laughter.

Even when her body had been bisected, Dorothea had not cast away her will to fight. That doggedness is what had allowed a new possibility to bud for Dorothea’s body.

Dorothea: “HOW’S THAT, ELSA?! SUFFER! SCREAM! FOR FATHER! YOU SHALL—Hk!”

Elsa: “—Hk.”

Under the foot of Dorothea, who was yet commanding the blood, Elsa swung her legs a great deal upwards. Her flexible, long legs zeroed in on Dorothea's cranium. But, by tilting her head, Dorothea managed to evade.

However, slipping through the momentary slack, Elsa broke away from underneath Dorothea's foot. She tenaciously jumped to the floor on all fours, deserting the room packed with the ruins of the library.

Dorothea: "Know when to give up…! You think I'd let you get away?!"

In pursuit of the fleeing Elsa, Dorothea cleared over the wreckage. Then, as she rushed forth, her cheek was ripped open by a sharp edge.

At a glance, it was a similar steel wire to the one that had cleaved her in half. One of the many steel wires that had been strung up around the room, had torn into Dorothea's cheek without any repent.

Dorothea: "…Hk! How so very annoying you are!"

Alongside a roar of anger, Dorothea released more sanguine blades through the wound on her wrist, and hacked into the steel wire. Dorothea's ire was not constrained to merely that act, and neither did the destruction wreaked by her sanguine blades come to an end.

In order to lay waste to the shoddy traps Elsa had set, the sanguine blades razed the room to the ground, berserking as they pleased, thwarting every last one of the steel wires by force.

With that done, she would attempt to pursue Elsa—

Dorothea: "Ghgobu…!"

An iron stake fired from the fore perforated her body, causing Dorothea to cough up blood as her viscera spilled out.

Widening her eyes wondering what had happened, it had been nothing of importance. Just another trap set out in the same manner as the steel wires, an iron stake arranged to be shot out were a steel wire to be cut.

Elsa had meticulously, yet indifferently, made preparations in order to kill the Featherrun Sisters.

Dorothea: “…Hk!”

Pulling out the iron stake, she cut it in half with her blood. Using blood to close up the fresh wound on her torso, Dorothea dragged her great shears along with her as she left the room.

Dorothea: “…”

Elsa was not present in the corridor, but the trail of blood droplets informed Dorothea of where she had gone. Regardless, even at a distance, she could clearly tell that her own blood was driving Elsa into a corner.

Following the bloodstains and the throbbing of her own blood, Dorothea pursued Elsa. En route, there were many traps including the likes of steel wires and iron stakes, but she crushed those head on, and persisted in her advance.

Then, upon the room to which Elsa had fled, she tore down the door, and stepped in.

Dorothea: “The dining hall…”

Looking over the space furnished with a long table, lined with chairs that likely did not see much use, Dorothea felt a strong, out-of-place impression that perhaps the dining halls of grand estates were all modeled the same way no matter the location.

Elsa: “I wonder, why do the dining halls of mansions always end up looking so similar? “

An audible voice correctly guessed what she had been thinking, and Dorothea turned around.

Deep within the dining hall, Elsa stood before a door that continued into the next room. Dorothea had certainly expected for her to flee yet again out of that door, but she closed it with a hand behind her back, blocking off her own means of escape.

Dorothea: "…Have you given up on running away?"

Elsa: "Gradually, I've gotten used to the pain. You see, even if I continue to flee, I can't see any prospects of being able to get away from you."

Dorothea: "I see. In that case, accept your defeat and die here. For Father…!"

Standing on opposite ends of the long table, Dorothea readied her great shears while training a vigilant gaze upon Elsa. If she were to spring at her in a hotheaded manner here, she would just end up with a bisected torso all over again.

Given that she had taken the trouble to flee here, there was no doubt about this room also being laid with sufficient preparations. Of those, Dorothea would maintain utmost caution, while simultaneously applying vigorous motion to the blood within Elsa's body.

And all the while, she commenced an all out sanguinary offensive.

Dorothea: "No matter what sorts of traps you've set, I'll crush them all!"

The frenzy of a sanguine blade cleaved right through the table, honing in on Elsa, who stood bolt-upright. Bearing the anguish within her body, Elsa flew to the side to evade, yet the blade of blood was relentless in its pursuit.

In such a manner, the blade sunk its teeth into Elsa's leg, and with her movement thwarted, the legacy of that pursuit was carried forth by the great shears. Formulating the chain of attack in her head, she would put it into practice— it happened the very next moment.

An uproarious inferno engulfed the entirety of Dorothea's vision in bright red.

Dorothea: "…"

Overwhelmed by the intense heat of the flames, Dorothea froze up.

In an instant, thrown from the other side of the curtain of flame was a table knife with aim centered on Dorothea's face. Narrowly avoiding it, Dorothea attempted to shake free from the flames, as empty of a threat as they were.

However, as soon as she shook away from the flames, a silhouette came piercing through the blazing curtain once more.

That was—

Elsa: "With this, I can finally get back at you."

Dorothea: "…Hk! ELSAAA!"

Unconcerned about getting burned, Elsa had leapt through the flames grasping onto Dorothea. She immediately commanded the blood to burst her arm apart, but Elsa's expression remained unchanged. Eyes sparkling with belligerence, she grabbed Dorothea's head and slammed it to the ground.

And out from Dorothea's hand, pinned to the floor as she was, Elsa kicked the great shears flying, stripping her of her weapon. But, that did not mark the end.

Dorothea: "Any, weapon…!"

Even without her great shears, her flowing blood would become a weapon by which to kill Elsa.

With a wrathful gaze upon Elsa, Dorothea commanded the blood of her own circulating in her opponent's body. After all, she understood the restorative capabilities of a Curse Doll's resuscitating qualities. In that case, she ought to lavishly mince up her entrails with such force that she would not be able to reminisce on her life, inflicting upon her the utmost agony.

Dorothea's blood made an attempt to bring that to fruition, and overrun the insides of Elsa's body—

Elsa: "Unfortunately, I won't let you do that."

Right after those words, a vast amount of something was poured onto Dorothea's body. And that was not just on Dorothea, it was some liquid that Elsa had covered both of them in from the head down.

A malodor assailed her nostrils, and a moment later, Dorothea's frozen thoughts became cognizant as to its identity.

It was an alcohol strong enough to emit an intense smell. And, there was only one reason why Elsa would have doused them in alcohol in this situation.

Elsa: "Well then, shall we test our endurance?"

Dorothea: "WAI—!"

Wait, Dorothea exclaimed, but it was too late.

Weighing down on Dorothea, Elsa reached out behind her and grabbed the burning cloth from off the long table, dragging it towards the two of them. The subsequent instant, the liquor alighteth.

Elsa: "…"

The liquor burst into a thunderous eruption of terrific flame, burning the bodies of Dorothea and Elsa.

The scintillating flames charred the skin of the two maidens, scorched their clothes, singed their hair, destroying their beautiful forms. In an attempt to escape the intense agony, Dorothea writhed, and sought salvation through blood.

However, engulfed by the scorching flames, her blood had lost every last bit of its strength, and disappeared. No matter how aberrant a power was granted to it, blood was still blood. It could not win against flame—

Dorothea: "Gy, aaaAAHHAHHHHH—!!"

Those thoughts of hers were quite literally scorched to naught by the flames, bringing them to oblivion.

Scorched was the throat releasing a scream, causing the embodiment of her inferiority complex, her voice, to disappear. As she had let out a voice, her lungs swelled in hopes of oxygen, but the incoming heat only served to incinerate her internal organs.

Due to the incinerating heat, her eyeballs burst asunder, and her tongue and mucous membranes frothed. It took no time for her white skin to be scorched black, for her long blue hair, and dress of the same hue, and absolutely everything else to become engulfed in the flames.

And yet, despite all of that, even though there could have been no possible way to endure such agony.

Elsa: “Fufu, aha, AHAHAHAHAHAHA!”

While being burned in the same manner, she could hear the loud laughter of Elsa from right above her.

How could she be laughing amidst such heights of intense pain? Why was she laughing? —No, this was something she understood. This youngest sister, Elsa, was out of her mind. This was something she understood.

Even the Featherrun Sisters, by no means capable of living in a proper manner, could not comprehend the thoughts of the girl by the name of Elsa. They could not accept them. They could not acknowledge them.

Dorothea: “You, are no, Featherrun…!”

Being burnt to a crisp. Dorothea, inferior in her regeneration, could not recover from the same damage as Elsa.

If these flames came to an end, and the situation quieted down, there would be nothing she could do. Therefore, if she was going to attempt a counterattack, it had to be this moment. While her thoughts were dominated by pain, vengeful desires flared up within her.

With doggedness that could overcome even this scorching heat, she would take revenge for the murdered Holosseo.

Dorothea: “Drop, dead…!”

Mustering all of her remaining strength, Dorothea fastened her palm to Elsa’s abdomen. All the blood that she had ejected outwards had been burned by the flames. In that case, then she would commence an onslaught of blood directly from her hand, into Elsa’s body.

If she could then crush her heart, it would still be possible to turn this around.

Aiming for that, she fired a bullet of blood towards Elsa’s heart. Circulating the blood through her body, before it could be burned by the heat of the flames, to the heart—

Elsa: “—Too bad.”

Her voice, was lost.

Elsa’s face, melted away from its original form, laid most of her skull bare, however, Dorothea could tell that her usual smile was strewn upon her face.

As always, it was that malevolent smile, looking down on everything within this world.

Dorothea: “…”

Before the speechless Dorothea, Elsa had escaped disaster though means most astonishing. To prevent the sanguine bullet from reaching her heart, she had slit open her own torso.

Dorothea: “AH, AHH, AHHHHHHHHHH—!!!”

Elsa: “How sorrowful, Dorothea… With this, our sisterly quarrel has come to an end.”

Having sliced open her body with her hand, while reveling in the pain of her entrails being scorched, the blood bullet that was supposed to have proved fatal was seized by the flames. And then, as Elsa smiled amidst the anguish, Elsa: “Ahh, what a thrill.”

With that, as her flesh and bones were being burned by the scorching heat, it caused her body to tremble.

10

The Lexant Manor was engulfed in flame, caving in without leaving a trace.

Amidst a blanket of light snow, the sight of the mansion constructed upon Hallowed Land burning down was something out of a reverie. In a dark world of white, where light was scarce, the fluttering descent of snowflakes was illuminated a vivid red.

With the disaster befalling the mansion of a personage quite well known throughout the town, people could not hide their shock, unable to do anything but watch from afar, dumbfounded.

???: “…”

Outside the cognizance of those curious onlookers, was a silhouette walking through the alley beside the burning mansion on bare feet. That was a maiden with skin laid bare, her body soiled all over with black soot.

She was avoiding the eyes of onlookers, but that was not out of embarrassment regarding her naked body being exposed, but something more pragmatic aiming to not be called out and halted.

As proof of that, after finding the man who had been waiting for her as she slipped out of the alleyway, she did nothing to conceal her body as she smiled and waved.

Elsa: “Oliver, you really did wait for me.”

Oliver: “…This lass, why’d ye come back with no clothes on? At least do a little to cover yourself.”

Elsa: “That would’ve been impossible. Everything in the mansion had caught fire, and I didn’t have that sort of time.”

As the girl answered in a nonchalant manner, Oliver placed his hand on his forehead hearing Elsa’s words, having been the one to wait for her here. But, it seemed he had given up on getting a normal response, so he immediately took off his coat, and handed it over to the nude Elsa. Receiving it, Elsa gratefully put it on.

Elsa: “A man’s coat over my bare skin… I get a feeling that this might actually end up attracting more perverted men.”

Oliver: “Even though ye don’t use it, ye’ve gone ‘n accumulated nought but useless knowledge… nonetheless, ye’ve really made a show of things, haven’t ye?”

Elsa: “I hadn’t intended on setting fire to it, but it was a last resort given how things were going. Will it be tough to deceive House Lexant, I wonder?”

Oliver: “No need for ye to worry ‘bout that. After all, it was none other than the head of House Lexant… Heiken’s father, who made the request for his profligate son to be dealt with.”

Revealing the shady circumstances enshrouding Heinken, Oliver made a bitter face.

Given that he had made use of a patron, Oliver could not honestly be glad regarding the success of the plan. Only, he harbored no sympathy towards those who treated their slaves roughly. That had been the compromise agreed upon by this clumsy man.

Oliver: “So then, did’ye accomplish your objective a’ight?”

Elsa: “Yes… It’s just, any prospect of having a discussion broke down. I ended up losing my bet.”

Looking towards the mansion burning down in the distance, Elsa sighed at how poor her luck had been.

The major bets Elsa had gambled on today numbered two. The first, was whether the Featherrun Sisters would appear at the Lexant Manor or not.

And the other, had been regarding which of the sisters would be assigned the mission of Heiken's murder.

She had emerged victorious in the former bet, of the Featherrun Sister's arrival. However, the other bet had been a total bust. If it had been Sithonia or Ornea sent here, talking things out ought to have been possible.

Elsa: "Among the sisters, I had thought Dorothea as being the least open to conversation, but… as expected, things turned out exactly as I'd thought."

Oliver: "Well then for the both of ye… no, the other side may've actually found it to be a bit more of a one-sided misfortune."

Elsa: "I also got terribly hurt, you know?"

Oliver: "Compared to having your life taken, the opponent's oughta be the far more pitiful one."

As Oliver shrugged his shoulders and spoke, Elsa could understand that such was also true.

In the end, Elsa did find it regrettable that things could have only ever ended up as a fight to the death. In preparation for that, she had set many traps throughout the mansion, but that was that, and this was this.

Elsa: "Even so, that was a close one…"

Come the final stage, Dorothea, having attained the ability to control blood, had been a formidable foe. If it had not been the eleventh hour in which she obtained that power, and had she not over relied on it, Elsa likely would have been defeated.

Had she mastered the technique of controlling blood, the situation would have been painted a more advantageous hue in Dorothea's favor. Moreover, the degradation of her decision making ability from the large loss of blood had likely gotten in the way of that.

In any case—

Elsa: "What's done is done… shall we get out of here? If Dorothea, who was eager to kill me, has died, then the remaining sisters will likely back off."

Oliver: "I'd like to hope so. I've already had me fill of this bloody affair."

Gathered on the main street were not just curious onlookers, but personnel who had come to put out the fire at the mansion. If the Temple Knights, affiliated with the Church of the Holy King, were to find fault with her, trouble would be unavoidable.

Using the escape route that they had decided on beforehand, Elsa and Oliver distanced themselves from the mansion. Along the way, Elsa looked back just once, thinking about Dorothea, who had been left in the burning mansion.

Self conscious about her husky voice, she was a girl who hated opening her mouth. Putting utmost effort into the work bestowed upon her, the flower garden in the front yard had beautifully bloomed as the fruits of her labor.

Since she knew just how hard of a worker Dorothea was, Elsa found it regrettable from the bottom of her heart.

Elsa: "If only you could have let bygones be bygones, that would've been best."

Thinking that it was inevitable for her to say such a thing, Elsa shook her head after whispering.

Oliver: "Elsa! Don't ye fall behind now, we're on the run! Come on, over here, here!"

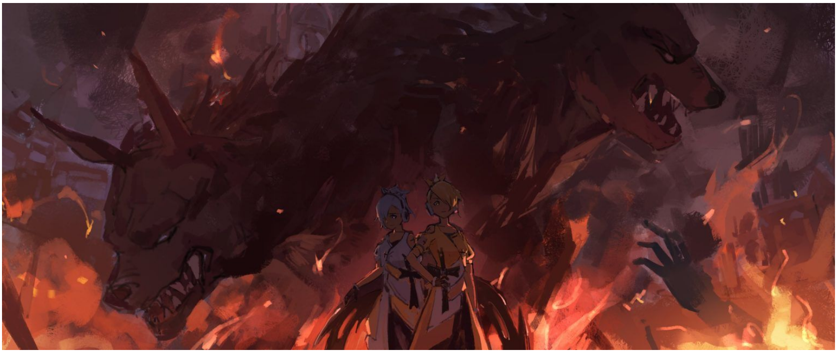
Elsa: "Yes, I know."

Not granted any time to immerse in sentimentality, Elsa responded to Oliver's call, and began to walk again.

Bearing in her heart the reality of having slain one of her sisters by her own hand, Elsa walked through the town of snow.

Without heeding those sentiments of hers, her black eyes moistened by dim emotions, she passed through the town.

—Through a town of white, did Elsa drift.



Chapter 4:
Saria Featherrun & Hildea Featherrun

1

Sithonia: “…Only a minimal amount of remains could be found in the ruins of the fire.”

Spoken in a somber tone, Sithonia laid it out over the dining room table.

Wrapped in a white bundle, was a peculiar object scorched black. At just a glance, it was difficult to tell just what it was, but while taking in the burnt aroma and visible shape, comprehension gradually followed.

It was a human bone fragment, of someone who had been a sister among them.

—The utterly altered form to which Dorothea Featherrun had been reduced.

Ornea: “This is, Dorothea, you say…?”

Aghast, grasping the bone fragment atop the bundle, Ornea muttered as her cheeks grew stiff. Presented with words that attempted to suppress all emotion, Sithonia spoke not a word.

However, that silence in itself was an affirmation of no falsehood. A corroboration of the fact that their timid, blue-haired little sister, had been discovered as a mercilessly burnt corpse.

Saria: "…What might have happened to Dorothea? Hildea is worrying over it."

Hildea: "Saria also seems mournful. How did this happen to Dorothea?"

Even Saria and Hildea, who would usually be immersed in their own little world, naturally turned pale upon witnessing these circumstances.

The tragedy that had befallen the Featherrun Sisters, so impactful had the truth of it been. The sisters were beings who had acquired quasi-immortality. To think one of them had been killed in such a manner.

Ornea: "Even if she went head to head with a high ranking Temple Knight, she shouldn't've been killed so easily. So just how, did things end up like this…?"

Sithonia: "There is one possibility conceivable. If the opponent was aware of how to kill a Curse Doll."

Ornea: "—Hk! Don't tell me, the opponent was…"

The expression on her face changing, Ornea lifted her head. Meeting the gaze of her younger sister head on, Sithonia nodded in a solemn gesture. Regarding the identity of Dorothea's murderer, there was only one person that came to mind.

Saria & Hildea: "—Elsa."

With that, the voices of Saria and Hildea overlapped, weaving together a lone person's name.

A member of the Featherrun Sisters— nay, occupying a position that ought to be regarded as former sister, Elsa. Having killed Holosseo, she who had managed to escape from the Featherrun Estate, had now slain Dorothea.

For what reason could she have possibly felt the need to commit such atrocities?

Saria: “Kuku… that girl, I suppose she’s planning on slaughtering everyone, even Hildea and I.”

Hildea: “What an outrageous girl. To think she feels like eradicating even Saria and I.”

Ornea: “Wait just a sec! Say what you like, but that’s way too hasty a conclusion! For me as well, she’s the only one who comes to mind regarding who might’ve killed Dorothea, but… “

Trying to reign the twins back in as they made up their mind on what the opponent’s aim was, Ornea hounded them so. However, the chilly gaze of the twins, and an utterance of “No” from Sithonia, stopped her.

As Sithonia looked down at the bones, at the horrid remains of Dorothea’s body atop the table,

Sithonia: “Following Father, Dorothea has also been killed. It is only natural that Elsa would be aiming to kill the rest of us.”

Ornea: “You really think she’s capable of such advanced thinking?!”

Sithonia: “Everything, including that, may have been an act. How much can you say that we really know about Elsa? To begin with, if she’s aiming for our lives…”

Saria: “She may have been a spy sent by someone.”

Hildea: “There are many people who are not fond of the duties of the Featherrun Sisters.”

Hand in hand, Saria and Hildea supplemented Sithonia’s views. Closing a single eye at those appropriate comments, Sithonia nodded to Ornea.

Even so, when Ornea was about to make some sort of refutation,

Sithonia: “Ornea, I know you had placed expectations in Elsa. But, you must stop averting your eyes from the things that have happened. —Dorothea, was murdered by Elsa.”

Ornea: “Gh, gh…”

Sithonia: “As you say, this isn’t something that Elsa could have planned by herself. There must be a collaborator, a person who is guiding her. As long as they remain in the shadows, we will never solve the root of the problem.”

Sithonia placed her hand to her forehead as if to express that an enemy was set against them, and sighed.

As it was, they were covering up Holosseo’s death, and doing what they could to maintain the appearances of Featherrun. In such a situation, losing Dorothea was a crushing blow. In both a simple sense of combat potential, and in the sense of their connection as sisters.

Despite how it might have seemed, Dorothea had been desperate to maintain their unity as sisters. Though, it was apparent that her reason for doing so was her deep affection towards Holosseo, with her not bearing many sentiments towards the rest of her sisters.

Saria: “—Hey, Sithonia. About Elsa, can you leave the matter to Hildea and I?”

Hildea: “—Hey, Sithonia. About Elsa, can you leave the matter to Saria and I?”

Thereupon, the twins strung together words in essentially the same tone, to which Sithonia was momentarily delayed in her reaction

That had been a surprising proposal. Even in this situation, she had expected the twins to wait and see what would happen as they always did, but to the contrary, they insisted on taking the initiative.

Ornea: “You’re really saying that the two of you will take action? How’d the wind end up blowing that way?”

Saria: “Well, what cruel thing of you to say, Ornea. You know, Hildea is one of the sisters too?”

Hildea: “And even Saria has some reservations about that. What a sharp tongue you have, Ornea.”

Puffing their cheeks up in discontent, the twins rubbed their cheeks together, leaving Ornea with a puzzled expression. To intervene, Sithonia placed her hands together before her chest.

In any case, Sithonia and Ornea had their hands full with the duties of the Featherrun Sisters.

Sithonia: “If you can fill in the gaps we cannot reach, it would be a wish come true. But, what will you do then?”

Saria: “To take care of that, just leave it to Hildea.”

Hildea: “If you count on Saria, it’ll be a piece of cake.”

Seeing the confident demeanor of the twins, Sithonia plunged into a brief contemplation, and then nodded.

Although they quite often lived in their own secluded world, they too were Feathrrun Sisters. They never lagged behind during missions, and they had two heads to think with.

Sithonia: “Do you happen to need anything?”

Saria: “Not at all. Hildea and I will make our own arrangements.”

Hildea: “Yes, but, I wonder just how many will suffice for Saria and I?”

Saying that, the twins pointed to their feet in unison— nay, pointing even further below than that,

Saria: “We’ll be taking all of the mansion’s hounds. Of course, that includes the very biggest pup.”

Hildea: “And then, there’s something we’d like to have Sithonia… no, something we’d like to have Father do for us.”

With sadistic smiles on their faces, Saria and Hildea made a request of Sithonia. Perceiving the seriousness hidden behind the twins' smiles, Sithonia silently nodded.

If it was necessary to get revenge on the killer of their father and younger sister— to kill Elsa.

Sithonia: "Use anything you please. In exchange, know that failure will not be tolerated."

2

???: "Aa…"

???: "…"

Looking at that which had been presented to her, a rare perplexity was etched into Elsa's brow.

Several days had passed since the incident involving Dorothea, and having returned to Oliver's base in Innorandum as if nothing had happened, she had been spending time healing her wounds.

Presented to Elsa, who sat on the floor with her back leaned against the bed, was a single white flower. And, the one holding that flower was a youthful girl looking at Elsa— Tatiana.

Having gone through hell whilst in the ownership of the now deceased Heiken, the slave girl had fled back to Oliver's place. Or perhaps, now that she had fled back here, she ought not be called a slave, but a mere commodity.

Regardless, Elsa had no intention of getting deeply involved with her, and she could not even hold a proper conversation with Tatiana, who was now suffering from aphasia, but—

Elsa: "So then, what are you doing with that flower?"

Tatiana: "Uu…"

Elsa: "I can't understand your "Aa"ing and "Uu"ing. Though, I do think flowers are very pretty."

Elsa tilted her head at Tatiana, who was shaking her head in refutation, given her scant ability to convey her will. In such a state, how were she and Olvier able to communicate with each other?

???: “Seems like she wants ye to take it. Though surely ye’d be able to tell that much just by looking?”

Striking upon Elsa’s eardrums as she harbored such a thought, the voice of the very person at the crux of those questions reverberated.

Upon returning to his bedroom, Oliver looked over Elsa and Tatiana, sitting opposite to each other upon the floor, and shrugged his shoulders as if to say “Goodness me”,

Oliver: “That girl’s thankful to ye. It’s b‘cause I told Tatiana that ye went ‘n punished the horrid master who’d put ‘er through hell…”

Elsa: “So then, she’s grateful to me? And this flower, is to represent those feelings?”

Tatiana: “…”

Tatiana vigorously nodded to affirm Elsa’s words. Then, glancing back and forth between the flower, being presented to her again, and Tatiana, who was holding it out, Elsa heaved a sigh.

And so, taking the flower from Tatiana’s hands,

Elsa: “Thank you. Setting aside whether it makes me happy or not, I ought to give my gratitude.”

Oliver: “Wouldn’t it be best for ye to just be happy in earnest?! Why’d ye have to put it like that?! “

Elsa: “I’m honest with myself. Use that as a sales pitch for the next time you try to sell me.”

Muttering that with a face of feigned ignorance, Elsa looked closely at the flower she had been given.

It was a wildflower of white petals. An ordinary thing, but in this Holy Kingdom of Gusteko, shorn of warmth, even an ordinary wildflower was rare. Unlike cultivated flowers, wildflowers could not survive unless they fulfilled certain conditions, so this was one that had emerged of such rarity.

Elsa: “And yet, to then arrive in my hands… what an unlucky flower.”

Oliver: “First time I’ve laid eyes upon someone lamenting the misfortune of a flower… geez, it could’ve actually been worthwhile for Tatiana if ye’d just earnestly accepted it with delight. Don’t ye find it pretty?”

Elsa: “Oh my, didn’t I say? I think flowers are beautiful. It’s not as if I have no attachment to them.”

As she said that, Elsa lightly beckoned to Tatiana with her hand. Tatiana’s eyes widened, and with a light moan she approached Elsa, who was sitting on the floor.

Flower in hand, Elsa gently reached her out towards Tatiana, and then,

Elsa: “There you go. This way, the flower will also have a comfy place to rest.”

Tatiana: “Aa.”

This time, Tatiana’s groan sounded as if it was something pregnant with astonishment and wonder.

Uttering such a voice, Tatiana’s eyes widened, upon her head— Elsa had adorned the white flower, and as she timidly reached up to touch that hair ornament, she appeared to have been deeply moved.

Beholding that, Elsa nodded, and looking to Oliver,

Elsa: “I had thought it was a bit strange how you could somehow communicate with this girl, but I can surprisingly tell what she’s thinking.”

Oliver: “…That’s what’s known as compassion. Just now, what did ye reckon she was thinking?”

Elsa: “Yes. —Her stomach’s empty, so make something, Oliver.”

Oliver: “Those’re your bloody feelings! I’ve wasted me time reevaluating ye!”

Oliver shouted in disappointment, and while Elsa found his demeanor to be noisy, she suddenly felt something weigh down on her shoulder.

Tatiana: “Uu.”

When she took a look, Elsa found Tatiana’s head resting upon her shoulder, moaning with her eyes closed. Elsa tilted her head, thinking that to be some sort of intimidation or protest, but realized that such did not seem to be the case.

Tatiana’s profile was reassured, and no hostility could be detected whatsoever.

Oliver: “Have ye taken to the one person in this world who ye absolutely shouldn’t get emotionally attached to…?”

Elsa: “Oliver, what happened to the meal?”

Oliver: “Whenever I just ‘bout think ye might be listening to me, I’m always proven bloody wrong, ye know?! I’ll tell ye this now, but today I ain’t listening to all your complaining ‘bout your preferences!”

With a violent shout, Oliver exited the room in a noisy manner. Since he could then be heard getting to work in the kitchen, she pitied how his mouth and limbs moved in a contradictory manner.

Anyway, regardless of Oliver—

Elsa: “But, as he said, I don’t think anything good will come of getting along with me.”

Tatiana: “Uu.”

Elsa: “But if you still won’t part from me… well, I suppose you can do as you please.”

Leaning close to Elsa, Tatiana drew near so as to make it difficult to separate. Feeling the warmth of that young girl on her shoulder, Elsa lightly snorted.

What slipped into her nostrils was the fragrance of the flower adorning Tatiana’s hair. That sweet aroma; it reminded Elsa of her days at the Featherrun Estate, of Dorothea’s flower garden.

It reminded her of the day she had been purchased by Holosseo, and brought to the Featherrun Mansion, whereon arriving at the mansion upon that Hallowed Land, that was the first sight that caught her eyes—.

Elsa: “I think, flowers are pretty. But…”

Tatiana: “Aa?”

Elsa: “They remind of the pitiful manner in which Dorothea died, so I dislike them just a bit.”

With that, narrowing her dark irises, Elsa reached out and patted Tatiana on the head for a reason she did not understand.

3

Ever since then, Tatiana could be found trailing behind Elsa wherever she went.

Throughout the day, while Oliver was busy working as a slaver, it was Elsa’s duty to look after Tatiana at his base.

For some reason, it seemed like Oliver had no intention of selling off the returned merchandise, Tatiana, to a new buyer. Even if he started reeducating Tatiana, he was not treating her in the same way as the other slaves, and instead was keeping her at his place the whole time, just like Elsa.

Oliver: “Ye know, for slaves to come right back to me is a bloody disgrace as a slaver, a bloody disgrace! I wanna do perfect work as a slaver. For that, I’ll get Tatiana back up on ‘er feet, and then I’m gonna sell ‘er to a buyer who’ll treat ‘er with care. ‘S a necessary investment.”

And, when asked, this was the sort of answer he gave regarding his treatment of Tatiana.

Still, in the sense of being returned merchandise, not only Tatiana, but Elsa likewise fulfilled the same conditions.

Oliver: “Ye’re… ahh, in your case, I guess I like, still need to consider a few things.”

Elsa: “Will you try to reeducate me?”

Oliver: “To begin with, I don’t have any memory of successfully educating ye even once…”

Not concealing his true feelings of finding her difficult to manage, Oliver was keeping Elsa put, without a clue as to what to do with her. In all honesty, he thought it the right answer to drive Elsa away since he knew of her obstreperous nature, but his act of not doing so showed the foolishness of Oliver Zeppes.

If Elsa left his hands, she would end up causing a great deal of damage to many individuals unrelated to himself. Since part of that responsibility would be on his own inadequacy, he would have to put a stop to it. That was the sort of foolish slaver he was.

Oliver: “Well, thanks to that, a wretch like me’s been saved.”

As Oliver found salvation in his petty-bourgeois sensibilities, Elsa resigned herself to the moment of tranquility.

While he was out working, she would head into the white town with money provided from Oliver, and spend her time window shopping in the street stalls and food carts just like before. All the while, accompanied by a youthful girl.

Elsa: “You’re quite whimsical as well, aren’t you?”

Tatiana: “Aa.”

Stuffing their cheeks with the skewered meat, Elsa and Tatiana walked through town.

Smiling at Elsa's words, Tatiana, as ever, answered with a moan. But, with how close they have been over these past few days, Elsa had become somewhat capable of understanding what she wanted to say.

Elsa: "You want to eat more? You mustn't. Any more than this and you'll be too full for supper. If you put Oliver in a bad mood and he stops serving us food, it will be troublesome to procure rations."

Tatiana: "Uu? Uu!"

Elsa: "How selfish. In that case, I guess there's no helping it. Just one more skewer then."

As Tatiana forcefully shook her head side to side in some sort of protest, Elsa bought one more grilled skewer from the food cart for her. For a moment, Tatiana made a dubious expression, but when Elsa sunk her teeth into her own additional skewer, she nervously followed suit.

In that time, with the hand opposite to the one holding her grilled skewer, Tatiana kept holding onto Elsa's sleeve.

Elsa: "…"

For the time being, Elsa had been told to look after Tatiana by Oliver, and did not shake off the small hand gripping her sleeve. It was not enough of a hindrance to shake off, but neither would she allow herself the vulnerability of gripping it back. Having both of one's hands occupied was a foolish act.

Elsa: "The teachings of Featherrun, indeed."

Tatiana: "—?"

Elsa: "No, it's nothing. I was just refreshing my mind with things I'm likely to forget."

Basking in Tatiana's curious gaze, Elsa reminisced on her days at the Featherrun Mansion.

The memories had a faint haze adrift over them— that was not influenced by any external factors, but was rather an issue of Elsa's own bad memory. This went for people's faces as well, but Elsa was quite forgetful regarding events that had happened.

Only, her gruesome training with Ornea, the final bout in which she was driven away by her sisters, and the stimulation at the time she killed Dorothea, were things she could remember clearly, but—

Elsa: "At this rate, I suppose those will also fade away"

The emotions mixed into that murmur; what exactly they were was not even clear to Elsa herself.

—Around twenty days had passed since her fight to the death with Dorothea, but the situation had completely stagnated, leaving Elsa to fall into obscurity amidst the surprisingly uneventful days.

The misfortune that had befallen Heiken Lexant was counted among the records of all the Featherrun Sisters' duties until now, and the truth of the situation would likely never get out.

After surpassing the extremities of debauchery, Heiken Lexant had received the death penalty. —That was the stance of the Gustekan Church, and the reality that would be recorded. Yet, not a soul knew of the Curse Doll who had also lost her life in the burning mansion on that same night.

Elsa: "The idea that Ornea might be angry only came to me a bit afterwards… but it seems it was a needless fear."

Regarding the incident with Holosseo, it seemed like the only one who was insistent on killing Elsa was Dorothea. So with her eliminated, there no longer remained any reason for her to feud with the Featherrun Sisters.

However, that was an idea that disregarded Ornea's desires to treasure her sisters.

Ergo, in these twenty days, Elsa had been unusually vigilant, waiting for Ornea to retaliate, or for there to be some form of contact. However, that opportunity never came around.

Elsa: “I wonder, maybe Ornea didn’t like Dorothea all that much.”

Tatiana: “Aa, aa.”

Elsa: “Hm? Ah, apologies. I was just thinking about something.”

Having gone too deep into contemplation, her reaction to the sensation of her sleeve being tugged on was a moment delayed. When she turned to look, she found Tatiana pulling on her sleeve, her eyes turned to the fore.

Tracing the line of Tatiana’s gaze, she spotted a rounded mass of fur in the snowy alley— realizing that it was a dog of black fur, Elsa widened her eyes.

Tatiana: “Uu!”

Perhaps because she liked animals, Tatiana pulled on Elsa’s sleeve to head towards the dog. Sensing that, the canine lifted its head, and looked at Tatiana with its red eyes.

—A moment later, the dog’s left eye was deeply pierced by an iron skewer thrown by Elsa.

Dog: “—BBRRAAARRK!”

Having had its eyeball mercilessly gouged out, the dog cried out as it was knocked backwards. Tatiana stiffened up upon witnessing that brutal sight, however, the tragedy ended not there.

Into the throat of the dog, shrieking out as it was, was pierced an iron skewer stolen out from Tatiana’s hand. The black canine coughed up blood from the impact as it collapsed, and after some brief convulsions, it stopped moving. A fatal blow.

Tatiana: “Aa…”

Dumbfounded, Tatiana looked up at Elsa, who had murdered the dog. Several question marks had emerged within her eyes, but providing them with answers was not something Elsa had time to do. Even if she had time, she did not know if she would answer or not, but—

Elsa: “—It got a bark out.”

She had failed to kill it in a single blow, and had allowed it to unleash a bellow moments before dying.

If it had been an ordinary stray dog, that final cry would have served as no reason to raise an eyebrow. However, this canine was no ordinary stray dog. —It was a hound. Moreover, it was a hound that had received special training.

???: “—BBRRAAARRK!”

Immediately after, to the snowy alleyway in which Elsa and Tatiana were, hounds were charging in one after the other, having heard their companion’s death throes. The disciplined hounds were beyond comparison to commonplace hoodlums. And with six of them present, they aimed to sink their teeth into Elsa and Tatiana—nay, just Elsa.

Elsa: “Get away.”

Tatiana: “Uu?!”

Faced with hounds leaping towards them, Elsa thrust Tatiana away. Jumping over Tatiana, who had fallen down without having been able to resist, the hound bared their fangs as they closed in on Elsa.

She had used up the grilled skewers to kill the first one. So right now, Elsa had no weapons at hand with which to fight. Hence, to avoid the hounds aiming for her legs, Elsa jumped up high. But, that had only allowed her to dodge the first two. Elsa no longer had anywhere to run, so the remaining four—

Elsa: “But, that’s a no-no.”

Jaw agape, the snout of a hound was perforated by the sharp tip of ice. Scattering blood as it fell, the hound had been intercepted by an icicle gripped in Elsa’s hand.

Using a large icicle that had been hanging from the eave of a building as an impromptu weapon, Elsa faced off against the hounds, howling in vigilance, and brandished a ruthless, but natural armament.

Elsa: “Stray dogs can at least run away if the situation becomes disadvantageous for them, how pitiful for you all.”

Having received intense training, the hounds were forbidden from fleeing, and thus had no choice but to fight to the death. Whilst she felt pity for them, Elsa did not hold back with her blade of frozen malevolence.

The remaining five put up a good fight, but they never stood a chance from the outset, not against Elsa, a nigh immortal.

Their heads and bodies borne into by the icicle, with care, they were thoroughly robbed of their lives one by one, their pursuit rendered a failure.

Elsa: “I’m finished, Tatiana.”

Casting away the bloodstained icicle, Elsa turned around, having suffocated the root of life from all the hounds. Tatiana had been holding her head during the battle, and lifting it up after hearing that voice, she widened her eyes.

That was because, torn asunder by the fangs of the hounds, Elsa’s shoulders and thighs were riddled with horrid wounds from which blood was flowing.

Elsa: “Ah, these? Don’t worry. They’ll close up right away if I just leave them as is.”

Tatiana: “Uu! Uu!”

Elsa: “—? You want another grilled skewer in exchange for the one just now? What a peculiar girl.”

Elsa inclined her head in response to Tatiana, who was vigorously shaking her head as she pleaded for the same thing she did in front of the food cart.

However, she did not have the time to go along with Tatiana’s empty stomach either.

Elsa: “—Seems like it’s begun.”

As she narrowed her eyes, Elsa could see black smoke rising in a place far from the alley. It was in the direction of Innorandum’s main street— it was the beginning of an abnormal event in the district where the food stalls were all lined up.

The beginning. Yes, this was the beginning.

Tatiana: “Aa, uu!”

Commencing at the same time as the rising of black smoke, were the bellows and screams of people in the town. Hearing that, Tatiana’s expression was dyed with a hue of fear, and she nestled close to Elsa’s arm.

Allowing Tatiana to do as she pleased with her arm, Elsa looked back at the slain hounds. The significance of them having come after her, lay unmistakably in one thing.

Elsa: “—Saria and Hildea. It looks like you two came next.”

4

Ornea: “—You authorized a cleansing operation on Hallowed Land?!”

An angered expression strewn across her face, Ornea burst into the office with enough force to tear off the door. Inside, facing the large desk as they did work, was a man nearing old age who had lost his eyeballs— nay, that was not so.

???: “…You are making quite a racket, Ornea.”

Uttered out from the man’s aging throat, was a report far too beautiful.

Immediately after, the man’s physique began to creak, and his appearance slowly transformed. Elasticity returned to his wrinkly skin, and his pigmentless hair was alight with a fiery hue. After a mere ten seconds, tangibly present there was not the deceased Holosseo Featherrun, but Sithonia Featherrun.

The eldest daughter of the sisters, who was maintaining the palace of Curse Dolls in place of their late master.

However, Ornea did not concern herself at all with that transfiguration of her elder sister, and closed in on her,

Ornea: “A racket? A racket you say? How do you expect me to not cause a racket with this?! Saria and Hildea are always heedless! But, just what the hell are you thinking?!”

Sithonia: “As always, I am thinking about my sisters. That goes for you too, no?”

Ornea: “And for that, you’re willing to accept a cleansing operation?!”

Sithonia: “Yes, of course. Are you really that surprised?”

As Ornea grabbed her by the collar, her breathing growing heavy as she voiced her objections, Sithonia tilted her head. Hearing her response, Ornea released her grip and took two, three steps back.

It was as if the Sithonia she thought she knew had changed into a completely different person.

Sithonia: “Turning into different people is something I always do, you know? That is my special skill.”

Ornea: “Even if, that was the case… nobody should be able to manipulate what’s in your heart. Even so, your decisions these days, they’re just like, just like…”

Sithonia: “Holosseo Featherrun. —As coldhearted as Father?”

Ornea: “…”

Pressed by those words, Ornea cast her eyes down in a feeble manner as she tried to respond. Hearing that, neither did Sithonia narrow her eyes, nor even attempt to alter her expression.

By no means did she want to think that while acting in the role of Holosseo, even Sithonia’s mentality could have been undermined to be the same as his.

Ornea: “If it’s a Curse Doll, could that be possible…?”

Sithonia: “—. Anyway, it was I who approved the cleansing operation for Saria and Hildea. In order to deal with Elsa… with that girl, I have decided it to be the best method. Is that so strange?”

Ornea: “…If she’d been hiding in some small Hallowed Land in the middle of nowhere, I wouldn’t object either. But, she’s in Innorandum… that’s a massive plot of Hallowed Land, yeah?!”

The Snowfield Capital of Innorandum was a city constructed upon exceptionally vast Hallowed Land in the Holy Kingdom of Gusteko. Of course, in terms of the number of inhabitants and level of importance to the state, the regular plots of Hallowed Land could not compare.

By nature, it was a plot that would cause one to hesitate to engage in combat that would draw attention there.

In such a location, that which Saria and Hildea were going to carry out was—

Sithonia: “—A cleansing operation.”

That was a last resort in order to eliminate heretics, whom the Church of the Holy King deemed were in the wrong. Aiming to remove problematic existences, it was a taboo deed unbound by any and all restrictions.

Once one was declared, the targeted land would be razed to the ground, no trace remaining.

In other words, though how she had done it was unclear, Sithonia had persuaded the Church of the Holy King. —In order to kill a single person, Elsa, she had secured permission to reduce a major plot of Hallowed Land to a scorched field.

Sithonia: “Of course, it is not as though the entire city will be burned. At most, just the district in which Elsa is hiding… Just one district out of more than fifty.”

Ornea: “…Even so, there’d still be no less than a thousand inhabitants.”

Sithonia: “Indeed. Still, it is necessary in order to protect the sisters. —Hey, Ornea.”

With those words, Sithonia closed the gap between herself and Ornea. Then, gently lifting her hand up, she stroked the cheek of an astonished Ornea.

The kind motion of that hand dispelling her caution, Ornea caught her breath.

—The sensation of those fingers, that affectionate gesture, seemed as if proof that Sithonia had not changed whatsoever.

Sithonia: “You are someone who treasures your sisters. With that in mind, if you were to weigh those precious sisters against random strangers on a scale, are you saying that those random strangers would be heavier?”

Ornea: “Th-That’s…”

Sithonia: “If you are objecting to the plan because you are worried about a thousand people you do not know, would that then not be the case? Am I wrong?”

You’re wrong, Ornea wished to say so.

However, her mouth moved not, and the will to go against Sithonia did not swell within her. On the contrary, Ornea’s heart was beginning to accept that Sithonia was actually right.

In reality, that was so. Sithonia was far more capable of making the right decision than the thoughtless Ornea.

For that reason, she and Sithonia split up their duties.

Sithonia: “I provide the valid judgements. That is why, Ornea, you shall…”

Ornea: “Become the spear of the sisters, who carries out that judgment… yes, that’s right.”

With a slow nod, Ornea reaffirmed her own worth, and her past choices. Then, looking back at Sithonia, she slightly pulled back her chin.

Ornea: “Understood… Out on a reckless cleansing operation, they’ve taken all the mansion’s dogs with them. Saria and Hildea, seems they’re going all out as well.”

Sithonia: “Indeed, that is what I am hoping for.”

Receiving Sithonia’s affirmation, Ornea breathed in, and turned her back to her elder sister.

Sithonia: “Ornea?”

Ornea: “I’m going to put my body to motion underground… Right now, I just need time to clear my mind of this haze.”

Leaving those words behind and naught more, Ornea left the office. Upon her departure, she set the broken door back into its original position, and stepped away once she ascertained Sithonia smiling in the corner of her eye.

Then, walking away from the office, as her footsteps picked up speed, she bit her lip.

Ornea: “Everything is for Featherrun, so that we sisters may live…”

Blood was flowing down her clenched fist, however, that was not noticed by the girl who felt no pain. But a single thing occupied her thoughts. —Her foolish youngest sister who, despite being able to feel pain, was undaunted by the notion of being wounded.

5

—A cleansing operation, that sound rang with a hazy familiarity in Elsa’s recollections.

Elsa: “If I’m not mistaken, it’s a coarse job to round up and deal with people who are hindrances.”

Her way of recalling that was coarse in and of itself, but no sisters were presently nearby to point that out.

If she were to delve into more detail within her memories, it was an authorization of extreme conduct in order to eliminate individuals regarded as heretics, those who go against the plans of the Church of the Holy King; such an understanding ought to have been accurate.

On that point, its objective was not too far off from the duties handed down to the Featherrun Sisters.

However—

Elsa: “Pretty much, unlike missions where you wouldn’t go after anything but the target and their surroundings, damages from these will extend endlessly… it seems like the opponent isn’t afraid to get reckless here.”

Tatiana: “Aa! Aa!”

Pulling on Elsa’s sleeve as she tilted her head, Tatiana frantically called out.

Her finger outstretched, it pointed further beyond the street, where the clamoring bellows and cries rang out without cease. She was urging Elsa to go join the fray unfolding there.

Elsa: “It’s likely that I’m the opponent’s target. That’s why, I can understand your feelings of wanting to sacrifice me to save yourself, Tatiana, but…”

Tatiana: “Uu?! Aa, uu!”

Elsa: “Yes, I’m aware. In most cases, everyone would prioritize their own life the most.”

When she shrugged her shoulders in an attempt to say that she did not mind, Tatiana vigorously shook her head sideways. Although she may have been a little too straightforward at times, it was easy to get along with Tatiana, as she never attempted to tactlessly deceive.

Only, the danger of bringing Tatiana along to a situation like this went without saying.

Elsa: “You don’t have a weapon that fits you just right, how troubling. Tatiana, will you be fine if I leave you be?”

Tatiana: “Uu?! Au! Aouu!”

Elsa: “A reassuring reply. In that case…”

Giving a nod to Tatiana’s attitude of regarding the hounds as nothing, Elsa was planning to split off from her. However, before she could make such a declaration, she remembered what Oliver had told her.

During his absence, he had entrusted her with Tatiana.

Elsa: “…”

Tatiana: “Aa! Uu!”

Elsa: “…I’m glad that you’re so brimming with confidence, but let’s actually stay together for now.”

In all likelihood, Tatiana would not require Elsa’s assistance, but she did not want to be scolded by Oliver for leaving her. If she did not keep with this babysitting, an act she had yet to grow accustomed to, then if worse came to worst, she would be kicked out.

Such a thing would be troublesome, and thus Elsa decided on going against Tatiana’s wishes.

Elsa: “Sorry about this, but please tag along with me, Tatiana.”

Tatiana: “Aa!”

Elsa: “Whether you like it or not, I’m bringing you along for the sake of my boring day to day.”

Tatiana: “Uu?!”

Tatiana had widened her eyes in protest. However, that was as far as the docile negotiations would go.

A moment later, many silhouettes appeared from the street beyond the alleyway, and came running towards Elsa and Tatiana. They were crowds seeking salvation from the pursuit of the dogs.

All were inhabitants of Innorandum whom, in her brief time here, were faces she seemed to recognize, but at the same time, she was not sure if she recognized them at all.

Elsa: “Well, I don’t really remember them, so I suppose it’s fine.”

Tatiana: “Auu?!”

With a soft mutter, Elsa forced Tatiana to the edge of the street without warning. Then, taking a low stance, she plunged right into the forefront of the fleeing crowd, unleashing a magnificent blow from her leg.

A man screamed out “Uoh?!” as he toppled over, and immediately after, the succession of people were trampled; screams turned to cries of pain, and finally, to death throes. Then, as people were trampled and tripped up in succession from that man, the alleyway was painted over with the agonizing cries of a hellscape.

Amidst the series of cries, angered bellows, and weeping voices of women, showing up late to the party were the howls of beasts— the growling voices of the ferocious hounds that had driven the crowd to this back alley.

In the name of a cleansing operation, the hounds had been granted permission to utterly chew up any whom they might lay eyes upon to death. And making full use of that murder license, the hounds sunk their fangs into the collapsed crowd.

Blood and shrieks flew up into the sky of the alley, satisfying the cruel hunting instincts of the hounds—

Elsa: “—Was a cleansing operation not a bad move, I wonder?”

Hound: “—BBRRAAARRK!”

The very next moment, Elsa shattered the window glass of a nearby building, and used a shard of it as a lethal blade to slit the throat of a hound.

She felt sorry for the dogs that were having the time of their lives feasting on their prey, but at least she was helping them along through the gates of hell with those climactic feelings as a parting gift.

Elsa: “I don’t have much interest in dog bowels. After all, I’d had my fill of them back when I was at the mansion.”

With a tight, bear-handed grip on the shard of glass, Elsa laughed as she stained her hands with blood. With a smile on her face, she dealt with every last one of the hounds inundating her.

Elsa had no qualms with using the crowd as bait to achieve that result.

It was not as though she valued her own life in particular, but—

Elsa: “That doesn’t mean I value others, either.”

She threw the shard of glass, and caught up with the hound that had leaped over the attack. Its jaw agape, Elsa used her hands to hold the oral cavity open as it endeavored to sink its fangs into her, and funneled strength into her arms.

After a moment’s resistance, the hound’s maw was torn top from bottom, ending its life. The hound’s blood showered her entire body, and turning back around, this indeed marked the annihilation of all the dogs that had hastened here.

She would have just killed around thirty.

???: “…Uh, ah, help, me…”

Elsa: “—? My apologies. I’m not a doctor, so there’s nothing I can do.”

She shook off the hand clinging to her leg, pleading for aid. It was unavoidable that those surrounding her would become unable to see properly as they teetered on the verge of death, but perhaps Elsa might have looked like a doctor?

Elsa: “You must have bad eyes.”

Leaving them with those words, Elsa stepped over the groaning crowd, and returned to Tatiana. Having been thrust away, Tatiana gazed up at Elsa’s red-stained figure,

Tatiana: “Aa, aa?”

Elsa: “Sorry for keeping you waiting. Don’t be mad now. I’ll kill them quicker next time.”

Deeply impressed with Tatiana’s nerves, Elsa waited for her to grip onto her sleeve once again.

There was certainly the option to slay the oncoming pursuers one after the other in this manner, but then the situation would not be resolved until dinnertime. Wanting to avoid that, Elsa would need to expedite the conclusion.

With that in mind, her target would naturally be—

Elsa: “—The root of the enemy, Saria and Hildea.”

Among the Featherrun Sisters, raising the dogs was the job of those twins.

It had been a system where Dorothea raised the flowers, Ornea raised Elsa, and the twins raised the dogs. She did not know what Sithonia had been raising. At the very least, she had failed to raise Elsa.

Elsa: “I’m sure Sithonia must have had no talent for raising anything.”

The desires and disposition of the person in question were things that did not really align with each other. On that point, Elsa ought to give her thanks to something for the fact that her abilities and tastes did indeed mesh well.

Nothing came to mind immediately, so she decided she would just give her thanks to Oliver.

Elsa: “Anyhow, let’s go somewhere more open. The opponent should also be looking for me, so I think they’ll come out to kill me if I go to a place where I stand out.”

Tatiana: “Au?! Aauu?”

Elsa: “Don’t say such barbaric things. For the most part, they should understand what I have to say since we’re sisters. I think it’s bad to throw away the option for negotiations right at the outset.”

Her sleeve still being pinched, Elsa took the hot-headed Tatiana out with her to the main street. She had slaughtered all the hounds that had come from there, so no additional pursuers appeared.

Along the road, there were a few people scattered around, collapsed and begging for help, so Elsa would have no choice but to occasionally stop and rebuke Tatiana, who eagerly wished to finish them off.

Elsa: “You’re a terribly stubborn girl, aren’t you now?”

Eat, sleep, kill; Tatiana’s avarice for such deeds was so truly human. If Elsa was capable of acting with as little restraint as she did, how good might that be?

Ultimately, people were all bound by fetters. At times, that was a terribly troublesome truth.

Elsa: “Hey, Saria, Hildea. —Don’t the two of you also think so?”

In the snowy plaza entangled with blood and screams, Elsa turned her vision, and inclined her head. And, receiving those words from their younger sister, upon the time tower located in the center of the plaza— atop the tower equipped with magic crystals signifying the time, visible from even a distance, two silhouettes held each other by the hand.

Then the sisters, as similar as two peas in a pod, nuzzled their cheeks together,

Saria: “Hey, did you hear? This Elsa really hasn’t changed in the slightest.”

Hildea: “Yes, I heard. This Elsa really hasn’t changed whatsoever.”

Indeed, as if to confirm with each other, Saria and Hildea flashed callous smiles.

As always, with the same expressions and the same dresses, they were identical twins no matter how you sliced it. Elsa narrowed her eyes upon seeing their unchanged demeanor, and breathed a brief sigh

Elsa: “I see you haven’t changed either, isn’t that so?”

Saria: “Indeed, that might be so. But, maybe not, according to Hildea.”

Hildea: “This is what Saria is thinking: even if you don’t appear any different, you might have still changed.”

Elsa: “Me? Well, I am certainly still in the midst of growing, so I might have gotten a bit taller, but…”

Saria & Hildea: “No, that’s not it at all!”

As Elsa pondered over their comments, Saria and Hildea rejected her answer in unison. Elsa widened her eyes wondering what it could be, and the twins gestured with their overlapping hands in her direction.

They were pointing towards Tatiana, who had drawn in her shoulders.

Elsa: “—. Is something the matter with this girl?”

Saria: “Something the matter? Something the matter, you say? This is a great shock to Hildea!”

Hildea: “Saria is also surprised. To think that Elsa of all people would be together with somebody else.”

With expressions suggesting they had just witnessed the strangest thing in the world, Saria and Hildea shared in astonishment. Then, they stared right into the eyes of one another, and,

Saria & Hildea: “—Even though she killed Dorothea.”

Elsa: “…”

Hearing Saria and Hildea’s tone, Elsa’s eyebrows twitched up. That was not because she was displeased with their words, but rather, because they were unexpected.

Elsa: “I’m surprised. I never would have thought you two would come after me because of what happened with Dorothea.”

Saria: “Is that so? It’s surprising that Hildea has sentiments for her younger sister?”

Hildea: “It’s strange that Saria was worried about Dorothea?”

Elsa: “Indeed. After all, I’d thought that you two were only ever interested in yourselves.”

Hence, even supposing Elsa were to be hunted for killing Dorothea, she had thought that Ornea, who cherished her younger sister, would have been the only one to do so.

Elsa: “Thanks to that, when the dogs first came out, I had thought it might be some sort of misunderstanding.”

Saria: “Is that so? Even so, you killed the dogs without hesitation, that made Hildea sad.”

Hildea: “They were pups we had raised in our personal care, and yet, oh so poor Saria!”

The twins put on overexaggerated mourning, but their intent was evident, their aim clear.

The problem that remained was the overwhelming disadvantage she was at. Unlike when she had lured Dorothea to a place laid with flawless traps, Saria and Hildea were the ones taking the initiative this time.

She would have no choice but to overturn that disadvantage, and bare her fangs to deliver them past the limits of their lives, far surpassing that of ordinary people.

For that purpose—

Elsa: “So, how long do you plan to keep holding hands up there? I really don’t mind in the slightest if you just keep watching from there, but the corpses will only grow all the more if you leave it up to the dogs, you know?”

Saria: “My oh my, the nerve to say such things. You’ve put Hildea in a bad mood.”

Hildea: “My my, If you say such things, even Saria will be pushed to her limit.”

Elsa attempted to drag the twins down from the time tower, and the girls parted for a moment, then danced back into an embrace, and the sound of their hands coming together loudly resounded.

And then—

Saria & Hildea: “—How about we introduce you to our most prized pup!”

Immediately after, two fiendish roars overlapped, quaking through the plaza— nay, through all of Innorandum.

The being that had produced that double layered bellow vigorously kicked off the snow as it charged towards the plaza, at the foot of the time tower before Elsa and Tatiana.

As snow scattered about, saliva drooled out from two giant maws, and the giant shadow lorded over Elsa and Tatiana.

Beast: “—GRAAOWRRHK!!”

The enormous demon dog boasting two heads— was the Witchbeast, Orthrus.

6

Orthrus: "—GRAAOWRRHK!"

Basking in the point blank roar of the Orthrus, Elsa's onyx locks and dress were greatly disheveled.

The feeling as oppressive as a bolt of lightning, Elsa licked her lips, and touched the goosebumps on her arms as chills quavered through her body. —She was not frightened, rather, her feelings were that of elation.

Elsa: "Wonderful."

Tatiana: "Aauu?!"

Faced with the Orthrus, Elsa spoke her candid feelings, causing Tatiana to act rambunctiously. As she pulled on Elsa's arm with that unruly outburst, Elsa looked up at the twins on the time tower,

Elsa: "Even though I was your sister, I had no idea you'd kept this sort of pet."

Saria: "Well, Hildea's been saying that it hasn't been all too long since you became our sister."

Hildea: "Though, if you had gotten along with Saria and I, we may have told you in secret."

Elsa: "I see. But, in exchange for that I had the pleasure of being surprised, so I'm fine with it."

The twins replied with mischievous smiles, and Elsa held her breath. Then, the very moment after a strain was begotten within the slightly cold atmosphere, the Orthrus sprung into action.

Orthrus: "—GRAAOWRRHK!"

The body of the twin-headed demon dog spanned at least five meters, from a quick estimation.

Just one of its front legs easily surpassed Elsa in mass, and its destructive force, unleashed at speeds that could scythe down the wind, would reduce a human body to dust in an instant.

Tatiana made an intrepid attempt to intercept the blow, and as Elsa pulled her back while narrowly avoiding a graze from the foreleg, she leaped a great deal backwards.

Any blow with such great mass behind it would prove fatal; a mere graze was quite capable of entirely extinguishing the flame of her life. But, even if she had evaded that front leg, it did not mean her life was secured.

Elsa: “A mouth so big it can swallow me whole, how troublesome.”

Twisting her body around, she barely escaped the powerful jaws. However, her heart could not so easily bear the sensation of her life being grazed. Much less when up against the Orthrus, where that anguish was made twofold.

Fang thrashed against fang, and a melody of the air being crushed in the jaws ensued; all the while, Elsa continued to dance past the onslaught of the Orthrus, Tatiana in her arms.

As snow fluttered, the two heads of the demon dog danced through the white plaza, kicking around the scattered corpses and the inhabitants who were still clinging on the verge of death. That passionate act of predation would instantaneously uproot her life if caught in it.

But, she could not keep up these evasive maneuvers for long. Furthermore, it was not as though the assassins, Saria and Hildea, were merely watching the battle unfold from a distance.

Saria & Hildea: “Taaa~ke that!!”

The Orthrus’s jaws snapped at Elsa as she leapt away, the sound of which overlapped with the voices of the twins. In that instant, what cleaved its way into the corner of Elsa’s vision, was a blade of death revolving at a rapid speed— in the center of their specialized weapon, the Plenilune Cirque, Saria and Hildea closed in on her as they spun happily.

Elsa: “—Hk.”

On the spur of the moment, Elsa had utilized one of the corpses collapsed in the plaza. The body had been chewed up by the hounds, and kicking it up, she used it to intercept the attack from the Plenilune Cirque. Of course, the attack was not one that could be held back with a corpse. The dead body was cleaved in twain instantly.

However, with the advent of a momentary delay, Elsa plunged into an opening of death between the Orthrus’s fangs and the Plenilune Cirque, and grasped survival as she skidded across the snowy street.

Elsa: “Now that you’ve finally come down, I suppose this is the main event?”

Saria: “Well, Hildea’s impressed with that impudent mouth of yours, Elsa.”

Hildea: “Indeed, Saria also might be impressed by how unwilling you are to admit defeat.”

Without cease to their rotation, the twins blurred amidst the snow as they ridiculed Elsa.

But, their laughs were no bluffs. And that was because they did so whilst looking down at Elsa who, in exchange for her life, had suffered a vast amount of blood loss from the wounds on her shoulder and waist, unable to evade.

Tatiana: “Aa! Auu!”

Elsa: “…Don’t be so angry. I’m aware that I look pathetic.”

Relentlessly slapping her hands on Elsa’s wounds, Tatiana was indignant at her cowardice. While receiving her scolding, Elsa focused on finding an opening in the enemy’s offensive.

She had poor compatibility against the Orthrus, which had the full ability to utilize its body in this large plaza. And with the anomalous attacks of the twins thrown into the mix, it would be impossible to secure this war front through logic.

Elsa: “But, I’ve gotten used to having your weight on me.”

Tatiana: “Uu! Uu!”

Elsa: “Yes, this won’t do for next time.”

While her wounds were still being beaten, Elsa nodded at Tatiana, who she was carrying in her arms. Having her arms occupied was undeniably inconvenient, but she would not be able to deal with the outcome if she abandoned her and they targeted her.

If anything were to happen to her, Oliver’s angered face came to her mind. Therefore, she would act to the best of her ability.

Indeed, as Elsa came to a conclusion so very much unlike herself, Saria and Hildea cackled in shrill voices.

Saria: “Hey, did you see? Did you hear? This Elsa is oh so strange!”

Hildea: “Yes, I saw, I heard! This Elsa won’t lose heart!”

Shrill laughter it was, and yet, the contents were not that of praising Elsa. On the contrary, it was something that had emerged from feelings of pitying, of looking down on Elsa.

As to where that composure of theirs was coming from, Elsa was suspicious—

Saria: “The pathetic Elsa, the pitiful Elsa! We’ll tell you, for your own sake.”

Hildea: “There was no helping it, you had no shot of winning from the outset, foolish Elsa!”

Elsa: “…”

Saria & Hildea: “After all, that’s what it means to have a weakness!”

As they spoke, each supporting the Plenilune Cirque with a single hand, Saria and Hildea gestured to something with their overlapping free hands; towards the time tower from which they had just descended.

Following with her gaze, Elsa pursed her lips when she noticed. The composure she had been maintaining in a calm and collected manner was lost.

That was because—

Elsa: "—Oliver."

Thereupon, Oliver was strung up, battered and beaten.

Oliver: "…"

His head languidly lowered, the strung up Oliver was barely still breathing. It was clear in a single glance at his swollen face and sullied clothes that he had undergone considerable torture.

Through clear malice and enmity, Oliver had been wounded in mind and body, and taken captive.

Tatiana: "Aauu!!"

When Tatiana noticed it too, her eyes widened as she frantically cried out. She pulled on Elsa's black hair with her small hands, and pleaded as she pointed at Oliver.

To free Oliver, to save him, she was pleading so.

Elsa: "I've never heard of something like a slave attempting to save their slaver."

Tatiana: "Aa!"

Elsa: "But, yes. Oliver is an irreplaceable eccentric, so it would be troublesome for him to pass away."

Lending an ear to Tatiana's appeals, Elsa licked her lips.

It would have been different if he were already dead, but as long as he was still breathing, he could still be saved. She would still have many opportunities to listen to Oliver’s noisy rebukes. For that reason too—

Saria: “—Elsa, why do you think Hildea and I chose this town to do a cleansing operation?”

Hildea: “—Elsa, who do you think it was that told Saria and I that you would be here?”

The moment she took a step, the beastmaster twins, who were accompanied by the hounds and the demon dog, made their declaration. Wondering what the intent behind those words was, Elsa knitted her brow.

That momentary standstill had allowed a fatal— nay, it would not amount to anything fatal for Elsa.

However—

Orthrus: “—GRAAOWRRHK!”

Tatiana: “AAAAUUUUU!!”

Beholding the sight of Elsa’s arm being bitten off alongside a howl, Tatiana shrieked.

Even if it did not amount to a fatal wound, it had resulted in her being robbed of her arm.

7

The moment her arm was bitten off, Elsa’s thoughts were drowned out by pain and loss.

It was a body that would regenerate no matter how finely it was chopped up, and Elsa had even once been reduced to just a head and an arm, but that did not liberate her from the terror of losing a part of her body.

The discomfort of losing something that ought to have been there would stain one's heart and mind black with unease, such that even Elsa ended up being mercilessly swallowed by it.

Elsa: "…"

Ergo, Elsa's next move was not something conjured using her head.

Her right arm torn off from the elbow down, what dangled down from the filthy mouth of the wound was blood, muscle fibers, and veins. Nestled within was bone, vehemently protected by the flesh, and brandishing that, she launched her attack.

The pointed tip of the bone bore into a tender eyeball head-on, piercing through it and ripping it apart.

That was a blow landed on the head of the Orthrus that did not eat Elsa's arm, as if to spite the head that had. The left eye of the left of its two heads gouged out, the Orthrus's anguished wail sounded through the air of the plaza.

They may have shared the same body, but perhaps they were to be considered different beings from the neck upwards, as it was only the one stabbed in the eye that cried out in pain. Displeased with that inequality, Elsa's leg sprung up and fiercely bore a hole into the throat of the one that had eaten her arm.

With a kick so mighty that even her own leg began to creak, she could feel her shoe shattering through her opponent's bones. That moment of recoil gave Elsa a taste of ecstasy, and as a result reined her back in to reality.

Elsa: "—Ah."

In terms of time, Elsa had lost herself for not even three seconds. But, in those three seconds, blood had begun to spill from the eyes and mouths of both the Orthrus's heads.

Only, she had felt that those three seconds she lost herself had been accompanied by an unbelievable sense of liberation. Just so she could get a taste of those three seconds again, she would plunge her consciousness into an even deeper place—

Saria: “Elsa, Hildea says you can’t do that!”

Hildea: “Saria says we won’t let you go that far!”

Reaching out to grasp the inexplicable sensation, Elsa attempted to go further beyond, but those voices called out to hold her back. However, without paying them mind, Elsa still tried to proceed further.

???: “Gy, AHHHHHHHH—!”

The clangor of the man’s voice that followed, a timber she knew well, did not allow her to do so.

Right before she could reach a state of trance, Saria and Hildea moved to the edge of the plaza. Then, the thin steel wire strung up there, only visible if one strained their eyes, was bisected by the blade cast in the form of the full moon, the Plenilune Cirque.

The steel wire was cut, and as a result, Oliver shrieked out in pain atop the time tower.

Saria: “We strung him up with a thin wire. Hildea did a great job, now didn’t she?”

Hildea: “Whenever one of the threads holding him up is severed, the burden on the other remaining strung up fingers will increase. Just now, Saria thinks he may have lost a finger.”

The callous proclamation gave Elsa a deep admiration of the twins’ meticulousness.

He would lose fingers whenever the load increased, and when he eventually became unable to support his body, he would plummet. If such came to pass, and he fell from such a height, Oliver would be beyond saving.

Moreover, the one-armed Elsa had an additional problem of a different sort.

That was—

Tatiana: “Au, auu!!”

Elsa: “As expected, it’s difficult to carry you like this, so it won’t do.”

She could not carry Tatiana with a single arm. Hence, Elsa dropped Tatiana to the ground, and then firmly grasped her outstretched hand.

The girl who had refused to have her hands occupied even when simply going around the food stalls, now joined hands with another.

Elsa: “How ironic.”

With the hand that had previously not been joined due to a reluctance towards being tied down, Elsa forcibly pulled Tatiana along. In an attempt to avoid a risky situation, she had ended up joining hands when things were most risky, thus putting the carriage before the ground dragon.

Tatiana’s body was small, her strides short. Even so, if Elsa pulled her arm firmly, raising her aloft, she could then put up a good fight against the wounded Orthrus.

However—

Saria: “If you keep running away, Hildea supposes that means your situation is only getting worse and worse.”

Speaking thus, Saria smiled at Elsa as the latter evaded the Orthrus’s fangs. Within the gyrating Plenilune Cirque, the expressions of the twins alternated, as they flew to another position in the plaza, cutting a steel wire.

Oliver: “GYAHHHHH!!”

Hildea: “Saria is wondering how many fingers he has left after this!”

Each time Oliver’s cries echoed throughout the plaza, his future prospects were sacrificed.

Oliver’s shrill voice usually gave off an annoying impression, but at the current moment, its timbre got on her nerves to an overwhelming extent. —To be precise, it was Saria and Hildea's actions to make Oliver scream, that got on her nerves.

Elsa: "Though, I'd be more grateful if you'd just tell me exactly what it is you want to do."

With Oliver as a hostage, did they wish Elsa to concede? Or perhaps, were they trying to get her caught on the Orthrus's fangs to make it seem like an act of suicide? 'Twas neither.

Right now, the deed being enacted was an abuse of Oliver. There was no meaning to be found in the act.

Saria: "My, you've forgotten to give an explanation to Elsa, Hildea."

Hildea: "Well, Saria is a careless girl, so it can't be helped."

The movements of the revolving twins halted, and as a cloud of snow was kicked up around them, they smiled. Then, as they peacefully traced the next steel wire right beside them,

Saria: "Our objective isn't just to punish him for having helped Elsa kill Dorothea."

Hildea: "Not just to punish him, we need him to become a poison that will force you to obey, Elsa."

Oliver: "Gih! Agh! GYAHHHH!!"

With each strum of the taut steel wire, Oliver shrieked from the damage to his remaining fingers.

As Elsa focused her attention on seeking the words to come from the twins enacting thus upon him—

Tatiana: "Auu!!"

By the time she became cognizant to Tatiana's warning, it was too late.

To the fore, the injured demon dog surrendered itself to wrath, hammering its front leg right into Elsa. She promptly spun her body around, distancing Tatiana from a direct hit. But, that was the limit of what she could have done.

All other defensive maneuvers remaining at a count of zero, the tremendous impact directly connected with Elsa's body.

Elsa: "…"

Her entire body shattering; relishing in a sensation much akin, Elsa's body was sent flying away in a manner reminiscent of a catch-ball.

Such an impact gave Elsa yet another taste of ecstasy.

Teetering on the brink of death was the one way ticket needed to deliver her to that moment; her soul verily interpreted it so. Thus, pruning all extraneous and troublesome elements, she would conduct herself as "Elsa" and naught more—.

Elsa: "—Sh."

The Witchbeast hot on her tail, Elsa kicked the ground with her back leg as she flew. That instant, her body flicked up high above the head of the bulldozing demon dog.

Stifling its large body's momentum with its claws, the twin heads of the demon dog snapped back around. The calvaria of both heads were simultaneously struck by the downward swing of Elsa's toes.

Orthrus: "—GRAAOWRRHK!"

Both heads sunk into the ground, the demon dog howled right away as it ate a ferocious blow. Lend an ear to those objecting howls Elsa did not, instead, still continuing to swing her legs down in turns, crushing blows were delivered to the Orthrus.

However, the perfunctory pursuit would go on no longer.

Saria & Hildea: "You can't do that, you bad, bad girl, Elsa."

Voices resounded in melody, and Elsa's body atop the heads of the Orthrus was blown away alongside a cloud of blood.

Aiming for a back full of openings, Saria and Hildea slammed their Plenilune Cirque. The tempestuous upheaval of snow was sullied with blood, and Elsa raised her head, three limbs remaining to her as her right arm was missing.

—Before her eyes, the gaping maws of the Orthrus closed in.

Elsa: "…"

Instantly, her brain warned that she had to either jump left or right. However, in the disastrous absence of fixation and discernment, a delay to execute what her mind had thought of was yielded.

And, in this lethal situation, that had been a fatal delay.

Orthrus: "—GRAAOWRRHK!"

Whilst hearing the close-by howl, Elsa's thoughts veered in a useless direction.

When she had descended into the waterway to escape her sisters, Elsa had reduced her body to just a head and an arm, but if she were to be eaten by a living creature, would she be able to replicate that?

In that case, would regeneration begin from the head or the heart—

Tatiana: "Aa."

Elsa: "—Tatiana?"

Thinking useless thoughts, Elsa was about to be eaten by the Orthrus. Upon her eardrums, struck the thoroughly familiar voice of Tatiana.

Then, two hands joined to Elsa's left, forcefully and resolutely pulling her.

Elsa might have been light, but her posture was also at fault. Without having firmly braced her legs on the snow, the force of that pull swapped the places of Elsa and Tatiana. —Their places, had been swapped.

Tatiana: “Uu.”

In the corner of her eye, the expression she had glimpsed on Tatiana’s face was tranquil. It was as if to say she had fulfilled her dearest desire, and Elsa’s mind was enveloped in an inability to comprehend.

Why was Tatiana, the very embodiment of destructive impulses, wearing such an expression?

She had wanted to ask. However, that opportunity would never come. —It would escape her for all eternity.

Orthrus: “—GRAAOWRRHK!”

In the following moment, Tatiana’s smiling figure vanished into the Orthrus’s right maw. As those jaws, lined with sharp fangs as they were, snapped shut, Tatiana’s very existence vanished.

In Elsa’s field of vision, all that remained of Tatiana were two slender legs from the knees down.

Orthrus: “—GRAAOWRRHK!”

Eyes opened wide, legs at a halt, Elsa stood.

The head opposite to the one that had eaten Tatiana set its sights on Elsa in an attempt to devour her. Its bloodstained fangs sank into Elsa’s white skin, attempting to tear her apart—

Elsa: “—Strangely, I found that quite upsetting.”

—Following that, the Orthrus’s cranium exploded, bereaving the twin-headed demon dog of one of its halves evermore.

8

Elsa: “…”

Preventing the large mouth from closing with her arm and leg, she used her pivot leg to unleash a kick to the back of the throat laid bare.

Leg strength transcending the realm of common rationality thus blew the head of the enormous demon dog asunder from within; one half of the demon dog, a beast unparalleled in its fiendish nature, was delivered into the clutches of death.

Orthrus: "——GRAAOWRRHK!"

Elsa: "Even if one of your heads died, you're still alive. —Thank goodness."

Towards the right head, enraged by the gruesome death of its other half as it was, Elsa loosened her blood red lips into a smile.

To be frank, that kick from a moment ago had been enacted as retaliation. Of course, given that they were connected by body, the Orthrus's actions, good and bad akin, ought to have been shouldered by both of its heads.

But, it would be sorrowful to not kill an opponent she thought she should kill, especially when she had a reason to do so.

Such was how Elsa thought. —No, this was the first time she had thought it.

Elsa: "Hence, I'm going to give you a painful death."

Not once had Elsa ever thought to kill something out of hatred. To Elsa, life or death was naught more than the outcome. Pleasure was always to be derived from the process.

Orthrus: "…"

The demon dog swung its front leg down in anger, only to be caught head-on by Elsa's "newly grown" set of arms as she held her ground. Then, being rivalled in a contest of strength by a puny existence, the demon dog's pride was injured; its fur was grasped, and its body was flung with full force.

As it soared, what lay at the end of the demon dog’s parabolic arc was—

Saria: “You’ve got to be kidding, unbelievable.”

Hildea: “Unbelievable, it’s as if you’re kidding.”

Grasping the Plenilune Cirque, Saria and Hildea stood with dumbfounded expressions.

The Plenilune Cirque was indeed a mighty blade, but in a situation like this one, its lack of maneuverability was its shortcoming. Things might have been different if they could make the decision to bisect the Orthrus, but they would not deliberately diminish their fighting strength.

Saria: “HILDEA!”

Hildea: “SARIA!”

Calling out to one another, the twins halted the rotation of the Plenilune Cirque, and slipped right under the soaring demon dog. After they slipped out, they were planning on resuming the blade’s rotation.

But, as soon as the pathetic screams of the demon dog flew over above their lowered postures, a black shadow wedged its way between the two as they tried to begin spinning.

Saria & Hildea: “El—”

Elsa: “The two of you really have such a good relationship. I’m jealous.”

Saria: “SA…!”

In clearly calling out the name of the interloper, only one of the twins had been successful.

With eyes opened wide, the elder sister, Saria, reached her hand towards Elsa as the latter ascended once more. However, Elsa evaded her fingers with a leap. —All the while, carrying the younger sister, Hildea, in her arms.

Hildea: “K, yaaaaaaa—!”

A shrill shriek was raised from Hildea’s mouth, her face caught in a firm hold.

The reason being that Elsa had forced her body against a wall, scraping it down. Her hair and dress of silver hue were stained in blood, ceaselessly.

Saria: “W-Wait! Wait, Elsa! Let Hildea go!”

Hildea: “S-Saria! Saria, help! Hel… AHHHHHHHH!!”

Dragging the Plenilune Cirque along, Saria screamed. Hildea also sought rescue from the distant girl, but Elsa would allow no such thing. Giving no response, she resumed her retribution upon Hildea.

Retribution. Indeed, this was retribution. Lawful retribution, for that which had been stolen.

Elsa: “I experienced something unpleasant. Hence, I’ll let you experience the same thing. —Sit by and watch as your younger sister is tormented due to your own inadequacy.”

Saria: “—Hk!”

Her face going even more pale, Saria’s beautiful features were colored in fear.

It seemed that the Plenilune Blade functioned on the premise that it would be controlled by two people. Left behind, Saria’s movements were dull, unable to form a counterattack unto Elsa.

That was to say, the notion that one of them might be removed had not even been considered from the start.

Elsa: “Too bad.”

With Saria unable to do a thing, Elsa proceeded to destroy Hildea’s limbs.

Her shoulders, her elbows, her wrists. Her hips, her knees, her ankles. Thoroughly destroying them in proper sequence, she applied torment with bilateral symmetry, and on each occasion Hildea would scream, calling out Saria's name.

Elsa: "Ornea also spoke of it. The fact that wounds heal carries a high risk of being subjected to eternal torture with no escape. Well, Ornea couldn't feel pain, so it's a bit unfair."

The second daughter of the sisters, who knew not the fear of pain, was an existence invincible through her ability to regenerate when broken.

Uncharacteristically recalling the training she had received from her, Elsa began to destroy Hildea's body anew, as it had been attempting to heal from the outset of the prior destruction, and pitied the wretched scene.

Though, by no means did she take it easy.

Saria: "ELSA—!!"

Elsa: "—?"

Breaking Hildea's defiant arm, the number of joints had almost been doubled, and with a blood curdling expression Saria called out Elsa's name.

It appeared that she had discarded the Plenilune Cirque, standing light on her feet in a corner of the plaza. Her hand was placed upon a steel wire that was stringing Oliver up.

Clasping it with a bare hand, golden eyes shone with loathing as their gaze pierced Elsa,

Saria: "If you want this man to be returned safely, let Hildea…"

Hildea: "Gih! Gyah! Hyah! Sa, Sari…AHHHHhhhhhhh!!"

Saria: "—Hk."

Before Saria as she tried to make a threat, Hildea's head was bashed into a wall. Hildea shed blood from a gash on her forehead, and lifting that head up, Elsa displayed it to Saria.

Saria: "Hi…"

Elsa: "Do you think these conditions are equal? I can still live if Oliver ends up dying, but will you be able to live if Hildea dies?"

The question left Saria speechless.

But, the tables had already turned. The moment Hildea was seized, and the Orthrus's fighting capacity was reduced by half— no, they had turned at the very moment Tatiana was killed.

Elsa: "—I heard the sound of something dislodging inside my head."

That had been the same sensation as what one experienced when driven to the brink of death.

When one's soul was unleashed from the cage known as oneself, it would bring about an overwhelming strength alongside a feeling of ecstasy. What was now different compared to before was that there certainly dwelled an awareness within Elsa.

Mustering all the latent abilities that could only ever be drawn out through a state of ecstasy, Elsa was transformed into a weapon of annihilation that displayed the full potential of a Curse Doll.

Elsa: "…"

To put it bluntly, it differed to the very way she had been viewing the world until now.

As her limbs were being broken, Hildea attempted to resist and escape restraint. However, Elsa took no note of it. Her course of movement, her aims, Elsa could anticipate based on the fluctuations in her gaze and muscles.

This was—

Elsa: "Ornea's state of mind… How ironic."

Saria: “El—”

Elsa: “I’ll give it back.”

Encouraged by a sudden sense of fatigue, Elsa flung Hildea’s body.

Saria: “…”

Seeing that, Saria fell into a momentary astounded silence, then immediately ran to her younger sister.

Having undergone the thorough torment from Elsa, Hildea had become a loose clump of flesh and blood. Despite having been akin to two peas in a pod, the likeness of the tragic twins had already been altered definitively.

Elsa: “It’s a shame that you’re no longer matching. Let me help you match again.”

Chasing after Hildea’s flight path, the hem of Saria’s dress fluttered. With the two of them in the corner of her sight, Elsa passed by Saria, and towards the corner of the plaza— clutching the twins’ discarded Plenilune Cirque, she hauled it up through sheer force.

Saria: “—Hk!”

Pouring strength into her arms, she lifted the Plenilune Cirque. The weight of the weapon required that the twins Saria and Hildea wield it together, but with Elsa’s current physical strength, it was nothing.

Saria: “HILDEA—!!”

Looking back, she witnessed as Saria ran and caught up to the battered Hildea. Ripping the hem of her dress, Saria caught Hildea’s fall with her slender arms.

Hildea: “Sari… a…”

Saria: “It’s okay, it’ll all be okay, Hildea. We’ll—”

Embracing the bloodied body of her younger sister, tears streamed out of Saria's eyes. And, held in the arms of her elder sister, Hildea gazed with her eyes half-closed— those eyes of hers widened.

Elsa: "—I'll be sending you to meet the angels."

Serving up a smile to Hildea's dread, Elsa sent the Plenilune Cirque flying with all her might.

The titanic blade gyrated at monstrously high speeds, assailing the twins' embrace from behind.

Saria: "—Ah."

In response to the incoming Plenilune Cirque, the only thing Hildea could do, tottering on the brink of death, was widen her eyes. Saria had naught an opening to question the meaning of the reaction strewn upon her little sister's face.

Thus, the thick blade perforated Saria's back, and without faltering, cleaved her delicate body in twain. Naturally, as Hildea was being held in an embrace, she too was split in half at the chest.

Saria: "…"

Unable to even cry out in pain, Saria and Hildea both collapsed, tops parted from their bottoms. Copious amounts of blood and viscera scattered about the plaza, and the wretched sight pitifully expanded.

Saria: "Hil… dea…"

Hildea: "Sar… ia…"

Crawling with just her upper half, Saria headed towards Hildea. Sprawled out on her back atop the stone pavement, Hildea answered her slowly approaching elder sister with naught more than a gaze.

Then, the bisected sisters overlaid their hands with each other, trying to somehow reconnect—

Elsa: "—It seems like you're aware of your situation. Good dog."

A black shadow swooped down upon the twins, and the trickle of saliva sullied the bloodstained dresses a degree further. Saria and Hildea's eyes opened wide at what was transpiring, and looking down at them was the demon dog with its mouth gaping wide open.

Having lost one of its heads, the Orthrus had found itself in a battered state. Whilst raising a savage roar, it directed hostility towards the ones who were supposed to be its owners, Saria and Hildea.

Saria: "Wh…y…?"

Elsa: "Who knows? When all is said and done, I suppose it's just the way of nature. Even Witchbeasts are made to instinctively follow the strong… that's what I think."

Caressing the flattened, filthy cross section remaining of the neck, Elsa sweetly smiled. Receiving the sensation of her palm, the Orthrus hung its head to demonstrate its submission.

Rather than hatred due to its other half having been slain, it followed its instincts, and chose survival. —In that regard, beasts were more sincere to life, and thus simpler to understand.

Elsa: "Though, it'd have been best for the two of you to leave the likes of me alone."

Saria: "That's because, you were…"

Elsa: "—Did you think I was attempting to kill all of you? I never even thought of doing such a thing. The situation with Dorothea was an unfortunate misunderstanding."

Hearing Elsa's words, the twins' cheeks stiffened as if it was utterly unbelievable. Even if they made such faces, it was still the truth, so being doubted was nothing but a loss.

Towards Elsa, who harbored such discontent, the sisters composed only of upper halves directed their loathing.

Saria: "An unfortunate, misunderstanding…? Even so…"

Hildea: “You still killed Dorothea… didn’t you…?”

Elsa: “Oh my.”

Hearing the twins’ loathsome mutterings, Elsa felt something unexpected from the bottommost depths of her heart, and raised her eyebrows.

It was the same strong emotion she had harbored when this cleansing operation had begun; when she had seen Saria and Hildea at the plaza. —It was the astonishment towards the fact that these two desired to take revenge for Dorothea.

She had misunderstood these twins as girls who looked at naught else but each other, but—

Elsa: “If the two of you desired vengeance for Dorothea, then it was unavoidable. I was the one who killed Dorothea, after all. —The two of you had a reason to desire that, it would seem.”

Saria: “Elsa—”

Elsa: “So, you ought to understand, right?”

Tilting her head as she spoke, Elsa lightly tapped the Orthrus’s head.

Taking that as a signal, the Orthrus began to move. The sharp fangs lining its gaping maw mercilessly dashed towards one of the sisters sprawled out on the ground— towards Hildea.

The face of the silver haired girl twisted in sorrow, her lips calling “Sari…” to her elder sister.

However, she had not been permitted to finish that utterance. —As had been the case for Tatiana.

Saria: “HILDEA—!!!”

The maw snapped shut, and began to chew. Within the Witchbeast’s mouth, Hildea was minced, mashed, and morphed into a wreckage of flesh and blood that could not be recovered from; of this fact, Elsa and Saria akin were acutely aware.

Saria and Hildea were both Featherrun Sisters. Transformed into Curse Dolls, their flesh held an immortal nature, and as such, they would not perish with their bodies being split in two.

Nevertheless, if their bodies were masticated, eaten alive by another creature, there would be no saving them.

Elsa: "It'd be a different story for me or Ornea, though."

Saria: "Why… why, Elsa…?"

Elsa: "—? Ah, you want to ask why it only targeted Hildea? Let's see, it does seem strange to me as well, but… somehow, it seems like I'm angry."

Her other half devoured, Saria's eyes lost their light as a waterfall of tears shed from them. Her question, reminiscent of a doll, caused Elsa to reflect on herself, as she patted her chest and exhaled.

Within her heart, the accumulation of unavoidable emotions asserted themselves. That encroached on the being known as Elsa, driving her towards enacting a cruel deed.

She did not find it especially pleasant. Only, she felt just a little bit —

Elsa: "I'm relieved. Though, I don't hate either of you, that's the truth."

Saria: "…I'm, going to kill you."

Elsa: "That won't be possible."

The words rang as a malediction, however, Elsa answered without emotion. As if to affirm her response, the Orthrus, having finished its slow mastication of the younger sister, directed its gaze towards the elder.

The Witchbeast's instincts sought a decision from Elsa, to whom it had demonstrated its subservience.

Facing one who had committed inexcusable acts of barbarism, what sort of verdict would Elsa pass?

Saria: “…I’m, going to kill you.”

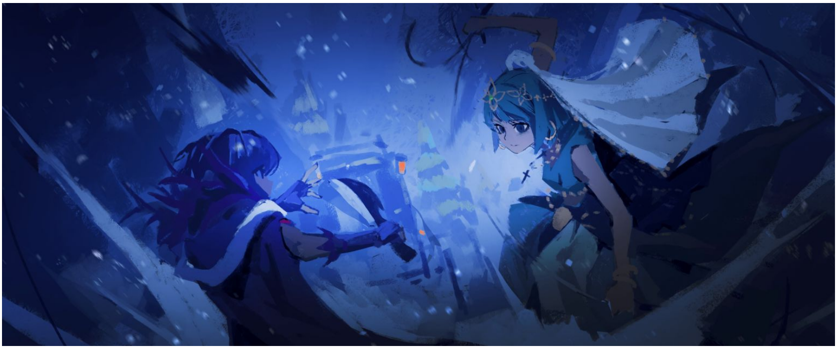
Elsa: “Didn’t I tell you? It’s a shame for the two of you, being so close as you are, to not be matching. So, I’ll help you match again.”

That served as the response.

Still did Saria glare at Elsa, attempting to vent her ire at the killing of Hildea. But, the Orthrus was quicker, placing Saria atop its malevolently writhing tongue.

Thus, it was but an instant until Saria, face twisting in hatred, was swallowed up by the closing fangs.

Naught a scream could be heard. Only, the sound of chewing echoed throughout the plaza— the cleansing operation that had targeted the snowy metropolis, thus met a terribly wretched end.



Chapter 5:
Ornea Featherrun

1

Elsa: “—The cross sections are quite pretty, and I suppose they can be reconnected since they were chilled by the snow.”

Releasing Oliver from the top of the time tower, Elsa spoke as she gently reached her hand out towards him. In her palm were six of Oliver’s severed fingers that she had picked up.

It was the result of his fingers having been tied to steel wires and applying force to them. Considering that it was a very real possibility for all his fingers to be blown off, sending Oliver himself plunging to his death, this could have even been called a miraculous outcome.

At the very least, he still retained four of his original fingers, and there was a chance that the severed six could still be reconnected.

But then again—

Elsa: “When you’re being told so by me, who can grow limbs back when they’re torn off, doesn’t it sound sarcastic, I wonder?”

Oliver: “…”

Elsa: “Hey, Oliver, are you listening?”

Giving no response, Oliver crouched atop the snow. His lack of movement almost made him appear to be dead, but Oliver slowly lifted his head when she called out to him.

His facial features, once called handsome, distorted in grief as melancholy engraved itself around his eyes and cheeks. In a completely altered state, he began to move his parched lips, and,

Oliver: “Tatiana, where…”

Elsa: “She died.”

Oliver: “—Hk.”

Elsa: “It was because she acted recklessly without bearing her own ability in mind. To think that would be the ruin of the Mad Dog, Tatiana, is quite ironic indeed.”

Oliver had been unable to grasp the state of the plaza amidst all the agony and dismay, prompting his face to stiffen.

Tatiana’s death had impacted Elsa to a much greater extent than she thought it would have. But, impacts would eventually disperse, fade, and gradually return to serenity. What remained in the aftermath, was but a tinge of loneliness.

Elsa: “…Ah, that’s right.”

Reflecting on her own feelings, Elsa was surprised at herself for feeling that tinge of loneliness.

Only lasting a mere few weeks, the time she had spent with Tatiana had been short compared to her days with the Featherrun Sisters, but it seemed to have been a pleasant relationship in its own way.

With Tatiana gone, she felt lonely. And, that had been the same for Saria and Hildea.

Elsa: “I’d also thought the same during that time with Dorothea, but… surprisingly, I am a woman with emotions.”

Oliver: “…Elsa, ye’re…”

Elsa: “Me? I’m fine. As you can see, I’m full of energy. Even if I did sustain some wounds, it’s almost like they never happened…”

Oliver: “That… ain’t it. Ye’re… ye lasses are, what th’hell are the lot o’ ye?”

Having worn out his throat from screaming, Oliver questioned her with a hoarse voice. Hearing the vague question, Elsa inclined her head with a “Who’s to say?”.

Elsa: “Even I don’t really understand it. Only, I received a peculiar body through a peculiar ritual. Though, I should have more or less been a normal human back in the days I was at your place.”

Oliver: “Healing wounds, bouncing ‘round everywhere, killing masses without batting an eye, acting like it’s all okay even when ye friend dies…”

Elsa: “…”

Oliver: “Elsa, just what th’hell are the lot o’ ye?”

That question had made her feel a definite isolation.

Somehow or another, Elsa had intended on building an amicable relationship with Oliver. Even if it seemed insolent from an outside perspective, Elsa had wanted to stand as his equal.

Though, given their roles as slaver and slave, attempting to establish an equal relationship was a rather odd notion.

Elsa: “Oliver, I’m…”

Perhaps because she had harbored that faint discord, Elsa’s response was delayed but a moment.

And in that moment, it transpired.

???: “—The Featherrun Sisters.”

Elsa: “…”

A voice suddenly cut in, snapping both Elsa and Oliver to attention.

For Oliver, it was an unknown voice of a third party, but for Elsa, it was an impossible voice to which her ears were all too familiar.

—No, it was nothing so impossible. To begin with, Saria and Hildea, who she would have never imagined would seek vengeance for Dorothea, had gone so far as to launch a cleansing operation.

In that case, the manifestation of this chance encounter had been an entirely possible development.

???: “Something wrong, Elsa? This ain’t like yourself, you look like you’ve seen a Hollow.”

Elsa: “—Ornea. So even you’ve come.”

Ornea: “…To tell you the truth, there was never any intention of actually deploying me, tho’.”

Heaving a sigh as she spoke was a young girl, her mature aura belying her youthful appearance— the second daughter of the Featherrun Sisters, Ornea Featherrun.

A tremor ran through Elsa the moment Ornea entered, the chains in the latter’s grip dragging behind her. Her specialized weapon, the kusari-fundo, had an enormous mass of flesh caught on its tip.

A writhing, deep red clump of flesh. Its identity was easy to surmise. Commanded by Saria and Hildea, yet in the end obeying Elsa by following its survival instincts, it was the Orthrus that had devoured the twins.

Elsa: “Though, it listened to what I said, so I had intended on setting it free.”

Ornea: “With one of its heads crushed? No way a twin headed demon dog is lasting long with a missing head. More importantly, this thing devoured my lil’ sisters. I’m taking their remains back.”

Elsa: “They should be totally mangled, but can you revive them?”

Ornea: “…Just grieving the dead, it’s that and nothing more. If eaten and chewed up alive, not even a Featherrun Sister… even if it were you or I, could be saved.”

Her cheeks distorting in annoyance, Ornea expressed her will to bring her sisters home along with the demon dog. Hearing that, Elsa tilted her head with “in that case”,

Elsa: “Before you take them home, do you mind if I open its stomach up? There should be a slave of Oliver’s in there along with Saria and Hildea.”

Ornea: “…Do you really think you’re in the sorta position to demand things of me like that?”

Elsa: “There shouldn’t be any harm in asking. You’re sweet, Ornea, so I thought I’d just try to ask and see.”

Ornea: “—I’m, sweet?”

That instant, stabbing into Elsa’s whole body was the bloodlust emanating from Ornea’s petite build.

In her battle against the twins, Elsa’s body had been unshackled from some kind of chains. But, although she had thought her body had arrived at the same level as Ornea’s, it trembled upon being exposed to Ornea’s murderous intent.

To think she had finally risen to Ornea’s domain, what an incredible misunderstanding. —The difference in strength between herself and the most powerful Featherrun Sister seemed even larger now that she had closed some of the gap separating them.

Moreover, in her current wounded state, just how good of a fight would she be able to put up against Ornea?

Elsa: “But then again… from the outset, I never intended on only fighting battles I know I can win.”

Ornea: “…Ever the same, aren’t you now?”

Seeing Elsa belligerently licking her lips, Ornea’s eyebrows dipped in exasperation. That instant, the bloodlust that had swept over the plaza dispersed, and the tension in Elsa's body also unconsciously vanished.

Be that as it may, the fact that Ornea still did not relax demonstrated her true strength. Back at the mansion, she had thoroughly pulverized Elsa's body as casually as making small talk.

Perceiving that sense of urgency still thick in the air, Elsa observed Ornea with utmost caution—

Oliver: "—Are ye a sister of the ones who did all this?"

The one to interject thereupon was Oliver, who had been placed outside the mosquito net.

Ornea: "…"

At the interjection of an unthinkable third party, Ornea directed her gaze towards Oliver. He had lost six of his fingers, and though the slaver ought to have been experiencing a ceaseless torment of violent pain, he received that gaze head-on.

Ornea: "Hm, now there's a face I don't know."

Oliver: "Tahaha, that so now? As ye can see, I'd intended on operating on an extensive scale, but the world just happened to be far wider and deeper than I'd imagined."

Foolishly chuckling, Oliver did not show any hints of the pain from his torture wounds. With that admirable demeanor, he craned his neck around the plaza, and signaled to the town.

Oliver: "Causing this much of an uproar in the Gustekan Church's turf… o' course, that's a huge gamble that ye could only ever pull off if ye were resolved to be branded as a heretic and hunted down."

Ornea: "Well, it certainly was a catastrophe. But, we're…"

Oliver: "Ye've got a shield covering your back to make sure that won't happen. Just before, ye said "Featherrun Sisters", aye? That's to say, the lot o’ ye are involved with Holosseo Featherrun-dono.”

Ornea: “…”

With a greasy sweat forming on his brow, Oliver’s loose lips prompted Ornea to narrow her eyes. Then, she closed the distance to Oliver, seizing the slaver by the collar with her small hand.

With Ornea’s superhuman strength, she could easily shatter Oliver’s cervical vertebrae just by pouring strength into her fingers.

Elsa: “Ornea, that man is…”

Ornea: “A slaver you’re involved with, yeah? I know this man’s been sheltering you. That’s enough grounds to say he has enmity against the Church of the Holy King.”

As Ornea constricted Oliver and spoke those words, Elsa tried to find an opening. But, even with one arm occupied, Elsa saw not a single opening in Ornea.

Nonetheless, with one of Ornea’s arms occupied with Oliver, now was her best chance. Just when she resolved herself to challenge Ornea’s small frame to a final battle as soon as possible—

Oliver: “But, ye don’t got ‘nough sense o’ duty to say anything to the Church of the Holy King, miss. That’s how it looks to me.”

Ornea: “…What?”

Oliver: “Rather, don’t it seem like ye’ve got some reservations here ‘n there? Miss, ye look like ye don’t find the wretched state of this town very pleasing, ye know?”

Ornea: “—You’re one aggravating man. There’s a foolhardiness to you that’s akin to Elsa.”

Oliver: “Though, I’m also just something like a victim being led along…”

With chilly eyes did Ornea briefly glare at Oliver as he smiled pitifully. Then, after Ornea took a long, deep sigh, Ornea: “…Indeed, I was against this cleansing operation. Even though they caused this level of destruction, Saria and Hildea died, while Elsa managed to survive.”

Oliver: “In the first place, why were ye aiming for Elsa?”

Ornea: “That’s—”

Oliver’s question pierced the crux of the matter, and Ornea’s expression contorted in silence.

The cause of that was the anguish derived from her inability to speak of the events that had served as the impetus for things having reached this state.

From what Elsa had heard from Oliver, Holosseo still seemed to be nonchalantly frequenting high society. Though, Elsa knew that the mechanism behind that lay in Sithonia’s unusual ability.

Oliver: “Ah, if ye can’t talk on it then don’t get concerned over it. ‘S just… the Elsa I know’s an unserious girl who treats every bloody thing like it’s someone else’s problem.”

Ornea: “Just what the hell is it that you wanna say?! If you’re gonna interfere with our affairs any further, I’ll pluck that head right off—”

Oliver: “Wouldn’t it be better for the lot o’ ye to actually try and just talk things out?”

Ornea: “…”

Seized by the collar, Oliver wrung out his words. His utterance left Ornea gazing in astonishment; thereupon taking her hand off him, she turned to face Elsa.

And then—

Ornea: “Right now, you and I are the only ones here. Dorothea, Saria, and Hildea are all dead, and Sithonia is waiting for a report back at the mansion. So, be honest with me, Elsa.”

Elsa: "…What is it?"

With Ornea now having released Oliver, both her hands were free, thus Elsa had missed her opportunity to get the jump on her. As that fact vexed Elsa, Ornea's lips quivered,

Ornea: "That day… the night Father died, what happened? For what reason, did you kill Father? For what reason, did you split up the Featherrun Sisters…?"

Elsa: "Ah, that day…"

At Ornea's imploring query, Elsa recalled the night in question.

When all the sisters had received missions and left the mansion, and Elsa was left behind on her own, Holosseo, whilst speaking exaggerations, had also bestowed upon her a mission.

And, as for the details of that mission—

Ornea: "Answer me! Elsa, why did you kill Father?!"

Elsa: "—? You ask some strange things. It's because the Father in question told me to do so."

Ornea: "…"

Wearing a blank expression, Elsa responded as such to the query.

And upon hearing that, Ornea's expression froze over. From her congealed expression, it seemed as if Ornea could not comprehend Elsa's words.

In fact, Ornea blinked her eyes many times over, and continued with a "Wait",

Ornea: "What… are you saying? Just now, what did you say?"

Elsa: "Like I said, I was instructed by our father. He said that it was necessary for the completion of the Curse Dolls, that the Featherrun Sisters would thus be brought to completion."

Ornea: “Bullshit.”

Elsa: “Excuse you.”

Ornea muttered aghast, to which Elsa voiced her disapproval. But, Elsa immediately realized that Ornea’s mutter was not directed towards her, but rather to something else, cursing out absurdity itself.

Ornea clutched her own head, reluctantly shaking it from side to side, and,

Ornea: “Father, he wouldn’t… no, but, a doll maker has methods that only a doll maker can comprehend, no? In that case, for what reason have we all been…”

Oliver: “Just meaningless fighting to the death, I s’ppose that’s all ye were doing. If that’s the case, I offer me condolences.”

Ornea: “—Hk!”

Amidst her confusion, Ornea erupted at Oliver’s interruption. Her kusari-fundo screeched as it violently smashed the stone pavement in the plaza right next to Oliver.

Oliver: “…”

But, receiving that deadly threat, there was no change in Oliver’s demeanor; rather, it was Ornea’s throat that clogged up as if she had been cornered.

Ornea: “You’re…”

Oliver: “Suppose it’s actually as Elsa said…”

As Oliver continued, Ornea listened as she held her tongue. She had fallen right into the scheme laid by Oliver’s silver tongue, though she did not seem aware of that fact.

As Oliver gestured his finger-lacking hand towards the unaware Ornea, Oliver: “If the source of your quarrel lay within himself, he ought’ve taken measures to prevent ye from fighting to the death. Maybe your father wasn’t the type to be prone to such thoughts?”

Ornea: “Bullshit! Our father’s thinking might have been inscrutable, but, that sorta…”

Elsa: “—Ornea?”

Ornea: “That, sorta…

Ornea protested fervently, but that fervor withered as she spoke. Looking as if she had realized something, Ornea did not even respond to Elsa’s call,

Ornea: “I need to confirm something…”

With that, she turned her back towards Elsa and Oliver.

Releasing the Orthrus’s flesh from her kusari-fundo, she quickly retracted her weapon. Then, once again did Elsa call out “Ornea” to the petite figure,

Elsa: “If you’re leaving Saria and Hildea behind, would it be alright for us to mourn them over here?”

Ornea: “—. Do as you please. I’ve got things to do.”

Elsa: “I see… Hey, Ornea. Ever since that night, we haven’t had any time to just leisurely talk.”

Ornea was just about to walk away, but her legs came to a halt. Looking at the back of her tiny elder sister, Elsa reflected on that night— the night Holosseo had died.

Things had gotten out of hand, and they had ended up parting without exchanging words, but—

Elsa: “I really do find it regrettable. That’s how I truly feel.”

Ornea: “…”

Elsa: “So be the Silver Affection. —Ornea.”

Giving no response to that prayer, Ornea departed as she left footprints on the snow-covered path. Only when her figure disappeared from sight did Elsa finally feel like she had made it out alive.

She had made it out alive from a situation she had no chance of winning. While grateful to that fortune, she gazed out over the wretched scene.

The plaza was filled with heaps of corpses that perished in the cleansing operation, and while similar sights ought to have been spread around various places in town, the only ones Elsa grieved for were her sisters and Tatiana, all eaten by the Orthrus.

At the very least, she would bury them someplace a little higher; that was all Elsa thought.

2

On lands outside the grace of Hallowed Land, even just digging a grave was hard work.

Clearing away the snow that had amassed on top, smashing through the snow that had frozen in place, and breaking the even further glaciated subnivean soil, the act of simply digging a hole felt like excavating a boulder, but finally, she cleared out a satisfactory grave hole.

A hillock from where Innorandum could be seen below, was the location Elsa had selected as a gravesite.

Elsa: “Three graves would be too tiring, so please bear with this. You may find Tatiana a handful, but you did kill her, so I thought you should take responsibility.”

With that, Elsa heaved the Orthrus carcass into the pit, entombing Tatiana and the twins, Saria and Hildea, all together. Including the Orthrus, it was a tomb for three people and one beast.

By digging this grave, Elsa’s arms were the worse for wear.

Her fingers had lost most of their original form, and a vast amount of blood was scattered around her. Without any tools, Elsa had needed to break her own arms in order to break the frozen soil.

Thus, she had broken them. That was all there was to it.

Oliver: “Even if that’s all, that’s normally something ye’d hesitate on.”

Elsa: “They’ll heal, so it’s no big deal. It hurts, but it’s fine if I just ignore it a little.”

Oliver: “A little, huh. Having lost some of my own fingers, I can’t understand that attitude in the slightest.”

Gazing over the completed grave, Oliver, who had been watching over Elsa as she worked, chuckled sarcastically. It was the sort of smile he did not show very often, but Elsa did not touch upon it.

Instead, Elsa called out “Oliver” to him,

Elsa: “—Torture is designed to make you divulge secrets, so I think there was no helping it.”

Indeed, as Oliver blamed himself, Elsa provided not consolation, but the matter-of-fact truth.

Oliver: “…”

Hearing Elsa’s words, Oliver cast his unpleasant expression downwards.

Oliver’s whole body had been tormented by the twins, including the loss of his fingers. It was unclear how the twins had located Oliver, but the reason why Elsa and Tatiana’s whereabouts had become the target location for the cleansing operation was apparent.

None other than Oliver had yielded that information in torture.

As a result, Innorandum became the target of a cleansing operation, and Tatiana had perished.

Oliver: “I’m a damn failure of a slaver…”

Elsa: “Is that so? Ah, but, you might be right. I’ve never heard of a slaver falling into such a depressive slump after letting a slave die.”

Oliver: “Tatiana… she was a girl who deserved to find happiness…”

Elsa: “Indeed. But, I think it’s presumptuous to say that dying means she was unhappy.”

Elsa refuted Oliver’s voice, which was not a tearful one, but rather, one that cursed himself and himself alone.

Speaking of Tatiana’s final moments as if they had ended in mere unhappiness rubbed her the wrong way.

In the end, Tatiana’s expression when she pulled Elsa away and threw herself before the Orthrus— it was not one that lamented her own imminent death.

Her spirit had arrived at a different place, one that transcended such notions.

Hence—

Elsa: “Tatiana’s death belonged to Tatiana alone. It’s not something for outsiders like us to say this or that about. More importantly, let’s do what we have to do.”

Oliver: “…What we’ve got to do? What in the world’re ye talking about?”

Elsa: “First of all, sticking your fingers back on. When you lack that many fingers, it’s bound to be an inconvenience. I don’t like that. You need to be taken care of”

Before the grave, she grabbed Oliver by the shoulders as he crouched weakly, and dragged him up to his feet. For a moment, Oliver attempted to resist Elsa’s hands, but he immediately realized the futility of that action.

Just as he had mocked himself, Oliver slowly shook his head side to side, and,

Oliver: “No matter what it is, I’ve never been able to go against ye… When ye think of it like that, the notion that I’m a failure of a slaver, it might be something I’m only realizing way too late now.”

Elsa: “Yes, truly. It’s truly too late now.”

Oliver strained a smile at Elsa’s merciless evaluation. Seemingly dragging him along, Elsa would search for a doctor to reattach his fingers, and so, once again, they returned to Innorandum.

All the while, her instincts were telling her that the time they could spend quietly like this, would not last long.

3

???: “…”

Storming through the familiar mansion with quick steps, Ornea forced open the door to the room of her destination as if she were tearing it down.

Ever-present in the heart of Holosseo’s office, a space crammed with stacks of confidential documents that could not be taken outside, was Sithonia.

Sithonia: “…Have you returned, Ornea?”

She closed the book she had been reading with nary a sound, gazing upon Ornea with her red eyes. Receiving her gaze head on, Ornea nodded with a “Yeah”.

Ornea: “I’m back. I’ve returned… Saria and Hildea, they both died.”

Sithonia: “…It would seem so. I received a report of a failed cleansing operation. However, I had not heard anything about you heading to Innorandum. Why act on your own accord?”

Ornea: “That’s, because… I was gonna provide backup, to Saria and Hildea…”

Sithonia: “But, the two of them died. And it was not because you arrived too late, correct? You intentionally let them both die… No, that is not it.”

Shaking her head, Sithonia slowly stood up from her chair. Then, as her long, red hair fluttered, Sithonia stood in front of Ornea, running her fingers through the latter’s green hair.

Feeling a ticklish sensation on her temple, Ornea caught her breath.

Sithonia: “You were unable to decide on whether to support Saria and Hildea, or Elsa.”

Ornea: “—Hk.”

Sithonia: “You did always dote on Elsa. Being as sweet as you are, choosing between sisters is impossible for you.”

As Sithonia’s icy voice pointed out thus, Ornea’s slender shoulders trembled.

She had hit the mark, and there was no room for excuses. Ornea had rushed to the battlefield amidst the cleansing operation and could have entered the fray whenever she wished.

But, she had done no such thing. —After all, she could not decide on whom to support.

Thus, Ornea’s indecision had allowed the sisters’ mortal combat to play out until the end.

Sithonia: “Ultimately, Elsa killed Saria and Hildea, that’s three sisters total including Dorothea. Of the Featherrun Sisters, you and I are the only two remaining…”

Ornea: “If, if our assumption was wrong from the outset, what then?!”

Sithonia: “—?”

The tenacious utterance of Ornea caused Sithonia to make a curious expression. Looking right up at Sithonia, Ornea referred to the owner of the office, the deceased Holosseo,

Ornea: “I spoke with Elsa. This is what she told me: the reason she killed Father was because Father had ordered her to do so. In other words, we’d misunderstood things right from the start!”

Sithonia: “…”

Ornea: “Father had some unfathomable objective. And for that reason, Father was killed by Elsa; she was never good at explaining things, and because of that, we chased her away… so then…”

Sithonia: “So then, you want to forgive Elsa? Ornea, are you truly saying that?”

Ornea: “—Ah.”

Her cheeks clasped by two hands, Ornea fell silent at Sithonia’s question. Lowering the hand that had been caressing her hair, Sithonia questioned the intent behind Ornea’s hesitation.

Would she truly be fine with that? And, on top of that—

Sithonia: “So you spoke with Elsa… That is why I had not wanted to let you go to Innorandum.”

Ornea: “…Sithonia?”

Her face suddenly released from the grasp, Ornea blinked her eyes. Sithonia took a step back, and from within the heap of documents, she pulled out a single note.

Holding it to her chest, Sithonia silently sighed before the perplexed Ornea,

Sithonia: “—The Witch of Envy.”

And, she muttered so.

The repulsive reverberance strewed confusion in Ornea, as well as an even greater sense of revulsion. For all who lived in this world, it was a vile name, one to be avoided, one to be feared.

An existence that even the Featherrun Sisters, who by no means walked under the light, found repugnant. It was a dreadful, hideous name of a being that once attempted to destroy the world.

Ornea: “Why, that name…?”

Sithonia: “Did you know? In the past, there were Witches in this world other than the Witch of Envy. But, those Witches were killed by the Witch of Envy, thus stealing their power. It is told that by doing so, the Witch of Envy became a being whom none could rival.”

Sithonia began to speak at length about history that was not commonly known. The fact that other Witches had existed was something that not even Ornea had been aware of. Hence, that topic in itself was something that surprised her. However—

Ornea: “That topic, why are you bringing it up now…?”

Sithonia: “—Because, it is not irrelevant to us, as Curse Dolls.”

As chills of unpleasant dread tinged her senses, Ornea interrupted Sithonia. As if knowing that, Sithonia continued with the note held against her chest.

Sithonia: “Ornea, do you know what the root of a Curse Doll is?”

Ornea: “…I heard it’s something that makes use of Curse Arts. By using the principle that the effectiveness of a Curse Art doesn’t fade until it can no longer manifest, we obstruct our own deaths.”

Sithonia: “Exactly, a curse does not perish until it kills its target. Curse Dolls utilize this… we cannot perish without killing an opponent we must kill.”

Ornea: “I agree with that, but… no, wait…”

Nodding as Sithonia spoke, Ornea called a timeout.

The inability to die without killing an opponent who must be killed. If that was the special characteristic of a Curse Doll, then how had Dorothea and the others died?

Ornea: “It’s a fact that we had individual differences in our regeneration ability. But, if what you’re saying is certain, then they should’ve made it out alive, given enough time…”

Sithonia: “It’s quite simple, Ornea. —It’s because they exchanged lives with an opponent they needed to kill.”

Ornea: “…”

Ornea’s dread grew ever larger, slowly crawling up her spine. Rejecting the instincts that told her that the dread originated not from within the conversation, but from Sithonia herself, Ornea shook her head from side to side.

Sithonia: “The reason the Witch of Envy became such a mighty existence, was because she killed and devoured the other Witches. Thus, the one who had thought to enact that very same phenomenon, was Holosseo Featherrun.”

Rather than as “Father”, Sithonia called Holosseo by name. A concern about the contents of the note clutched to her chest began to gnaw at Ornea’s heart, and thus she reached out her hand.

Ornea: “Sithonia, what’s written on that? Show me.”

Sithonia: “Holosseo’s Curse Arts, the Curse Dolls birthed thereforth… the Featherrun techniques are a remnant of heresy from the era of the ancient Witches. And, there is a person who cannot help but lust for them.”

Ornea: “SITHONIA—!!”

Sithonia: “—That person is mine abominable, accursed Mother.”

Sithonia’s confession was as a poem, causing Ornea to tear her legs off the ground.

The feelings between sisters, the deep affection that a second daughter bore the eldest, in this moment was overturned, morphing into hatred.

Sithonia had schemed something in secrecy away from the sisters.

And, that had been the genesis of the sisters' division, bereaving Ornea of the days she had envisioned.

Therefore—

Ornea: "Once I've knocked you down, I'll—"

Hear you out; brandishing her kusari-fundo, Ornea's fierce attack attempted to strike Sithonia.

Their relationship was that of eldest and second daughters, but with Ornea's level of strength, Sithonia was no match for her. Hence, her reaction time was not fast enough to evade Ornea's attack.

That was to say, there had been a different reason why Ornea's blow came to a halt.

For instance, getting her arms and legs tangled up in her very own kusari-fundo.

Sithonia: "You did well, how admirable."

Immediately after hearing Sithonia's gentle voice, Ornea fell head-first onto the floor without bracing for impact. Hitting her nose hard, a lukewarm sensation, blood, dripped out of her nose.

There was no pain. By birth, that was how it always was for her. But, something was strange.

Ornea: "M-My body…"

She could not move it at will. If it had merely stiffened up that would have been preferable, but it was not even that.

Half of Ornea's body was being restrained by her own kusari-fundo. Not because she had erred in its handling, but rather, the act of restraint was borne of a definite will.

However, no such intent existed within Ornea. So its very presence meant that—

Ornea: "No way, what did you do to my body…?"

Sithonia: “I have known you the longest, so it was not so difficult to gradually soak it into you. Though, it was painful for my heart.”

Sithonia squatted down next to Ornea, the latter collapsed onto the floor, unmoving. Whilst taking care to mind the hem of her dress, she cast an unaltered, gentle gaze onto Ornea.

Then, as Ornea caught her breath, Sithonia softly presented the note before her eyes. With that profound article thrust before her, Ornea’s eyes scanned its contents,

Ornea: “Bull… shit…”

—Knowing it to be a note left behind by Holosseo Featherrun, she was aghast.

Of course, it contained many things worthy of astonishment. But, what truly earned her shock was none other than Sithonia, who had known about the note’s existence, and had kept it hidden.

Ornea: “SITHONIA, YOU’RE…!”

Sithonia: “I am grateful to you, to the sisters, to Holosseo, that is the truth.”

Interrupting Ornea as she raised her voice, Sithonia spoke so. Ornea was left speechless at her audacity, and as Sithonia placed her hand over her own chest,

Sithonia: “Even if it was only for a brief time, being away from that woman’s side has truly felt like salvation. However, the time for viewing such dreams has ended. —Ornea, I envy you.”

Betrayed by one she had believed in, and the power she was so sure was absolute suppressed, Ornea lay sprawled on the ground in vexation; looking down on her, Sithonia placed an earnest envy upon her own tongue.

With that earnest envy upon her tongue, Sithonia spoke.

Sithonia: “Without knowing a thing, able to remain as a little girl, I truly, oh so truly, envy you.”

4

—As soon as her eardrums caught a faint clangor of metal, Elsa picked up Oliver’s body.

Elsa: “…”

Applying the lessons learned from the last time, there was no negligence.

When out in town with Tatiana, it had been far too lacking in vigilance for her to have walked around without carrying a weapon. Given the result begotten by that accumulated negligence, she was firmly opposed to letting it happen a second time.

Elsa: “Besides, if I was as careless this time, I would have been killed.”

Of course, Saria and Hildea had also been formidable foes, but the difference in their potential had turned the tables on them. However, such an upheaval would not work against the next opponent. Not to mention, if she was careless in any capacity, she was convinced that she would be snuffed out in an instant along with that carelessness.

Hence, for the first time in Elsa’s life, she removed from herself every last sliver of negligence.

Oliver: “Wai—?!!”

The screams of Oliver could be heard as she picked him up, but Elsa showed no concern. Lifting one of her long legs and kicking down the window of the dragon carriage, she leaped outside whilst carrying Oliver.

Immediately afterwards, the dragon carriage they had escaped from was seized by a clangor of metal, the impact pulverizing the frame to smithereens.

There had been other passengers riding the public transport dragon carriage, but the passengers, coachman, and ground dragons alike, were crushed, cast away to become an amalgamation of flesh and blood where none could be differentiated from the other.

Thus, that which had carried out such an extraordinary feat of destruction— was a chain of silver hue, writhing like a snake.

Elsa: "—Ornea."

The wreckage of the utterly macerated dragon carriage, and the kusari-fundo that brought that reality to fruition. The identity of its wielder laid in the small silhouette standing upon the forward path of the dragon carriage.

Clad in an emerald dress to suit the green of her hair, that had been the onslaught of Ornea Featherrun.

Oliver: "So she's come, aye? That lass…"

Still held in Elsa's arms, Oliver muttered, his reattached fingers wrapped in bandages.

It was an ambush on their way back to base after completing his medical treatment. Elsa had not gotten that impression, but if Ornea had been wary of their escape, Elsa would have expected for a fight to have been picked before they went into hiding.

Elsa: "My body has also returned to form… the playing field is even."

After a few days had passed, she had replenished her lacking flesh and blood through eating.

The wounds she had sustained during Saria and Hildea's assault had already healed, and there was no longer anything impeding her ability to fight. If there was anything at all in the way of Elsa doing battle, that would be,

Elsa: "You're in the way, so get back, Oliver. It would be troubling were you to end up like Tatiana."

Oliver: "Ye bloody… ahh, shit!"

As he tried to scratch his head, his lack of fingers prevented him from doing so. As a result, Oliver shook his moderately-long hair, and as he parted from Elsa's side,

Oliver: "Elsa! Ye'd better not die before I can sell ye off!"

Elsa: "Your merchant's soul is strong. I don't dislike it."

